UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS LIBRARY
AT URBANA-CHAMPAIGN
STACKS

NOTICE: Return or renew all Library Materials! The Minimum Fee for each Lost Book is $50.00.

The person charging this material is responsible for its return to the library from which it was withdrawn on or before the Latest Date stamped below.

Theft, mutilation, and underlining of books are reasons for disciplinary action and may result in dismissal from the University.
To renew call Telephone Center, 333-8400

UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS LIBRARY AT URBANA-CHAMPAIGN

BUILDING USE ONLY

DEC 17 1988

DEC 17 1988

L161—O-1096

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2021 with funding from University of Illinois Urbana-Champaign

https://archive.org/details/nation4190unse

The Nation

VOLUME IV

October 3rd, 1908, to March 27th, 1909.

LONDON: 14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN.

052
N
V.4

LONDON
PRINTED BY THE NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY LIMITED, WHITEFRIARS HOUSE, E C.

The Nation

INDEX.

POLITICS AND AFFAIRS.

	PAGE
A Bad Beginning with the Lords	493
Afforestation, The Case for	630
A Great Ambassador	702
An Equitable Budget	662
Anglo-German Tension, The	701
Another British Nation	737
A Scare and Its Makers	916
A Sermon in Stones	882
Austria as a Slavonic Power	366
A Victory and a Defeat	174
A Voting Experiment. By Lord Courtney ...	337
Azeff, The Possibility of	846
Balkan Problem, The	105
Basis of Security, The	808
Berlin Visit, The Fruits of the	736
Book War, The Close of the	7
Career of M. Clemenceau, The	565
Character of Parties, The	492
China's Anti-Opium Crusade	663
Church Liberalism, A Defeat for	296
Constitutionalism, First Steps to	295
Continental Socialism, The Stalemate of	883
Coquetting with Conscription	881
Democratic Party, The Downfall of the	210
Dominant Issue Again, The	880
Dominating Issue not Dominant, The	596
Educational Concordat, The Hope of an	177
Educational Peace, The Path to	332
Effect of "Bluff" in Politics, The	660
End of the Mir, The	495
European Concert, The Need for a	809
Europe, The Impotence of	918
Fact, "Dominating," The	661
Fight or Abdicate!	328
Finance of Social Reform, The	243
Free Trade Unionists, The Fate of the	848
From Panic to Reason	952
From Pensions to Insurance	566
German Policy, The Motives of	955
German Shipbuilding, The Truth About	953
Good Allies and Bad Europeans	240
Government, The Task of the	104
Hard Times and Socialism	208
High Licences, The Success of	294
Hope of a Revival of Trade, The	956
Hostage, The	460

	PAGE
Idealism and Life	211
Influence of Kingship, The	564
In Sight of a Settlement	212
Insurance for Unemployment	738
Is Nonconformity too Political?	740
Kaiser's Appeal, The	172
Labor in Partnership	107
Land Values and the Budget	494
Lesson of the Scottish Elections, The. By One Who Knows	885
Liberalism, The Issue for	364
Liberalism, The Two Paths for	772
Liberalism, The Wearing Down of	421
Liberal Party and the Navy, The	665
Liberal Responsibility to Europe	844
Liberal Turkey and the "Times"	774
Licensing Bill, The Future of the	4
Licensing Bill, The Progress of the	138
Lord Morley's Success	528
Lords, A Test Case for the	292
Miners' Bill and Free Trade, The	459
Motor-Car, The Control of the	244
Do. do. do. do.	632
Mr. Burns, The Personality of	139
Mr. Roosevelt, The Ineffectiveness of	424
Nature's War with Man	567
Naval Power, A New Definition of	293
Navy, The New Scare about the	700
New American Tariff, The	919
Ottoman Parliament, The Chances of the... ...	456
Persia, The Fate of	629
Policy of the Super-Tax, The	367
Poor Law, The Ending or the Mending of the ...	773
Powers, The Cynicism of the	40
Protection, Some Fatuities of	812
Public Opinion and the Death Penalty	599
Railway Amalgamation	6
Reform of the Constitution, The	420
Remaining Work of the Government, The ...	810
Roosevelt Manner, The	598
Royal Message, The Meaning of the	207
Saving and Character	531
Secular Solution, The	423
Shall the "Dominating Issue" be Dominant? ...	456
Shall we Build against America?	329

186703

POLITICS AND AFFAIRS (continued).

	PAGE
Sir Edward Grey's Opportunity	530
Social Reform, The Church and	43
Social Reform, The Manner of	703
Some Impressions of the Session. By James Drysdale	497
South African Convention, The	106
Suffragists and Suffragettes...	242
Time Limit, The Extension of the	175
Triumph of the Wreckers, The	365
True Conceptions of State Help	845
Turn of the Confederate Screw, The	628
Turkey, How England can Help	137
Turkey, The Future of	41
Turkish Crisis, The	4
Two European Camps, The...	597
Unemployed, The Government and the	136
Unemployed, The State and the	42
Vacant Archbishopric, The...	245
What "Equality of Sacrifice" Means	776
What is a Fair Wage?	529
Will Canada Maintain Her Preference?	422
Women's Suffrage, The Logic of	920
Work, The Right to	173
Young Turkey and Young Persia	330

LIFE AND LETTERS.

	PAGE
Achievement of Darwin, The	741
Alien Fox, The	112
An Anglican Bishop...	816
A New Year Entertainment...	636
A Rebel	889
A Word and an Action	602
Barbara. By Miss May Kendall	12
Beauty of a Native Tongue, The	633
Believer, The. By the Rev. S. Henry	781
Bible as Criticism of Life, The	426
Bird and its Friends, The	780
Broken Alabaster, The	535
Burns the Realist	667
Cats, In Praise of	216
Child of the Yellow Press, The	706
Christianity and Democracy. By the Dean of Ripon	8
Christmas and Charity	497
City Crowd, The	111
Close of November, The	336
Confession of Mr. Wells, The	298
Danger of Eugenics, The	886
Dead Man, The. By John Galsworthy	217
Dean's Dilemma, The. By the Rev. S. Henry ...	573
Defender of the Faith, A	109
Dial in Paradise, The	815
Edgar Allan Poe. By G. B. S.	601
Enjoyment of the "Earth," The	666
Eternal Jeremiad, The	371
Flowers, The Naming of	215
Fortunate Musician, The	669
Freshening by Frost...	573
Furious Century, The	959
Gates of Sense, The	300
Genius of Lincoln, The	705
Gentle Art of Fighting, The	334
Gilbert, The Genius of. By G. K. C.	370
Goddesses of the Camera, The. By Sidney Low...	467
Good and the Beautiful, The	922
Good Book, A. By G. K. C.	10
Good Samaritan, The	335
Grammaticals...	46
Graphomania...	110
Harlequin and Columbine. By C. E. Lawrence...	400
Harvest of An Ideal, The	246
Harvest of Waterloo, The	463
Heart of Fire...	142
Home Life of Jesus, The	604
Idea of Brotherhood, The	461
"Iliad" as a Whole, The	923
Instability of the World	178
In the Rain	465
Irish Song, The	888
Jolly World, The	143
Last Enemy, The. By the Rev. S. Henry	49
Latter-day Prophet, The	849
Life of a Roman Citizen, The	813
Little Pension, The. By Padraic Colum	961
Logician in Parliament, The...	851
Lonely Men, The	743
Macaulay, The Permanence of	44
Matings of Valentine's Day, The	744
Methods of Melodrama	141
Mind of the Apes, The	924
Mountain Glory, The	779
Nests of Defiance	605
New Determinism, The	777
Novelette and the Superwoman, The	428
"Now then, Smith!"	570
Oak and the Acorn, The	48
Of Good and Evil	670
On Art and Mysteries	707
On Nursery Rhymes...	144
On the Margin of Life	634
Our Want of Philosophers	742
Paralysis of Satire, The. By G. K. C.	850
Personalism	45
Pitt the Elder	297
Princess and the Messenger Boy, The. By Sidney Low	638
Psychology of a Panic, The...	957
Radical Pioneer, A	9
Reality of Jesus, The	500
Religion of the Spirit, The	180
Revealing Night, The	372
Robberies of the Sea, The	250
Ruin of England, The. By Mrs. E. Nesbit ...	399

LIFE AND LETTERS (continued).

	PAGE
Russian People, The Character of the	179
Salmon in the Thames	181
Science and Faith	213
Seasonable Witch, The	501
"Security" and Change	533
Shop Life and Citizenship	569
Sights and Sounds of the Fall	301
Sleepers, The...	536
Soul of Cities, The	214
Speech of the Province, The...	333
Star of Milton, The	425
Sudden Splendor, The	462
"The Bacchanals"	249
"The Clanging Rookery"	709
The Gleam	534
Thoughts of the Poor, The...	247
Tudor Boy, The	369
Twin Stars of Poetry, The	958
What the Age Looks Like	498
Wind Flowers, The	852
Winter Garden, The...	637
Why the Leaves Turn Brown	11
Word and the Dictionary, The	571
"Yes" of Jesus, The	890

CONTEMPORARIES.

	PAGE
Mr. Taft	891
Professor Murray and the New Hellenism ...	671

ART, MUSIC, AND THE DRAMA.

ART.

	PAGE
A Modern Picture Buyer	607
Corot	114
Scottish Painting	748
The American School of Painting	14
The Art of the East	713
The Autumn Salon	221
The Place of Jacob Jordaens	504
The Secret of Whistler. By Sidney Low... ...	182

MUSIC.

	PAGE
Sir Edward Elgar's Symphony. By Ernest Newman	430

THE DRAMA.

	PAGE
A Hardy Annual. By William Archer	339
A New Actress. By William Archer	374
De Juventute. By William Archer	575
Mr. Galsworthy Arrives. By William Archer...	892
Mr. James and Mr. Jones. By William Archer...	818
Mr. Jones Philosophises. By William Archer ...	219
Mr. Tree and the Fairies. By William Archer...	504
"One Law for Man——" By William Archer ...	926
Patriotism, Passion, and Pugilism. By William Archer	711
"Penelope" and Popularity. By William Archer	606
Samson and Others. By William Archer ...	747
Sudermann and Hauptmann. By William Archer	431
The Magnanimous Engineer. By William Archer	251
The More or Less Real Woman. By William Archer	854
"The Truants." By William Archer	782

SCIENCE.

	PAGE
Popular Anthropology. By Dr. A. C. Haddon ...	50
The Reign of the Electron	538

PRESENT DAY PROBLEMS.

	PAGE
Aeroplanes at Olympia. By Douglas Leechman...	963
A Municipal Civil Service. By Graham Wallas	745
Lord Morley's India Bill. By Sir William Wedderburn	817
Oxford and the People	710
School Feeding, The Breakdown of	537
The Administration of the Small Holdings Act. By Philip Morrell, M.P.	338
The Child Trader	466
The Liberty of the Subject. By H. J. B. Montgomery	13
The New South Africa	502
The Revision of the Prayer-Book. By the Rev. Canon H. Hensley Henson	853
The Slavery of the Cocoa Islands. By Henry W. Nevinson	925
The Underfed Child. By R. A. Bray	146

OPEN QUESTIONS.

	PAGE
Proportional Representation. By Lord Courtney of Penwith	429
The Future of English Land. By Brougham Villiers	639

COMMUNICATIONS.

	PAGE
A Municipal Civil Service. By H. J. H.	821
Are "Dreadnoughts" Worthless? By C. E. Kelway	929
Liberal Clergy, The Discouragement of the. By Main Line	304
Mystery of Radio-Activity, The. By J. Reid ...	673
More Messages from Myers. By John W. Graham	340
Old Age Pensions, The Working of. By the Rev. C. L. Marson...	148
Small Holdings Act, The Administration of the. By A Liberal	432
Small Holdings Act, The Administration of the. By Philip Morrell, M.P.	468
Sorrows of an Austrian Liberal, The. By J. M. Robertson, M.P., and Professor Leon Kellner ...	507
Suffragettes, The Cabinet and the. By E. Sylvia Pankhurst	375
Treasury and the Army and Navy Estimates, The. By Reformer	964
University of London Commission, The. By a Liberal Graduate	858
What Workmen Think of Conscription. By S. R. and R. W. W.	749

LETTERS FROM ABROAD.

	PAGE
Arms and the Bill. By Dr. Ed. Bernstein ...	927
Balkans, The Germanisation of the. By Your Correspondent in the Balkans	302
Baron von Beck, The Fall of. By a Viennese Resident	252
Clearing the Air. By Dr. Ed. Bernstein	964
Downfall of the Grand Vizier, The. By Our Balkan Correspondent	819
French Radicalism, The Revival of. By Our Paris Correspondent	540
German Freedom, The Struggle for. By Dr. Ed. Bernstein	373
German Taxes, The New. By Dr. Ed. Bernstein	218
Great Agent Provocateur, The. By Jean Longuet	672
Parties in the Italian Elections. By Salvatore Cortesi	857
Peace and King Edward's Visit. By Dr. Ed. Bernstein	964
Revival of Will in German Literature, The. By Dr. Ed. Bernstein	773
South Africa: The Problem of the Native Area. By South African	116
Turkish Reformers, The Chances of the. By H. W. M.	145

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

PAGE

Scares and Scaremongers (H. S. Tasker); Bad Harvests and Unemployment (J. P. Bisgood, F. U. Laycock, and J. B. M.); The Prison Population ("Radix"); The Newcastle Election ("An Elector"); The "West London Parliament" (Oswald Lewis); President Diaz (The Mexican Minister and "the Writer of the Article"); The Small Holdings Act (Montague Fordham); The Doctrine of Toleration (J. S. King) 16

Bad Harvests and Unemployment (J. A. Hobson); President Diaz ("The Writer of the Article"); "The Doctrine of Tolerance" ("A Yorkshire Liberal"); "Is Constitutional Government in Turkey Possible?" (G. F. Abbott); "The Prison Population" ("The Writer of the Article"); The Newcastle Election ("A Radical Churchman" and John Evans); Moore's "Lalla Rookh" (H. Beveridge); The Significance of Richard Strauss (Adrian C. Boult); A Green Heaven (Samuel Wilks and Edward E. Heathfield); Lord Crewe and Electoral Reform (John H. Humphreys); The Budget (Albert Raphael) 51

Militant and Constitutional Action: A Contrast (Margaret Llewelyn Davies); Bad Harvests and Unemployment (F. U. Laycock and F. Williams); The Newcastle Election ("An Elector"); Venezuela and Holland (A. Aldana, Consul of Venezuela); The Future of the Police (J. Fletcher Little); Green, and Other, Heavens (John Higgins); "Grammatical" (Percy Braby); The Publican's Life (F. W. Lockwood); Two Days ("Puzzled") 117

Is Constitutional Government in Turkey Possible? (Edwin Pears); The Future of Turkish Women (Halide Salih); Bad Harvests and Unemployment (J. A. Hobson and W. G. W.); A Suggestion (J. Marshall Sturge); Grammatical ("Grammaticulus" and Ellen R. Taylor); The Newer Spirit in India (V. Chattopadhyaya); The Liberty of the Subject (George Whale); Liberalism and Social Reform (F. N. G.); Mr. Asquith's Concession to the Brewers (J. E. Allen); Orthodoxy (the Rev. S. Henry); The Habitual Offenders Bill (N. Kolp); Militant and Constitutional Action (A. F. P.) 148

Remedies for Unemployment (Sir George McCrae, M.P., and the Rev. J. Frome Wilkinson); Bad Harvests and Unemployment (F. U. Laycock); Mrs. Fawcett and Women's Suffrage (Mrs. Fawcett); The Turkish View of Women (G. F. Abbott); Small Holdings (Montague Fordham); Grammatical ("The Writer of the Article" and D. N. Samson); "The Gospel of Agriculture" (John Higgins); Punishment and Mr. Gladstone's Bill (M. A.) 184

Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman's Papers (The Right Hon. John Sinclair, M.P.); "The Right to Work" (Walter Menzies, M.P.); Mrs. Fawcett's Letter (Mrs. Nash); "The Secret of Whistler" (St. John G. Ervine, Sidney Low, and A. Clutton Brock); The Taxation of Land (W. R. Lester); Bad Harvests and Unemployment (J. A. Hobson) 221

A Tale of Unemployment (A Working Cabinetmaker); "The Conciliation of the Irreconcilables" (Virendranath Chattopadhyaya); "Grammaticals" ("Grammaticulus"); Murray's Bible Dictionary (The Rev. William C. Piercy); Arbitration and National Honor (J. F. Green); Persian Liberals and Great Britain (Dr. Ishmael Khan, and others) 254

PAGE

Suffragists and Suffragettes (Lady Strachey, Anna Martin, Henry W. Nevinson, and A. B. Wallis Chapman); Barmaids and the Licensing Bill (Lancastrian); "Personal Service Among the London Poor" (Margaret Llewelyn Davies); Disputed Points in the Old Age Pensions Act (Edward R. Pease); The Bishops and the Death Penalty (Carl Heath); "The Bacchanals" (Gilbert Murray); New Crosby Hall (Noel P. W. Brady and others) 305

The Epitaph of the Licensing Bill (Sursum Corda); "Personal Service Among the London Poor" (Edith Lyttelton, Violet R. Markham, A Subscriber to The Nation, and Sybilla Gurney); The Settlement Committee (M. E. Sadler and T. Edmund Harvey); Moot Points in the Pensions Act (Rev. J. Frome Wilkinson); Suffragists and Suffragettes (J. H.); Women's Wages in Finland (Mrs. F. Travers); The Government and International Peace (H. S. Perris); Grammatical (J. Sully); The Education Compromise (Graham Wallas); A French View of Mr. William Archer (D. N. Samson); Wanted —A Referendum! ("Tired"); The Indian Irreconcilables (H. Shaen Solly) 342

More Messages from Myers (Edward Clodd); Personal Service (A Reader, Eliza Delf, and C. S.); Mr. Long and Scottish Home Rule (A Young Scot); "Fight or Abdicate" (H. H. Robson and B. Brooksbank); The Materialisation of the Church (the Rev. W. Manning); Moore's "Lalla Rookh" (E. Crawshay-Williams); The Speech of the Province (Albert Campbell and "An Academic Person"); The Small Holdings Act (Montague Fordham); The Catholic Encyclopædia (H. F. Le Bas); Habitual Criminals (J. P.); Women's Wages (A. L. Bowley); The Propertied Vote for Women (Lilian Harris); The Use of Violence in Politics (Hugh Thompson); What is a Poor Man? (J. C.) 376

"Fight or Abdicate!" (G. F. Bradby, Walter Murray, J. G. Voice, and Henry J. Southall); The Cabinet and the Suffragettes (Israel Zangwill); The Progress of Women's Suffrage (Mrs. Vaughan Nash); The Speech of the Province (John Sargeaunt); More Messages from Myers (John W. Graham and Euphemia Stevens); County Councils and the Small Holdings Act (Hubert Beaumont) 433

The Character of the Church Council (The Dean of Ripon); The Government and Public Opinion (J. E. Dobson); The Germanisation of the Balkans (Maude M. Holbach); Lords v. Commons (The Rev. D. K. Auchterlonie and the Rev. Philip H. Wicksteed); The Education Question (C. E. Maurice); Cet animal est très méchant (St. John Hankin); More Messages from Myers (Edward Clodd); The "Helpers" and the C.O.S. (I. D. R.); The Administration of the Small Holdings Act (County Councillor); The Passer-By (P. Hemmerde) 469

"The Idea of Brotherhood" (George Haw); The Education Question in 1909 (A. J. Mundella, W. Westbury Preston, the Rev. S. E. Dymott, and Sir James Southern); The Issue for Liberalism (C. W. T.); Suffragist Tactics (Margaret Llewelyn Davies and Clementina Black); Women's Wages (Henry W. Nevinson and Rosalind Travers); The Speech of the Province (A. J. B. and Albert Campbell); "What is Love?" (D. N. Samson) 507

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR (continued).

PAGE

Greeting the Constitution at Beyrout (M. L. R.); The Government and the Lords (A. Dykes Spicer); The Representative Church Council (Alfred Holdsworth and Gordon Crosse); Austria and Bosnia-Herzegovina (James Baker, F.R.G.S., and J. Reid); Denominationalism and the Allocation of Rates (John Massie, M.P.); The Administration of the Small Holdings Act (A Chairman of a Rural Liberal Association); More Messages from Myers (John W. Graham); Moore's "Lalla Rookh" (H. Beveridge); Mr. Archer's Criticism (An Old Playgoer); The Books of 1908 (G. P. Gooch, M.P., and R. B. Chapman); Axioms or Fallacies? (J. H.) 541

Why? (Fiat Lux); Education and Religion (C. E. Maurice, P.C., and "A Man in the Street"); Allotments and Small Holdings (George Streetly); The Character of the Church Council (The Rev. W. Manning); More Messages from Myers (Edward Clodd); Primary Education in Irish Convent Schools (The Rev. Canon I. O'Mahony); The Works of Walter Pater (L. B.); A Correction (T. L. Foulis); Dressing for the Slum (K. S.); Women's Wages and the Suffrage (Mrs. F. Travers) 577

Sir Edward Grey's Opportunity (Edwin Pears); "Why?" (J. R., Dr. Thos. Hodgkin, T. M. T., B., George Washington, and One Who is Waiting); Mr. Archer and "The Last of the De Mullins" (St. John Hankin); "The Gleam" (S. Septon); The Representative Church Council (Alfred Holdsworth) 608

"Why?" (Lux in Tenebris, (Mrs.) A. S. Beveridge, M., Walter Howard, Fiat Justitia, and Hugh Leader); The Dominating Issue (Arnold Lupton, M.P., and X.); Mr. Seaman's Pronunciation (G. W. E. R.); Public Opinion and the Death Penalty (An English Resident in France); Suffragette History (W. A. Jolly); Equal Work for Equal Wages (Evelyn M. Tregear); The Home Life of Jesus (H. Shaen Solly); Old Age Pensioners (A. Griffin) ... 640

"Why?" (R. E. D.); The Beauty of a Native Tongue (R. W. J.); The Administration of the Small Holdings Act (Frederic Impey); The City Meeting (Carlyon Bellairs, M.P.); "A New Year Entertainment" (The Discoverer of the Lady); Bluff (Prof. G. M. Minchin); The Death Penalty in England (Jurist); The "Oxford English Dictionary" (The Rev. John D. Sinclair); "Suffragette History" (John Ivory Cripps and Veritas); Mr. Seaman's Pronunciation (L.); A Dirge (Susanna Corner); The Works of Pater (A. T. W.); Edgar Allan Poe (D. R.); Women's Wages (R. N. and (Mrs.) C. D. Rackham) ... 674

The Shanghai Conference (Joshua Rowntree); The Cause of the Progressives' Defeat (The Rev. Stewart D. Headlam); The Lords and the Budget (Bernard S. Harwood); The People or the Lords? (Mackenzie Bell); A New Year Entertainment (Douglas Fox-Pitt); Taxation Areas and Tariff Reform (A. W. D.); Mr. Seaman's Pronunciation (The Reviewer); The Lyke-Wake Dirge (F. C. Brunton); Play the Game (E. W. Smithson); A Cheap Edition of Pater (Isobel Hecht); The Elizabethan Dramatists (J. M. Dent); Cowper and Free Trade (Ralph S. Ashton); Suffragette History (W. A. Jolly); The Effect of "Bluff" in Politics (John H. Humphreys); The Speech of the Province (John Sargeaunt); The Opium Trade in the Colonies (Hamilton Crothers) 714

"Surmises on the Iron Mask" (Andrew Lang); Conscription (Colonel A. Grimshaw-Haywood); "A Parallel to the Suffragettes" (Helen A. McArthur); The Strength of the German Navy (C. G. Walker); "Suffragette History" (Charlotte C. Stopes); Pronunciation (G. W. E. R.); The Lyke-Wake Dirge (J. H. Shaxby, A. L. Mayhew, and Allen Mawer); The Logic of Christian Science (Algernon Hervey-Bathurst); The Poetry Recitals Society (Galloway Kyle); "The Clanging Rookery" (J. Marshall Sturge); The Wrath of Sir Robert (Henry S. Salt) ... 750

Is Nonconformity too Political? (Richard Mudie-Smith and "Blackheath"); The Coming Slavery in Education (The Rev. F. W. Aveling); Employers and the Territorial Army (Sir John Barker); The Lyke-Wake Dirge (Frank Sidgwick); Pronunciation (T. Wilson); Moore's "Lalla Rookh" (E. Crawshay Williams); Fitz-Gerald Centenary Celebration (W. H. McNamara); The Wrath of Sir Robert ("Lex"); England v. Britain (Wm. McPheat); The Change of Party Names (Municipal Worker); Conscription (Charles Cecil); The Effect of Suffragette Tactics ("Senex") ... 785

Conscription (Colonel A. Grimshaw-Haywood, C. E. Maurice, Herbert M. Wyatt, Commander R. N., and A. H. Craven); M. Anatole France's "Jeanne D'Arc" (A. Lang); The New Turkish Government (Mehmed Sadik); The Crisis in Liberal Policy (J. A. Hobson); The New Suffrage Bill (Margaret Llewelyn Davies); Suffragette Tactics (Ethel Colquhoun); Anatole France on Equality of Sacrifice ("Penguin"); The Lyke-Wake Dirge (S.C.) 822

The Education of Turkish Women (Isabel Fry); Conscription (Colonel A. Grimshaw Haywood and S.); The Policy of the Navy League (Wm. Caius Crutchley); Suffragette Tactics (Mrs. Gerald Paget); Strikes and Unemployment (The Right Hon. Robert Farquharson); "Some Fatuities of Protection" (H. W. Goldberg); The "Obedience" of the Clergy (Presbyter X.); A Voice from South Edinburgh (R. Henderson Smith); "British" and "Irish" (James H. Webb) 859

Conscription (Colonel A. Grimshaw-Haywood, Commander Herbert M. Wyatt, R.N., and Charles Cecil); The Strength of the Fleet (Archibald S. Hurd); The Policy of the Navy League (Captain Wm. Caius Crutchley); The University of London Commission (Interested and a Liberal Graduate); Adult Suffrage (A. J. Marriott); Our Foreign Investments (G. Eckhard); The Inversion of Sentences (M. D.); Wind Flowers (G. H. Isaacs); Consumption (Dr. J. Fletcher Little); A Defect in the Death Duties (Sidney P. Turnbull); Votes for Some Women (Mrs. F. Travers); The Marshals of Napoleon (Percy Cross Standing) 895

Conscription (S., C. E. Maurice, W. A. Jolly, and Charles Cecil); The Evasion of the Small Holdings Act (Philip Morrell, M.P.); The Central Glasgow Election (J. W. Cleland, M.P.); "The Paralysis of Satire" (R. H. Kidd); The University of London Commission (Professor G. Carey Foster and Professor Kirsopp Lake); A Defect in the Death Duties (D. B. McLaren); Hare Hunting at Eton (C. S.); The Education of Turkish Women (Isabel Fry) 930

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR (continued).

PAGE

Anatole France and Joan of Arc (Andrew Lang); Imperialism and Militarism (Frederic Harrison); The War Danger (The Rev. R. L. Gales); The Passion for Material Security (The Rev. John D. Sinclair); "The Logic of Woman's Suffrage" (Clementina Black and F. Melian Stawell); The Reform of the Death Duties (Sydney P. Turnbull); The Profits and Income Insurance Company (Alex. D. Auchterlonie and John Lewis); Mr. Hocking and the Roman Catholic Church (The Rev. Joseph Hocking); A Doubt About the "Sermon in Stones" (J. Graham Murray); The Mortality of Chinese Opium Smokers (the Rev. Thomas G. Selby); On Running Down the English (Shipowner); London University Commission (R. Spindler); The Eton Hare Hunt (Henry S. Salt) 965

DIARY OF THE WEEK.
1, 37, 101, 133, 169, 205, 237, 289, 325, 361, 417, 453, 489, 525, 561, 593, 625, 657, 697, 733, 769, 805, 841, 877, 913, 949.

THE WEEK IN THE CITY. BY "LUCELLUM."
32, 68, 128, 164, 200, 232, 268, 320, 356, 392, 448, 484, 520, 556, 588, 620, 652, 690, 728, 764, 798, 836, 879, 912, 944, 980.

THE WORLD OF BOOKS AND BOOKS TO BE READ.
21, 56, 121, 153, 188, 225, 258, 310, 347, 381, 437, 474, 546, 581, 613, 645, 679, 718, 755, 790, 826, 863, 900, 935, 970.

POETRY.

PAGE

A Broadland Interlude. By Thomas H. T. Case 789
A God in Venice. By James Flecker 825
A Lodge in the Wilderness. By Lucy Lyttelton 899
A Mendip Witch. By Edward S. Tylee 644
A Portrait. By J. Marjoram 152

Creed. By John Galsworthy 380

Dark Hour, The. By William H. Davies ... 580
Death in the Woods. By Thomas MacDonagh... 545

Holy Night, The. By the Rev. R. L. Gales ... 436

Interview, The. By R. C. K. Ensor 754

Joseph and Mary. By James Elroy Flecker ... 473

Milkmaid's Song, The. By W. H. Davies ... 717
Milton Agonistes. By Professor C. H. Herford... 969

Nil Nisi Divinum Stabile Est. By A. R. ... 55

PAGE

October. By R. C. K. Ensor 120
On Expecting Some Books. By W. H. Davies... 862

Prologue Spoken before a Performance of "Samson Agonistes." By Professor C. H. Herford 511

Rencontre. By H. H. Bashford 187

Seer, The. By G. M. Hort 678
Suburb, The. By S. R. Littlewood 934

The Church. By John Galsworthy 309
The Pleasant Life. By W. H. Davies 256
To My Dog. By John Galsworthy 612

Vox Infirmitatis. By Lucy Lyttelton 224

What is Love? By F. Halm. Translated by G. T. 346
Wisdom from the East. By David Wilson ... 20

REVIEWS OF BOOKS.

PAGE

Aeneas Silvius. By William Boulting 720
After the Pardon. By Matilde Serao 867
After Waterloo. By Major Frye 464
A History of Russian Literature. By A. Brückner 792
A History of the English Agricultural Labourer. By Dr. W. Hasbach, Professor of Political Economy in the University of Kiel. Newly Edited by the Author, and Translated by Ruth Kenyon; with Preface by Sidney Webb ... 513
Along the Rivieras. By Gordon Home 266
Amabel Channice. By A. D. Sedgwick 478
American Painting, The School of. By Charles H. Caffin 14
An Historical Introduction to the Marprelate Tracts. By William Pearce 940
An Immortal Soul. By W. H. Mallock 388
Anne Seymour Damer. By Percy Noble 690
Annuals (Various) 390
A Parson in the Australian Bush. By the Rev. C. H. Matthews 906

PAGE

A Poor Man's House. By Stephen Reynolds ... 248
A Prince of Dreamers. By Mrs. F. A. Steel ... 192
Araminta. By J. C. Snaith 794
A Room with a View. By E. M. Forster ... 352
Arts and Crafts in the Middle Ages. By Julia de Wolf Addison 30
Arvat: A Dramatic Poem. By Leopold H. Myers 280
A Short History of Engraving and Etching. By A. M. Hind 264
A Sister of Prince Rupert: Elizabeth, Princess Palatine and Abbess of Herford. By Elizabeth Godfrey 940
A Spanish Holiday. By Charles Marriott ... 440
A Shropshire Lad. By A. E. Housman 681
Asser's Life of King Alfred 868
At Large. By A. C. Benson 198
Autumn Garden, The. By Edmund Gosse ... 280
A Wandering Student in the Far East. By the Earl of Ronaldshay 384

REVIEWS OF BOOKS (continued).

PAGE

A Week in the White House with President Roosevelt. By W. Bayard Hale 586
A Woman at Bay (Una Donna). By Sibilla Aleramo 584

Background of the Gospels, or Judaism in the Period between the Old and New Testaments, The. The Twentieth Series of the Cunningham Lectures. By William Fairweather, M.A., Minister of Dunnikier United Free Church, Kirkcaldy 721
Back to the Past (Various) 410
Baganda at Home, The. By C. W. Hattersley... 556
Baldassare Castiglione, The Perfect Courtier: His Life and Letters. By Julia Cartwright ... 349
Brontës' Life and Letters, The. Being an Attempt to Present a Full and Final Record of the Lives of the Three Sisters, Charlotte, Emily, and Anne Brontë from the Biographies of Mrs. Gaskell and Others, and from Numerous Hitherto Unpublished Manuscripts and Letters, By Clement Shorter 226
Bible of Nature, The. By J. Arthur Thomson ... 978
Bomb, The. By Frank Harris 228
Bridle Roads of Spain, The. By George John Caley 440
Burne-Jones. By J. E. Phythian 518
By Desert Ways to Baghdad. By Louisa Jebb 57

Call of Dawn, The. By Esmé C. Wingfield-Stratford 681
Catholic Encyclopædia, The. An International Work of Reference on the Constitution, Doctrine, Discipline, and History of the Catholic Church. In fifteen volumes. Vols. I., II., and III. 282
Century Shakespeare, The. Cassell's 68
Characters of Theophrastus, The. An English Translation from a revised text, with introduction and notes by R. C. Jebb, M.A. A new edition, edited by J. E. Sandys, Litt.D. ... 827
Chats on Old Miniatures. By J. J. Foster ... 518
Chats on Oriental China. By J. F. Blacker ... 554
Childhood of Man: A Popular Account of the Lives, Customs, and Thoughts of the Primitive Races. By Leo Frobenius. [Dr. A. C. Haddon] 50
Child's Book, The. (Various.) [H. W. Nevinson] 402
Christ of Toro, and Other Stories, The. By Gabriela Cunninghame Graham 266
Clutch of Circumstance. By Dorothy Senior ... 516
Collectivism. By Professor Leroy Beaulieu ... 690
Confessions of St. Augustine, The 142
Co-operation at Home and Abroad. By C. R. Fay 32
Cornish Characters and Strange Events. By Baring Gould 480
Corot and His Friends. By Everard Meynell ... 115
County Lieutenancies and the Army, 1803-14. By the Hon. J. W. Fortesque 756
Court of Russia in the Nineteenth Century, The. By A. B. Hodgetts 284
Cults, Customs, and Superstitions of India. By John Campbell Oman 198

Dan to Beersheba. By A. R. Colquhoun ... 650
David Bran. By Morley Roberts 724
Death of Virgil, The. By T. H. Warren 26
Decline and Fall of the Kingdom of Judah. By the Rev. T. K. Cheyne 584
Development of Greek Philosophy, The. By Robert Adamson, sometime Professor of Logic in the University of Glasgow. Edited by W. R. Sorley and R. P. Hardie 726
Devon: Its Moorlands, Streams, and Coasts. By Lady Rosalind Northcote 726

PAGE

Diana Mallory. By Mrs. Humphry Ward ... 28
Dowager of Jerusalem, The. By Reginald Farrer 681
Dramas and Diversions. By W. L. Courtney ... 726
Dramatic Odes and Rhapsodies. By F. P. B. Osmaston 681
Dromina. By John Ayscough 976
Dumouriez and the Defence of England against Napoleon. By J. Holland Rose and A. M. Broadley 123
Dutch Painting in the Nineteenth Century. By M. G. H. Marius 868

Early Victorian and Other Papers. By E. S. P. Haynes 762
Earthworks of England. By A. Hadrian Allcroft 832
Edinburgh Periodical Press, The. Vol. I. By W. J. Cooper, M.A. 24
Eighteen Years in Uganda and East Africa. Alfred R. Tucker, Bishop of Uganda 312
Empress Josephine: Napoleon's Enchantress, The. By Philip W. Sergeant 227
Encyclopædia of Religion and Ethics. Edited by James Hastings, M.A., D.D., with the assistance of John A. Selbie, M.A., D.D., and others. Vol I. A—Art 938
English Church Architecture. By G. A. T. Middleton 941
English House, The. By W. Shaw Sparrow ... 583
Essays on Evolution, 1889—1907. By E. B. Poulton 722
European Travellers in India During the 15th, 16th, and 17th Centuries. By E. F. Oaten ... 978
Evolution in Italian Art. By Grant Allen ... 196
Eye-Witness, The. By Hilaire Belloc 552

Fairies (Various) 408
Faith of His Fathers, The. By A. E. Jacomb... 867
Family Letters of Christina Rossetti. Edited by W. M. Rossetti (Ford Madox Hueffer) 550
Father Tyrrell's Modernism. By Hakluyt Egerton 864
Fellowship Hymn Book, The 798
Fishers of the Sea. By J. E. Patterson 478
Flower of the Heart, The. By H. B. Marriott Watson 684
Folklore in Lowland Scotland. By Eve Simpson 518
Forty Years of Music, 1865—1905. By Joseph Bennett 228
Foundations of Liberty, The. By E. F. B. Fell... 46
Francis Joseph I. By R. P. Mahaffy 834
Fraternity. By John Galsworthy 830
Friedrich Nietzsche: His Life and Work. By M. A. Mügge 547
From Island to Empire. By John Bridge 480
From Ploughshare to Parliament 9
Further Experiences of An Irish R.M. By E. O. Somerville and Martin Ross 518

Gardens of England. By Beatrice Parsons and E. T. Cook... 62
Gardens, Past and Present. By K. L. Davidson 482
Gay Gordons: Some Strange Adventures of a Famous Scots Family, The. By J. M. Bulloch 354
General Lee: Man and Soldier. By Thomas Nelson Pope 940
George Canning and His Friends. Edited by Captain Josceline Bagot 791
George Cruikshank. By W. H. Chesson (G. K. C.) 10
George the First in Hanover and England. By Lewis Melville 549
Gifted Family, The. By Barry Pain 938
Great English Painters. By Francis Dowman ... 588
Great Masters of Dutch and Flemish Painting. By Dr. Bode 762

REVIEWS OF BOOKS (continued).

PAGE

Greatness and Decline of Rome, The. Vol. III. "The Fall of An Aristocracy." By Guglielmo Ferrero 277

Halfway House. By Maurice Hewlett 124
Happy Medium, The. By Charles Marriott ... 192
Heart Smiter, The. By Mary S. Mann 478
Henry Stuart, Cardinal of York, and His Times. By Alice Shield 582
Herculaneum: Past, Present, and Future. By Charles Waldstein and Leonard Shoobridge ... 514
Heredity of Acquired Characters in Plants, The. By Professor Henslow 48
Hermit and the Wild Woman, The. By Edith Wharton 724
Hidden Church of the Holy Graal, The. By A. E. Waite. (A. M.) 971
Histoire de France, depuis les origines jusqu' à la Révolution. Tome Huitième. Louis XIV., La fin du règne (1685-1715). Par A. de Saint Léger, Professeur à l'Université de Lille; A. Rébelliau, Bibliothècaire de l'Institut; P. Sagnac, Professeur à l'Université de Lille; E. Lavisse, Professeur à l'Université de Paris ... 719
Histoire de la Littérature Française. Tome IV. "Le Dixneuvième Siècle." Par Leo Claretie... 973
Historical and Political Essays. By W. E. H. Lecky 647
History of Engraving: From its Inception to the Time of Thomas Bewick, The. By Stanley Austin 264
History of the Holy Eucharist in Great Britain. By T. E. Bridgett 30
Holland House Circle, The. By Lloyd Sanders... 22
Home Life in Italy: Letters from the Apennines. By Lina Duff Gordon 190
Human Nature in Politics. By Graham Wallas... 439
Hungary and the Hungarians. By W. B. Forster Bovill 30

Ian Maclaren, Life of the Rev. John Watson, D.D. By W. Robertson Nicoll 757
Iliad of the East, The. By Mrs. Frederika Macdonald 554
Inner Life of the Navy, The. By Lionel Yexley 648
In Morocco with General D'Amande. By Reginald Rankin 318
Interplay. By Beatrice Harraden 478
In the Days of the Council: A Sketch of the Life and Times of Baldassare Cossa. By Eustace Kitts 834
In the Potter's House. By G. D. Eldridge ... 724

Jeanne d'Arc, Preface to M. Anatole France's... 756
Jonathan Swift, D.D., The Prose Works of. Edited by Temple Scott 350
Joseph and His Brethren: A Dramatic Poem. By Charles Wells 865
Joseph Skipsey: His Life and Work. By the Rt. Hon. Robert Spence Watson 442
Journal of Elizabeth, Lady Holland (1791-1811), The. Edited by the Earl of Ilchester 189
Justice and Liberty: A Political Dialogue. By G. Lowes Dickinson 384
Justice of the Mexican War, The. By Charles H. Owen 318

King who Never Reigned: Being Memoirs upon Louis XVII. by Eckard and Naundorff, with a preface by Jules Lemaitre, of the Academie Française, together with introduction and notes by Maurice Vitrac and Arnould Galopin, to which is added Joseph Turquan's "New Light upon the Fate of Louis XVII.," The 312
Kiss, and Other Stories, The. By Anton Tchekhoff 617

PAGE

Latins in the Levant: A History of Frankish Greece (1204-1566), The. By William Miller. [Prof. J. B. Bury] 275
Lawrences of the Punjab, The. By Frederick Gibbon 518
Le Cénacle de la Muse Française, 1823-1827. Par Leon Séché 973
Lessons for the Day. By Dr. Moncure D. Conway 68
Letters from an American Farmer. By J. Hector St. John Crèvecœur 940
Letters of James Boswell to the Rev. W. J. Temple 864
Letters of a Noble Woman, Mrs. La Touche, of Harristown, The. Edited by Margaret Ferrier Young 516
Le Livre des Chats. Par Alfred Ruffin 216
Le Rire. Par Henri Bergson 348
L'Evolution Créatrice. Par Henri Bergson ... 902
Life and Letters of George Bancroft. By M. A. de Wolfe Howe 191
Life of Henry Irving, The. By Austin Brereton 262
Life of Henry Pelham, Fifth Duke of Newcastle, The. By John Martineau, of Trinity Hall, Cambridge 260
Life of James Robertson, D.D. By the Rev. C. W. Gordon 762
Life of Stewart of Lovedale. By Dr. James Wells 586
Life of the Spirit, The. By Rudolph Eucken ... 646
L'Ile des Pingouins. Par Anatole France ... 190
Lollardy and the Reformation. By James Gairdner, C.B. [Professor A. F. Pollard] 382
"Londons" of the British Fleet, The. By Edward Fraser 66
London Visions. By Lawrence Binyon 280
Lord Haliburton: A Memoir of His Public Service. By Mr. Attay 798
Lorenzo the Magnificent, and Florence in Her Golden Age. By E. L. S. Horsburgh 827
Louis Napoleon and the Genius of the Second Empire. By F. H. Cheetham 686
Love Letters of Thomas Carlyle and Jane Welsh, The. Edited by Alexander Carlyle 976
Luke the Physician, and Other Stories in the History of Religion. By Sir Wm. Ramsay ... 680

Madame Elizabeth De France: 1764-1794. By the Hon. Mrs. Maxwell-Scott, of Abbotsford ... 312
Man of the Mask: A Study in the By-paths of History, The. By Arthur Stapylton Barnes... 614
Man who Understood Women, The. By Leonard Merrick 192
Marie-Madeleine, Countess de La Fayette. By Lilian Rea 198
Mariner of England, A. Edited by Colonel Spencer Childers 66
Mars as the Abode of Life. By Perceval Lowell... 868
Masque of the Grail, The. By Ernest Rhys ... 280
Medici Popes, The. By Herbert M. Vaughan ... 827
Memories of Gardens. By Alexander Innes Shand 62
Memoirs of the Comte de Rambuteau. Edited by His Grandson 937
Memories of My Life. By Francis Galton, F.R.S., D.C.L. [Edward Clodd] 278
Miracle, The. By Antrim Orel 478
Mission and Expansion of Christianity in the First Three Centuries. By Professor Harnack ... 939
Mockers, The. By Jane Barlow 280
Modern Germany, The Evolution of. By W. Harbutt Dawson 246
More Truth, Wit, and Wisdom. By Algernon Ashton 111
Murray's Illustrated Bible Dictionary 196
My Life in the Open. By Will Ogilvie 156

REVIEWS OF BOOKS (continued).

PAGE

Mystical Element of Religion as Studied in S. Catherine of Genoa and Her Friends, The. By Baron Friedrich von Hügel 475

Napoleon and the Archduke Charles. By F. Loraine Petre 198
Nature Poems. By W. H. Davies 280
New Light on Ancient Egypt. By M. Maspero ... 688
New Spirit in India, The. By Henry W. Nevinson. [Sir William Wedderburn.] 113
New Poems. By Herbert French 26
New Poems. By Stephen Phillips... 26
New Zealand. By the Hon. W. Pember Reeves... 796
New Zealand. By Reginald Horsley 796
Nights with the Gods. By Emil Reich 834
Notes on New Testament Criticism. By Edwin A. Abbott 160

Old and Odd Memories. By the Hon. Lionel A. Tollemache 682
Old London. By W. L. McNay 834
Old-Time Parson, The. By P. H. Ditchfield ... 549
Old Wives' Tale, The. By Arnold Bennett ... 314
Orthodoxy. By G. K. Chesterton 109
Our Daily Bread. By Clara Viebig 552
Out of Doors 412
Out of Doors in the Holy Land. By Henry van Dyke 688
Over Bemerton's. By E. V. Lucas 124
Oxford in the Eighteenth Century. By A. D. Godley 438
Oxford Thackeray, The 475

Panmure Papers: Being a Selection from the Correspondence of Fox Maule, Second Baron Panmure, afterwards Eleventh Earl of Dalhousie, K.T., G.C.B., The. Edited by Sir George Douglas, Bart, M.A., and Sir George Dalhousie Ramsay, C.B., late of the War Office. With a supplementary chapter by the late Rev. Principal Rainy, D.D. 154
Parallel Paths. By T. W. Rolleston 482
Passer-By, The. By Prince Pierre Troubetzkoy ... 444
Personalism. By Dr. Boune 46
Peter Moor's Journey to South-West Africa. By Gustav Frenssen 62
Phillips Brooks, 1835—1893. Memoirs of His Life, with Extracts from His Letters and Notebooks. By Alexander V. G. Allen 58
Philosophical Radicals, and Other Essays, with Chapters reprinted on the Philosophy of Religion in Kant and Hegel, The. By Professor A. Seth Pringle-Pattison 123
Poems. By M. Compton Mackenzie 26
Poetry of the Gospel of Jesus, The. By Otto Frommel 126
Practical Wisdom of the Bible, The. By Strachey 426
Pre-Tractarian Oxford. By the Rev. W. Tuckwell 936
Princesse de Lamballe: A Biography, The. By Miss B. C. Hardy 30
Private Palaces of London, The. By E. Beresford Chancellor 586
Prophets, Priests, and Kings. By A. G. Gardiner 686
Public Health Agitation, The. By B. L. Hutchins 906

Queen Mariamne. By the Author of "Borgia"... 681

Racial Problems in Hungary. By R. W. Seton-Watson 615
Realities and Ideals. By Frederic Harrison ... 64
Recollections of Baron de Frénilly. Edited by Arthur Chuquet 901
Reminiscences of an Old Sportsman. By W. B. Woodgate 868
Reminiscences of Lady Randolph Churchill. By Mrs. George Cornwallis West 158

PAGE

Revolt in Hindustan, The. By Sir Evelyn Wood, F.M., V.C. 25
Roman Life and Manners Under the Early Empire, Friedlaender's 126
Royal Botanic Gardens, Kew, The. By W. J. Bean and H. C. Olivier 316
Ruined and Deserted Churches. By Mrs. Beedham 518
Russian Conquest of the Caucasus, The. By John F. Baddeley 446
Russian Essays and Stories. By Maurice Baring 179
Rutland Barrington. By Himself... 482

Safety in Story Books (Various). (Evelyn Sharp) 406
Salthaven. By W. W. Jacobs 192
Salvage. By Owen Seaman 616
Scenery of Sherwood Forest, The. By Joseph Rodgers 446
Science and Faith. By Sir Oliver Lodge 213
Science for the Young (Various). (G. M. Minchin) 404
Scottish Gardens. By Sir Henry Maxwell ... 266
Septimus. By W. J. Locke 938
Seven Splendid Sinners. By W. R. H. Trowbridge 66
Short Cut to India: The Record of a Journey Along the Route of the Baghdad Railway," The. By David Fraser 972
Side-Shows. By J. B. Atkins 688
Simon Fraser, Lord Lovat: His Life and Times. By W. C. Mackenzie 866
Sir Christopher Wren. By Lena Milman ... 60
Sir Richard Escombe. By Max Pemberton ... 516
Sir Richard Tangye. By Stuart J. Reid ... 798
Sisyphus, an Operatic Fable. By R. C. Trevelyan 903
Some Eighteenth Century Byways, and Other Essays. By John Buchan 686
Some Eminent Victorians. By J. Comyns Carr... 446
Some Women Loving or Luckless. By Yeodor de Wyzewa 66
Songs of Good Fighting. By Eugene R. White ... 681
Song of the Manly Men, The. By Frank Hudson 280
Spencer Perceval, The Rt. Hon. By Philip Treherne 688
Spy, The. By Maxim Gorky 162
Story of a Lifetime, The. By Lady Priestley ... 318
Story of My Life, The. By Ellen Terry 23
Story of the Pharaohs. By the Rev. James Blaikie 690
Studies in Solitary Life. By W. R. Titterton ... 482
Surrey. By Eric Parker 728
Sylvia in Society. By Mrs. George Norman ... 68
Syrinx. By Laurence North 903

Ten Personal Studies. By Wilfrid Ward ... 548
Territorial Force, The. By Harold Baker ... 756
Testament of John Davidson, The 681
Things Seen in China. By J. R. Chitty 554
Thomas Bailey Aldrich, The Life of. By Ferris Greenslet 311
Thrice Armed. By Harold Bindloss 648
Thysia: An Elegy. Anon.... 681
Tono-Bungay. By H. G. Wells 758
To the Top of a Continent. By F. A. Cook ... 482
Towards Social Reform. By Canon and Mrs. S. A. Barnett 829
Trade and Tariffs. By John M. Robertson, M.P. 194
Tragedy of Saint Elizabeth of Hungary, The. By Arthur Dillon 280
Tudor Schoolboy Life. By Juan Luis Vives. Translated by Foster Watson 369
Two Dianas in Alaska. By Agnes Herbert ... 318
Two English Queens and Philip. By Filippo de Filippi, F.R.G.S. 477
Tyburn Tree: Its History and Annals. By Alfred Marks 276

Unemployment: A Problem of Industry. By W. H. Beveridge 793

REVIEWS OF BOOKS (continued).

	PAGE
Vincenzo Foppa, of Brescia, Founder of the Lombard School: His Life and Work. By Constance Jocelyn Ffoulkes and Monsignor Rodolpho Maiocchi, D.D.	830
Voluntarists Creed, The. By Auberon Herbert...	46
Wander Years, The. By J. H. Yoxall	906
War in the Air, The. By H. G. Wells	178
War Songs. By Christopher Stone	480
W. B. Yeats's Collected Works. Vols. I. and II.	122
W. B. Yeats's Collected Works. Vols. III. and IV.	354
W. B. Yeats's Collected Works. Vols. V. and VI.	556
Wells and Glastonbury. By T. Scott Holmes. ...	518
Who is to be Master of the World. By A. M. Ludovici	547
Wife of Lafayette, The. By Mrs. Crawford ...	266
William Haig Brown of Charterhouse. Edited by his son, H. E. Haig Brown	722
Woman Through the Ages. By Dr. Emil Reich	354
Working Lads' Clubs. By C. E. B. Russell and Lilian M. Rigby	906
Yesterday's Children. By Githa Sowerby ...	390
Yrivand. By Henry Baerlein	478
69, Birnan Road. By W. Pett Ridge	192
Publishers and the Press	147
Pick of the Publishing Season, The. Spring ...	73
Pick of the Publishing Season, The. Autumn ...	877
Literary Supplement	273
Christmas Gifts Book Supplement	397
Books in Brief and Short Notices ... 32, 68, 128, 164, 198, 200, 230, 232, 268, 286, 318, 354, 390, 448, 482, 520, 728, 764, 798,	870

AUTHORS' INDEX.

	PAGE
Archer, William. The Drama ... 219, 251, 339, 374, 431, 504, 575, 606, 711, 747, 782, 818, 854, 892,	926
Bashford, H. H. Rencontre	187
Bray, R. A. The Underfed Child...	146
Bury, Professor J. B. The Latins in the Levant	275
Bernstein, Dr. Edward. The New German Taxes	218
The Struggle for German Freedom	373
The Revival of Will in German Literature ...	576
Peace and King Edward's Visit	783
Arms and the Bill	927
Clearing the Air	964
Case, Thomas H. T. A Broadland Interlude ...	789
Chesterton, G. K. George Cruikshank	10
The Genius of Gilbert	370
The Paralysis of Satire...	850
Clodd, Edward. A Traveller for Science... ...	278
Colum, Padraic. The Little Pension	961
Courtney of Penwith, Lord. A Voting Experiment	337
Proportional Representation	429
Cortesi, Salvatore. Parties in the Italian Elections	857
Davies, William H. The Pleasant Life	256
The Dark Hour...	580
The Milkmaid's Song	717
On Expecting Some Books	862
Drysdale, James. Some Impressions of the Session	497
Ensor, R. C. K. October	120
The Interview	754
Flecker, James Elroy. Joseph and Mary ...	473
A God in Venice	825
Gales, The Rev. R. L. The Holy Night	436
Galsworthy, John. The Church	309
Creed	380
To My Dog	612
The Dead Man	217
Graham, John W. More Messages from Myers ...	340
Haddon, Dr. A. C. Popular Anthropology ...	50
Henry, The Rev. S. The Last Enemy	49
The Dean's Dilemma	573
The Believer	781
Henson, The Rev. Canon H. Hensley. The Revision of the Prayer-Book	853
Herford, Professor C. H. Prologue Spoken before a Performance of "Samson Agonistes" ...	511
Milton Agonistes	969
Hort, G. M. The Seer	678
Hueffer, Ford Madox. Family Letters of Christina Rossetti	550
Kelway, C. E. Are "Dreadnoughts" Worthless?	929
Kendall, Miss May. Barbara	12
Lawrence, C. E. Harlequin and Columbine ...	400
Leechman, Douglas. Aeroplanes at Olympia ...	963
Littlewood, S. R. The Suburb	934
Longuet, M. Jean. The Great Agent Provocateur	672
Low, Sidney. The Secret of Whistler	182
The Goddesses of the Camera	467
The Princess and the Messenger Boy... ...	638
Lyttelton, Miss Lucy. Vox Infirmitatis	224
A Lodge in the Wilderness	899
MacDonagh, Thomas. Death in the Woods ...	545
Marjoram, J. A Portrait	152
Marson, The Rev. C. L. The Working of the Old Age Pensions	148
Montgomery, H. J. B. The Liberty of the Subject	13
Morrell, Philip, M.P. The Administration of the Small Holdings Act	338
The Administration of the Small Holdings Act	468
Nesbit, Mrs. E. The Ruin of England	399
Nevinson, Henry W. The Slavery of the Cocoa Islands	925
The Child's Book	402
Newman, Ernest. Sir Edward Elgar's Symphony	430
Pankhurst, Miss E. Sylvia. The Cabinet and the Suffragettes	375
Pollard, Professor A. F. Lollardy and the Reformation	382
Reid, J. The Mystery of Radio Activity... ...	673
Ripon, The Very Rev. the Dean of. Christianity and Democracy	8
Robertson, J. M., M.P. The Sorrows of an Austrian Liberal	507

AUTHORS' INDEX (continued).

	PAGE
Rowntree, Arthur. Nil Nisi Divinum Stabile Est.	55
Sharp, Miss Evelyn. Safety in Story Books ...	406
Shaw, G. Bernard. Edgar Allan Poe	601
Tylee, Edward S. A Mendip Witch	644
Villiers, Brougham. The Future of English Land	639
Wallas, Graham. A Municipal Civil Service ...	745
Wedderburn, Sir William. The India of To-day	113
Lord Morley's India Bill	817
Wilson, David. Wisdom from the East	20
H. J. H. A Municipal Civil Service	821
A. M. The Secret of the Sangraal	971
H. W. M. The Chances of the Turkish Reformers	145
S. R. and R. W. W. What Workmen Think of Conscription	749
G. T. What is Love? By F. Halm	346

The Nation

VOL. IV., No. 1.] SATURDAY, OCTOBER 3, 1908. [PRICE 6D.
Postage: U.K., ½d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
DIARY OF THE WEEK	1
POLITICS AND AFFAIRS:—
The Future of the Licensing Bill	4
The Turkish Crisis	4
Railway Amalgamation ...	6
The Close of the Book War ...	7
LIFE AND LETTERS:—
Christianity and Democracy. By the Dean of Ripon. ...	8
A Radical Pioneer	9
A Good Book. By G. K. C. ...	10
Why the Leaves turn Brown	11
SHORT STORY:—
Barbara. By May Kendall ...	12
PRESENT-DAY PROBLEMS:—
The Liberty of the Subject. By H. J. B. Montgomery ...	13
ART:—
The American School of Painting	14
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:—
Scares and Scaremongers. By H. S. Tasker	16
Bad Harvests and Unemployment. By J. P. Bisgood, F.U. Laycock and J. B. M. ...	16
The Prison Population. By Radix	18
The Newcastle Election. By An Elector	18
The "West London Parliament." By Oswald Lewis ...	18
President Diaz. By the Mexican Minister and the Writer of the Article	19
The Small Holdings Act. By Montague Fordham	20
The Doctrine of Toleration. By J. S. King	20
POETRY:—
Wisdom from the East. By David Wilson	20
THE WORLD OF BOOKS	21
Books to be Read	21
REVIEWS:—
The Whig Salon	22
Ellen Terry...	23
In the Infancy of Journalism	24
The Mutiny	25
Some Poets of the Day ...	26
An Edifying Novel	28
BOOKS IN BRIEF:—
The Princesse de Lamballe ...	30
Hungary and the Hungarians	30
The Holy Eucharist in Great Britain	30
Acts and Crafts in the Middle Ages...	30
Co-operation at Home and Abroad	32
Legendary Ballads	32
The Art of Velasquez	32
A Novel Reader's Guide ...	32
THE WEEK IN THE CITY ...	32

The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

THE Chancellor of the Exchequer made a remarkable speech at Swansea on Thursday. Addressing himself to the problem of distress, and taking his stand on the principles admitted in the Pensions Act, which he declared to be only the beginning of things, Mr. Lloyd George proceeded to a forcible exposition of the modern teaching of the duty of the State towards poverty. In part poverty was due to failure of character, and here the State had preventive work to do in the shape of Betting Bills and Licensing Bills. But in greater measure it was due to economic causes over which the chief sufferers had no control. It was idle to attribute the trouble to Free Trade. A dozen men, whose aggregate incomes would suffice to maintain a quarter of a million people for a month, might be found on Tariff Reform platforms arguing that the distress incidental to unemployment was due to the workman's bread being untaxed. The day would come when the country would shudder at its toleration of the present state of misery at a time when, as a whole, it was "rolling in wealth." As to the threat that capital would leave the country if fresh burdens were placed on it, where was it to fly? Where in the modern world would it escape from paying its due to the poor? There would soon be "no civilised land in the world where proper provision for aged, luckless, and unfortunate toilers would not be regarded as a first charge on the wealth of the land."

* * *

IN the retirement of Lord Tweedmouth the Liberal Party loses a member whose services have been long, considerable, and not perhaps always as clearly acknowledged as they might have been. Not the least of these services perhaps was a certain forbearance in pressing his claims, which is a quality too rare in public men to be passed over without acknowledgment when found. It seems to be generally assumed that his successor will be Lord Lochee, whose appointment would not necessitate any further changes and consequent by-elections. There is, however, something to be said on the other side. The Government can fairly challenge comparison with its predecessors in administrative ability at any point, but it is not so clear that the capacities of all its members are being used to their best advantage in the positions which they at present hold, and it is hardly to be denied that there is a feeling in the party that in this respect one or two changes might be made with advantage.

* * *

AN effort has been made to obscure the fact of the failure of the first Anglo-Russian Note to the Shah, but it is now admitted that the two Powers are pressing for a clearer reply. Still stronger evidence of the Shah's sentiments is an edict issued just before Ramadan appointing new elections for November 13th. Azerbaijan is excluded from these elections, and apparently the new Assembly is to be a Senate partly nominated and partly elected, and its powers are to be determined by new organic laws In short, it is a mere sham, probably intended to look like submission to the will of England and Russia, but utterly inadequate to satisfy the Persian Nationalists or restore order. In Teheran the belief is general that the Shah was inspired to reject the advices of the Powers by the disloyal counsel of the Russian Legation. Tabriz still remains in the hands of the Nationalists, and will probably hold out through the winter. Its successful resistance is certain to stimulate the courage of the Constitutional Party throughout Persia.

* * *

AN unpleasant incident last Friday at Casablanca might have made bad blood between France and Germany. An assistant and a guard of the German Vice-Consul were assisting three Germans and a Russian and a Swiss, deserters from the Foreign Legion, to embark on a steamer, when the French gendarmes intervened, and after a scuffle captured them and put them in prison. The Consular assistant was maltreated, and the guard for a time put in irons. The German claim is that Germany retains her control of German subjects in Morocco; the French that the soldiers are under martial law only in the face of the enemy. The Press and the Governments of both countries have kept cool, and there is a general disposition to deal with both the question of international law and the question of courtesy in a conciliatory spirit. All the Powers except Belgium have replied to the Franco-German Note, and Italy, Austria, and Portugal have made criticisms similar to those of Germany. France and Spain have resolved to draft a new Note, from which all controversial conditions are to be omitted, so that the question of recognition is now practically settled.

* * *

MR. HEARST'S first batch of revelations has driven Mr. Haskell, the Democratic Treasurer, and Mr. Dupont, of the Republican Committee, as well as Mr. Foraker, out of the campaign, and it has brought Mr.

Roosevelt right into it. Mr. Roosevelt has been exchanging broadsides with Mr. Bryan, and is contemplating "going on the stump." It is obvious that Mr. Roosevelt thinks the Republican cause is in a bad way. Both party chests are empty; the trusts have been frightened off from subscribing, and the funds are not a tenth their normal size. The betting is strongly in favor of Mr. Taft, but, curiously enough, against his friend, Mr. Hughes, for the Governorship of New York State. These speculations are not worth very much, because nobody knows what damage the Independent candidate will do his rivals, though Mr. Hearst predicts for him a poll that will astonish us all.

* * *

On Tuesday, Mr. Ewing, the Australian Minister for Defence, introduced his Bill for Compulsory Military Service. All British subjects, unless specially exempted, between twelve and eighteen, must serve as Cadets, and from eighteen to twenty-six as National Guards. The Cadets must put in one hour's training a week and four days a year; the National Guards eighteen days annually in the first three years and seven days in the next five. Naval, artillery, and engineer recruits are to undergo rather more training. Non-efficients are to be penalised, and employers discriminating against National Guards in their service fined. Mr. Ewing anticipated that the strength of the National Guard would be 200,000 men, adequate to guard the island and leave the British fleet free for "bigger operations." The cost to the Government, he calculated, would be only £100,000 more than it was already spending on armaments. The scheme is favoured by the Labor Party and the "White Australia" parties generally, and is likely to go through.

* * *

On Saturday a Paris court condemned two young men, M. Méric and M. Delannoy, to a fine of £120 and a year's imprisonment for publishing a cartoon depicting General d'Amade as a butcher wiping his bloodstained hands. This outrageous sentence is heartily approved by the Conservative Press in France, and some of the Departmental Councils are voting the Government their thanks for dealing severely with anti-militarists and Socialists. Between the Morocco affair and his domestic policy, M. Clemenceau bids fair to inflame the Jingoism and the fears of the French middle-class, and to bring reaction back into the saddle. He has wrecked the bloc, and rests now upon Conservative support, though the fact that M. Méric and M. Delannoy both belong to the intellectuals and not to the wage-earners seems to show that his anti-militarist campaign is not exactly successful. The Catholic Church in France thinks the time propitious for developing an attack upon the lay school system, which, if it have no other result, will give M. Clemenceau an excuse for further delaying the execution of his programme of social reform.

* * *

A great step towards a universal penny post between civilised nations has been taken in the inauguration on Thursday of the new rates between this country and the United States. Letters under one ounce may now be sent to New York or San Francisco for 1d., and the establishment of a penny post between all English-speaking peoples is substantially complete. The new reform leaves the rates of postage between this country and the Continent in an exceptional, almost an absurd condition, and it cannot be long before the penny rate is established throughout the Postal Union.

* * *

The widespread distress in Manchester has caused the Lord Mayor to open a special relief fund, which will be entirely separate from the money at the disposal of the Distress Committee. The necessity for recourse to private philanthropy in order to fulfil what is in effect a public obligation seems to us only to emphasise the defects of the present Unemployment Act and the necessity of more systematic measures for coupling relief with the condition of work. Unfortunately for the prospect of the autumn in Lancashire, the dispute in the cotton trade continues, and there is no sign of yielding on the part of the card-room operatives, who hold the key to the position.

* * *

The Canadian election campaign is now in full swing, and Sir Wilfrid Laurier has almost completed a tour in Ontario, after which he will stump Quebec. The party issues have very little to do with principles. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, while reserving his faith as a Free Trader, commends his tariff to the country, and even suggests the institution of a permanent tariff commission. He claims credit for initiating the Grand Trunk Railway enterprise, and asks that the Government which started it should be allowed to finish it. The Opposition's chief plank is to charge the Liberal administration with wholesale corruption. The charge has been brought home beyond refutation, but the record of the last Conservative administration was at least as bad. The country evidently thinks that the Liberals have had a good run, for several provinces have turned Conservative; but it is hardly likely that the Liberal position in the Federal Parliament will be carried on this occasion, though it will suffer. Sir Wilfrid Laurier has just given evidence of his anxiety by withdrawing his party's two candidates for Ottawa, and standing himself, together with a strong English-speaking colleague, as the only way of retaining the seats.

* * *

In the "Nineteenth Century" for October, Lord Milner sets himself to establish "The Value of Canadian Preference" by a singularly ill-informed attack upon an article in the "Edinburgh Review" of last July. The Edinburgh reviewer proved from official figures that since the operation of the preferential tariff the import trade into Canada of dutiable goods from the United States and from other foreign countries had actually increased at a slightly faster rate than that from Great Britain. Lord Milner, admitting, as he was compelled, this statement of the course of trade since 1895, accuses the reviewer of ignoring the decline of British trade in the years preceding Preference. By selecting an arbitrary date, 1890, he appears to make a case for the view that Preference has converted a decline into a rise, so far as a protected set of imports are concerned. Examination of his table, however, indicates that his argument derives its sole support from a temporary slump in iron and steel exports from Great Britain, due to our rising domestic prosperity and prices in 1898. The fuller tables of the Edinburgh reviewer, dealing with all dutiable imports, completely expose Lord Milner's argumentative device.

* * *

A preference must, of course, have some effect. The question is as to its size and endurance. The textile trades, to which the preference has given a temporary lift, are trades which Canada is developing for herself. Lord Milner does not allude to the most illuminating episode in the history of Canadian preference, the withdrawal by the Finance Minister, in 1903, of the greater part of the preference upon woollen goods at the behest of the Canadian manufacturers. Even the reduced preference is now found too great, and at the meeting of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association a few weeks ago the British preference was indicted as ruinous to Canadian mills, and a further demand for withdrawal was put forth. Lord Milner's contention that the increase of British imports to Canada since 1890 "can only be explained by the existence of the preference" is singularly ignorant. For 1898 marked the beginning of the rapid new development of the North-West, with its growing tide of immigration. Every Canadian is aware, and every "Imperialist" ought to be aware, that the growth of our imports into Canada since 1898 is simply England's share in the development of this great new productive area, with its growing markets, for our manufactures.

* * *

We have received a copy of the report of the Committee appointed by the Transvaal Government to inquire into the repatriation debts. This is, in substance, a report on the administration of the sum of three millions, which was granted for the repatriation of the Boers in the Vereeniging Terms—a sum which, it was widely believed in this country, would suffice to make good the devastation inflicted by the war. The report is a serious commentary on the methods of Crown Colony administration. The local Commissions, promised under the terms of peace to assist in the repatriation, were allowed little responsibility or power. The matter was all in the hands of officials who bought up stock from the military and disposed of it to the Boers. The Boers, as the Committee show, had virtually no option except to take the stock or go without any share in the grants. As to the choice of stock, the report says that the worst oxen were selected for distribution to the burghers. They quote a circular issued by the Director of Transport, saying that "the greatest care must be taken that no oxen fit to trek in two or three months' time are disposed of." There were heavy losses on the mules purchased, and such was the condition of the animals taken over that £641,000 had to be charged under the heading of "death of animals." Quantities of cattle were also brought in from the East Coast, among which fever broke out, which not only destroyed the stock issued but infected others. Of a consignment of 500 oxen from Madagascar, every one died either in the trucks or afterwards. These are a few samples of maladministration revealed by the report, which has compelled the Transvaal Government to make large rebates on the debts incurred by farmers, many of whom in purchasing the animals were led to suppose that their expenses would be fully covered by what was due to them for compensation claims. They were under the impression that these claims would be paid in full.

* * *

One of Dr. Lunn's popular tours was interrupted on Tuesday by an unpleasant experience. The "Argonaut," with a hundred and twenty passengers on board, was run into, in a fog, off Dungeness, by a Newcastle collier, and sank in twenty minutes. Owing to the coolness of the passengers, and the efficiency of the captain and crew, not a single life was lost. The whole ship's company was transferred to the collier, which was also badly damaged, and the passengers had again to be transferred to a London collier, by which they were safely conveyed to Dover. The "Argonaut" has been unfortunate, as it is little more than a year since she went ashore on the coast of Norway, but on that occasion also all loss of life was averted, and the vessel was refloated.

* * *

The Moral Education Congress held its last session on Tuesday. As happens in all congresses, its work was dispersed through many sections, and its effect is impossible to summarise, but we shall hardly go wrong in taking Monday's discussion on Moral and Religious Education as the keynote to the whole proceedings. At any rate, both then and on the following day the two schools of thought were represented by energetic advocates, the French system in particular being brilliantly expounded by M. Buisson, of the Sorbonne, while the ethical view was also advocated in a striking speech by Mr. John Russell, of the King Alfred Society's School. The Congress will, we think, have done good in dispelling crude notions of what moral education means, and in stimulating the effort, at present confined to a few enthusiasts, to apply more fully the result of modern psychological inquiry to the training of intellect and character.

* * *

The flooding of the River Musi by the rains of Saturday and Sunday has given rise to a terrible disaster in Haidarabad. The river burst its banks, and what is described as a "wall of water" swept over the suburbs, wiping out a thickly populated district on the west of the city. Warning was given by the authorities at the British Residency, and many of the inhabitants had taken refuge on higher ground, but the loss of life appears to be very great, though, owing to its very magnitude, exact informaion is not at present obtainable.

* * *

In regard to the collision between a motor-car and a cyclist near Witham, referred to in this column last week, a correspondent sends us a cutting from the "Essex Weekly News," showing that the driver of the car did not, as was alleged in the London papers, drive off without offering assistance. The motorist states that he helped to pick up the cyclist and stayed with him for twenty minutes until other help arrived; and, further, that when reports about a runaway motor were circulated, he communicated with the police. We gladly insert this correction. At the inquest on the cyclist killed by a motor-car near Bolton at the last week-end, the jury found the chauffeur blameless, but "protested against the reckless driving of some motorists at dangerous crossings in the locality." On Friday of last week a boy, running out from behind a van, was killed by a motor-cab. A verdict of accidental death was found. On Wednesday an old man of eighty-four was knocked down by a private motor-car while crossing Whitehall and died in the evening. In the case of the woman killed near Oxford Circus in crossing the road from an omnibus, the evidence tended to show that she was confused by the sounding of a motor-horn, an important point, deserving serious attention in any attempts at legislation. The chauffeur was exonerated by the jury. In Lambeth a motor-cab driver was fined £10 for reckless driving, having come into collision with a waggonette, and having driven on before the police could obtain his number. On Wednesday two people, an elderly man and an elderly woman, were knocked down by motor-cars in the same road in Manchester and both died of their injuries. By a collision between a motor 'bus and car in a fog at Barnes on Thursday, the driver of the car was killed.

[The next issue of The Nation will be a Special Announcement Number and will contain a supplement dealing with the Books to be published during the season.]

Politics and Affairs.

THE FUTURE OF THE LICENSING BILL.

The demonstration against the Licensing Bill is perhaps best described in the words of the "Times" as "a remarkable example of skilful organisation." It is precisely for this reason that in its total effect upon public opinion it seems to have carried less impressiveness to the square inch, or, let us say, to the pound sterling, than any recent demonstration of similar size. No public man of the first rank was found to address the meeting, a point which is again emphasised, with some unkindness, by so friendly a critic as the "Times"; and the final touch of farce was added in the extravagant letter read at one of the platforms from Canon Knox Little. Indeed, the meeting has contributed no new fact. Everyone was aware of the uncompromising opposition of "the trade" to the proposals of the Government; everybody was aware of "the trade's" unequalled power of marshalling its forces; everyone knew that it could count upon the permanent support of certain sections of the Electorate. The Government, as its leaders have said, did not enter into this question blindfold; it had calculated on opposition; it was aware that the Bill must cost it by-elections. No evidence has been brought by the Hyde Park Demonstration to prove anything that was not well known already, to show the existence of any forces which had not been fully discounted by the supporters of the Bill. The demonstration had the circumstances of the moment in its favor. Held on the morrow of the declaration of the poll at Newcastle, it might have seemed to set the seal upon a victory which was no doubt in large measure due to the efforts of the trade. Yet in its effect upon public opinion it has failed. Neither the demonstration nor the Newcastle election, nor even a repetition of such incidents will move the Government from its course. The Bill is in its main lines accepted, not only by temperance reformers, but by moderate men, as a just and reasonable measure. The Government is fully pledged to the principles which it embodies, and any failure at this stage would only be taken as a proof of weakness, in our politics the most unforgivable of all sins.

But the Government has to reckon not only with the House of Commons and the country, but with a more serious and less calculable factor—the possible action of the House of Lords. For the main principles of the Bill the Government and temperance reformers can rely, it is gratefully acknowledged, on the support of the Bishops in that august assemblage. Had the Bishops the united force of the Church behind them their influence would probably be decisive. As it is, we must not shut our eyes to the fact that there are very strong political considerations which are likely to weigh with those who in the past three years have dictated the policy of the House of Lords. As long as the controversy is kept open, Mr. Balfour and his friends can count on a permanent subtraction from the forces supporting the Government. Once the Bill has passed into law, excitement will subside, the cry of confiscation will be recognised for the empty thing that it is, and people will very rapidly settle down into the new state of things. It is while it is pending that a controversy of this kind weakens the Government by exciting alarm, and both in this and in the Education Question the Opposition have all to gain from frustrating a settlement. If they can go to the country with these two questions open, they have every hope of distracting the Democratic forces and coming in on the failure of the Liberal programme to get itself inscribed on the Statute Book.

At the best, then, we must be prepared for strong opposition in the House of Lords, and we must realise that the crisis of the struggle will only come when the Bill has been read a third time in the House of Commons. But, on their side, the brewers will do well to remember that in this matter Ministers have a resource which was not available in the Education controversy. They may be barred in effective Temperance Reform by the obstruction of the peers, but there is one side of the Licensing question which they can tackle. They can deal with the problem of monopoly value through the Budget, and in doing so they can materially assist the finance of the country. The main constructive problem of next year's legislation will turn on the finance of Social Reform, and if the Chancellor of the Exchequer can approach the Licensing problem unencumbered by the consideration of a time limit, it will in no small degree lighten his task. There is no reason in equity, or in the nature of things, against an immediate readjustment of licensing duties. The only reason for postponing the question for fourteen years was to facilitate the reduction of public-houses, and the general cause of temperance reform. If the attainment of these objects is rendered impossible by the friends of the brewers in the Upper House, they will only make it the more incumbent on Ministers to deal with that side of the problem which lies directly within their power, and to do so without delay. This is the alternative to which Mr. Lloyd George, in his speech at Criccieth, has called the serious attention of the trade. For our part, we hope that it is not an alternative to which the Government will be driven. The power of the trade is the most serious political menace, as the extent of drinking is the greatest single social evil of the time. The driving force behind the Licensing Bill is a desire for Social Reform, which goes far beyond the financial considerations involved. Nevertheless, it is well for all parties that the alternative should be fairly kept in mind. Despite all the defects and illogicalities of our Constitution, the representatives of the people have, and should have, the last word. The Government cannot on this issue meekly accept defeat and pass on to the next question. On pain of confessing their impotence, Ministers must prove that they are masters in their own house, and, fortunately, in this case the Constitution provides them with effective means for the purpose.

THE TURKISH CRISIS.

There are in the anxious dispute between Bulgaria and Turkey two issues, the one acute, but temporary, the other of more serious moment and more durable influence. On the actual issue it would be a mistake to waste words. In seizing the Oriental Railway Bulgaria has put herself palpably in the wrong. It is natural and proper that Bulgaria should desire to acquire this important trunk line. It is the property of the Ottoman Empire, while an Austro-German company holds the concession for its working. Belgium and Switzerland long ago reached the conclusion that the ownership of their railways by foreign capital was incompatible with national autonomy. The arguments which influenced them apply with even greater force to Bulgaria, and she has a perfect right to seek to protect herself, either by purchasing the line from Turkey, or by buying out the rights of the concessionaire company. But in no civilised country is a Ministerial order a sufficient warrant for an act of expropriation, even when no foreign interests are involved. To seize first and negotiate afterwards is a piece of international bad manners, which no casuistry can defend. Whatever were Bulgaria's intentions, she has, doubtless, realised at length that European, and particularly English, opinion would emphatically condemn a policy of adventure. There is reason to suspect that she had contemplated a declaration of independence, which would have emancipated her entirely from the nominal suzerainty of Turkey. For the moment that experiment is postponed, but Prince Ferdinand has long cherished the dream of assuming the dignity of kingship; he has recently received direct encouragement from Austria, and now the firebrand General Tsoncheff, who is everywhere recognised as the Prince's man of confidence, has started an organised agitation against Turkish suzerainty. It was this personage who inaugurated the long period of anarchy in Macedonia, which has just come to an end, by leading an invasion into Turkish territory, against the wishes even of the rebel Macedonian organisation, in the winter of 1902. Now, as then, he is the agent rather of dynastic ambitions than of any popular movement. It is this evidence that there are politicians and courtiers, whose aim it is to undo the recent fraternisation between Young Turks and Macedonian peasants, which is the really serious aspect of the present conflict.

Opinion in this country has adjusted itself with surprising alacrity to the almost miraculous change in Turkey. The discovery that the Turks can reform themselves and restore their Empire may have shaken some of our traditional prejudices, but it threatened none of our interests. On the contrary, it relieved us from the difficult duty of forcing reforms by coercion, allowed us without dishonor to recover our old influence at Constantinople, and opened up the attractive vista of a progressive and tolerant Islamic renaissance. The promptitude with which British policy and public opinion adjusted itself, was a proof that our attitude in the past had its origin only in a decided but quite disinterested detestation for the Hamidian régime. To the interested Powers, to the Balkan States, and to some of the subject races of Turkey, the necessary effort of adaptation has been much more difficult, and they have performed it with less spontaneity and grace. Austrian statesmen had reckoned on the ultimate dissolution of Turkey. They had in effect promoted its decay by obstructing serious reforms, and they had sought, by opposing the Liberal Powers, to win for themselves the temporary favor of Yildiz Palace, a service for which the Novi-Bazar railway concession was the payment. Bulgaria, with better reasons and less purely selfish aims, had adopted towards the old Turkey an attitude of frank hostility. Year by year, at an immense material sacrifice, she had perfected her armaments, with the object of one day freeing her brethren in Macedonia from an intolerable tyranny, and at the same time of advancing the greatness of the Bulgarian race. The two aims, the one chivalrous and humane, the other purely self-regarding, had become inextricably associated in the national consciousness. To close the long chapter of massacre and stagnation in Macedonia was also to create in one way or another a great Bulgaria. To-day Macedonia is free, happy, and tranquil, but the dream of a great Bulgaria which its long miseries had excused, cannot be so readily abandoned. Even among the Macedonian Bulgars there is a curious conflict between their present satisfaction and the loss of their ultimate ambitions. We have seen some unrestrained and honest letters from their leaders which explain these two currents of opinion. The simple peasants are, of course, unfeignedly glad, for the change means to them only the end of a corroding and degrading fear, and the beginning alike of liberty and material well-being. But their leaders, if they admit the gain, are conscious also of a loss. An autonomous Macedonia or a Great Bulgaria would have meant for themselves personal influence and power, and for their race a certain position in the world. But in an Ottoman Parliament they will be only a small group beside the more numerous Turks and Greeks and the more adroit Armenians. Their welcome to the new régime has accordingly been reserved and ambiguous, and while consenting to work in the open as a constitutional party, they are quietly perfecting their organisation and their armaments. It is well to condemn this attitude, and we cannot refrain from condemning it in the strongest possible terms. But it is fair to make some allowance for the bewilderment and disappointment of men who are suddenly called upon, by an event to which they did not contribute, to renounce the dreams and the preparations for which they have risked their lives and sacrificed their fortunes. The only Christian race in Turkey which makes no reserves in its welcome, and feels no shadow in its joy, is the one race which had neither prospects nor illusions—the Armenians.

The more intelligent among the Young Turkish leaders are quite prepared to make allowances for this ambiguous state of mind, and they have shown tact and patience in handling the Bulgarians of Macedonia. They blundered only in failing to realise that if they are to live on good terms with their Bulgarian fellow-subjects they must refrain from provoking the Bulgarians of the Principality. The interests of the two sections of this divided race are by no means identical, but Sofia has influence enough in Macedonia to wreck any policy of fraternisation if she is determined to do so. By insulting the principality quite wantonly in the Gueshoff incident, the Turkish Government has now made for itself a complication which it should have sacrificed much to avoid. The result has been to throw Bulgaria into the arms of Austria. Austria thinks of annexing Bosnia; it may be that she also thinks of pushing downwards into Macedonia. Bulgaria thinks of declaring her independence; it may be that she also thinks of acquiring territory in Adrianople and Macedonia. Such a coalition might be fatal to Turkey, but we doubt whether, if war should result, the Great Powers would be generous in allotting Bulgaria her share of the spoils. It is obvious that if the Young Turks are allowed a field free from foreign complications, Turkey must become each year more able to defend herself from aggression. As in 1876 so to-day, the temptation to any Power which hoped to profit from Turkish decay is to strike before the reformers have had time to do their work.

That such disloyal schemes may for a moment present themselves to some of the less scrupulous politicians in Sofia and Vienna is not improbable. But Austria has always been a timid and conservative Power; Bulgaria is sensitive to European opinion. The risk lies not so much in any reckless policy of adventure, as in the adoption of a cold and self-assertive demeanour, which must react unfavorably on the pacification of Macedonia. Any tampering with the arrangements of the Berlin Treaty might have disastrous consequences. For if Bulgaria were to declare her independence, Austria might, with less risk, annex Bosnia, Greece absorb Crete, and Russia violate the arrangement which confines her navy to the waters of the Black Sea. The temptation to all these courses is considerable, for none of the arrangements in question is quite reasonable, and none of them can last for ever. But the effect of altering the status quo to the disadvantage of a Liberal Turkey would inevitably be to discredit the Young Turks, to revive the old sense of a natural war between Islam and Christendom, to bring Western political ideals into disrepute, and to expose the Christians of the Empire once more to the old suspicions and the old enmities. It would be, in a word, to revive the reaction, and with its revival to destroy the hope of a Turkish renaissance. If ever these arrangements are reversed, it must be when the new régime is secure, and any loss to Turkey must be balanced by concessions which will save the proper pride of the Turks. The abolition of the humiliating Capitulations would be the least concession which the Turks could be asked to accept in return for a surrender of rights which the Treaty of Berlin secured to them. But some years must elapse before such a bargain will be either prudent or desirable. In the meantime, the duty of Europe, and in particular of Great Britain, is to shield the most promising movement of our generation from foreign complications, and to meet with an uncompromising resistance any race or any Power which seeks to endanger its progress.

RAILWAY AMALGAMATION.

Underneath the exaggerated rumours of "mergers" among the great railroad companies, aiming at a single non-competing "trust," there is doubtless a solid substratum of truth. Several reasons must have led the companies to take to heart the advice tendered to them by Mr. Lloyd George during the negotiations of a year ago, that they should "set their house in order." This was not the menace that it seemed to some, but a plain suggestion of a business policy desirable in the interests of the shareholders and, provided adequate safeguards could be devised, of the public as well. The lack of co-ordination and the waste of competition are serviceable to nobody, and it is evident that combination among the companies is essential to anything that can deserve the name of a railway system. If we bear in mind the newer economic features in the situation, the great growth of expenditure by unremunerative extensions of lines and by increase of the wage bill, for which no adequate compensation has come in the shape of increased traffic, the consequent decline of dividends, and the precarious prospect opened up to shareholders in railways by the development of tramways and motor-cars, we cannot feel surprised that every effort should be made to effect economies of working. The first-fruits of the settlement effected by the Board of Trade last autumn was an attempt of the Great Northern and the Great Central to form a single business, so far as management was concerned, by pooling receipts and distributing them upon an agreed basis, without fusing their capital or abandoning their separate legal status. Had this been possible without an Act of Parliament, such "mergers" would doubtless have proceeded apace. But, though it is believed that the two companies intend to proceed with this project and to admit the Great Eastern into the alliance, the necessity of Parliamentary sanction makes the procedure slower and less assured, and, should other combinations, as, for instance, that suggested between the great roads running North and South, seek legal sanction, the proposals must be discussed not merely on technical grounds but in relation to the wider issues of public policy which are involved. At present it appears that a halt has been called at the stage of "working arrangements," such as the agreement between the Great Northern, North-Western, and Midland regarding through coaches and sleeping cars to Scotland, and a number of other similar economies to be secured by substituting concerted action for competition.

Most of these arrangements are tolerably obvious economies which involve no inconvenience or discomfort to any member of the travelling public, unless it be to a handful of luxurious wayfarers accustomed hitherto to have an almost empty carriage at their disposal, the cost of which has been in part defrayed by the tickets of third-class passengers. But since it is now probable that these tentative agreements will be followed by the development of a much more thoroughgoing policy of union, it is well that we should inspect more closely the situation that will be created when, by statutory powers or by private arrangements, "the waste of competition" has been eliminated from our great high roads. If we could assume, as is often done by well-informed and able advocates, such as Mr. E. A. Pratt ("Railways and Nationalisation," King & Son), that the interests of the shareholders and of the general public in the economical administration of railroads were virtually identical, we could simply encourage the companies to go ahead and fold our hands complacently. But what is proposed is, in substance, a monopoly of the means of transportation, and there is no more reason to assume that the interests of the management, concerned with procuring a maximum dividend, must coincide with those of a travelling and trading public seeking the lowest rates for the best service, than there is in any other monopoly. It is perhaps only natural that any such divergence should be ignored in the proposals of the railways. Lord Stalbridge, for example, outlining the proposed agreement between the North-Western and the Midland to his shareholders, used the following language: "Its principles are, first, the elimination of all inducements to excessive competition, which, while expensive, produces no additional traffic; and, second, co-operation in the working of all competitive traffic in the manner most convenient to the public and most economical to both companies." These harmonies between competition and co-operation, between the economy of the companies and the convenience of the public, are not "natural," and have little sanction from history. A monopoly in dealing with the consumer must certainly consider his interests, but only as a means to enable it to adjust a most profitable scale of prices. Similarly, in dealing with employees, a monopoly must treat them with such humanity and generosity as will come back in improved efficiency. Alike in the relation of capital to the public and to employees, there is a true identity of interests, but only over a certain part of the field: outside that area there is antagonism.

But, in truth, no one would seriously argue that railways without competition can be trusted always to do their best for the travelling and trading public. Both in their dealings with the public and with their employees, the State is to keep a firm hand upon them, regulating rates, requiring conformity to rigorous rules for the safety and welfare of the public and of the railway workers. Such is the theory. But can this supervision, control, and influence of the State be made really effective? The entanglement of issues now raised by Mr. Bell upon the dismissal of Midland employees, and the attempts of several companies to force reductions of wages without reference to the new machinery of conciliation, illustrate the difficulty on one side of this public control. But it is even more difficult to suppose that public officials can cope satisfactorily with the delicate and ever-changing machinery of rates, especially when the underlying issue is one of adjusting two partially conflicting interests without any accepted automatic standard of reference.

But though we can see no ultimate solution of the railroad problem upon the basis of private monopoly, qualified by a State control, which is likely to oscillate between impotence and vexatious interference, we are by no means so certain that the movement towards nationalisation is likely to be as rapid as some appear to think. For, in the first place, there is the strong British predilection for dwelling in half-way houses to be reckoned with. If the railways give the public not the whole but one tithe of the gains of their new economy, in the shape of improved service, and if reasonably good conditions for railway employees are maintained, a long halt at this stage may be secured. Moreover, the policy of combination, if it leads to improved administration and better business methods, will itself be likely to militate in two ways against any early nationalisation. In the first place, by consolidating the competing railway interests, it will enable directors and shareholders to offer a more powerful resistance to national ownership if they desire to do so. If, on the other hand, as is not impossible, they should desire to sell out to the State, the improved financial conditions, which ought to ensue from consolidation, would enable them to get a higher price from the nation. Indeed, the bargaining power of so strong a body of property owners, so fully represented in Parliament, would be so great, that we venture a word of warning to over-eager nationalisers, lest their movement should precipitate a policy of public purchase upon terms analogous to those given to Irish landowners, excessive in themselves, and not discounting adequately the new risks attaching to railway enterprise under the conditions of an age of electricity.

THE CLOSE OF THE BOOK WAR.

It is understood that the warfare between the "Times" Book Club and the Publishers' Association has been concluded by concessions on the part of the former, the precise nature of which has not been revealed. The story of the struggle is not without interest. Under American inspiration the "Times" entered on a project in which the hire and sale of books was designed to play the part of the eleemosynary teapot in the grocery business. In order to assist the circulation of the newspaper, subscribers were presented with the free loan of new books from the Book Club. This first blow was struck at the ordinary lending libraries, and so long as the attack was confined to them the publishers failed to realise the full significance of the project, and consented to supply the "Times" with books on special terms, which included an agreement to expend fifteen per cent. of the price of books upon advertisements in the newspaper. Then came a new development. The "Times" announced its intention to sell books a few weeks after publication to all who chose to buy them at a material reduction from the published price, thus breathing slaughter at once upon the publishers and the retail booksellers. To this menace the Publishers' Association replied with a resolution "that second-hand copies of net books shall not be offered for sale or sold at less than the published price within six months of publication," and rallied to this declaration of their policy almost all important members of the trade, undertaking neither to supply new books to the "Times" Book Club nor to advertise in the columns of that newspaper so long as this slaughtering method was applied. With transpontine audacity the "Times" then sought to carry the fight into the enemy's camp, posing as champions of "free trade" and cheap literature, and startling the uninitiated reader with revelations of the exorbitant greed of publishers, who sold at thirty-six shillings works which only cost five shillings to produce. Though the wild exaggeration of such statements was thoroughly exposed, they admitted nothing and retracted nothing, but employed every device which ingenuity could suggest to break up the opposition of the trade, and to secure by indirect methods the books which they could not purchase in the open market. Fortunately, the publishing houses stood firm, supported by the retailers and by the overwhelming majority of well-known authors. Although certain sophists strove to confuse the issue by dwelling upon unsatisfactory features in the relations between author and publisher, publisher and retailer, which belong to the special structure of the trade, the general body of the public clearly recognised that the "Times" was pursuing a course which, could it have succeeded, would have established a peculiarly injurious monopoly.

It is perhaps true to say that intelligent opinion was against the "Times" rather than with the publishers. If the "Times" or any other business firm showed itself able, by superior skill in organisation or any other mode of legitimate competition, to cheapen the supply of current literature, and to stimulate book-buying by enabling prospective purchasers to taste before they bought—two claims put forward by the Book Club—no questions regarding the intrusion of a newspaper upon a trade which "belonged to others" would have prevented it from securing wide sympathy and support. But all who understood the motives and methods adopted by the "Times" knew that the terms offered to the public were such as could not be maintained for long, and that if it had been possible for the "Times" to have succeeded, they must have recouped the heavy financial losses of such price-cutting by the terms they would subsequently impose on publisher, retailer, and consumer.

Publishers have never been very popular with authors, for the methods of appraising immaterial values are so essentially defective as continually to rouse suspicions and resentments in an irritable nature, and authors have often taken trouble to inform the public that they do not get their due. But, in truth, it is not easy to apportion blame for the unsatisfactory condition of the making and sale of books among the various parties concerned. One or two important features should, however, be kept in mind. A vast body of fresh readers is continually coming into being, with new sorts of education and shifting tastes, and the business of supplying them with reading becomes continually more speculative. Most of us bewail the unchecked flood of new books, far in excess, as it must be, of any normal healthy demand; indeed, it is admitted that most of them fail to find readers. But though we may set some blame upon the itch for authorship, and the reckless facilities afforded by the trade, it must be remembered that most books are published simply because the publisher had no means of knowing that they would fail until they had been tried. For even if the psychology of book-buyers were better known than it is, there is the rapid new development of the lending library to reckon with. With the exception of school books, certain classes of religious works and some presentation books, most volumes are produced not for sale but for hire, and the determination of their library success is extremely delicate and precarious. We doubt not that publishers in general would welcome, as much as the more educated public, any method of testing and standardising literature, which would diminish the terrible waste of the existing system of producing books, and would reduce the speculative character of their trade. But no reasonable person would look to the Times, either in its late or in its present management, for any contribution towards this desired end.

Life and Letters.

CHRISTIANITY AND DEMOCRACY.

A GREAT deal is said in the present day about "The Church and Democracy," "The Church and Labor," "The Church and Popular Amusements." Unfortunately, the idea of "the Church" is apt to be limited to the system of public worship and the persons who administer it. It is not likely that the democracy will busy itself with questions of dogma or ritual; but it cannot think lightly of the Christian spirit, nor can those who wish to live in that spirit turn aside from democratic movements. So long, no doubt, as we think of Christianity as an external element introduced here and there into human affairs, we may keep these two powers apart; we may preach and pray and think of heaven, and leave social movements to go their own way. But religious men have learnt to look upon Christianity as the redemptive force for the uplifting of mankind, and they cannot be indifferent to any of the movements which sway the thoughts and actions of the masses; nor can the strivings of those who by their own efforts are rising to power be viewed with any but a sympathetic eye, so long as the good of the whole community is kept in view.

We may even claim a closer union between these two powers of Democracy and the Spirit of Christ. No doubt, if we limit our conception of Christianity to the professions of the churches and their worshippers, the breach may seem absolute; but, since Christ never spoke a word about church-going, it is clear that that cannot be the test of a Christian; and, since He did speak constantly of justice, truth, and beneficence, and said that all religion was summed up in love to God and to man, and that men will be judged by the practical deeds of kindness which they have done, it is to those latter qualifications that we must look when we speak of Christianity. And who can say that they are absent from the organs of modern democracy?

Not only so; but the object of Christianity is to set up among men what Christ and the prophets and apostles called the Kingdom of God; and, if we ask the meaning they attached to this, we have it in the words of St. Paul: "The Kingdom of God is . . . righteousness and peace and joy." Is not this precisely what is aimed at by democratic movements? Take the motto which expresses their aim: "Liberty, equality, fraternity." Are not these the things which St. Paul aimed at when he said that we are not to be the servants of men, that for Christians there is no difference of race or condition or sex, and that we are members one of another? Or take the whole Reform movement, and the emancipation of one class after another by the grant of the franchise—what is it but the determination that, by each section of the community having power to express its needs, no injustice shall be done to any? Take, again, the word Socialism, so dreaded by some, so idolised by others. Must we not admit that its motto is entirely a Christian one: "From each man according to his ability, to each man according to his needs"? No doubt there is much in it to be explained, and much to be added for its completion; but if all men would unselfishly and ungrudgingly give all his best to the service of the community, and every man could, in recompense, receive what he needs according to a just judgment of his requirements, we should have, at least as regards the outward sphere, a very perfect society.

This is not a forced approximation of two rival powers: they are parts of the same movement of thought and energy. Men like Robert Owen and George Jacob Holyoake were inspired with the same enthusiasm of humanity which actuated William Wilberforce and Lord Shaftesbury; and we may venture to believe that Christ would have recognised them, and will say to each of them, What you have done to my brethren you have done to me.

What, then, is wanted? Why cannot Christian people be content to join in the labor organisations as they are, without introducing anything more definite as religion? Why should we not do away with religious teaching or public worship, since the life, and not the profession, is true religion, and the spirit of Christ is of so much greater value than the special ideas about Him which have formed the churches and sects?

The chief reason is that the organisations which are formed for special political or social objects are far too narrow; they do not cover the whole ground. One may be an enthusiastic supporter of Women's Suffrage or of an Eight Hours Bill; but there are things much more important than these—namely, the spirit in which we advocate them, and the general interests of the community and of mankind. If one trade seeks its own interest at the expense of others, it becomes unjust and tyrannical. It is held that the blackleg who refuses to join in a common movement of his trade is acting a selfish part. What, then, is the trade which should go its own way to the disadvantage of the community but a corporation of blacklegs? There are other interests than those of labor, and if all wage-earners could combine simply for their own advantage without regard to the claims of knowledge or culture or statesmanship, or the interests of the Empire or of the community of nations, they may become an unjust power, and the proper balance of social forces may be upset. And, if this one-sided course should be pursued with violence, we might have the scenes of the French Revolution enacted over again. In all human affairs we have to consider, not merely what is to be done, but in what manner it is to be done; and it is here that the spirit of Christ vindicates its supremacy. The spirit of justice and of love is more important than wealth or power. Nor can any great movement for the good of mankind be carried through without the support of unselfish devotion, of which the self-sacrifice of Christ is the abiding source.

On the other hand, we have to guard against a danger which is felt whenever Christianity is named. It is this—that the spirit of Christ is thought of far too much as connected with the organisations for public worship and its adjuncts, separate from the larger interests of mankind; so that it appears to men as something abnormal, having little or no relation to practical interests—something which denaturalises human life and divides human society, and, again, as being necessarily bound up with the system administered by the clergy; so that we have two warring powers, each claiming our allegiance, and the moral world is divided into two camps, not on the ground of the everlasting conflict of good and evil, but on that of the religious and the secular life. Of this latter conflict Christ and the Bible know nothing: in the former we must all take part.

Christianity is spoken of very commonly, as if it were a new element thrust at a particular time into the life of mankind, instead of being, as represented in the Bible, the realisation of the "purpose of the ages." But modern thought allows for an immanent God working through the whole creation and through all mankind. It allows us to think of Christ as the centre and culmination of this process. "God gave the spirit without measure to Him"; but He also gave the same spirit to others before and after in their measure. This permits us to think of humanity as a whole, every member of which has some function in the great body, while yet it justifies the special adoration which we pay to Christ as the source and centre of life. We desire that all men and all organisations should be Christian, not so that they may join in a special and separate body of worshippers, but that their whole life may be actuated by the spirit of sacrifice and of universal love which was in Him. And the Church then becomes not a separate body, the organ of a special function, but the whole of mankind so far as they share that spirit.

Human Society? That is a vast expression; and it implies not merely fortuitous collections of individuals, but organised aggregates, especially nations and their governments. But to these, since the triumph of constitutionalism, applies all that we have said in reference to democratic movements. Whether they work on a monarchical or a distinctly popular basis, whether, and to what extent, they admit the principle of Socialism, is not of primary importance. What is vital is the spirit of justice and of love. That spirit is inculcated, though with varied thoroughness, by all the different Church Organisations. They all need for their own efficiency, as well as for the good of mankind, the broad universal spirit which said that not in one place or mode is true worship to be found, but everywhere, if it be in spirit and in truth, and which has for its ideal "one flock and one Shepherd." When the Churches and their clergy imbibe that spirit, they will find nothing to make them stand aloof from any form of government, and nothing to make the nations and their governments repudiate them. This process is going on more rapidly than is commonly recognised. The late Pan-Anglican Congress and Conference (which we may take as typical of a general movement) had for their chief note Service, not dominion, and their interest in all social questions showed that what was meant by Service was not the inculcation of special tenets as modes of workship, but the sincere wish to minister to the social needs of mankind in the manner we are now advocating. Should this disposition ripen and bear fruit throughout the Churches, we may look forward to the cessation of mutual suspicions, and the working of the Christian nation in unity for the attainment of the things which are aimed at by the democratic movement under the impulse of divine justice and divine love.

W. H. Fremantle.

A RADICAL PIONEER.

No time has left fuller records of the life and manners of its aristocracy than the period of English history which began with the French Revolution and ended with the Reform Bill. Those were the last years of the exclusive reign of that aristocracy, for the period was marked by the rise to social power of a new class in England. To this new class belonged Richard Potter, one of the founders of the "Manchester Guardian," and member for Wigan in the reformed Parliament of 1833, fragments of whose diary have been published by his granddaughter, Mrs. Meinertzhagen, in a little volume entitled, "From Ploughshare to Parliament" (John Murray). This little volume is full of interest as an intimate picture of the life of a class of which we learn but little from published records. Richard Potter's career, it must be explained, did not begin behind the plough. It began where he was much less content to find himself, behind the counter. When he was seventeen his brother got him a place at a draper's in Nottingham, and he left his home at Tadcaster to begin the life of a shop assistant. It was not a life to which he took kindly, and all the efforts his brother made to reconcile him to it were ineffectual. Young Richard, who was fond of his books, disliked, in particular, being put in the kitchen in the evenings, but his family reminded him that he was very lucky not to have his meals there as well, "for brother John dined in the kitchen in most of his situations." His sister, anticipating the moral pointed by the Miss Taylors in their pleasing story about "Little Ann and Her Mother," added "If we wish to be happy we must look into the world, not at those above us, but at those below." Poor Richard was no happier in the shop than in the kitchen, for he found himself awkward when things were busy, and when they were not he felt that he ought to be allowed to read a book or a newspaper. But his brother explained to him that "nobody allows their young men to read in the shop. It is a system with all shopkeepers to appear busy."

Richard did not stay long at Nottingham. His next venture was at Birmingham. His brother, who was growing anxious about him, redoubled his sage advice, reminded him of that good impression that can be made by a little care about manners and deportment, particularly at table, and urged him to study the bearing of his more successful colleagues. "Amongst the young men in the shop you will find some in a higher estimation and confidence of their employers than others by their engaging manner of serving customers. Such it is a duty to yourself to imitate—the attentions, the language, the bow, and everything else attractive—aim at attaining." It is impossible not to think of the unfortunate Mr. Hoopdriver in Mr. Wells' "Wheels of Chance," and his desperate efforts to unlearn that bow and those attentions. As a matter of fact, poor William Potter, who gave all this eager advice, turned out to be, as Burke said of Savage, rather the friend of goodness than a good man, for he came hopelessly to grief and ended his days in drink.

Richard's career, in spite of its reluctant beginning, followed a very different course. In 1802 he started with his two brothers (one of them being William) in the business in Manchester which brought him wealth and power. Five years later poor William's infirmity made it necessary for him to withdraw; but the business grew and prospered without interruption. Richard, though in his shop assistant days he had paid less attention to his brother's exhortations than his family would have liked, had already given a taste of qualities which were the guarantee of success. He was extremely industrious and anxious to improve himself. He took French lessons in Birmingham, and formed a debating society among his fellow shop assistants, who met at half-past five in the morning, to discuss some of the topics of the day. This was not the first sign he had given of an interest in public affairs, for some years earlier he began to keep a diary, in which he jotted down his comments on politics. The politics of the day, obscured to us by the glories of the war with Napoleon, were a morose and bitter subject to those who could watch at close quarters the rapid degradation and impoverishment of the life of England. It is to Richard Potter's credit that the strong Radical views which he inherited did not fade away as his own fortunes improved, and that his concern for the sufferings of others did not diminish as he found himself passing from comfort into affluence. He and his brother belonged to the group of Manchester Liberals who started the "Manchester Guardian" in 1821. They were all lashed by Cobbett, who used to call them "the Prigs," and Richard himself "the simpering, drivelling, and stammering Dick," but it is significant that even that uncompromising critic admitted that "the Potters had given undeniable proof on many occasions, not only of their humanity, but of their really active benevolence." Mrs. Meinertzhagen publishes an extract from Richard Potter's diary which might help to explain Cobbett's dislike—a dislike which could be earned so easily and so capriciously were worth analysis:—

> "March 10th, 1813. This day being appointed for a General Fast, the funds for supplying the poor with soup in Manchester being exhausted, it was proposed to make collections in all the places of worship. I attended the old parish church and gave five pounds. There were several persons in the same seat whose circumstances were such as to expect they would have liberally contributed who only gave silver; but I was amply compensated by the pleasant reflections I felt the remainder of the day, which I passed alone."

In one respect Cobbett's description was conspicuously unjust, for there was nothing of the simperer in Richard Potter's treatment of the ruling powers. Indeed, the strong part he took in denouncing the Peterloo massacre made his sister, whom Mrs. Meinertzhagen calls "a shrewd and sensible old maid," a little uneasy. "I must own that I felt glad that you could not muster a meeting, because it would have made you conspicuous and obnoxious to the magistrates, which would have prevented you from ever co-operating with them in any public good. Another thing, their power is so great that it would be imprudent to make them your enemies." If Richard replied he probably explained that he did not believe in the possibility of much useful co-operation with the magistrates, for he was a stern critic alike of the justice and the administration of the class of whose rule we have a sympathetic picture in Mr. and Mrs. Webb's study of English Local Government. An extract from his diary gives us an illustration of the temper in which the ruling class maintained order:—

> "October 13th (1813). Manchester Quarter Sessions commence. I was attending to give evidence against a man. Afterwards two boys—John and Thomas Clough, aged twelve and ten years—were tried and found guilty of stealing some Irish linen out of Joseph Thorley's warehouse during the dinner hour. The Chairman sentenced them to seven years' transportation. On its being pronounced, the mother of these unfortunate boys came to the Bar to her children, and with them was in great agony, imploring mercy of the Bench. With difficulty the children were removed. The scene was so horrifying I could remain no longer in court."

This "Annual Register" for 1791, it may be noted, contains the mention of the execution at Newgate of two boys, aged fourteen and fifteen, for stealing. Richard Potter was, indeed, so much impressed by the savage sentences of his day, that he made a collection of them. These were the times when the opinions of the typical country magistrate, like those of General Dyott, whose diary was published last year, were based on the fundamental conviction that "nothing but the terror of human suffering can avail to prevent crime." The type of which Richard Potter was an example had its own weaknesses and faults, but it put an end to the reign of that system of brutal repression in which, to the Sidmouths in office, and the Dyotts on the Bench, the duties of the State had their beginning and their end.

A GOOD BOOK.

In the true meaning of a phrase which is generally meaningless this little book, "George Cruikshank," by W. H. Chesson (Duckworth) is a credit to its author. It is a great misfortune that the words "conscientious" or "laborious" and the idea of "hard work" in literature should generally be associated with mere masses of detail or catalogues of facts. As a matter of fact, Mr. Chesson is both exhaustive and accurate touching such facts, as anyone will know who remembers his bibliography of Charles Keene. But it is not for its facts that I call this book a piece of hard work. There are books crammed with facts which are nevertheless fundamentally careless. There are pages and folios of continuous accuracy which yet seem as if the writer had written them in his sleep. This is a conscientious book because the author has kept awake to write it. The hardest kind of work is really to work with one's head, not with one's pen or spectacles or paste-pot or scissors or British Museum reading ticket. To write down no word that does not mean something; to write no sentence without a point to it; to echo no mere fashionable phrases; to pick living adjectives; to select real analogies; not to pad by so much as an inch; this is really to work hard, and this is how Mr. Chesson works when he is at it. One can read through the narrative and trivial parts of Cruikshank's Life in this book with the certainty that the author's mind will be fully present in every sentence. He does not write the pompous parts of the book and leave the rest of the book to write itself. The most trivial sentence may have an entertaining twist in it, as that Isaac Cruikshank "was a Lowland Scot who lived and unfortunately drank by his art," or of the dark and dirty look of a figure "London is ashamed to see and acknowledge him: he makes her long for rain and soap in the rain," or best of all, that Fagin's den with the fried sausages "has a squalid comfortableness—a leering charity—which praises Hell." Nor is the excellence merely verbal; there are admirable ideas; nay, there are admirable definitions. "Humor then is the ability to receive a shock of pleasant surprise from sounds and appearances without attributing importance to them . . . it is victoriously beneath contempt and above worship"; or again, "his natural idea of a ghost was comic in the way of a wise old world that taxes pain and wrath for humor."

Therefore it is sad to think that if I called Mr. Chesson's book "conscientious," everyone would think I meant that it was dull. As a matter of fact, conscientiousness is rather painfully exciting; you have only to try being conscientious for a week to find that out. For my part, I like morality; it is so exciting; but I fear that Mr. Chesson would not always approve of my thus mixing it up with art. In defiance of his frowns, however, I insist on saying that this book is an ethical as well as an artistic credit to him. As the eighteenth century patrons of Cruikshank would have said, it is worthy alike of his head and heart. For it shows (what is much rarer than many people fancy) a strong literary sense of honor. Here is a little book, claiming only to be a slight biography, likely to be used as a mere table ornament. There are five or six first-class critics now drawing large salaries who would write such a book without taking any trouble at all to earn their money, except the trouble of being accurate—which can be delegated. It would be so easy to write a readable and flowing account of Cruikshank, full of all the unconscious modern dogmas, decorously thanking God (or Evolution, or whatever it is) that we are so much more moral and refined than our fathers, or praising our fathers for fighting Napoleon, without realising how hard it was to fight him. Such a book would have been acceptable; it would have been accepted; it would have been praised as much as I am now praising this. But Mr. Chesson, out of his own intellectual integrity, prefers to think his way through the book, to stud every other sentence with some sincere conviction or some sincere doubt. That is the sort of accuracy and the sort of conscientiousness which we really want to encourage. It is not dishonest to write a new life of Cruikshank with a false date for his birth, for that can be learnt in an encyclopædia. But it is dishonest to write a new life of Cruikshank with nothing really in it at all except what exists already in the encyclopædia. It is not dishonorable to put some private error into a book, but it is dishonorable not to put any private truth into it. We writers are paid to cut off bits of ourselves, and we must deliver the goods, if they are pounds of flesh. There are a great many points on which I should, in the abstract, like to argue with Mr. Chesson. I am not sure that he fully appreciates how near the old English virility was to virtue—almost as near as the two Latin words. But all such prospects of argument on the mere matter of Cruikshank are swallowed up in my agreement with him as to how such a book as this should be written. Here is a man who puts big thoughts into a small book. Here is a man (one may even say) who puts important thoughts into an unimportant book. If once writers can be urged to that sort of industry English literature is saved.

G. K. C.

WHY THE LEAVES TURN BROWN.

The house-wall that belongs to the Virginia creeper is flaming scarlet; yellow fire is creeping down the mighty elms; sycamore and lime hold up huge golden plates to the still air; dogwood is purple-black; the blackberry brambles show all these colors and many more; the beech will soon eclipse them all with its red-hot, radiant copper; and then down will come all these banners to the earth that gave them. The unending beauty of autumn reconciles us to the sadness of the winter change. It strikes us as more of a miracle than the green progress of spring, because we understand a little the reason of greenness, while we shall never understand why it serves the trees to be quite so beautiful in their annual moult. Perhaps there is no answer, but we shall for ever ask the question, as well as answer it with absurd inadequacy.

Death is usually accounted a privative phenomenon. It is life that changes the green caterpillar, through the brown chrysalis into the richly-painted butterfly. But the butterfly is not more brilliant or varied than the green leaves that have been painted by death. We are asked by science to believe that autumn leaves are red because the green chlorophyl grains have been withdrawn from them: that the red was there all through the summer side by side with the green, or even as one of its constituents. It does not satisfy. Pale green from dark green does not leave yellow: it leaves blue. Blue-green from green may leave yellow, but not the rich positive yellow of the maple. No painter can add beech-red to beech-green without making mud, or paint the flaming Ampelopsis leaves so as to make them a transparent green. Nevertheless, Nature may have done it, and it is the element of miracle in them that makes the autumn tints so delightful. The miracle is really in the summer green, but only the dénouement of autumn awakens us to the fact.

The popular belief that the leaves are nipped off by the cold night of autumn is as remote from the facts as the poet's cry that the young buds of next year push off the leaves that have had their day. In other climes the leaves come off at the approach of hot weather, and grow again when the cool rains come. They fly from the tree like intelligent units when they are about to become a burden instead of a help. The snows of winter would break the tree down if there were broad leaves to settle on: the scorch of the dry season would make it perspire to death. So in each case the leaves desert while the bad time is scarcely more than imminent. The order of course comes from the roots. The flow of sap, which has been abundant and regular while summer lasted, begins to fail when cold rains have chilled the soil (or the tropical sun has dried up the supply). Leaf transpiration comes to exceed the intake, and at last the tide flows the other way. The outposts are not driven in, but recalled. The starches and the sugars that the chlorophyl has been making pass from the leaf to the twig, and often to the branch, the stem, and the tuber warehouse underground. As they pass from the leaf blade to the permanent wood, someone closes the gate. The outwork is to be abandoned, and bark must grow where there were channels for the flow of sap. The leaf, or the skeleton that remains, is no longer of the tree, though it remains on the tree till the cleansing wind shakes it down.

A curious phase of leaf abandonment is shown on our house-wall, where the Virginia creeper is flaming so redly. First of all, the substances that the green cells have worked for are withdrawn from each leaflet to the leaf-stalk. The cork layers of separation are formed, and one by one the leaflets fall, till the wall bristles with leaf-stalks, down which the sap is slowly passing to its true winter quarters. For soon the lower bridge is blocked and a second moult rids the creeper of all of its summer hamper. It is the same with the sumach, the ash, the chestnut, and the "Sacred Tree of Heaven," which has become such a favorite in our towns. It seems as though these trees hoped every year to be allowed to retain at least the long middle stalks of their leaves. It is not to be however, for, one and all, they are at length compelled to cut down to the first bud. One wise and capable plant alone there is in the garden that retains a bit of the stalk. That is the syringa, which keeps just a scale-like portion as a house for its bud till next spring.

If what we have said were the whole truth, we could have autumn tints at will by starving the roots of our summer trees. The elm branch that we broke in climbing for the magpie's nest shows that this is not so. The leaves withered in a day, but they never turned yellow, and are even now hanging on the wounded branch. They will survive even the orderly retreat of their yellow fellows now mustering for the last review. The cork-forming habit, then, so far as it relates to the base of the leaf, is purely autumnal. It is something so much higher than the automatic back-flow that follows decreased pressure, that it is almost worthy the name of intelligence. It is, at least, a seasonal habit that stands very much for the preservation of the tree.

It is a rule that the trees that first went into leaf in spring retain their autumnal glory longest. At the end of May the freshest green was that of the ash, following much other foliage that had already passed into the sober hue of middle age. And now the ash is stripping off its pennons so rapidly that they have no time to get rid of their chlorophyl first. The elder, which gave its treasured wisps of green in February, still shelters the thrushes in a complete dome of leaves as they sit and gobble the rich black berries. "The brushwood sheaf round the elm-tree bole," which burgeoned more than a week before the upper branches, has not yet caught the yellow fire which has consumed the topmost sprays, and is burning the great middle portion. On the other hand, long after the lower boughs of the poplar have yellowed and become bare, the top will bear plumes almost as green as the mistletoe that the storm-cock has planted among them. Differences of character, not merely between species, but between individuals, constantly present themselves as we pass through the field of battle. A single sycamore within twenty yards of many others is a pillar of fire, while its neighbours are unflecked. Here, side by side with oaks that are withering in their dour fashion, is one dressed in the tender red-green of spring. The birches on the top of the gravel bank have lost their plumes, while those only twenty yards below are covered with parti-colored leaves. The outer part of each has been abandoned, while the base is full of the green army retiring towards the twig.

The chlorophyl grains swim in the protoplasm of the cell, as the red corpuscles in the hæmoglobin of our blood. When the light is weak they muster clamourously at the surface, for then each must work its hardest to get the utmost chemical advantage of a short supply. But when the sun shines strongly, the leaf grows less green. A few chemists can do all the work, or the flat granules only need turn an edge instead of a broadside to the sun. The pupil of each cell contracts as does the eye of the cat under similar circumstances. The brightest greens are those found in deep, rocky pockets, where hartstongues and liverworts eke out a labored existence, or in darker places still, where the Luminous Moss earns its name, merely by the activity of its chlorophyl particles. There is much to be learnt about these tiny green bodies, but we do know that some salt of iron seems essential to their formation. Give a plant soil that has no iron in it, and it produces white leaves, which are not of the least service for prolonging life. Feed it now with an iron salt, and the leaves become green and serviceable. Surely, then, the secret is out, and we know why the leaves turn brown. Added to all that wonderful list of benefits that Ruskin reminded the people of Tunbridge Wells they owed to iron must be the green of summer and the glory of autumn. It is to the rusting of infinitesimal particles of iron in the abandoned leaf-structures that we owe the elm flames, the scarlet of the whortleberry, and the glowing fires of the beech.

Short Story.

BARBARA.

"I came in tired and miserable; and then I found your letter. I shall keep it till I die, and have it buried with me. It's the one thing in my life I shall want to remember when I'm dying—that I did love you with all my heart and soul and strength, and there was something in me that you loved.

"I can't marry you, and God helping me, I will never see you again. To-morrow I shall be gone—I don't know where, abroad, perhaps. But I shall have your letter, it will keep me from doing anything wrong. I will try to be good.

"Didn't you ever guess, when you came to these flats, that you had got among a shady set of people? To be sure, some of them are quite all right, except for being Bohemians. . . . I'm not. You would have seen if you had been anyone else that I wasn't a good woman. There's a little brazen way one gets—I've heard it in my own voice, I've seen it in my own face—a dash of devilry, that says to respectable people, 'Your grapes are uncommonly sour and hard.' So they are; but ours are worse—ours are poison, and we know it.

"I needn't go into details; besides, I'm not so bad as many women. I fell in love with one man and married another; then I ran away with the first. When my husband died, he didn't marry me; he left me; we had grown to hate each other. Afterwards—but I won't tell you any more; it doesn't do any good that I see. . . . For years I've kept straight—I don't know why. I'd enough money left me to live on—just enough, and, perhaps, my soul knew you were coming; you came six months ago.

"You were poor, and in spite of your genius, it was touch and go whether you held on or went under. If you'd been a prig you might have gone under for aught we cared—as it was, we all took to you. We helped you in ways you never guessed, and we kept our manners and morals right side up before you—with considerable difficulty, because it was their second nature to be upside down. That first Sunday—shall I ever forget it?—when you picked up my bangle that had come loose, and tumbled, and tried to roll all down the stairs, like an india-rubber ball. We both laughed at the bangle, and then I saw how lonely and how tired you looked. I asked you to come in and have coffee.

"There were half-a-dozen of us, and the room was full of tobacco-smoke and whisky. When you came in it looked like the Cherub Choir and the Rake's Progress trying to live together peaceably in one canvas. But you were so friendly, so grateful, we all took to you right away; and by-and-by we asked you to sing. My dear, you sang us Gounod's 'There is a green hill far away,' because it was Sunday. Gracious heavens! because it was Sunday! We all cried. And afterwards, you should have heard McKinnon raging because he hadn't tried to snap you up at once for his music-hall—you didn't know he had one, did you? He has—and sails it very near the wind, too. Oh, well, he did something better for you later on, and you've got your own place at last—high-class opera and oratorio. That's your line—and mine isn't.

"Three months ago you fell ill, and we all looked after you, but I looked after you the most. It was then I found out I loved you, and it was then I found out you loved me. I was terribly glad and terribly sorry. I was longing to break down and give in, night and day, but I must have kept myself well in hand. You sound so doubtful, in your letter, as to whether there is any chance for you!

"You didn't speak then; and soon you went away. I thought you might forget among fresh faces. Of course, I knew you wouldn't, but I honestly thought you might. It would have been better for you. But you were only waiting till the tide had really turned, and you could offer me some kind of home. Why, I'd live with you in the worst kind of shanty, on nothing a week! But it can't be.

"I'll say whatever I like to say in this letter, because I shall never see you again. Six months ago I didn't know you, and now you're all there is of me. It's a new kind of love, so strong and quiet; I seem able to rest in it, as I never rested before. It makes me forget there's any such thing as sin. It's as if all my life had brought me to it, and now, because it's real, it must go. When you were lying ill, I prayed to God to let me die for you. Perhaps this is His way of answering prayer. I believe in God, now, you know, because you once said you did—and I can't think that the worst kind of universe would be mean enough to cheat you any more than I would. You're so trustful, you see."

"I know, if I know you at all, that reading what I have told you in this letter will make no difference to you. If anything, it will make you care for me more; you'll feel as if you held a brief for me against myself. No, I'm not afraid of your love's failing me, and I'm not afraid of failing your love. It's quite easy to be good if one's happy. That's not my reason for giving you up—and it isn't the social handicap, though it exists. You'd climb higher and higher, and the higher you climbed the more people would remember all about me. To set against that, there are the many ways in which we satisfy each other, make each other happy and free. I don't believe I should ever bore you, and I should give you so much room—there would be the whole world before you.

"These others, the good women, so seldom understand that. They don't want to wander, and they don't see why anyone else should. When they look at a rolling stone it stops, and gathers moss for all it is worth—till they look the other way again—and if they never take their eyes off it, it finds a mossy grave. Oh! it would be too terrible if you married a woman like that! You'd be lonely—only your own soul to commune with—and that's like shaking hands with one's own hands. And yet it would be better for you than marrying anyone like me.

"I think, even when I was a child, I hated to give people I liked a spoiled thing. Dear, suppose you wanted to give your most favourite book to the person you loved best of all, and you had a beautiful copy of your very own. And suppose you had been careless, and when the person's birthday came, and you meant to write the name, and mark some lines that were like your soul speaking, you found a stain, a common, hateful stain—grease, tallow, something hideous—and it had soaked through all the loveliest pages, and you couldn't bear the one you loved to see or touch it. You hadn't known you had been careless with the book till you wanted to give it away.

"Well, one can throw a book into the fire, and go and buy another. I can't do that with my life—and it might have been so beautiful. I feel far older than you; but I'm very little older. We laugh and cry at the same things: when one wants to be quiet, the other does—we should have been such comrades. I never would have spoiled my life if I had known I should want it for you. Last night I heard a man preaching about the forgiveness of sins. . . . I wish, instead of forgiving me, God would make me able to help you as much as if I hadn't sinned. What's the use of being forgiven? It won't make you miss me less when I go away from you.

"I shall pray continually that you may forget, that it may not embitter you, that you may find the one woman in a million who can give you everything—and goodness, too. You must never try to look for me. Oh, God bless you, and good-bye!"

Barbara put down the pen and read the letter over.

"It's all true," she said, slowly. "And it might sound like giving him up—to some people."

She walked across to a tall mirror, and looked at her own face in the glass. The lovely face looked back at her, with a vague fear in the eyes, that deepened as Barbara apostrophised it.

"Are you really going to let go, or are you only trying to hold tighter? What's this letter for, anyhow? You say he'll find out some day, and then despise you for not telling him. Very well; why shouldn't he? Oh, I don't know, even I, what you're after—you're such a hydra-headed beast! You've been posing all your life. Never mind, poor thing; it's your nature! But I'll put a spoke in your wheel."

There was real terror now in the mirrored face. It is one thing to play with a lighted match, close to a train of gunpowder, and picture death and desolation—another thing to fire the train. Barbara turned away from the mirror, and, with a blind instinct of self-protection, reached the door and turned the key. At all events, there was no pose now—and for the next few minutes such pain shook her as it seemed hardly possible to bear and live. When she sat down at her desk again, she looked haggard, spent, and old. But she wrote fast and clearly.

"No, it can't be. I deserve shooting. I am so awfully fond of you, and now I have hurt you like this. But you had better have it straight; I don't love you enough to marry you,—never shall. It's quite different.

"If I hadn't been a senseless idiot, I should have seen what I was doing, where you were drifting. But, thank the Lord, I'm going away. You'll have a chance to forget me, and the sooner the better. I feel such a sweep.—BARBARA."

She addressed and stamped the letter, and, unlocking the door, ran down to the hall porter.

"Will you take this just now?" she said.

She watched him turn the corner, and went slowly back to her room. The letter she had first written was lying on the table, and there was a fire in the grate. Painfully, it was as if she were hurting some living thing, she tore it into small fragments, and flung them into the fire. The next day the grate was fireless, and the room was silent and bare.

MAY KENDALL.

Present-Day Problems.

THE LIBERTY OF THE SUBJECT.

THE Liberal Party has long posed as, and has, in fact, been, the watch-dog of liberty. It has—in name, at any rate—never abrogated the rôle, but occurrences of recent years make one wonder if the Party as a whole is still sensible of its prerogative in this respect. For a period approaching three years a Liberal, an advanced Liberal, Government has been in power, supported by a huge majority in the House of Commons, and opposed by a minority not only small in numbers, but contemptible in debating power, tactical ability, and, it may be added, pugnacity. A halcyon period, one would have thought, not only for the assertion and maintenance but for the extension of the principle of liberty. And yet, sad to have to relate, the greatest set-back to which this principle has been subjected for innumerable years past has been at the hands of this powerful Liberal Government in the shape of a Bill introduced by a statesman bearing the revered name of Gladstone.

The title of this Bill has, in my opinion, been chosen with the object of covering up the noxious principle which it proposes to legalise—in effect the permanent suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act as regards a certain number of British subjects. Mr. Gladstone's measure has been named the Prevention of Crime Bill—an alluring title, for who does not desire to prevent crime?—and manifestly an Act of Parliament to that end looks a step in the right direction. But is the prevention of crime the main object of this Bill, and, granting that it may in some degree prevent crime, how is the result going to be attained? The answer is plain. Crime is to be prevented by permanently incarcerating a certain number of men who have previously committed crimes and who, it is assumed, because of their previous offences, will continue committing crime for the remainder of their lives. In this sense the Bill is, undoubtedly, one for the prevention of crime. It might be similarly dubbed, and quite as correctly, did it enact that every man charged with an offence who had so many previous convictions registered against him, should be executed. This would be a more logical, a more effective, and certainly a far more economical method of dealing with the professional criminal than the measure fathered by Mr. Gladstone.

I object to Mr. Gladstone's Bill not only because it is a covert attack on the whole English conception of the liberty of the subject, but also because it is based on the assumption that the professional criminal is a natural product and can only be exterminated by unnatural methods. Mr. Gladstone has been dazzled by the penologists, who seem to be obsessed by the professional criminal and to be filled with an insensate mania to get and keep him under lock and key. Certainly in one respect these penologists are consistent, though they fail to realise the fact. The English professional criminal is an English prison-product, and, such being the case, there is a certain amount of appropriateness in relegating him to perpetual durance in an English prison. But what is the utility of such a step, leaving on one side for the moment questions of justice and economy? Surely the saner, the easier plan, would be to set about putting a stop to the constant manufacture of the professional criminal. How is this unpleasing product of modern civilisation brought into existence? Let me consider this matter for a moment out of the depths of my own experience.

The man sentenced in this country to penal servitude comes under the influence of a prison system the most degrading and demoralising in the world—absolutely ineffective from any point of view. In cases where actual punishment is most needed it is not punitive at all, while it is never educative or reformative. It is simply a deadly dull routine, concerned with the infliction of petty degradations, petty annoyances, petty irritations. It has no objective save the completion of the prisoner's sentence. It utterly demoralises and degrades the person subjected to it, has a pernicious effect on his physical and mental well-being and a weakening effect on his moral fibre. It tends to train the prisoner in habits of deceit and cunning. Indeed, the system exercises so drastic a change on the moral fibre of the average prisoner that it is little short of marvellous that the number of professional criminals is not even greater. When the convict, whose system has been weakened physically, mentally, and morally, has completed his sentence he is turned adrift on the world with a paltry gratuity. The whole of his training in jail, the work he has been called upon to do there, absolutely unfit him for the rôle of a respectable citizen. He, moreover, quickly finds and feels that he is not wanted in the world, that there is no place for him there. Practically the only men who will give him a welcome and a helping hand are those who, from their own experience, will tell him that he is pursuing an idle quest in attempting to earn an honest living, that there is no place for him in the ranks of honest labor, and that if he got there he would not long remain there, because the police, under whose supervision he still is, would quickly acquaint his employer with the fact that he is what is officially designated "a convict on license." These professional criminals, whom the discharged prisoner has met in jail and whom he meets again on his return to the world, quickly convince him that he is as they are, an outlaw, and that the only thing for him to do is what they do, namely, to prey upon that society which has made them what they are. This is no fanciful sketch. The recruiting of this professional criminal class goes on day by day in the manner I have indicated and for the reasons I have suggested. The penologists come along and suggest the placing under lock and key for life of these professionals. They assure the public that these men find fascination, exhilaration, excitement in the pursuit of a horrible vocation, that they will not be quit of it no matter what opportunities may be proffered them, and that accordingly the only thing that remains is to place such persons under restraint for the rest of their existence. This seems to me to be a counsel of despair. I assert that professional crime will never be stamped out by shutting up a certain number of criminals. I admit the evil thing exists, but I suggest that the causes which produce or induce it should be ascertained, and, being discovered, should be as far as possible removed. The professional criminal is not quite so black as he is painted. I have conversed with hundreds of these men, and I assert they are by no means the hardened, hopeless, degraded beings they are depicted. The penologists contend that crime is a disease, and yet they decline to treat it as such. My contention is that the diagnoses of these penological physicians are altogether faulty, that their medicine is noxious, and that their suggestions are futile.

I suppose Mr. Gladstone's Bill is certain to pass into law. It is to me astounding that such a measure should go through with practically no opposition and only some perfunctory criticism. It is not only because this Bill strikes a dangerous blow at the liberty of the subject, but because it is in all its details a retrograde and unsatisfactory measure that I am opposed to it. It is, despite the verbiage of Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Samuel, a Bill to legalise the permanent incarceration of certain old and uninteresting criminals. That it is considered to be merely this by those who will have to administer the measure when passed, may be deduced from the obiter dictum of one of the judges at the Old Bailey a short time back, when two habitual criminals were brought before him. "A Bill," he remarked, "is before Parliament for imprisoning men like you for the rest of your lives, and I think it would be a wise and proper measure." Of course, this is really the aim of those whose influence and agitation have led to the introduction of the Bill, and I have not the slightest doubt that the result of the measure will be simply the permanent incarceration of a certain number of persons in respect of whom a writ of habeas corpus will not run. The British public has been led astray by the statements and promises of the Home Secretary respecting the treatment of these professional criminals when in confinement, and the measures to be taken to train them in principles of ethics and moral rectitude so that they may return to the world as model citizens at the earliest possible date. It is an alluring picture, but let me point out that Mr. Gladstone's and Mr. Samuel's promises are not provisoes of the Bill. It invests the Home Secretary with autocratic powers, and everything, or almost everything, in regard to the treatment of these incarcerated persons is to be at his discretion. That, of course, means at the discretion of the Prison Commissioners, who have long administered English prisons in the name of the Home Secretary, and who will, no doubt, continue to do so. As soon as this Bill is passed I prophesy we shall hear precious little about reformation and release. The only release for these incarcerated professionals will be when they are escorted to the cemetery with two prison warders as mourners to see them securely under ground. Reformation in any prison or penitentiary under the Prison Commissioners is an idle dream. Just as grapes will not grow on thistles so reformation of character will never be brought about by the men who are at present detailed to run English prisons, saturated, as they are, with the principles, prejudices, and traditions of the English prison system.

The Bill, as I have said, will no doubt pass. The fact is not only regrettable, but, in my opinion, scandalous, seeing that the present House of Commons contains an enormous majority of men who would, if called on to-morrow, loudly asseverate that they would, if necessary, lay down their lives in defence of the principle of liberty. The Prevention of Crime Bill, when passed, will be the greatest blow that liberty has received in this country for very many years. True, it will practically affect only the liberty of a small, uninteresting, and dangerous class, many, if not most of whom, are the products of modern social conditions. Nevertheless, the essential principle of liberty which rests upon the Habeas Corpus Act is assailed in this Bill, and the assault will shortly receive the legislative sanction of several hundred members of Parliament returned to the House of Commons to maintain and defend the sacred and time-honored principle embodied in the word "Liberty."

H. J. B. Montgomery.

Art.

THE AMERICAN SCHOOL OF PAINTING.*

For the average Englishman, who thinks at all about it, American painting begins and ends with a small group of American painters working in Paris and London. Even officially in England an "American School" has seemed an impossibility, and, one after another, American artists have been stripped of their nationality. Benjamin West is remembered as the British President of the British Royal Academy. In the National Gallery, Copley and Stuart are handed over to the British School, which also claimed Whistler, who would have been more surprised than anybody to find himself there, when his "Old Battersea Bridge" was first hung in Trafalgar Square among the Turners and the Landseers. But the evidence of British influence in the earliest American pictures does not make British artists of the men who painted them. Unless they had based their methods on the art of the Red Indians—from whom, indeed, West is said to have had his training in the use of color—it was inevitable that their painting should be influenced by British models. Nor does a painter lose his nationality because he does not happen to stay and paint at home. Holbein is none the less a German because much of his work was done in England. Van Dyck is included in the Flemish School, though he lived for long in London and died there. The fact is that an American School exists, as old as the United States, and its origin may be traced and its development followed in the extremely interesting pages of Mr. Caffin's story.

* "The Story of American Painting." By Charles H. Caffin. Hodder & Stoughton. Price 10s. 6d.

It is extraordinary, not that there should have been few painters in the beginning, but that there should have been any at all. The Colonists had more urgent matters to think of than art; the young Republic's struggle for life was too absorbing to leave much leisure—or money—for the patronage of artists. Painters who survived the unfavorable conditions had no chance of advancement except in portraiture. Most of the early American paintings are portraits. Benjamin West began his career by painting portraits. Copley and Stuart were essentially portrait painters. At their best, all three are artists of distinction: Stuart is often more than a rival to his English contemporaries, some of West's portraits and studies make one regret his straining after the "grand style" in his more ambitious canvasses. There is less to show for the next generation; but, after all, it was not a brilliant period anywhere. The most characteristic American painters during many years were the men usually grouped together as the "Hudson River School," Bierstadt, Church, Moran the most conspicuous—painters of huge panoramas of commonplace, not, however, without a sincerity that will always give them a place in galleries of American pictures and histories of American art. Schools were started: the Pennsylvania Academy in Philadelphia dates back to the end of the eighteenth century. But schools could not at once create tradition and "atmosphere," and many students came to Europe. Düsseldorf was for long the favourite centre, and then Munich. At first only the few preferred Paris, which now draws to it the many. William Morris Hunt was the exception, when he entered Couture's in the 'forties; George Inness and Whistler found few compatriots when they arrived in the 'fifties. Whistler never returned home, but both Hunt and Inness did, and Hunt made himself almost immediately the influence that Whistler became only later, and by degrees. Hunt was a fine artist, whose reputation would be greater had he not devoted his time less to painting than to teaching. His training under Couture was sound. In Paris he got to know something of Millet, whose work was to him an inspiration. And so he brought back to America not only all that was best in the traditions of the old generation, but all that was healthiest in the movement of the new. The "Hudson River School" had been as absorbed in subject, though of another kind, as the Victorian painters of anecdote. The gist of Hunt's teaching, as Mr. Caffin explains,

> "was that it is not the subject but the way in which the subject is rendered, that determines the artistic merit of a picture; that in the hands of an artist, any subject, no matter how simple and insignificant, can be made artistic, and that this artistic quality, a product and expression of himself, is what the painter should aim chiefly to embody in his pictures. Furthermore, that the ideal of good brushwork is not to concern oneself with niggling precision of detail for detail's sake, but to obtain truth of character and expression."

This was good seed to sow, and Hunt had the talent of inspiring enthusiasm. As a result of his teaching, and of the return of an ever-increasing number of students from Munich and Paris, there was a strong group of artists working in the right direction at the moment, when, after a hundred years of busying about many essential things, Americans could draw breath, and bring their "long apprenticeship to the learning of other lands" to a close. The Centennial Exhibition, held at Philadelphia in 1876, is usually looked upon as epoch-making in the history of American art, and with reason. It gave the people who stayed at home—and in those days they were the great majority—a chance to see what artists were doing in other parts of the world, and to realise the interdependence of art and industry. A new need was felt, and the supply came, not from, but with, the demand. Galleries and schools sprang up on every side. The splendid work done in black and white from that time onward is an old story now. Painting developed quite as brilliantly, though this was a development of which so little was heard outside of America, that, in Europe, the American section in the Paris Exhibition of 1900 was almost the first hint, or revelation, of an American School—vigorous, full of vitality, with a marked character of its own.

The story of this growth is well told by Mr. Caffin, with less detail than Mr. Isham gives in his "History of American Painting," but with more attention to influences and movements. We do not always agree with him. To us Hogarth is much more than "an excellent painter." We think Mr. La Farge's importance in American art is exaggerated. It seems to us an injustice to Mr. Abbot Thayer to make any sort of comparison between him and Mr. Dana Gibson. We do not see why labor could not have suggested as fine motives to painters returning to America in and about 1876 as to Millet in Barbizon, or Meunier in Belgium. These, however, may be matters of opinion. A more serious fault is Mr. Caffin's determined search throughout for the "spiritual." He has no patience with subject as long as this means literary subject; but then he substitutes in its place a hidden spiritual meaning with which the artist is still less concerned. A landscape must express "the inward spirit of the scene" to have merit in his eyes. He believes, with Mr. La Farge, that a work of art is the better for suggesting that "it is but a fragment of a universal harmony and entity." Homer Martin is commended because "he did not absorb nature and then pass it through the prism of his own consciousness," but "himself passed into nature, and became once more conceived in her, afterwards employing the strength of his intellect to express, as it were, the secrets of the womb." George Fuller's greatest pictures are "expressions of a singularly beautiful condition of soul." Because Inness reasoned upon the eternities and was a Swedenborgian, he was particularly drawn toward Corot. And so we could go on quoting. But nowhere is Mr. Caffin's chase of the spiritual so out of place as in his criticism of Whistler, whom he praises for "spiritual insight," for "dipping beneath externals," for giving us "not the facts of nature, but their effect upon the spirit." "It was not the forms of nature per se which interested him, but their significance to the spirit." "With Whistler, we may do well to enter at times into the tranquil half-light of the soul, and wonder upon the things of the spirit." In a word, Mr. Caffin extols Whistler for the very qualities that Whistler was at pains to protest should not be looked for in his work. It is not surprising after this that Mr. Caffin, in conclusion, should base his hope for the future, not only of American, but of all art, upon its entire pre-occupation with the "facts of the spirit," which really means that it will have escaped from the bondage of one sort of subject only to fall victim to another.

We cannot but object, also, to the make-up of the book. It is unnecessarily heavy, the illustrations could be better chosen and better printed, the sub-division of chapters by a line of black marks across the page is extremely ugly. Here objections end, and we can recommend Mr. Caffin's Story to all who have waited for it to know that an "American School" exists.

Letters to the Editor.

SCARES AND SCAREMONGERS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—News from England is very scanty, but I gather that you are in the throes of a war-scare. German army, German fleet, and German spies flourished before the terrified eyes of the Great Gullible—I know the way of it. And in this knowledge I have been interested to observe the other side. In later time, I think, the Anglo-German ferment of 1908 will be the subject of amused mystification and the standard example of the extreme risk which the principle of a Free Press must necessarily involve.

I suppose that the great bulk of "common sense" opinion in England pictures a Germany whose activities in commerce and armament, whose feeling and policy have for their aim and lure the downfall of England. Now, in Germany—and here, I think, the gods must smile—the feeling towards England is of an almost identical nature. It is not, however, the size of our fleet that causes their deepest misgivings, but our unfortunate addiction to treaties and ententes. They conjure up the prospect of Germany, a solitary remnant, face to face with the civilised world under the paternal leadership of Great Britain. And, quite naturally, the prospect affrights them.

This seems, of course, very trivial and foolish—to the Englishman. "Our foreign policy," he will say, "has brought the world decades nearer to the ideal of universal peace. We have been transparently altruistic and conciliatory. These people believe all the papers tell them." And he sits down to read the latest statistics as to the number of German waiters in England or swallows whole an article which describes minutely the aggressive projects of the German Government during the next five years. Mind you, I describe just the ordinary opinions on both sides.

The Englishman will not recognise that Germany, with a commerce of later origin and, therefore, of more rapid growth than ours, must under present conditions build a fleet adequate to its present and future protection; that her geographical position makes a large and well-organised army an unfortunate necessity.

When you grasp this two-sidedness—this mutuality—of the scare you will appreciate how entirely the newspapers of both countries are responsible for it.

The two nations, like the animals of the Colosseum, have been goaded into the arena by the malicious pricks of these pitiless attendants. The analogy only fails when one considers that if the fight should come the onlookers will not find the spectacle very amusing.

What object the newspapers may have, I know not. Whenever I speculate on the subject I find that the result arrived at always reflects on the motives of their capitalist proprietors. So it is, perhaps, best charitably to say that possibly this topic pays well—though if that be true one may well ask, "Is there yet honesty in journalism?"

I know, of course, all the arguments which are adduced for fomentation purposes—arguments of gilt-edged respectability and undeniable truth. They are all set out; the necessity of precaution when the security of the nation is at stake, the lessons we may gather from history, and so on, without end. But let us assay the facts so that you may see the exact nature of my contention.

In England the whole people, all parties alike, look with horror on the prospect of an Anglo-German war.

In Germany the like feeling prevails among the great part of the population.

It is only as regards the German Government and military party that a doubt persists in a certain type of English mind. They, it is said, harbour certain aggressive aims.

Let us, for the sake of argument, assume—though I do not admit it—that these doubts are justified, and that recent events in Germany indicate an active policy of offence.

There are two means by which England can foil such efforts.

First, the statesmanship of Government, whose expression lies in the maintenance of a sufficient defence and in skilful but frank diplomacy.

But the people have a statesmanship to exercise—if they will.

They can disown envious diatribes which appear in representative journals, and which, therefore, to an outsider, appear in the name of the people. They can preserve a calm judgment in international ferments which must arise—for scaremongery has become a fine art.

Above all, they can display towards other peoples a charity of judgment which is not quixotic, a certain willingness to believe the best, without which intercourse between nations, as between individuals, is strained and difficult. In other words, they may, by deed and word, draw the two nations together, until the thought of a war becomes more and more absurd and impossible.

And at the present time it seems that the peace of England is menaced, not so much by lack of statesmanship on the part of the Government as by the people.

This I write, insisting neither on facts nor details, in order to suggest a train of ideas and a line of thought, consideration of which seems indispensable to a sane and impartial judgment on a difficult question.—Yours, &c.,

H. S. TASKER.

Halle-a-Saale, September 21st, 1908.

BAD HARVESTS AND UNEMPLOYMENT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I am reluctant to enter into controversy with Mr. J. A. Hobson. He is a Socialist who believes that the world always has enough to go round amongst all its inhabitants, and that the distribution is in error. I am merely a business man, living away from mere theories, and faced by facts every day of my life. The points of view are irreconcilable. We shall never convince one another.

Take the champagne question. Mr. Hobson is satisfied to think that the "money" that would have been spent on champagne this year will be spent on something else, and the same total amount of employment will be found. But what is money but a means of exchange. The real wealth is the commodity, and, if the world is short of two millien pounds worth of grapes which could have been exchanged for other commodities, then the world is that much the poorer. To that extent there is less to go round, and the fact is that the champagne wine growers will have to make last year's boots last another season, and bootmakers will suffer; last year's frocks last another season, and cloth manufacturers will suffer, and so on ad infinitum. You can trace the loss through a hundred trades, but the ultimate loser is someone else who grows something else somewhere else.

I will not exhaust your space by trying to follow the chain of negotiations which attend any business transaction, involving the exchange of commodities, through all its ramifications. The famous instance given by Bastiat to support the argument of the tallow chandler who appealed for Protection against the competition of the Sun shows how wide those ramifications are. But I would remind Mr. Hobson of one fact which theoretical economists of his School invariably ignore, and that is, that the one person in the world who strives hardest to avoid unemployment is the employer. Closing down his works touches him in his most vital spot—his pocket. And it is only as a last resource that he takes so serious a step, and turns his men out. It is safe to say that as far as employers are concerned they are always striving with all their might to keep things moving and their men employed. Why do they fail? Because no one requires the commodities they offer, or are people surfeited with them already. Why? Because they cannot get commodities in exchange, and if you follow it through you will find that it is the agriculturist who has broken down at the other end.

It is impossible to do justice to such a subject in a letter, and no doubt there are intricate secondary results of a deficit in the natural increase of the soil or the sea which are special in their effect. For instance, at times, the whole foundation of credit tends to give way, and with it prices, and the fall of prices closes down a good many undertakings. But credit is based on the soil, and however badly it may be misused—as in the United States, for instance—it is the soil and the sea which invariably come to the rescue.

It is a singular thing that in these days, when so many men of the highest University qualifications are engaged in City business, that the late Walter Bagehot and the late Lord Goschen have found no successors, and that the discussion of political economy, the science of wealth, is left to the politicians and the professors. A new work on credit is urgently needed. Perhaps it will drop from the clouds some day.

I say that the cause of unemployment is beyond human control. Could it be controlled, the employer, who knows the whole difficulty, and has his sources of new information everywhere, would control it either singly, or, as in Lancashire, in co-operation with the employed.

What is necessary is to accept the situation as being cyclical in its incidence, and imitate the bees, who, knowing that there is no honey in winter, and that they will be unemployed, pile up the honey in the summer.

But the only place the unemployed honey can come from is the value hoarded out of the surplus increase of the earth in its periods of surpassing bounty—so provision should be made in the good times.—Yours, &c.,

J. P. Bisgood.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—It was well that the letter of Mr. Bisgood, attributing bad trade to bad harvests should not pass unchallenged. Ignorance and quackery have always attributed to nature the evil results of men's own folly and regarded misfortune as the act of God from which the human race was to be delivered by some artificial meddling, contrary to natural operation, instead of freeing and restoring the course of nature.

But Mr. Hobson does not elucidate the problem by his attempt at a mere negative. His conclusions do not follow, and, if they did, they would prove altogether too much. For instance, we assume a total failure of the champagne grape. But, says Mr. Hobson, the same money will certainly be spent either in other wines or other luxuries, or in making or working new instruments of production. "The money that would have been spent on champagne will be spent." "Though some trades may suffer, others will be benefited and the aggregate of employment will not be affected." In that case it is demonstrably true that there can be no such thing as falling off in employment, and it is a mathematical certainty that the police did not come into conflict with the unemployed in Manchester the other day.

Why is there ever bad trade and want of employment? Since the destruction of the spending power of a whole trade does not diminish spending, it is obvious that the destruction of the spending power of two trades could not do so, and by parity of reasoning the destruction of the spending power of all the trades would still not result in diminished employment.

The fact is, Mr. Hobson has not answered Mr. Bisgood at all. The two lines of argument attributed by Mr. Hobson to the supporters of the "harvest" theory of depressions are not as he states inconsistent with each other. They are simply complementary to each other as far as they go, though they still fail to go far enough to indicate the cause of trade depressions. A bad harvest means a lower income for agriculturalists, because of the smaller quantity to sell, and the higher price involves a smaller surplus for expenditure in other objects by those consumers who, despite the higher price, insist on having the same total of agricultural produce. Both these effects militate against employment, and they are both conducive to the same depression of trade. Where is the inconsistency of them?

Of course, if we calmly assume, after the manner adopted by Mr. Hobson, that the diminished yield will afford as much money as the full crop would, we get no such result. And if we go on to assert that the consumers paying for three-fourths all that they were going to pay for the whole will have just the same surplus for expenditure in other objects, we come back to the previous question, why is there any unemployment at all? But ought such reasoning and assumption to be tolerated.

To indicate only one trifling detail, the smaller crop will require less labor for its harvesting. That itself means less employment, and the immediate effect which follows is less demand for the productions of others by the people thus left unemployed. Moreover, consumers do not usually make up to the producer all the loss of his bad harvest by the higher prices they give for the smaller quantity produced. They suffer by enjoying less, but he also suffers enough diminution of cash result to make him prefer good harvests to bad. And both arguments of the "harvest" theorists are, therefore, correct.

But nature must not be blamed for the fact that human beings so often do not find the work by which commodities are produced. The evil arises from the hindrances by which natural tendencies are interfered with.

If, flying in the face of nature, Governments establish penalties on buying food from abroad which is easier to be procured from abroad, and thus, of necessity, hinder the selling abroad of the objects more readily producible here, employment must be diminished. The reduced profit affords less inducement to undertake the enterprise by which alone the larger results can be obtained.

If the land which nature offers as the source of production can be owned and held idle, free from all taxation, while the occupation and use of land involve the penalty of taxation on the annual value of land and improvements and on the effort put forth, a very little exercise of common sense should make it clear that this is a deterrent of employment.

If the person who, despite all this, undertakes the enterprise, must consult not only those whose assistance he requires, but also some extraneous authority who will interfere to say that the payment he gives is insufficient and insist on his giving more or stopping his work, he will be the less ready to offer the employment.

And if the powers that be persist in borrowing the purchasing power and paying interest to its owners out of taxes levied on productive enterprises, there will be another double hindrance in the less need of moneyed people to find outlets for their capital in actual production and the positive loss of taxes levied on those who produce, to pay to those who do not.

Underneath all these mischievous hindrances, however, is the fundamental doctrine that too much is produced. We call it in these days under-consumption, but that is only another name for overproduction. The evil is really underproduction, and it comes about from deliberate attempts to hinder production (often for the purpose of keeping prices up), and from artificial contrivances to increase consumption; instead of freeing production, relying on the plenty to induce its own consumption. Bumper harvests are overproduction, and they improve trade as well as consumption. We suffer from incessant clamour to consume more, including, as far as possible, the seed, corn, and implements. Poverty and unemployment will not be cured by efforts in that direction. That is the gospel of scarcity and snatch it, against the saner doctrine of plenty and freedom to produce more.—Yours, &c.,

F. U. Laycock.

Sheffield, September 28th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—In his interesting communication on this subject, after admitting "that bad harvests and other failures of natural resources must contribute something towards trade depressions and unemployment," Mr. Hobson argues that a failure in the champagne crop would not affect employment, because "the money that would have been spent upon champagne will be spent partly in increased demand for other wines, partly in other luxuries," and thereby, theoretically, will create as much employment as if it had been spent upon champagne.

But would this be so? Assuming that the champagne is exchanged for motor cars in years of plenty, then if, owing to a failure of the champagne crop, the motor manufacturers cannot exchange their cars for champagne, but offer their wares to growers of claret, who have only had a normal crop, and obtain orders from them, the men who had previously made motor cars for the claret growers will be thrown out of work.

Assuming the value of claret and champagne in normal years to be the same, the motor car manufacturers will not accept a smaller quantity of claret in exchange for the same number of motor cars in the year when the champagne crop fails. If only half the quantity of claret is offered, a smaller number of cars will be given in exchange.

In actual practice, the champagne growers, after a good crop, put into their cellars some, but not all, their surplus crop. With the balance they buy rather more motor cars, and the manufacturers consume rather more champagne. The fact that the growers, after a bad crop, are still able to buy some motor cars by reducing their stock, does not really affect the question that ultimately the motor manufacturers feel the effect of a good or bad champagne harvest.

The increase or reduction of stocks may, however, be one of the reasons why the employment figures do not appear to immediately respond to a good or bad harvest.—Yours, &c.,

J. B. M.

September 30th, 1908.

THE PRISON POPULATION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Will you allow me, as one who has had some experience of prisons, to make a few remarks with regard to the article headed "The Prison Population" in your last week's issue?

In the first place, I thoroughly agree with what you say in the opening paragraph of the article, concerning "the era of demoralisation produced by the South African War." The country has, undoubtedly, settled down considerably during the last few years, as is evidenced by the decrease in crime.

You then find fault with figures given by the Prison Commissioners concerning the professional or habitual criminals. You think that 500 rather than 5,000 is the probable number of professional criminals in our prisons, out of a total population of about 20,000.

In the first place it would be better to define what we mean by the professional criminals. I should say that a professional criminal is a person who, as your correspondent states, makes crime the profession or business of his life, or who breaks the law without any obvious reason, unless it be a physiological one, as is the case with the perpetual inebriate (i.e., inebriety may to a certain extent be looked upon as a disease).

Now, for several years past, first offenders have been put in a separate class called the Star Class, and if we take the case of Parkhurst Convict Prison, we see that its daily average population is nearly 800, and of these, at the most, 200 are "star men" or first offenders, that is to say, only one quarter; of the remaining 600, the great majority are habitual offenders. That is, they have been convicted more than three or four times. Surely, if this is the case, it is not too much to say that one-third of these 600 may be classified as professional criminals. Thus we have 200 out of 800, or one-quarter of the total prison population, belonging to this class.

I have only taken Parkhurst as an example, because I happen to have special knowledge of that prison; but it will be found that at Dartmoor and Wandsworth and Pentonville the population is even larger, and so I think the Prison Commissioners are giving only a very moderate estimate, when they say that 5,000 of the prisoners in our gaols are professionals criminals.—Yours, &c.,

Radix.

London, N.

September 27th, 1908.

THE NEWCASTLE ELECTION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—The result of the Newcastle election is regrettable because of the disastrous effect it may have on the passing of the Licensing Bill, and its encouragement to the Protectionists. Otherwise it is a well-deserved lesson to the Government. The first Session of the present Parliament, then fresh from the country, and with legislative power behind it, should have been devoted to a great measure of land reform, beginning with a Valuation Bill, and the unemployed question should also have been taken early. But a large section of the Government and the Liberal Party, animated by hatred of definite Churchmanship, were intent on forcing upon Churchmen an undenominational and sectarian solution of the education question. Dr. Clifford, Sir Robert Perks, and the influences behind them had to be satisfied, and valuable time was wasted on undenominational, and unjust legislation, which the House of Lords knew it was quite safe in throwing out. The subservience of the Government to intolerant Protestantism and illiberal Nonconformity has characterised its life more or less right up to the prohibition of the Eucharistic Procession.

Last year Newcastle itself had an example of this sectarian pre-occupation, for when the Bishopric of Newcastle became vacant, instead of appointing a progressive clergyman of social enthusiasm—and many such could be found—the Government, succumbing to the pressure of wealthy Protestants, searched the country for an ecclesiastical coercionist, and, in consequence, a Tory reactionary of the most narrow-minded Orange type was forced upon a great industrial community. The object was clearly to harry those Churchmen, many of whom are earnest social reformers, who have the misfortune to lie under the ban of Dr. Clifford, Sir Robert Perks, and the titled patrons of the Protestant Alliance.

It is very largely this illiberal spirit and policy which has rendered the Government ineffective in many of its undertakings. It cannot make itself the tool of those who are the enemies of Churchmen and Roman Catholics without neglecting the great social needs of the democracy. If the Licensing Bill is destroyed, land monopoly left untouched, and Protection let in, the sacrifice is due largely to the dominance of the Whig and Orange dictators of the Government.—Yours, &c.,

An Elector.

[Our correspondent overlooks the fact that if the Government had any clear mandate for constructive legislation from the electors it was to deal with the education question.—Ed., Nation.]

THE "WEST LONDON PARLIAMENT."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—On behalf of my fellow-members in the "West London Parliament," I am writing to you in the hope that you will be able to find space for a short appeal to the Liberals of West London. This debating society, which was formed by the amalgamation of the old Marylebone and Paddington "Parliaments," offers an exceptional opportunity for the discussion of the important political movements of the day, in that there are in this Parliament three parties strongly represented, viz., Liberals, Conservatives, and Socialists, which naturally tends to a greater diversity of opinion than is usual in a society where only two parties are represented.

On the 9th of March last, the Socialists, who were in office for the first time, were defeated, and accordingly retired, the Liberal Party taking office in their stead. Since that date we have remained in power, and during the coming session we hope to pass several measures dealing with matters of great public interest, such as unemployment, licensing, the control of mechanically-propelled vehicles, &c. The occasion is, therefore, peculiarly favorable for young Liberals, who wish to accustom themselves to speaking in public on a variety of subjects, to join this Parliament and give us the benefit of their opinions.

The Clerk of the House, Mr. Bayley (The Town Hall, St. Marylebone), to whom all communications should be addressed, will be only too pleased to give any information in his power, and we shall all be glad to welcome any new members.—Yours, &c.,

Oswald Lewis,
Prime Minister and First Lord of the Treasury
West London Parliament.

September 30th, 1908.

PRESIDENT DIAZ.

SIR,—The article published in your issue of the 19th instant under the above heading does such great injustice to the President of Mexico in some of its statements that a reply becomes necessary. It is far from true that in order to "boom" or advertise his country he indiscriminately condescends to furnish materials for their writings to the globe-trotter, the special correspondent, or the adventurous tourist. He has no department for that purpose. Of late years he has twice consented to receive writers, one English and one American. The former, well known in the social world of London and as a writer of note, Mrs. Alec Tweedie, had written previously a book on Mexico in which she had shown not only her fairness, independence of character, intelligence and desire to do justice to the country, but also her power of observation. It was not strange, therefore, that General Diaz showed a chivalrous disposition to help her when she begged leave to write his life, by furnishing her with historical, accurate data, mostly taken from his own diaries or from official documents. This courageous woman, who travelled throughout the territory of the Republic, has given to the world a picture of the man and an account of his deeds. The other writer, Mr. James Creelman, a journalist of the highest type, whose career appears in the English publication, "Who's Who," was received by General Diaz because he was provided with a letter of introduction from the President of the United States. Mr. Creelman published in "Pearson's Magazine" for March of this year, a report of his interview with General Diaz. On the 7th of that month President Roosevelt wrote Mr. Creelman a letter, lately published, thanking him for his admirable article, and, after agreeing with him in the opinion that among the statesmen of the present age there is not one greater than General Diaz, he thanked him again for "having given the American people the best and most vivid picture of the great President of the sister Republic."

It is a pity that the author of the article I refer to, has not taken the trouble to read carefully Mr. Creelman's article before writing his. He would then have acquainted himself with the reasons General Diaz had for continuing in office so long against his will, and with the desire the President then expressed to retire in private life at the end of his present term of office. He would have seen that, as he himself bears testimony to, life and property are as safe for the well-behaved in Mexico as they are in England, and that every Mexican has as full a measure of political and religious liberty as the people of this country.

As to the statement that Mexico having borrowed her constitution from the United States, is also getting her ideals of progress from the same source, or that she takes those she can assimilate, chiefly such as can be expressed in dollars and cents, it may be interesting to quote an American on the moral standard of Mexico. The builder of a railway from his native town to the Pacific passing through Mexico, Mr. Arthur E. Stillwell, of Kansas City, controls enormous real estate enterprises in the Republic amounting to some seven million dollars. He expressed himself to Mr. Crelman in the following terms: "In all my dealings with Mexican officials I have never been asked to pay one dollar in bribery, direct or indirect. In establishing the American end of my railway I have had to fight politics and graft constantly. Here, in Mexico, I have been treated not only justly, but with great generosity. President Diaz told me once that if I were ever approached for a dollar of tribute by any Mexican official, I had but to disclose the fact and, no matter how high up the official stood, he would lose his post at once."

If this is the kind of barbarism General Diaz has introduced into Mexico let such barbarism be welcome.

Not being able to deny the standing Mexico has taken among the civilised nations of the world, the author of the article published in your periodical has been pleased to minimise it by stating that General Diaz has brought his administration within the comity of nations, but not his people, nine-tenths of whom, he pretends, are still submerged below the level. Fortunately for civilisation this statement is contradicted by facts. The progress of Mexico is deep-rooted in her people who have enjoyed the blessings of peace and civilisation so long under General Diaz that they are slow to let him relinquish the reins of government, notwithstanding the fact that the nation has reached a robust manhood precluding every fear in the future. Labor now is better remunerated, new markets have been opened, new industries have developed and the people have been raised to a higher standard of life. Thirty-two years ago Mexico's foreign trade only amounted to a total of 36,111,600 dollars. To-day her commerce with foreign nations is 481,363,388 dollars, that is to say, over thirteen times as much. Remarkable as has been also the increase in population, it has only doubled in that time, a rate of increase only seen before in the United States with an extensive immigration. Considering that there are only 75,000 foreigners in Mexico, it is unquestionable that the enormous increase in foreign trade has come through education, higher civilisation, and the general progress of her people in every line.

The railway policy of Mexico has not been dictated by any absurd fear of an undue preponderance of the uitlander element as the author seems to believe. The recent railway legislation of Mexico is an attempt to solve a problem which confronts all the civilised nations of the world, and it has had the endorsement of the British Association during its meeting of the 3rd instant in Dublin. On that occasion Mr. W. M. Acworth, speaking of the relation of railways to the State, referred to that legislation as "the one valuable and original contribution to the solution of one of the most difficult and important questions of modern politics, which has been made in the present generation."

General Diaz fully realises the dignity of office, and does not depend for justice to his work, upon the methods described by the author of the article in question, nor upon kodak-carrying scribblers, unless he places in this category the eminent writers above mentioned. If he craved for advertisement, either for himself or for his country, it would be folly to have recourse to such methods among the unsolicited applause of the world and the unanimous verdict of the greatest men of the age. His renown as a statesman has been made by statesmen themselves.

Not long ago Mr. Elihu Root, Secretary of State of the United States, who went to pay a visit to Mexico, said on his return home: "It has seemed to me that of all the men now living, General Porfirio Diaz, of Mexico, was best worth seeing. . . . If I were a poet I would write poetic eulogies. If I were a musician I would compose triumphal marches. If I were a Mexican I should feel that the steadfast loyalty of a lifetime could not be too much in return for the blessings that he had brought to my country. As I am neither poet, musician, nor Mexican, but only an American who loves justice and liberty, and hopes to see their reign among mankind progress and strengthen and become perpetual, I look to Porfirio Diaz, the President of Mexico, as one of the great men to be held up for hero-worship of mankind."

So far from courting advertisement in foreign lands, General Diaz, although proud of the approval of his work by the world at large, is perfectly content with the unmistakable proofs of devotion and gratitude he daily receives from his own countrymen, and, perhaps, that accounts for the fact that he has constantly refused to make a trip to Europe, notwithstanding the pressure that has been brought to bear upon him and the perspective of the advertisement that such a trip would mean for Mexico.—Yours, &c.,

M. COVARRUBIAS,
Mexican Minister.

September 29th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I always read Mr. Cunninghame Graham with an enjoyment which, fortunately, I derive from other qualities of his, than that of strict accuracy. He writes you that he is "amazed" at the feat of memory which I said was attributed to Diaz. He immediately adds that he thinks he could perform it himself, and explains that it is easy to remember a Mexican Indian's Christian name, as they are nearly all called José, and their wives Maria.

The Mexican Indian, like other "Christians," receives his name at baptism, and the rule is to consult the calendar and give the child the name of the saint on whose day he may happen to have been born. Persons of a few hundred other names besides Joseph have been canonised. Was there not a Chinaman who thought every Englishman was called John?—Yours, &c.,

THE WRITER OF THE ARTICLE.

September 29th, 1908.

THE SMALL HOLDINGS ACT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I have been somewhat sharply criticised in THE NATION on previous occasions for emphasising the difficulties of working the Small Holdings Act. I now ask permission to give in your columns an illustration of these difficulties as they affect one group of applicants.

In this case, as I pointed out to the County Council Committee some six months ago, one and one farm only seems really suitable; it could be obtained under the Act without great difficulty.

It is a farm of over 100 acres of arable pasture and woodland, and it suits the requirements of the six applicants, who are trustworthy and capable men, approved by the County Council, and, therefore, without doubt, provided with sufficient capital. So far as can be ascertained, the present tenant, who does not reside on the property, and employs but one man upon it, pays rent, rates and taxes, which, after making allowance for farmhouse, cottages, and shooting let off, works out at about 10s. an acre for the cultivated land. He holds, it appears, subject to a short notice. The County Council and their representative, finding no other suitable land, took the matter of this farm up, and finally, in August, their representative suggested a rent of about £2 5s. to £2 7s. 6d. an acre. "I hardly see," he writes, "how the land could be obtained at a less rent," and he asks the applicants if they would be willing to pay this. After making allowances for rates this means that the small holders would pay about six times the amount paid by the farmer. Naturally, the men were both astonished and annoyed at this proposal; for they have studied the Act and the explanations issued through the Liberal organisations, and they imagined that they were to have land at but little more than the farmer's rent. They refused the offer. Subsequently there has been, I understand, reference to the Small Holdings Committee of the Council, and now comes an alternative offer of unsuitable land on a hillside five miles off. No cottages are available or offered.

Meanwhile, what is the men's position; three men live in cottages on weekly tenancies controlled by the farmer, whose son holds the land. They might be ejected at any time, and in any case feel fairly certain they would be turned out if they got the land. The fourth man is under shadow of ejectment warrant, obtained against him by a farmer, part of whose land was at one time under consideration. He lives in constant anxiety, is a marked man, and is only kept in his cottage by an expensive appeal against the procedure under which the ejectment order was made. Eviction for all these men means they would have to leave the neighbourhood and lose homes and employment, for there are no other cottages. The fifth man having, in view of his small holding, got together more stock that he can carry on the small plot of land he now holds, may have to leave the neighbourhood or sell at a loss if he does not get land very soon. The sixth man is, fortunately, in an independent position. It may be noted that these men are country people, and are not particularly capable of putting their case into writing and carrying on prolonged negotiations.

Now in this special case, after a careful and comparatively costly investigation and action by sympathetic outsiders, something will be done; but even if action be taken and the men ultimately get the land, it can hardly be by putting the Act into force. Such a course would mean endless delays, protracted over a year or two. What will probably happen is this: pressure will be put on the authorities through the Board of Agriculture and possibly by action in Parliament, and some compromise will finally be arrived at. The landlord will be conciliated by an enhanced rent, and the men will find themselves at some future time installed on the land, paying two or three times what the present occupant pays. Such a compromise, which does not seem exactly what the Act means, will be doubtless considered by the authorities satisfactory to all parties.

But—what about the hundreds of other cases in which the men are not supported and have no influence. The Board of Agriculture can hardly make a complete and detailed investigation into every case. County Councils will do so only in those counties where they are enthusiastic supporters of the Act. Voluntary organisation and investigation, as we know to our cost, is most expensive in both time, energy and money, and the Board have refused to subsidise such organisations, as the Act permits, even when prepared to undertake this important work.

I do not write, Sir, to make querulous complaint; I wish to put the case as it affects the men, who, themselves, have neither the time nor the capacity to deal with these complicated negotiations. They are paralysed and silent, but seriously and, indeed, bitterly disappointed. The remedy is not easy. For my own part, I believe in voluntary associations to organise and investigate; but effective work of this character needs men and money.—Yours, &c.,

MONTAGUE FORDHAM, Hon. Sec.
Land Club Union.

September 25th, 1908.

THE DOCTRINE OF TOLERATION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—As a Nonconformist reader, I thank you for your article on "The Doctrine of Toleration" in your issue of 19th.

It is somewhat disappointing that more than fifty years after the frenzy and useless legislation of 1852 it should still be necessary to prohibit the carrying of the Host on the ground of public order.

If our Roman Catholic friends had no objection to parading their sacred symbol before a partially cynical crowd, that is no affair of those outside their communion, and it is no tribute to the hold of either intelligence or democracy on the minds of the people to suggest that the mere carrying of a symbol would aid a reversion to a faith that at present can lay no claim to democratic sympathy.

The intolerant section of our Protestant brethren will have to find another name if they give cause for complaint that the shoe is now on the other foot.—Yours, &c.,

J. S. KING.

3, Harcourt Road, Brockley, S.E.
September 29th, 1908.

Poetry.

WISDOM FROM THE EAST.

I.

WHEN Mr. Elephant goes out to walk
He never heeds how much the dogs may talk.

II.

When lion and striped tiger fight a bout
It's best to leave these two to fight it out.

III.

Who lends a silken robe to man unfit
Must run and spread a mat for him to sit.

IV.

The five great evils, never beneficials,
Are famine, plague and war, thieves and—officials.

V.

The flea can jump, when jump it must,
But never yet has raised a dust.

VI.

A mangy camel, but we'll let it pass—
It still can bear the load of many an ass.

VII.

By flattery you conquer him;
His excellence allow;
He'll teach the crocodile to swim,
And fiddle to a cow.

VIII.

To kings and all their servants,
And women, too, as well,
Have one foot in the stirrup
Before the truth you tell.

DAVID WILSON.

The World of Books.

THURSDAY NIGHT.

WE deal elsewhere with the settlement of the quarrel between the publishers and the "Times." It is also announced that the "Letters of Queen Victoria" will, by command of the King, be issued in a new and popular edition. The book will appear in three volumes, containing the complete text of the larger work, together with sixteen illustrations. It will be published by Mr. Murray, in conjunction with the "Times," and the price is to be 6s. net.

* * *

THERE is a growing feeling that biography has been rather done to death by book makers and publishers during the last few years. So many books have been issued containing nothing of value that had not been known before, and unable to plead any freshness of treatment as justification for their existence, that readers are beginning to hesitate about taking up a new biography. But when the subject is interesting, and the author is able to throw fresh light upon it, the case is different. Miss Alice C. C. Gaussen's "Percy: Prelate and Poet," which Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co. have in the press, promises to fulfil both of these conditions. Bishop Percy occupies a peculiar place in the development of English poetry. The publication of his "Reliques" marks the beginning of the revolt against classicism and the dawn of the English Romantic movement. He was, too, one of the earliest members of Johnson's Club. It was he who introduced Goldsmith to Johnson, and he was intimate with Burke, Reynolds, Garrick, and most of the other members of the famous coterie. In the preparation of her work Miss Gaussen has been able to make use of a mass of unpublished papers in possession of Bishop Percy's descendants. She has also consulted the Duke of Northumberland's Percy MSS. at Alnwick, while Lord Colchester has given her permission to use the correspondence of Mr. Abbott, who was Chief Secretary for Ireland at the time of the Union. This latter collection includes letters from Johnson and Goldsmith and a document in Percy's own handwriting, which, we are told, determines some disputed points in connection with the formation of the Club.

* * *

ANOTHER book dealing with the same period is announced by Messrs. Sidgwick & Jackson, the latest recruit to the ranks of London publishing firms. This is a reprint of Boswell's letters to W. J. Temple, the grandfather of the late Archbishop. First issued in 1857 by Bentley, these letters which, with connections, form a consistent life of Boswell, are now hard to procure. They were originally discovered by a Major Stone in a shop at Boulogne. He was given a parcel wrapped up in papers bearing Boswell's signature, which he identified, and after some trouble he succeeded in recovering the greater part of the correspondence from an itinerant paper-vendor. The reprint will be edited by Mr. Thomas Seccombe, who has brought to light some fresh facts concerning the letters and will contribute a brief sketch of Boswell and his correspondent. The self-revelation of Boswell in the letters is one of the most naïve that literature affords. He calls himself "the proud Boswell," and talks of his "Spanish stateliness of manner." The latter, at any rate, is a quality with which he is not usually credited.

* * *

THE puzzling problem of Shakespeare's sonnets is dealt with in a book called "Shakespeare's Complete Sonnets," which Mr. Fisher Unwin announces. The work claims to be "the first edition which in a single compilation includes all the sonnets of Shakespeare that have come down to us." Its editor, Mr. C. M. Walsh, holds that it is a mistake to regard the sonnets in a single body as presenting one mystery and setting one problem. They should, he thinks, "be grouped together in clusters of two, of three, in one case of sixteen. Such clusters, and all isolated sonnets, are mysteries in themselves." Acting on this theory, he has made a fresh arrangement, which is based on internal evidence alone. Mr. Walsh's view of the problem, if not entirely new, is certainly interesting. It remains to be seen whether he can support it by any weight of argument.

NEXT month Messrs. Longmans will publish "A History of English Journalism to the Foundation of the 'Gazette,'" by Mr. J. B. Williams. The early history of the Press in this country is a promising field of research, and should furnish Mr. Williams with excellent material. His book gives an account, on a scale never before attempted, of the origin and early history of English newspapers with particulars of all the principal writers. It ends with a catalogue of all periodicals published before the year 1667. As this covers the time of the Civil Wars, when more than three hundred different newspapers appeared, the catalogue should be of great value for reference. The absence of a full, trustworthy history of English newspapers has often been commented on, but possibly Mr. Williams' work will fill this gap, at least for the period with which it deals.

* * *

THE publication of Mr. Bernard Shaw's "Getting Married, and Other Plays," is announced for the present season. It will presumably contain "The Doctor's Dilemma" as well as "Getting Married," and we may be sure that Mr. Shaw will not miss the opportunity of contributing a characteristic preface.

* * *

AMONG the memoirs to be published during the autumn, Lady Priestley's "The Story of a Life-Time" promises to contain many interesting recollections. Lady Priestley's father was Robert Chambers, the author and publisher, and she is the niece of Henry Wills, Dickens's partner. Through her father and her husband she came into touch with many of those eminent in the literary and scientific world of the last generation. Her book will contain reminiscences of, among others, Sir Walter Scott, Dickens, Thackeray, Wilkie Collins, Oliver Wendell Holmes, Sir John Millais, and the Duc d'Orleans. Messrs Kegan, Paul & Co. are to be the publishers.

* * *

MR. BIRRELL, in one of those delightful essays which make some of his readers regret that he gives to politics what was meant for letters, remarks that "Borrow is one of those kings of literature who never need to number their tribe." The tribe appears to be increasing in numbers, for not only is Mr. Murray issuing his definitive edition of Borrow's works at the low price of a shilling a volume, but we are also promised a new biography, embodying a considerable amount of fresh matter. The latter book, which is the work of Mr. R. A. J. Walling, is to be published by Messrs. Cassell under the title "George Borrow, the Gipsy Scholar." Professor Knapp's "Life of Borrow" is not entirely satisfactory, as, although it gives most of the facts, it falls short in arrangement. We believe that Mr. Clement Shorter is also engaged upon a "Life" of Borrow, though it probably will not make its appearance for some time.

* * *

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

"Lollardy and the Reformation in England: An Historical Survey." By James Gairdner, C.B., LL.D. (Macmillan. 2 vols. 21s. net.)

"The Brontës: Life and Letters." By Clement Shorter. (Hodder & Stoughton. 2 vols. 24s. net.)

"Herculaneum: Past, Present, and Future." By C. Waldstein. Litt.D., Ph.D., and L. Shoobridge, M.A. (Macmillan. 21s. net.)

"The New Spirit in India." By H. W. Nevinson. (Harpers. 10s. 6d. net.)

"Roman Life and Manners under the Early Empire." By Ludwig Friedländer. Translated by L. A. Magnus. (Routledge. 6s.)

"Queen Anne and Her Court." By P. F. W. Ryan. (Hutchinson. 2 vols. 24s. net.)

"Trade and Tariffs." By J. M. Robertson, M.P. (Black. 3s. 6d. net.)

"At Large." By A. C. Benson. (Smith, Elder. 7s. 6d. net.)

"Corot and His Friends." By Everard Meynell. (Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.)

"National Idealism and the Book of Common Prayer." By Stanton Coit. (Williams & Norgate. 10s. 6d. net.)

"A History of English Prosody." By George Saintsbury. Vol. II. From Shakespeare to Crabbe. (Macmillan. 15s. net.)

"Life and Letters of Lord Macaulay." By Sir George Otto Trevelyan. Enlarged and Complete Edition. (Longmans. 3s. 6d.)

"The Crime of Sylvestre Bonnard." By Anatole France. A Translation by Lafcadio Hearn. (Lane. 6s.)

"Over Bemerton's." By E. V. Lucas. (Methuen. 6s.)

"Katharine's Child." By Mrs. Henry De La Pasture. (Smith, Elder. 6s.)

"La Morale Naturelle." Par J. L. de Lanessan. (Paris: Alcan. 7 fr. 50.)

Reviews.

THE WHIG SALON.*

The remarkable society that frequented Holland House has often been described in the studies that have appeared of its several members. Mr. Lloyd Sanders has conceived the happy idea of making the society itself the subject of a book, and he has collected, so to speak, under one roof stories and impressions that are to be found scattered about in various records. He gives us sketches of the different celebrities who braved Lady Holland's caustic hospitality, and he fills his pages with the good stories and smart sayings of a circle that might almost be said to have incurred the reproach which Rogers brought against Mackintosh, that of sacrificing itself to conversation. Such a book could not be dull, and Mr. Lloyd Sanders certainly provides his readers with a set of piquant pictures. His own criticisms are slight and not always particularly happy. Thus, quoting Rogers' remark that painting gave Lord Holland no pleasure and music absolute pain, he says that Lord Holland's limitations corresponded to the gaps in the mental equipment of Fox. We could understand him if he had said that it was difficult for modern taste to appreciate some of Fox's enthusiasms (he shared Sir Joshua's taste for the Bologna school), but to say that he took little interest in a subject to which he devotes almost as many of his letters as he devotes to Virgil and Homer is to give a strangely wrong impression of the atmosphere in which Lord Holland was brought up. Lord Holland himself was an admirer of Goya. Something might be said again of Mr. Sanders's political judgments which are not altogether undisturbed by prejudice. But the volume is not so much an analysis of a society as a collection of anecdotes and impressions, and, judged as such, it is certainly full and entertaining.

Holland House, more than any other institution, carried on the tradition of the world that combined scholarship and politics. The story of Campbell's first introduction to Holland House which is quoted in this volume is characteristic of that society. "The poet arrived to dinner in the spring of 1806, arrayed in a yellow waistcoat which he had stolen from his friend Richardson. He was introduced to Fox, walked arm-in-arm with him round the room, and discussed Virgil with him. Campbell hardly knew, if his correspondent would excuse the phrase, whether he was standing on his head or his feet. Fox invited the poet to St. Anne's Hill and told Lord Holland that he liked Campbell; he was so right about Virgil—their point of agreement being that the charge of monotony was unjustly brought against the characters in the Æneid." We are reminded of Fox's fury against Godwin for disparaging Racine. In such a society Lord Holland though, as he said in his Memoirs, he passed through Oxford "without disgrace and without distinction," was well qualified to play his part. Moore, who was a frequent visitor, thought him equal to any talker of his time, and the talkers at his own table included Sydney and Bobus Smith, Byron, Macaulay, Rogers, Talleyrand, and Scott, besides some of the most famous of the wits of the Rolliad and of the Anti-Jacobin. Bobus Smith, indeed, rarely went into any other society. Many thought him a better talker than his brother, though he is now chiefly remembered not for what he said about others, but for what others said about him. Lord Dudley, when asked his opinion of certain Roman poets, strung together the names of Lucretius, Catullus, and Bobus, in graceful allusion to his accomplished verse. The other remark which has helped Bobus Smith to be remembered was less complimentary, for it was he who was the victim of Talleyrand's reply, after he had been dwelling on the beauty of his mother, "C'était donc votre père, monsieur, qui n'était pas si bien."

There was a long breach in the friendship of Scott and Holland, which arose out of the latter's protest against the pension bestowed on Scott's brother. The pension was what is vulgarly known as a job, and Lord Melville was reduced to defending it as a recognition of Scott's genius. Lord Holland, after taunting Lord Melville with his neglect of Burns, acquiesced in the propriety of rewarding Scott, but deprecated this vicarious acknowledgment. Scott was bitterly wounded, and cut Holland dead when next they met in Edinburgh. But eighteen years later Scott is found again at Holland House, and there is certainly no trace of resentment in the way he spoke of his host to a friend in Rome. He told his friend "that Lord Holland was the most agreeable man he had ever met, remarkable for his critical faculties, his knowledge of English authors, and his power of language which adorned his thoughts as light streaming through colored glass heightens the brilliancy of the objects it falls upon." Byron's connection with Holland House was more intimate, for it was Lord Holland who brought about the private arrangement for a separation between him and his wife. The Hollands tried to make peace between Byron and Lord Carlisle, his guardian, but without success. Lady Holland did Byron a good turn of another kind, for the snuff-box which Napoleon left to her inspired Carlisle to a protest in verse which lent itself readily to Byron's mocking parody:—

> "Lady, accept the box the hero wore,
> In spite of all this elegiac stuff;
> Let not seven stanzas written by a bore
> Prevent your ladyship from taking snuff."

It has often been observed that Holland House was the closest approach we have had in England to the French salon. Its triumphs were perhaps all the more remarkable because its ruler was under a cloud which English society took a great deal more seriously than French. Lady Holland's past cut her off from much of the feminine society of her day, and many a good Whig held aloof. Even Norfolk Tom, dearly as he loved Fox, would not acknowledge Lady Holland. Creevey tells us of his conversation with Coke on the subject: "I remarked that I had never heard of Lord Holland being at Holkham, and yet that, of course, he must have been. 'No,' said he, 'his uncle Charles used to live here, and I have often asked Lord Holland, but, of course, he would not come without Lady Holland, and it was quite out of the question my asking her. I dine at Lord Holland's now and then. When I do so I am as attentive as I ought to be to Lady Holland, and there is no kind of flattery, she does not apply to me; but it won't do! She is not a woman I approve of at all. I am only surprised that so many people have been bullied by her to letting her into their houses. For myself, I have always made up my mind that she should never enter mine.'" "Bravo King Tom," is Creevey's comment, and he goes on, "What a charming subject to plague her with the first time she gives me any offence." There were a good many like Creevey, who would have been glad of any stick with which to retort on Lady Holland's peremptory manners. No woman ever ruled her company with quite so absolute a sway. When her table was crowded, a guest was liable to receive a summons to give up his chair to a more favored guest. Macaulay would be interrupted by a tap of her fan on the table, and the warning, "Now, Macaulay, we have had enough of this; give us something else." Her gout-ridden husband was the most defenceless of all her victims, for if the worst came to the worst, she could order the servants to wheel him out of the room. Mr. Sanders, whose description of Lady Holland is perhaps the most interesting part of his volume, remarks that the success of a salon which was governed with such a ruthless hand, is a great testimony to the charm of Lord Holland. Yet Lady Holland, as Mr. Sanders points out, had a warm heart, and her grief over the death of Horner was passionate and sincere.

It is natural that Mr. Sanders's description of this rich and various life should not leave very much room for politics. Yet if Lord Holland could have got rid of his two hereditary infirmities, his peerage and his gout, he might have had not merely a very honorable but a very important political career. After Grey's departure to the House of Lords on his father's death in 1807, the Whig Party lacked all effectual leadership in the Commons, and it was Macaulay's opinion that if Lord Holland had been in the Commons instead of in the Lords, he might have become a great debater. He possessed many of the best qualities of a leader, for he was conspicuous alike for his sound Liberalism and his sure judgment. He escaped some of the most embarrassing of the mistakes of his friends, and dismissed with a just severity the infatuation that plunged a whole people, when threatened with something like universal pauperism, in the disreputable controversies of the Court. "Strange, indeed, that neither war nor peace, laws nor liberties, could excite so much anxiety in a free and civilised nation as the personal character and comfort of two individuals who had nothing about them but their rank to raise interest or even curiosity." It is more important that Lord Holland, like Horner and Lord John Russell, seized the significance of the Peninsula War, and realised that the same spirit which made Fox oppose the war of 1793 ought to make all Fox's disciples throw themselves into the cause of the Spanish rising. The bearing of these principles was clear enough to Windham, who was not a little uneasy about resisting even Napoleon himself by the power of democratic sympathies. If the leadership of the party had been in Lord Holland's hands the Whigs would have played a wiser and more vigorous part. We know from his Memoirs that he tried to impress on Grenville the necessity of prosecuting the Spanish war and of resisting the attacks on the freedom of the Press. The Whigs, distracted by their own differences in those trying times, had acquired more of the habits than of the virtues of opposition. Mr. Sanders, indeed, uses the word factious more than once to describe some of the members of that party. Yet it would be difficult to name anything done by a Whig more deserving of that adjective than the conduct of one of the most generous opponents of that party, an old friend of Lord Holland's, in the crisis which put an end to Lord Holland's first taste of office. The Whig Government which was tripped up by the King's treachery in 1807, went out of office rather than promise never to propose again during his lifetime to grant any instalment of Catholic relief. Canning was himself strongly in favor not only of the particular minor concession that had been proposed, but of Catholic emancipation. But Protestant prejudice blew up into a hurricane; Canning came into office on the storm, and he was not ashamed to write the epitaph of a measure of which he approved in the following stanza:—

* "The Holland House Circle." By Lloyd Sanders. Methuen. 12s. 6d. net.

"Then huzza for the party that here is at rest,
By fools of a faction regretted and blest;
Though they sleep with the devil, yet theirs is the hope,
On the downfall of Britain to rise with the Pope."

Lord Holland's judgment as to tactics did not often stray. He had misgivings in 1806 about the wisdom of taking office without an understanding on the Catholic question, and he was one of a minority of three (the others were Grey and Windham) who opposed the Cabinet resolution to give up the Bill of 1807 to the King's wishes. In the difficult crises of 1832 he was one of the stalwarts. If his judgment was generally right his Liberalism never faltered, and even Cobbett in the midst of the abuse with which he splashed the Whigs on the subject of Parliamentary Reform was in the habit of excepting Holland and Grey. He worked hard with Romilly to humanise the criminal laws, and his protests in the House of Lords, which were collected in a volume by Mr. Doylan, are a fine record of resistance throughout thirty sombre years to violence, cruelty, and doubtful justice. He was a Liberal who could always put his principles before the interests of his class and the prejudices of his times, and it is remembered of him that Brougham called him "the refuge of the persecuted," and that Macaulay described him as the noble who in every great crisis cast in his lot with the Commons, the planter who made manful war on the slave trade, the landowner whose whole heart was in the struggle against the corn laws.

ELLEN TERRY.*

Let us at once declare that we have found Miss Ellen Terry's story of her life a most delightful piece of writing. As we read it we seemed continually to hear two or three lines of Ben Jonson's comedy, "The Silent Woman":—

"Give me a look, give me a face,
That makes simplicity a grace;
Robes loosely flowing, hair as free——"

This is one of the impressions we derived from the book, and it remains. Often, too, in reading, we were reminded of Miss Terry herself in the character of Beatrice. In sum, it is a tale of much delight—and not so gilded as to give us the suspicion that we are being tricked with make-believe.

The theatre fills the greater part of it; the theatre, first, of Charles Kean, and afterwards, in turn, of the Bancrofts, John Hare, and the great Irving. Incidentally Miss Terry tells us a good deal about her life off the stage; about her family, her children, her friendships, her cottages, her pets, and her tastes; but the player's life is her text, and to it she sticks loyally. The book contains just the amount of self-revelation that readers may properly ask for, preserves a just proportion everywhere, expresses itself with unwonted niceness, and includes a small gallery of portraits equal, if not superior, to the best in Colley Cibber's "Apology." The touches of genius in it are unmistakeable. Those of us who, in pit or stalls of the old Lyceum, while Irving reigned, "paid scot and lot there any time" for twenty years and more, will find Miss Terry's pages good to dwell on and none too easy to forsake.

The story itself, no longer unfamiliar to play-goers of Miss Terry's generation, we may pass over—or, rather, may leave to be re-read. Let us, in the first place, seek to know a little of the woman herself as her pen betrays her. More than once, in discussing the strenuous career of Irving—who, in all his life, was never really at rest—she tells us that for her own part she has been a stranger to ambition. She says farther, that not until she had been many years on the stage was she conscious of any keen desire to use her talents to the utmost. But we can see that, when once she had resolved to try her strength, she had no choice but to succeed. To an hereditary gift (for both her parents were players, and the father was a finished elocutionist) was added a genuine power of work, and a technical equipment at the age of twenty, such as Irving had not wholly at the age of forty. Several times in his histrionic course Irving must have experienced moments of extraordinary exaltation. Miss Terry gives us her one great moment, which, she adds, never repeated itself. It was when she played Portia at the Prince of Wales's. Her fires were but just beginning to burn. She was popular, and had more than once tasted of success.

"But never until I appeared as Portia at the Prince of Wales's had I experienced that awe-struck feeling which comes, I suppose, to no actress more than once in a lifetime—the feeling of the conqueror.

"'What can this be?' I thought. 'Quite this thing has never come to me before! This is different. It has never been quite the same before.'

"It was never to be quite the same again.

"Elation, triumph, being lifted on high by a single stroke of the mighty wing of glory—call it by any name, think of it as you like—it was as Portia that I had my first and last sense of it."

This is well told; it is but one of many passages in the book that are fine by their perfect naturalness.

Did we not always talk of the naturalness of her acting? The self-same quality shines through her writing. She analyses her manner of playing with a candour that will, perhaps, be best liked by those who, remembering what effect her playing had on them, will not hesitate to reject a full half of her criticisms. She is, in a measure, right in insisting that she often lacked "pace" and the power of sustaining at its height a long and trying scene; but wherever she suggests that she failed to give us a vivid notion of her part, Miss Terry is—with our cordial apologies—completely in the wrong.

Speaking of herself as Juliet, she says that it is "only in high comedy that people seem to know what I am driving at." Did none of us know what she was "driving at" in the part of Lady Macbeth? Have we forgotten her last scene with Lear? We can recall the four words, "No cause, no cause!" as we can recall Irving's, "I'll not believe 't!" in "Othello." But in high comedy we may admit that Irving denied her certain chances at the Lyceum, as he denied the same chances to himself. What we have missed in not seeing Ellen Terry as Rosalind and Irving as Touchstone! The self-depreciatory note is excessive in Miss Terry's criticisms of her acting, and we decline point-blank to take her at her own estimate as something just better than a "useful" actress. There have been many "useful" actresses among Miss Terry's contemporaries; there has been but one Ellen Terry.

It is in sketching for us some of the many players she has known that Miss Terry reaches her highest excellence. How many playgoers of this day remember old John Ryder?

* "The Story of My Life." By Ellen Terry. With Illustrations. Hutchinson. 6s. net.

"Ryder was a very pugnacious man—an admirable actor, and in appearance like an old tree that has been struck by lightning, or a greenless, barren rock; he was very strong in his likes and dislikes, and in his manner of expressing them.

"'D'ye suppose he engaged me for my powers as an actor?' he used to say of Mr. Kean. 'Not a bit of it! He engaged me for my d——d archæological figure!"

Howe ("a walking history of the stage") was one of the old-fashioned "safe" comedians whom Irving always liked to have with him.

"The dear old man was much liked by everyone. He had a tremendous pair of legs, was bluff and bustling in manner, though courtly, too, and cared more about gardening than acting. He had a little farm at Isleworth, and was one of those actors who do not allow the longest theatrical season to interfere with domesticity and horticulture. Because of his stout, gaitered legs and his Isleworth estate, Henry called him 'the agricultural actor.' He was a good old port and whisky drinker, but could carry his liquor like a Regency man."

Here is a glimpse of Edwin Booth, dejected by failure at the Princess's, and broken by domestic bereavement:—

"'Here's Miss Terry,' said Henry, as I came round the door. Booth looked up at me swiftly. I have never in any face, in any country, seen such wonderful eyes. There was a mystery about his appearance and his manner—a sort of pride which seemed to say: 'Don't try to know me, for I am not what I have been.' He seemed broken, and devoid of ambition."

Mrs. Stirling:—

"swept on to the stage, and, in that magical way never, never to be learned, filled it. She had much breadth of style, such a lovely voice, such a beautiful, expressive eye. When she played the Nurse at the Lyceum her voice had become a little jangled and harsh, but her eye was still bright, and her art had not abated—not one little bit. Nor had her charm. Her smile was the most fascinating, irresistible thing imaginable."

This is fine on Bernhardt:—

"How wonderful she looked in those days! She was as transparent as an azalea, only more so; like a cloud, only not so thick. Smoke from a burning paper describes her more nearly! She was hollow-eyed, thin, almost consumptive-looking. Her body was not the prison of her soul, but its shadow.

"On the stage she has always seemed to me more a symbol, an ideal, an epitome, than a woman. It is this quality that makes her so easy in such lofty parts as Phèdre. She is always a miracle."

Of Duse she says (among other charming things):—

"There have been only two faces on the stage in my time—Henry Irving's and Duse's."

There are many delightful bits about old Tom Mead and his "Meadisms":—

"When Jerome Lesurques is forced to suspect his son of crime, he has a line: 'Am I mad, or dreaming? Would I were!' Mead one night gave a less poetic reading: 'Am I mad or drunk? Would I were!'"

Miss Terry found Tennyson's reading of "The Cup" impressive but curious. He read, she says:—

"in a monotone, rumbling on a low note in much the same way that Shelley is said to have screamed on a high one. For the women's parts he changed his voice suddenly, climbed up into a key which he could not sustain."

Irving, of course, dominates a great part of the book, and from Miss Terry's reminiscences a separate study might be made of that strange, brilliant, and fascinating man, whose posthumous renown will probably exceed Garrick's. He is as sure of fame hereafter as any man who has lived among us. Many of us can remember the wonderful modification of his features and expression in middle life, the refinement and intellectual beauty that came into them. The Irving with whom Miss Terry acted at the Queen's Theatre in 1867:—

"was stiff with self-consciousness; his eyes were dull and his face heavy. . . Then he was really almost ordinary-looking—with a moustache, an unwrinkled face, and a sloping forehead. The only wonderful thing about him was his melancholy. He looked conceited, and almost savagely proud of the isolation in which he lived."

This was the Irving who was still "suffering deeply from his inability to express himself through his art," and it is Miss Terry's belief that to his long fight with difficulties of every kind might be traced "the peculiar quality of his acting afterwards—a kind of fine temper, like the purest steel." His long years of failure left in his memory some deposit of bitterness, which:—

"colored Henry Irving's attitude towards the public. When he made his humble little speeches before the curtain, there was always a touch of pride in the humility. Perhaps he would not have received adulation in quite the same dignified way if he had never known what it was to wear the martyr's shirt of flame."

Miss Terry doubts whether Irving was ever absolutely intimate with anyone, and is persuaded that at no time in his life had he any vital interests unconnected with his work.

IN THE INFANCY OF JOURNALISM.*

In this volume Mr. W. J. Couper deals with the origin of the Scottish, and more particularly the Edinburgh, Press and its history from 1642 to 1711. Too much praise cannot be bestowed upon Mr. Couper for his enthusiastic industry in rescuing a vast amount of valuable information which lies somewhat out of the main line of the ordinary historian. Great, indeed, must have been the trouble involved in collecting the fragmentary information which this volume contains—information which, when pieced together, affords an interesting glimpse into the political, social, and literary history of Scotland during an interesting period of the nation's development.

As was natural, Edinburgh, and notably the High Street, was the centre of Scotland's journalistic activity. Equally natural were the crude attempts at newspaper enterprise. The early pioneers of journalism were hampered by two great obstacles—the difficulty of getting news and the difficulty of getting it published. The hand of the Stuart despotism lay heavy on journalism. The situation was accurately described as follows by the late Professor Masson:—"Clearly for newspapers and pamphlet literature at least, the Restoration was an arrest and paralysis. Not only were the number of newspapers kept at the lowest possible minimum, but that minimum, being under Government management far more strictly than any time during the preceding eighteen years of the revolution, and free pamphleting having ceased, or nearly so, all pith was taken out of English journalism." Bad as was the state of journalism in England under the Stuarts, it was much worse in Scotland, where the Privy Council, of evil repute, exercised a rigorous Press censorship. During the time of the Covenanters, the Council gave orders against the printing of any books or papers unless permission had been obtained. Mr. Couper tells us that "embargo was laid even on the reading of manuscript news-letters in public coffee-houses—the great news centres of the town—until they had first been presented to the Bishop of Edinburgh, or any other Privy Councillor, or the Clerks of Council, that they may consider them, and thereby false and seditious news and slanders may be prevented." As a result of this censorship little attention was given to local news, and, therefore, Edinburgh journals relied mainly upon London for intelligence of a general nature which could not come into conflict with the censorship. But as the coach from London was at the mercy of snowstorms and highwaymen, it is easy to understand the intimations made by Edinburgh editors that the date of publication was postponed pending the arrival of London intelligence. Thus we find Donaldson, one of the earliest and most enterprising journalists of his day, intimating in his programme that he would have everything so in readiness in his office awaiting the mails that his "Gazette" would be issued "within four or five hours after the Post arriveth." Then, as now, great competition existed among rival papers. The proprietor of the "Edinburgh Chronicle" "used to ride to Leith to intercept the London mail, and return to the city by a shorter route in order to forestall his contemporaries"

With the Revolution, which brought to an end the political and ecclesiastical controversies which kept Scotland in a state of turmoil, the nation entered in earnest upon an intellectual career. The leading spirits of the time were fully aware of the leeway Scotland had to make up in all that pertained to civilisation. Carlyle describes the backwardness of Scotland in his own vivid style when he says: "At the date when Addison and Steele were writing their 'Spectator' our own good Thomas Boston was writing with noblest intent, but, alike in defiance of grammar and philosophy, his 'Fourfold State of Man.'" That, under proper conditions, the taste for literature in Scotland would develop was plain from the great influence exerted in Edinburgh by such papers as the "Tatler" and the "Spectator." In his "Life of Kames" Lord Woodhouselee remarks that to Addison was largely due the cultivation of style among Scotland's writers and the taste for literature generally. The essay became fashionable, so much so that it occupied a conspicuous place in the newspapers as well as in the magazines. Then we find the "Edinburgh Advertiser" of 1764 justifying the inclusion of the essay in its columns on the ground that it was "an article of entertainment for which there is so large a demand." A favourite method was the reproduction in Edinburgh papers of essays from the "Rambler" and other English periodicals, and, as showing the great public demand for sound literature, it is interesting to note that the "Gentleman and Lady's Weekly Magazine" made its essays the principal feature by which it claimed the support of its readers. What strikes the reader of Scottish periodical literature is its seriousness of purpose. The Scottish mind was athirst for knowledge in all its directions—scientific, economic, philosophic, and literary.

* "The Edinburgh Periodical Press." Vol. I. By W. J. Couper, M.A. Stirling: Eneas Mackay. 5s.

In the eighteenth century in Scotland the periodical Press was an educative agency. Can the same be said of it to-day? Up till far into the nineteenth century the Scottish Press did splendid work as an educative agency. Who can over-estimate the great work done by the "Edinburgh Review" in its palmy days? And in "Blackwood" the old traditions are still splendidly maintained. The daily Press, too, in the great political controversies was serious and educative in a high degree. In the "Witness" Hugh Miller produced work of high literary excellence, and the subjects which he handled, apart from his ecclesiastical writings, were far above the heads of the average newspaper reader of to-day. If anyone wishes to see how economic questions can be handled in a newspaper, he has but to turn to the columns of the Scottish Press at the time of the Corn Law controversy. The writers were thoroughly conversant with the most abstruse points in political economy, and to appreciate such writing the average newspaper reader of that day must have been exceptionally intelligent. On the whole, the Scottish Press of to-day still lives up to its traditions, but a change is in progress which threatens to lower the old ideal. In the eighteenth century the popular cult was knowledge; to-day it is pleasure. Up till far on in the nineteenth century it was recognised that knowledge was power, and to satisfy the thirst for knowledge numerous institutions were started in Scotland. The diffusion of useful knowledge was demanded by all the leaders of the people, and through their influence the demand for information on all kinds of serious subjects was supplied. The newspapers reflected the popular tone. Scotland has shared in the general prosperity of the past sixty years, and the result on the popular mind has not been gratifying. Free education, instead of creating a love of serious knowledge, has, in the main, developed a taste for what is called light literature, and the shorter hours now enjoyed by the people, instead of being utilised for educative purposes, are mainly devoted to pleasure. Solid reading has gone out of fashion. The taste for the sensational has taken the place of the taste for the useful. The change is reflected in the newspapers. Sixty years ago when a man died he was taken notice of in the papers only when his life had been devoted to some public end. Now a man is thought important enough for Press notice if he has distinguished himself in some form of sport. He may have done no useful public act; enough if he was the champion boxer, the leading cricketer, the outstanding golfer. If he excelled on the music-hall stage, beat the record at billiards, or outdistanced all competitors as a racer, his photograph is conspicuous in the papers, and his death is bewailed as a national loss. Judging from the space given in the Press, physical, and not intellectual, culture is the god of Scotland's idolatry. Happily, in Scotland in this matter the Press has not gone so far as in England. The better class of newspapers have, so far, kept true to the old traditions, but the evil is manifesting itself here and there, and before another generation passes it will, unless checked, tell seriously upon the national character. We have travelled a long way since the eighteenth century, when newspapers looked upon the essay as the most attractive feature in their columns.

THE MUTINY.*

We could not very heartily welcome even the best book imaginable upon the Mutiny. Not only was the Mutiny itself the greatest disaster in the history of our connection with India, but it was a disaster that seems never to end. It is the one thing that all educated English people know about India, and often it is the only thing. Our children are still reared on the stories of Delhi, Lucknow, and Cawnpore, and however hurried the British tourist in India may be, he is sure to spare time enough to visit the grim relics of those scenes. It would not matter much if the Mutiny had been a war like other wars, in which the races stand apart and recover reason when the fighting is done. But in India we have remained as rulers of the conquered, and it is disastrous for both races that from one generation to another we should form our conception of the people we rule from an episode that affected only a small fraction of them. The tragedy which burnt most deeply into the British mind—the massacre of the women and children at Cawnpore—was the work of five common men, two of whom were Mohammedan butchers, acting under one despot's orders. Yet it is constantly quoted to justify the condemnation of three hundred millions of innocent people, fifty years after the event.

It is almost as bad on the Indian side, for Indians remember the ruthlessness with which the Mutiny was crushed—the flogging, the hanging, and blowing from the guns. Nothing seems to die so slowly as the memories of cruelty, and in the popular imagination it took more than three centuries to quench the fires of Smithfield. That is why we regret anything that may serve to keep alive the passions of the Mutiny, and if it was necessary for the "Times" to stir up the smouldering fires by getting Sir Evelyn Wood to write a series of articles on the well-worn theme just when our relations with India were in a critical state last autumn, we should have thought the matter might have been left there. But the Field-Marshal has been persuaded partly to re-write the articles and to collect them into another history for which there was not much need.

It is a straightforward piece of work—bare narrative for the most part, told with greater brevity and less personal interest than we have lately been accustomed to in the despatches of Generals on the field. Sir Evelyn evidently does his utmost to be just to friend and foe, and the account is probably as accurate as any account of confused and passionate fighting can be. But for the omission of some disputed but important points, such as Hodson's shooting of the Princes after Delhi, the work would serve as a text-book for students or for tourists, as there are good maps and plans, with one or two portraits. But, as a whole, the history strikes us as peculiarly impersonal and "detached," considering that the author was himself present during the later part of the disturbance, though not at the most critical and exciting episodes. However, he was only young at the time, and within his brief limits he does his best to make us acquainted with the remarkable personalities whom the Mutiny suddenly raised to fame, as only war does. In all our history we doubt if England has ever been able to show at the same time a group of men so distinguished by the best soldierly qualities as the officers who commanded in India during those few terrible months. Some failed under the pressure of crisis, but they were very few and their failure is forgotten in the resource and persistent bravery of the rest.

In his brief introduction and conclusion, Sir Evelyn Wood rightly traces the cause of the Mutiny to the unimaginative habit of the British mind. The greasing of the cartridges with beef-fat and lard, abominations to Mussulman and Hindu, was not ill-intentioned. There was no thought of destroying caste or excluding the Sepoys from salvation. It was only one of our characteristic blunders in not appreciating the nature of other people's feelings. It was the same with the annexation of Oude, the missionary denunciations of Indian religions, and our arbitrary interference with popular tradition, especially in regard to marriage. All these things were well enough meant, but we had not sympathy enough to understand the danger of doing people good in that overbearing way. The error of our rule has seldom been cruel oppression, and seldom corruption, but it has been this want of sympathetic imagination almost always; and we are grateful to Sir Evelyn Wood for drawing attention to the true cause of the Mutiny at a time when, by such measures as the Partition of Bengal, we have been doing our worst to repeat our ancient blunder.

* "The Revolt in Hindustan." By Sir Evelyn Wood, F.M., V.C. Methuen. 6s. net.

SOME POETS OF THE DAY.*

Mr. Herbert Trench is a singer who cares more for the substance of poetry than for its accidents, and is disposed to be a little cavalier in his treatment of form. The chief poem in his last book "Apollo and the Seaman" is a worthy attempt to treat a large idea in a large manner; but it has great formal defects. To begin with, the writing is frequently unmetrical. This is, no doubt, to be explained by the announcement that it is intended "to be accompanied by orchestral music"; but the "Ancient Mariner" has sometimes been accompanied by orchestral music and yet stands independently as a poem on its own rhythmical merits. In the second place, the picturesque treatment of the theme breaks down in the middle. The good ship Immortality has gone to pieces, and the Seaman is left lamenting. But Apollo, who built the ship, instead of promising his human friend a new vessel on an improved principle, tells him he must in future stick to terra firma:

> "Earth is thy ship! Thou shalt have time
> To find the earth thy friend"; and presently, after a somewhat unpoetical sneer at the clergy, embarks on a sermon about the best modern substitute for immortality. The allegory is too important in the first half—even to representing conscience as a medal hung round the Seaman's neck:

> "He fumbled in his hairy breast,
> Yes, the 'Judge thyself' hung there—" to be so completely cast aside in the second. Of course, there are fine passages. If the first poem, in point of importance, in the volume must be held on the whole to fail, the second, "The Queen of Gothland," can hardly be reckoned to succeed. There is a want of definition. We seem in an atmosphere of passion, but we have no sufficient clue to the particular passion intended. What was it drove the queen on her long wanderings, the taint of madness in her blood, mere hatred of monotony, or unsatisfied love? That the poet has in view a real queen, who did so wander, may help the reader to conjecture; but a poem should be independent of foot-notes; and if speech is employed by the artist as his medium, and not music, it should render passion intelligible, which here it certainly does not. It is needless to say that in this poem also Mr. Trench has some beautiful writing, in a somewhat rhetorical manner. But the best things in the book are the simplest, those in which the poet accepts the customary limitations of his art, and handles a simple theme in simple verse, "The Questioners," "The Shepherd," "Lindisfarne." It is surely true that any verse that is to move mankind passionately must first be able to take its place in memory by virtue of the perfection of its form. Here are two modes of Mr. Trench's writing:

> "Ah, yes, it rained—sudden a-cold
> The sky loured overcast.
> Soon the pavements leapt with plashing drops;
> And, as he hasty passed,
> He heard a burst of chanted sound,
> And glanced up at the vast
> Shadow, that over huddled roofs,
> Loomed, pinnacled, and grey.
> The spired cathedral thundrously
> And widely seemed to sway:
> Like earth upon her pilgrimage
> Buffetting on from age to age,
> It still was under way."

That we should all allow to be poetry; and no one who has read it will forget it; particularly if he thinks the cathedral is in more senses than Mr. Trench would allow, the type of the world; but what is the use of writing and printing lines like these that follow?

> "Even so are ye
> All standing now at such a moment,
> Smoulderers, objectless, uncertain,
> Artists and priests of all religions,
> Shapers of clay, sound, and colour,
> Shapers of perfection and of symbol,
> Shapers of passion and of awe!
> Hath it gone, last hour of all that glory,
> For which we came to be?"

Mr. Phillips is a poet of the opposite type to Mr. Trench. With him the form is the main thing. There is not so much of the hard matter of thought to be beaten or molten into shape. Mr. Phillips' ideas and emotions are, as a rule, on the ordinary level, and they tend to repeat themselves. Thus, in the present volume, "Endymion," "Gulf and God," "A Poet's Prayer," and "The Dreaming Muse," all deal in various ways with the pains of poetry. But given the theme, how simply adequate is the phrasing! For illustration, take a passage in blank verse from the "Quest of Edith"—the wife of Harold:—

> "But Edith doubted not: Ah, by what sign,
> And holy between undivided hearts,
> Grew she so certain of that marrèd face,
> And the mown beauty of tall manhood? Yet
> She chose it out for all the stains and blows,—
> And as she streamed above him in her hair,
> And with her long hair wiped away the blood,
> Using those yellow tresses he had loved,—
> Over her issued clean the autumn moon.
> Even the moon, so used to mortal woe,
> To gazing on death bed, and battle-field,
> Herself the brilliant candle of our sorrow,
> Herself the reckless glory of this grief,
> Was troubled by the woman, in mid sky.
> But Edith held that to her which was Harold,
> Nor was aware of those two standing priests,
> Nor mother in a paler grief retired,
> Nor of those ladies, with their burdens, who,
> As laden women from the harvest field
> Returning, pass beside one busy still,
> Past her returned: nor now was she aware
> Of moon or dew: the sting, the sword was here,
> The cup, the burning crown, the robe of blood,
> And the great earth a shadow."

It must be admitted, however, that there is little in this writing that attracts the reader to a second perusal. There is a want of deliberation, which divides this blank verse from Tennyson's "Ulysses," or "Tithonus." At its best, its excellence lies in its fine use of imagery; as at the close of "Lancelot and Guinevere":

> "And as two trees at midnight, when the breeze
> Comes over them, now to each other bend,
> And now withdraw; so mournfully these two > Still drooped together and still drew apart."

Of the new lyrics, the most touching is that called "A Gleam," which tells of the parents' grief for the lost child:

> "I shall know, ere the sun arises,
> By a sudden stirring of thee,
> Or blind slight touch in the dark,
> Or face upturned in quivering dream,
> That your heart, like mine, has gone home in the hush to its dead,
> Through dew and beginning birds."

But the tragedy called "Iole," a Greek version of the sacrifice of Jephthah, is perhaps the most perfect poem Mr. Phillips has yet written. In it the eternal thoughts of father and daughter, son and mother, receive that simple and sufficient expression which we associate with Greek poetry. A good many of the shorter poems are unrhymed. This seems to be sheer loss, except in the case of some memorial lines to Gladstone, which gain by this means a certain monumental quality.

Dr. Warren's poem, about Virgil's last days, is called by him "a dramative narrative," and the title explains his purpose. He has taken the outline of facts from Suetonius and elaborated them into scenes. The subject is one of interest to scholars, and the writing is the writing of a scholar, full of classical reminiscence and happy skill in the use of language.

With Mr. Mackenzie's name we make acquaintance for the first time, and his volume has all the daintiness of a first book. The paper is of the whitest, and to each poem is assigned its date and place with the fond scrupulosity of youth. Let it be said at once that the book has charm and accomplishment, and that it belongs to the school of Lycidas, than which there is no better school for a young poet. Mr.

* "New Poems." By Herbert Trench. Methuen. 6s.
"New Poems." By Stephen Phillips. Lane. 4s. 6d. net.
"The Death of Virgil." By T. H. Warren. Blackwell. 3s.
"Poems." By M. Compton Mackenzie. Blackwell. 3s. 6d. net.

MR. EDWARD ARNOLD'S ANNOUNCEMENTS.

NEW FICTION.

AMABEL CHANNICE.
By ANNE DOUGLAS SEDGWICK, Author of "Valerie Upton." 6s. [Oct. 7.

A ROOM WITH A VIEW.
By E. M. FORSTER, Author of "The Longest Journey." 6s. [Oct. 14.

THE WITCH'S SWORD.
By DAVID KERR FULTON. Illustrated by the Author. 6s. [Oct. 7.

MIRIAM.
By EDITH C. M. DART. 6s. [Oct. 14.

CHRONICLES OF SERVICE LIFE IN MALTA.
By Mrs. ARTHUR STUART. 6s. [Oct. 14.

GENERAL LITERATURE.

THE REMINISCENCES OF LADY RANDOLPH CHURCHILL.
By Mrs. GEORGE CORNWALLIS-WEST. With Portraits. 1 vol. Demy 8vo. 15s. net. [Oct. 7.

OLD AND ODD MEMORIES.
By the Hon. LIONEL TOLLEMACHE, Author of "Talks with Mr. Gladstone," &c. With portraits. 1 vol. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net. [Oct. 28.

EIGHTEEN YEARS IN UGANDA AND EAST AFRICA.
By the RIGHT REV. A. R. TUCKER, D.D., Bishop of Uganda. With 60 full-page illustrations from the Author's sketches, and a map. 2 vols. Demy 8vo. 30s. net. [Oct. 21.

ON SAFARI. Big Game Hunting in British East Africa. With Studies in Bird Life.
By ABEL CHAPMAN, Author of "Wild Norway," &c. With 170 illustrations by the Author and E. Caldwell. Demy 8vo. 16s. net. [Oct. 28.

IN SEARCH OF A POLAR CONTINENT.
By A. H. HARRISON. Illustrated from Photographs. With map. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net. [Oct. 14.

IN OLD CEYLON.
By REGINALD FARRER, Author of "The Garden of Asia." With numerous illustrations. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net. [Oct. 28.

THE BOOK OF WINTER SPORTS.
Edited by EDGAR SYERS, with contributions from experts in the different branches of sport. Fully illustrated. 1 vol. Demy 8vo. 15s. net. [Oct. 14.

SCOTTISH GARDENS.
By the Right Hon. SIR HERBERT MAXWELL, Bart. With 32 coloured plates from pastel drawings by Miss M. G. W. Wilson. Crown 4to. 21s. net. Also an Edition de luxe, limited to 250 copies, at £2 2s. net. [Oct. 14.

ALPINES AND BOG-PLANTS.
By REGINALD FARRER, Author of "My Rock-Garden." With illustrations. Large Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d. net. [Oct. 7.

MADAME ELIZABETH DE FRANCE—1764-1793. A Memoir.
By the Hon. Mrs. MAXWELL-SCOTT, Author of "Abbotsford and its Treasures," &c. With finely printed illustrations. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net. [Oct. 21.

A HISTORY OF THE "GEORGE" worn on the Scaffold by King Charles I.
By SIR RALPH PAYNE-GALLWEY, Bart., Author of "The Mystery of Maria Stella," &c. With interesting illustrations. Royal 8vo. 7s. 6d. net. [Oct. 21.

PAINTING IN THE FAR EAST.
By LAURENCE BINYON. With 31 reproductions of originals in the British Museum and in private possession. 1 vol. Crown 4to. 21s. net. [Oct. 14.

WOODSMEN OF THE WEST.
By M. A. GRAINGER. With illustrations. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net. [Oct. 21.

A PARSON IN THE AUSTRALIAN BUSH.
By the Rev. C. H. S. MATTHEWS. With illustrations by the Author. Crown 8vo. 6s. net. [Oct. 21.

LONDON SIDELIGHTS.
By CLARENCE ROOK. Crown 8vo. 6s. [Oct. 21.

KNOWN TO THE POLICE. Memoirs of a Police-court Missionary.
By THOMAS HOLMES. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net. [Oct. 28.

THE MISTRESS ART.
By REGINALD BLOMFIELD, A.R.A., Professor of Architecture to the Royal Academy. Crown 8vo. 5s. net. [Oct. 14.

THE ROSE-WINGED HOURS. A Collection of English Love Lyrics.
Arranged by ST. JOHN LUCAS, Editor of "The Oxford Book of Verse," &c. Small 8vo. Elegantly bound. 5s. net. [Oct. 28.

ARVAT. A Drama.
By LEOPOLD H. MYERS. Crown 8vo. 4s. 6d. net. [Oct. 7.

PEEP-IN-THE-WORLD.
A Story for Children. By Mrs. F. E. CRICHTON. Illustrated. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d. [Oct. 21.

VEGETARIAN COOKERY.
By FLORENCE A. GEORGE. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d. [Oct. 28.

LONDON: EDWARD ARNOLD, 41 & 43, MADDOX ST., W.

BEAUTIFUL FLOWERS

AND HOW TO GROW THEM

17 PARTS

1/- NET

100 LARGE PLATES IN COLOUR

Authors

HORACE J. WRIGHT and WALTER P. WRIGHT

The Famous Horticulturists

Artists

ELEANOR F. BRICKDALE, ANNA LEA-MERRITT, H. L. NORRIS, LILIAN STANNARD, MARGARET WATERFIELD, A. F. MUCKLEY, and F. E. JAMES.

In all cases the most perfect types have been painted.

The aim of the book is practical. The plainest and fullest instruction is given to ensure success in flower growing.

Cuts are inserted in the text where necessary to make the explanations perfectly clear.

Recent methods of colour printing have enabled the publishers to produce a veritable Edition de Luxe at a price to bring this fascinating and ambitious work within the reach of all.

Each part contains six large colour plates in addition to the illustrated text.

LONDON: T. C. & E. C. JACK
16 HENRIETTA ST., W.C., & EDINBURGH

Mackenzie displays unusual skill in the use of a ten-syllable metre, alternately rhymed; his masterpiece in this kind being the lines "To Corinna," with which his book opens, inviting her "to scorn the town." Here is a passage from the praise of winter in the country:—

"So will we read by gusty candlelight
Old chronicles of the dim, ancient time.
In whitest vellum bound or tinctures bright,
All in black letter writ and crabbèd rhyme,
Until throughout the house the noisy clocks
Strike midnight suddenly: then swift to bed,
Up the dark stairs, we two will go, your locks
Ensilvered where the frosty moon has shed
A long ray through the lattice-curtain's chink,
Or pause to fling the darkness back, and gaze
Upon the fruit trees in the snow, and think
Of blossom and still far-off summer days.
* * * * * *
And then one morning we will wake to find,
Since yesterday, the snowdrops are full-blown,
And see their myriads brave the pagan wind—
Eleven thousand virgins of Cologne.
Then, too, the golden aconites will hang
Their ruffs with jewels of bright rain, and shine
On borders where but now the thrushes sang
In snow, who mate when comes St. Valentine."

A noticeable poem, called "The Child's Epic of the Night," describes the imaginative terrors of a lonely child.

AN EDIFYING NOVEL.*

It is not difficult to discover, in reading "Diana Mallory," why we are so little affected by what is meant to move us so much. The various characters are cleverly contrasted; the story is ingeniously, too ingeniously, put together; the political atmosphere has actuality, and we ask ourselves, even though the tragedy be demonstrably fabricated, why the broad picture, with its episodes and interludes in social interchange, should excite in us so negative an interest. It is not, indeed, that the story is without force, or is lifeless; the author has always the secret of animating her characters with her own mental energy. The defect lies deeper—in the very springs of her artistic impulse. It is because Mrs. Humphry Ward's characters, however diverse they show themselves in motives, instincts, or outlook, are perpetually being driven, like sheep, into the fold of her lofty idealism, and are solemnly sorted out and branded according to the weight of their moral wool. It gets on one's nerves at last, the rigidity of her point of view. One rebels against this ethical stress laid on character and conduct, and again on character, and yet again on conduct, because one is never allowed simply to rejoice in human nature, or weep with it, for its own sake. One is always being forced to assist at a solemn laying on of hands, or anxiously scrutinising life through the lens of moral purpose. The schoolmaster's point of view is, of course, of high importance, but when it is translated into terms of art it is patent, after all, that the universe is responsible for Mrs. Trimmer, and not Mrs. Trimmer for the universe. And, in fact, it is the compelling strain of that admirable woman, Mrs. Trimmer, in our author's intellectual outlook, that has forced her artistic instinct to play second fiddle.

The hold the work of the real artists, in the drama and the novel, has over us is always relative to our conviction that the characters are obeying the inner laws of their nature. Now the crying defect of "Diana Mallory" is that there is no psychological issue that our author will not manipulate and tamper with, sensibly or insensibly, to suit her moral purpose. She is not, of course, aware of this, but throughout the scheme of the novel it is never the case of the dog wagging its tail, but of the ethical tail wagging the dog. Even on the first page the moral note of high endeavour is struck when the perfect heroine, Diana Mallory, a high-souled, ardently patriotic, exquisite girl, "wrapped in a white dressing gown," leans out of her window on Christmas morning, and "half laughing yet with tears in her eyes," cries "England! England! my own, own country!" and, feasting her kindling eyes on the quiet countryside falls into appropriate historical musings:—

"'Nothing changes,' she thought, 'in this country life!' On the morning of Charles I.'s execution—in the winters and springs when Elizabeth was Queen—while Becket lay dead on Canterbury steps—when Harold was on his way to Senlac—that hill, that path, was there: sheep were climbing it and shepherds were herding them. 'It has been so since England began; it will be so when I am dead. We are only shadows that pass. But England lives always—always—and shall live!'"

These Tennysonian musings are put in since Diana as a wanderer has but lately returned to England from the Riviera after her father's death, and is newly settled in Beechcote Manor, an old Tudor house. Diana is a fervent Imperialist, knows Latin and German, is passionately fond of French memoirs and the French classics, and is little short of a female Admirable Crichton. When a guest at Tallyn Hall she floors Mr. Barton, the Labor member, in an argument over the Afridi war, and even her host, Mr. Oliver Marsham, the rising politician, "can hardly keep his footing" till he "summons all his nerve and all his knowledge and then Diana falls back in her chair silenced, her beautiful passionate eyes fixed on Marsham as his were on her." Diana, as a heroine should do, carries all before her at Tallyn House. She dances and sings so beautifully that the gilded youth "came crowding about her like flies in a milk pail." The great Mr. Ferrier, the leader of the Opposition seeks her out "with every mark of flattering attention," and, in fact, Diana is growing almost unendurable, when, through the agency of Sir James Chide, and her odious cousin, Fanny Merton, we are let into a very dark secret of her family history. Her mother, Juliet Sparling, the victim of the handsome and plausible villain, Sir Francis Wing, after gambling away her sister's trust-money at baccarat, has stabbed Lady Wing to the heart in a moment of frenzy; and her trial has been a cause celèbre, of which everybody in England but Diana is aware. After the death of his wife, "who sinned and suffered agonies beyond any penalty of man's inflicting," Mr. Sparling thoughtfully changed his name to Mallory, and retired to the Riviera where the lovely Diana is reared in all the purity of her virginal innocence. The reader may imagine that Mrs. Humphry Ward lays bare this family skeleton with a discreet and loving hand. With heads reverently bared we stand around the mausoleum while some rich, deep-fluted voice recounts for fifty pages the tragic tale of Mrs. Sparling's temptation, her crime and her repentance, her punishment and expiation, all in the frightful glare of our watching Empire's publicity. It is a theme for the idealistic analysis to ponder in all its interestingly rich detail, and the author's sentimental pity and horror are equalled only by the delicate thoroughness of her moral probings.

A scene less instructive to our human frailty, but more artistic in its effect is the one between the great Sir James Chide, who, oddly enough, has loved Juliet Spearing in her youth, and defended her at the Old Bailey, and Lady Lucy Marsham, who is resolved to disinherit her son, Oliver, the rising politician, sooner than allow him to marry Diana—the criminal's daughter! The rigid, narrow, and cold-hearted old Quaker lady, with a strain of worldliness disguised in much placid moralising, is as capitally rendered as is the terrible old Lady Niton. Caustic, and almost as good, is the brilliant, heartless, and worldly girl, Alice Drake. The artist in Mrs. Humphry Ward has been given free play in the drawing of these minor figures, as a slight compensation for the binding vows she is under not to interfere with the novel's grandiose moral scheme. For, to put it bluntly, there is an extraordinary lack of spiritual taste shown in the exaggerated account of Diana's torments, of her tortured imagination, of her moral agonies over her mother's frenzy of twenty years ago. The last drop of pity and sympathy is wrung out of the girl's situation, and the author is still wringing at Diana's "strange, frozen horror" for fifty pages more. We lose patience at last, and ask whether the author's excessive enjoyment of sin and its consequences does not point to a hypertrophy, or overnourishment of her moral sense? In any case, the novel as a work of art suffers cruelly from her preoccupation with moral issues. We are no sooner out of the wood of Juliet Sparling's ancient crime than we find ourselves plunged in the tangled undergrowth of Oliver Marsham's treachery, punishment, and repentance. Marsham meanly throws over the peerless Diana, at his mother's dictation, and forthwith betrays to hostile politicians his old friend and leader, Ferrier, to whom he owes his political career. Marsham's confused feelings, when Ferrier dies of shock and heart-failure on the

* "Diana Mallory." By Mrs. Humphry Ward. Smith, Elder & Co. 6s.

Just Published. F'cap. 8vo. 1s. net.

DOGMA AND HISTORY.

By Professor Dr. GUSTAV KRÜGER, of Giessen.

Intended for those who have little acquaintance with the historical development of religious ideas, and especially for those who, while becoming ever more uncertain about the validity of Creeds and Dogmas, cannot see their way to true religion without them.

Crown 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

WHOSE SON IS CHRIST?

TWO LECTURES ON PROGRESS IN RELIGION.

By Professor FRIEDRICH DELITZSCH, of Berlin (Author of "Babel and Bible").

The author holds that Protestantism, when possessed of a full consciousness of its sacred task of serving the truth, will free the life and the teaching of Jesus from the dross which has collected on both and threatened to smother them.

LONDON: PHILIP GREEN, 5, ESSEX STREET, STRAND, W.C.

OCTOBER ISSUE.

Financial Review of Reviews

PRICE, ONE SHILLING.

INDIA'S HOARDED WEALTH: Is an Inquiry Necessary?

Articles on this important public question are contributed by:
SIR EDWARD F. G. LAW, K.C.M.G., K.C.S.I.,
SIR HENRY J. COTTON, K.C.S.I.,
SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE, K.C.I.E., SIR J. F. L. ROLLESTON, SIR MANCHERJEE M. BHOWNAGGREE, K.C.I.E.
Other Articles of Practical Value to the Investor.

300 pp., 1s. Publisher, 2, Waterloo Place, S.W.

Buy ## The Saturday Westminster

Weekly Issue of "The Westminster Gazette."

Because
it contains all F.C.G.'S Cartoons of the Week.
of its unique page of "Problems and Prizes."
of its Book Reviews and Literary Columns.
of the Variety of General Articles and Short Stories.
it is the only Weekly Magazine-Review of the kind.
it costs but a Penny a Week. By post, 6s. 6d. (Home), and 8s. 8d. (Abroad) per annum.

It ## Never Fails to Please & Satisfy

Offices: Tudor House, Tudor St., London, E.C.

THE INDEX TO VOLUME II. OF THE NATION

Is NOW READY and can had free on application to the Manager.

Macmillan's New Books

Lollardy and the Reformation in England. An Historical Survey.
By JAMES GAIRDNER, C.B., Hon. LL.D., Edin. 2 vols. 8vo, 21s. net.

VOL II. JUST PUBLISHED.

A History of English Prosody
From the Twelfth Century to the Present Day.
By Prof. GEORGE SAINTSBURY, M.A., Hon. LL.D. 3 vols. 8vo. Vol. II. From Shakespeare to Crabbe. 15s. net.
Previously published: Vol. I. From the Origins to Spencer. 10s. net.

The Eversley Tennyson.
Annotated by ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON. Edited by HALLAM, LORD TENNYSON. In 9 vols. Globe 8vo, 4s. net. each. Vol. IX. Becket, and other Plays.

SEVENTH EDITION JUST PUBLISHED.

Introduction to the Study of the Law of the Constitution.
By A. V. DICEY, K.C. Seventh edition. 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

FREDERIC HARRISON.

Realities and Ideals:
Social, Political, Literary and Artistic.
By FREDERIC HARRISON. Extra Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

Herculaneum, Past, Present and Future. By CHARLES WALDSTEIN, Litt. D. Ph. D. L.H.D., and LEONARD SHOOBRIDGE, M.A. With Coloured Frontispiece, numerous Photogravure Plates, and other Illustrations and Maps. 8vo, 21s. net.

Buddhist Essays.
By Dr. PAUL DAHLKE. Translated from the German by BHIKKHU SILACARA. 8vo, 10s. net.

The Philosophy of Gassendi.
By G. S. BRETT, Professor of Philosophy, Government College, Lahore. 8vo, 10s. net.

New 6s. Novels.

OUIDA'S LAST NOVEL HELIANTHUS A Romance of Modern Europe.

Mamma. By RHODA BROUGHTON.

The Sunny Side of the Hill.
By ROSA N. CARY.

Paths of the Righteous.
By L. DOUGALL, Author of "Beggars All," &c.

Together. By ROBERT HERRICK.

* Macmillan's Autumn Announcement List post-free on application.
MACMILLAN and CO., Ltd., London.

The Economist.

(ESTABLISHED 1843.)

Weekly Commercial Times, Bankers' Gazette, and Railway Monitor.

A POLITICAL, LITERARY, FINANCIAL AND GENERAL NEWSPAPER.
PRICE 8d. BY POST, 8½d. ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM, £2. COLONIES AND ABROAD, £2 4s.

The established authority on all Financial and Commercial subjects. In addition to a large high-class general circulation, the ECONOMIST is subscribed to by Banking Houses, Chambers of Commerce, Mercantile Firms, and Railway, Insurance, and other Companies throughout the United Kingdom, the Colonies and Abroad; and, as its columns from week to week show, it is the recognised organ for the announcements of some of the most important trades in the Kingdom.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY IN TIME FOR THE MORNING MAILS
Offices: GRANVILLE HOUSE, ARUNDEL STREET, STRAND, W.C., and of all Booksellers and Newsagents.

lawn at Beechcote Manor, are not badly drawn, though the moral thunderstorm is muttering ominously in the background. It bursts over Marsham's head, when, finally, he is thrown out of Parliament by his constituency, and struck by an electioneering brickbat, develops all the symptoms of spinal disease—blindness and complete mental, moral, and physical breakdown. Let us draw a veil over the author's treatment of this congenial theme. Where the prey is there are the eagles gathered together, says the proverb, and the reader who has ventured thus far into Mrs. Humphry Ward's terrain, finds the whole ground bristling with yawning moral batteries, while the angels of pity and mercy are hovering overhead, eager to begin their ministrations over the stricken man. Diana, of course, insists on rushing in and marrying her recreant lover, and the coals of fire are piled higher and higher round the writhing man's couch. "It was a wedding which, to all who witnessed it, was among the most heart-rending experiences of life. Oliver, practically blind, could not see his bride, and only morphia enabled him to go through with it." No improving detail is spared us: "the black hair mingled with the grey on the same pillow." It is no wonder when again, on the last page, Diana throws open her window, the next morning, on New Year's Day, she finds "her being flooded with an upholding, enkindling joy." The sleeping Oliver, morphialess, is now out of pain, and to "the dim, joyous sound of bells," aptly concludes this edifying novel.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

The number of English biographies of the chief actors in the French Revolution receives an interesting edition in "The Princesse de Lamballe: A Biography," by Miss B. C. Hardy (Constable, 12s. net). The death of Madame de Lamballe is described by Carlyle in a famous passage, and although Mr. Belfort Bax, in his short account of the Revolution, speaks in contemptuous tones of Carlyle's "ecstatic frenzy," the majority of readers will share Carlyle's indignation and horror. Had the Princesse de Lamballe lived in a more settled age, she would, in all probability, have been unknown to history, for, apart from her loyalty to Marie Antoinette and the tragic fate it brought upon her, there was little of note in her career. A daughter of the House of Savoy, she was married at eighteen to the Prince de Lamballe, a great grandson of Louis XIV., and Madame de Montespan. Her father-in-law, the Duc de Penthiéore, was "the only nobleman," says Miss Hardy, "who remained unmolested on his estates during the disturbances until his death." As this event did not take place until 1792, the Duke's popularity seems to have been deeply rooted. His son, the Prince de Lamballe, had none of his father's virtues. He was a dissolute rake, and his wife had little to regret when he died eighteen months after their marriage. Madame de Lamballe's sister-in-law married Philippe Egalité in 1768, and some years later the Princess became a maid of honor to Marie Antoinette. A warm friendship was formed between the Queen and the Princess, which, though occasionally clouded by Marie Antoinette's fickleness, was kept up until the Princesse de Lamballe's death. From the first mutterings of the Revolution Madame de Lamballe showed an unhesitating devotion to her mistress. Again and again she showed her intrepidity by placing herself amid the dangers that threatened the Queen, and when the Royal Family was removed to the prison in the Temple she accompanied them, although she could easily have saved herself. Her death outside La Force was accompanied by details as revolting as anything to be found in the Revolutionary annals. Miss Hardy's biography is written with sympathy, and presents the Princess in an engaging light. It shows a knowledge of the Revolutionary memoirs and other records, and is in all respects a capable and satisfactory piece of work.

* * *

During the past few years books of travel have had a great vogue. By far the greater number impress the reader with the belief that their authors are dependent on short holidays for the opinions and descriptions which they set down. On the other hand, we meet now and then with a book inspired by real knowledge, and showing something more than a superficial knowledge of the political and social state of the country described. Mr. W. B. Forster Bovill's "Hungary and the Hungarians" (Methuen, 7s. 6d. net) comes nearer to the second class than to the first. Its fault is an inclination to be picturesque at all hazards, though Mr. Bovill is, on the whole, successful in his efforts "to outline those features that naturally come up for consideration during travel, and to explain and answer some of the questions a visitor is likely to ask." His summary of Hungarian history is good, and the same may be said of his account of the present state of the country. He declares that Hungary aspires to the political independence of Austria and seems to hold that this ambition is not unlikely to be fulfilled. The chapters on Hungarian language and literature, on the gipsies and their music, on the customs, costumes, and character of the people are lively and entertaining. Mr. Bovill has little difficulty in showing that the country is an attractive one. His book will probably induce some of its readers to visit Hungary, while those who have to content themselves with second-hand impressions will find in it much to interest them.

* * *

Although "A History of the Holy Eucharist in Great Britain," by T. E. Bridgett, C.SS.R., with Notes by H. Thuston, S.J. (Fisher Unwin and Burns & Oates, 21s. net), did not make its appearance before the Eucharistic Congress had ended, the re-issue of the book was doubtless suggested by that event. In its present form it consists of a skilful curtailment and re-arrangement by Mr. Louis G. Howard of Father Bridgett's great work, with Notes by Father Thurston, principally on points where Father Bridgett's text needs modification in the light of more recent research. The book consists of four sections, a historical sketch of the Eucharist in Great Britain up to the Reformation, a discussion of the Eucharist as a Sacrifice, the Eucharist as a Sacrament, and an examination of the part it has played in the life of the people. All these aspects are treated with great learning, and a moderation in the statement of results, especially praiseworthy in a book dealing with so controversial a subject. Father Thurston declares that "no work could have been chosen which, from its singular combination of earnest piety and wide historical knowledge, is better fitted to represent the contribution of Great Britain and Ireland to the Eucharistic literature of the world." Protestant as well as Catholic theologians will find much of value in its pages, however much the former may dissent from much that they contain.

* * *

A comprehensive history of medieval craftsmanship is a literary task from which few authors who know the difficulties would not shrink. One may, therefore, admire the courage, at any rate, of Mrs. Julia de Wolf Addison, who, in her "Acts and Crafts in the Middle Ages" (Bell, 7s. 6d. net), sets out to describe "Medieval Workmanship in Several of the Departments of Applied Art," and to give some account of "Special Artisans in the Early Renaissance," all within the limits of a single volume. The work bears every sign of immense industry, and in spite of being overweighted with material, makes interesting reading. Necessarily, a book that includes surveys of the world's work in gold and silver, iron, lead, wood, stone, ivory, book illumination, enamel and weaving—to mention some of the subjects handled by Mrs. Addison—cannot show an equal familiarity with all, and we encounter a few obviously weak spots. In the chapter on tapestry, for example, the account of so important a landmark in the history of that art as the Gobelin's Factory, is not only too sparse, but contains more than one inaccuracy. On the other hand, the authoress's acquaintance with the treatises of contemporary writers, such as Benvenuto Cellini and Marco Polo, has been the means of providing us with many piquant and amusing, as well as instructive, extracts; while the amount of miscellaneous information on topics as wide apart as apostle spoons and billiard balls should commend the book to every reader of an inquiring turn of mind. The illustrations in

SITUATION WANTED.

YOUNG GENTLEMAN (22), of literary disposition seeks engagement of the nature of Private Secretary or Assistant. Excellent references. knowledge of German.—Address, Box 4034, Willings, 125, Strand, W.C.

BOOKS WANTED, 25s. Each Offered.—Brewer's Henry VIII., 2 vols., 1884. Burke's Armoury and Extinct Peerage, 1883. Borrow's Wild Wales, 3 vols., 1862. Eliot's Scenes of Clerical Life, 1st edition, 2 vols., 1858. Jerrold's Men of Character, 3 vols., 1838. Alice in Wonderland, 1865 or 1866. Stevenson's Edinburgh, 1879. Desperate Remedies, 3 vols., 1871. Churchill's Poems, 3 vols., 1844. Symond's Italian Literature, 2 vols., 1881. Swinburne's Atalanta, white cloth, 1865. Lorna Doone, 3 vols., 1869. James's Painters and their Work, 3 vols. Gardiner's History of England, 2 vols., 1863. Jackson's Old Paris, 2 vols., 1878. Freer's Last Decade, 2 vols., 1863. 100,000 books for sale and wanted. Please state wants.—HOLLAND BROS., Book Merchants, 21, John Bright Street, Birmingham.

BOOKSELLERS.

A SHILLING ILLUSTRATED BIBLE.

This Bible is printed in clear Pearl type, and contains 16 Photographic Views, 16 beautiful Figure Pictures after Collier, Delaroche, Hoffmann, Reynolds, Titian, etc.; 2 beautiful Illuminated Title Pages and Maps; tastefully bound in crimson imitation leather, gilt edges, and round corners, 1s. 3d. post free, or 6 copies for 6s. 6d. post free.

Rev. ALAN BRODRICK, Broughton Gifford Rectory, writes:—"The Bibles are perfect books of art and cheapness."

The London Bible Warehouse, 53, Paternoster Row, E.C.

J. POOLE & CO., 104, Charing Cross Road, LONDON.

School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific, and Students'

BOOKSELLERS.

NEW AND SECOND-HAND.

All enquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered.

406 pages, 8vo, cloth, 2s. post free.

HEAVEN AND HELL:

Things Heard and Seen.

By EMANUEL SWEDENBORG.

JOHN GREENLEAF WHITTIER wrote:—"There is one grand and beautiful idea underlying all Swedenborg's revelations or speculations about the future life. His remarkably suggestive books are becoming familiar to the reading and reflecting portion of the community."

LONDON: SWEDENBORG SOCIETY, 1, Bloomsbury St.

SECOND IMPRESSION.

Towards a Social Policy

SUGGESTIONS FOR

CONSTRUCTIVE DOMESTIC REFORM.

By Various Writers.

Representing the conclusions of a Committee consisting of Messrs. C. R. BUXTON, H. C. FAIRFAX-CHOLMELEY, J. L. HAMMOND, F. W. HIRST, L. T. HOBHOUSE, J. A. HOBSON, C. F. G. MASTERMAN, M.P., J. H. MORGAN, and VAUGHAN NASH.

"We must all welcome, therefore, such a volume as the Speaker Office has produced under the title of 'Towards a Social Policy.' It is full of hard thinking and solid information, and should be a mine for platform speakers."—DAILY CHRONICLE.

"The book should be in the hand of everyone who loves his country. It is a lucid and comprehensive statement of the causes of the blight that is falling upon the race, and the remedies to be applied."
—DAILY NEWS.

"'Towards a Social Policy' decidedly 'gives us to think.' Its authors are doing the Liberal Party a notable service."—WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

"They (the readers) will find within its hundred and twenty odd pages much keen diagnosis of existing evils, much outspoken criticism of the slipshod palliatives with which we have hitherto been content to attempt to meet them, and many bold suggestions—some very bold indeed—as to the direction in which the real remedies are to be found. They may not agree. They cannot fail to be interested."
—MORNING LEADER.

Crown 8vo, 1s. net; post free, 1s. 2d.

LONDON: THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY, LIMITED
14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C.

THE INDEX TO VOLUME II. OF THE NATION

Is NOW READY, and can be had free on application to the Manager,

100 POINTS FOR FREE TRADE

By L. G. CHIOZZA MONEY, M.P.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

(Reprinted from "The Daily News.")

The publication of 100 POINTS for FREE TRADE day by day during the last few months in "The Daily News" has been followed with the keenest interest. These 100 Points are now issued in convenient pamphlet form (100 Pages). Free Traders all over the country have thus an opportunity of possessing in a handy form the material for an immediate answer to the fallacies of the Tariff Reformer.

100 POINTS FOR FREE TRADE

PRICE ONE PENNY.

The price of this 100-page pamphlet, which is of a handy shape for the pocket, is 1d. for a single copy or 1½d. post free. A comprehensive index to the entire subject matter makes every item of information contained readily accessible.

We have arranged for special terms to be in force for large orders as follows:—

SPECIAL TERMS FOR QUANTITIES.

(Carriage Paid.)

2 dozen and upwards	-	1d.	each.
200 and upwards	-	1d.	„	less	2½ per cent.
500 „	„ -	1d.	„	„	5 „
1,000 „	„ -	1d.	„	„	10 „

1d. 100 POINTS FOR FREE TRADE. 1d.

Applications to be made to THE MANAGER, Publications Dept., "The Daily News," Bouverie Street, Fleet Street, E.C.

CONCERNING DEBATING CIRCLES.

ALL who are interested in the formation of Debating and Reading Circles in Clubs and Social Institutes, in town and country, should send a penny stamp for a sixteen-page booklet on HOW TO FORM A DEBATING CIRCLE to PUBLIC OPINION, 31 and 32, Temple House, Tallis Street, E.C.

Each week PUBLIC OPINION gives a series of subjects for debate. It not only gives subjects, but puts the questions to be answered and furnishes a multitude of facts and opinions with which speeches can be made on all sides. No other paper gives so much valuable information on all the great topics of the day. It presents the cream of all the best thought in the best papers and magazines and books.

Every week lengthy and informing summaries of two of the most important books are given, so that in the course of a year the reader is put in possession, by direct quotation, of over one hundred books. In fact, the information contained in this paper could not be obtained in any other way without the expenditure of many pounds.

If a paper like this interests you, write for a free specimen copy to the

MANAGER OF

PUBLIC OPINION.

31 & 32, TEMPLE HOUSE, TALLIS STREET, LONDON, E.C.

It is published at twopence weekly. Post free in the United Kingdom 10s. 10d. yearly, or 13s. yearly abroad.

color and monotone are splendidly produced, and are as various as the text, and a satisfactory index and bibliography add greatly to the work's utility.

* * *

Mr. C. R. Fay's "Co-operation at Home and Abroad" (P. S. King & Son, 10s. 6d.) is a full and painstaking account of the history and present condition of the co-operative movement both in this country and on the Continent. Mr. Fay examines the four main divisions of co-operative effort—namely, co-operative banks, agricultural societies, workers' societies, and stores, the last being the only branch carried on by consumers. He thinks that the working of agricultural societies is especially worthy of attention in this country, and predicts that when they become more widespread the small farmer will enjoy much greater prosperity than he does to-day. There is an excellent account of the German co-operative banks which, beginning in a small way about the middle of last century, have now reached large dimensions. The book may be heartily commended as containing an excellent description and analysis of the present state of the co-operative movement.

* * *

A Novel Reader's Guide.—"Arthur's." By A. Neil Lyons (Lane, 6s.) "Arthur's" is a London coffee-stall, and the book contains a series of excellent sketches of the night side of London.—"The Elusive Pimpernel." By Baroness Orczy (Hutchinson, 6s.) A sequel to the same author's "Scarlet Pimpernel," dealing, like its predecessor, with the French Revolution.—"Gay Lawless." By Helen Mathers (Stanley Paul & Co.) A good sporting novel.—"The Propulsion of Domenica." By Helen Heath (Anseley, 3s. 6d.) A story of philanthropy and love in the East End of London.—"Pan and the Little Green Gate." By Silvia Brett (Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.) A collection of short stories of no striking merit, but showing some gift of imaginative fancy.—"Arnoul, the Englishman." By Francis Aveling (Methuen, 6s.) A historical novel. The scene is laid in Paris, and St. Thomas Aquinas is introduced.

The Week in the City.

The Movement of Leading Stocks.

	Price Friday Morning, Sept. 25.	Price Friday Morning, Oct. 2.
Consols 2½ per cent.	85 11/16 ...	85 11/16
German 3 per cent.	84 1/2 ...	82 1/2
Russian 5 per cent. 1906	97 3/8 ...	99
Union Pacific	161 5/8 ...	163 5/8
Canadian-Pacific...	176 1/2 ...	181 3/4

Canada the Sturdy Beggar.

Canada is rapidly achieving reputation in the City as the sturdiest beggar in the British Empire. I believe that some £25,000,000 sterling in loans has been borrowed already by Canada since the first of January in the London Money Market—say £5 per inhabitant. But the end is not yet. Several Canadian industrials have already applied to us for funds, and several more are about to apply. Several Canadian municipalities have raised loans in London this year, and several more are preparing to do so. Meanwhile, the Canadian Government itself has been getting into financial embarrassments, owing to the bounty system and the grants it is making to railways, as well as to a generally rising standard of extravagance. The increasing cost of the civil service (now being reformed) is, no doubt, partly the consequence of Protection and the rapidly rising cost of living, which promises before long to reduce very much the advantages of Canada as a field for British emigrants. However that may be, the Dominion Government, which, at the end of June, offered holders of the 4 per cent. bonds due November 1st an extension at 3¾ per cent. till May 1st, 1912, is now issuing another loan for five millions sterling, 3½ per cent. at par. This is not all new money, as over two millions will be used for the conversion or repayment of maturing bonds. All things considered, it looks as if London is lending Canada money too readily and on too easy terms. Stiffer rates would be good for both parties. Meanwhile, it may be noticed that the Grand Trunk railway has entered upon a course of economy; but the outlook of the line is by no means rosy, in spite of the wheat crop; for retrenchment in such items as maintenance or repairs generally means heavy expenditure later on. It is difficult to see, for instance, how at the present time the Trunk Preference Stocks can justify their respective prices.

Growth of Speculation.

Although no one cares to predict what may happen in the American railway market, there are many who believe that the speculative investor is again coming to the front; and they point in proof of their assertion to the recent movement in the mining market which they expect to see carried further. I am told that the West African group in particular has good prospects, and there are some believers in Mexican mines, of which, by the way, an official description has just been issued. Distinct buoyancy is also observable in Home railways—whether because prices are so low, or because the rise of a great railway trust is anticipated, one cannot say. It is difficult to see how a railway monopoly can be formed and run without the consent of Parliament, and still more difficult to see how that consent could be got. However, there seems to be no doubt that many railway trains are being knocked off by agreement between companies, and this is bound to reduce costs. But will not traffics be reduced also, and will the public stand it? The London Underground seems to be doing much better, and a good deal of enterprise is being shown in accelerating the service by means of "non-stop" trains and other devices.

Falling Revenues.

Perhaps it is not too much to say that the Revenue Returns for the last quarter are rather cheerful, considering the case of Germany and the United States. In spite of the reduction in the sugar duties, or, perhaps, because of it, the Customs have done better in the second quarter than in the first. On the face of it one must confess that, when the estimated decline for the year has been more than doubled in the first half, despondency looks justifiable. But the income-tax is an uncertain quantity, and over a million of the falling-off is caused by death duties, which may easily recover before the end of next March. The Post Office, too, ought to make some recovery, and the revival of the Stock Exchange should improve the revenue from stamps. But it seems certain that Mr. Asquith's estimates will prove to have been too sanguine, and the debt reduction will not come up to anticipations, even if Parliament refrains from granting further supplementary estimates. A Conservative City man concerned with the foreign market asked me anxiously whether it was true that the Government intended to tax foreign investments. I replied that I felt sure they would not yield so far to the Tariff Reformers, and that he might feel confident of being "saved from his friends" for another year or two. But the taxation of foreign investments is just the kind of thing that the Colonies will insist upon when the Unionists submit our tariff to them.

Lucellum.

TAKE CARE OF YOUR THROAT.
If you suffer from irritation of the Throat, Catarrh, Coughs, Colds, Bronchitis, or other Throat and Chest affections then try these wonderfully efficacious Throat Pastilles. They quickly relieve hoarseness and soreness and act as a safeguard against all Throat troubles.
MADE TO A FORMULA OF THE LIVERPOOL THROAT HOSPITAL
Can be obtained at all Chemists and Stores at 1s. and 4s. 6d. per box.
Write for Free Sample and Illustrated brochure of testimonials received, enclosing 1d. stamp to cover postage, to Sole Manufacturers—
EVANS SONS LESCHER & WEBB LTD., Hanover Street, Liverpool.
EVANS'
ANTISEPTIC THROAT
PASTILLES
Ask for "Evans" Pastilles and see that you get them
Beware of the numerous imitations.

THE LEGAL

Insurance Company Ltd.,

(WITH WHICH IS NOW MERGED THE PROFITS DEPARTMENT OF THE PROFITS AND INCOME INSURANCE COMPANY, LIMITED).

Capital, £1,000,000. Subscribed Capital, £500,000.

Trustees: The Hon. Mr. Justice Channell, The Hon. Mr. Justice Bargrave Deane, The Hon. Alfred E. Gathorne-Hardy.

Head Office: 231-232, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

FIRE: The Perfect System of Fire Insurance—Special Profit-Sharing Policy.

ACCIDENT: All Branches of Accident Insurance and General Contingency.

PROFITS: Loss of Net Profit and Standing Charges due to the interruption of Business by Fire or Boiler Explosion

HENRY M. LOW
General Manager.

Write for particulars.

THE
LEADING EGYPTIAN CIGARETTES

Try them. They are the finest imported, and can be obtained from all High-class Tobacconists, Stores, &c.

Wholesale depot—20, Cheapside, London, E.C.

"PYRENO"

(REGISTERED).

A PERFECT UNDERWEAR.

Should any Garment shrink in the wash it

WILL BE REPLACED.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST
allowed on Deposits repayable on demand.

2 per cent. INTEREST
on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.

All General Banking Business transacted.

ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.

C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

TANGYE OIL ENGINE

AUTOMATIC TUBE IGNITION.

NO LAMP
EXCEPT FOR STARTING

TANGYES LTD
BIRMINGHAM.

ONE & ALL BULBS

The Brand Guarantees One & All Quality.

ONE & ALL FLOWERING BULBS AND ROOTS

Produce a most effective display.

COLLECTIONS FOR THE OPEN GROUND,
1/-, 2/6, 4/-, 7/6, and 15/-
FOR THE CONSERVATORY OR ROOM DECORATION, 7/6 and 15/-.

ESTABLISHED 1867.

For details see Illustrated Catalogue free on application at any One and All Seed Agency, or by post from Edward Owen Greening, Managing Director Agricultural and Horticultural Association, Ltd., Wholesale Seed Warehouses, 92, Long Acre, London, W.C.

Curio Club Bargains

Private persons desirous of disposing of antiques at bargain prices will find a ready sale for same at the "London Opinion Curio Club" 107, Regent Street, London, W.

MAKERS TO H.M. THE KING.

Rowntree's

"WARMS & CHEERS"

ELECT COCOA

EDUCATIONAL.

A Resident Governess to teach History and Geography is wanted on November 1st, 1908. A graduate or equivalent is preferred. Salary according to qualifications and experience.—Application should be made immediately to the Principal, Training College, Darlington.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE, TAMWORTH.

YOUTHS TRAINED FOR HOME OR COLONIES.

Farm, 1,000 acres. Carpentry, Smith's work. Riding and Shooting taught. Prospectus.

CHANTRY MOUNT SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
BISHOP'S STORTFORD.

Head Mistress Miss ESTHER CASE, M.A., Dublin (Class. Tripos, Camb.
Second Mistress: Miss ESTERBROOK HICKS, B.SC., London.
A limited number of boarders received.

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.

BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING

Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.

Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.
Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

CO-EDUCATION BY THE SOCIETY OF FRIENDS.

Friends' School, Great Ayton in Cleveland, Yorkshire.

A Boarding School for Boys and Girls (9-16). Modern Education. Preparation for Exams. Unique health record. Ten acres Recreation Grounds, Gymnasium, Swimming Bath, Laboratories, Domestic Science School. 30 Guineas per annum. Apply to the Headmaster for Prospectus, etc.

The Abbey School, Beckenham.

FINE POSITION, SIXTEEN ACRES OF GROUNDS.
TEN MILES FROM LONDON.

Preparation for the best Public Schools. Write for List of Scholarships won last year.

TANGLEWOOD, BARNT GREEN, THE LICKEY HILLS,
Near Birmingham.

BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

On approved Modern Lines. Thorough Education with individual care and character training. Games, gardening, and open air life in lovely country, with bracing air. Good train service on main line. Escorts provided.

Principal - - MISS EBBUTT, M.A.
(Newnham College, Cambridge—Trinity College, Dublin.)

LINCOLNSHIRE COAST.

ESSENDON GIRLS' SCHOOL, SKEGNESS.

Headmistress, MISS PAGAN, M.A. Full Staff. L.R.A.M. Swedish Gymnastics. Higher Examinations. Tennis, Hockey, Swimming. Dry sunny climate. Bracing sea air. Exhibitions offered.

SOUTHPORT MODERN SCHOOL.

A First-Class School for Boys. Staff includes B.A., M.Sc., F.C.V., Mus. Bac., etc. Languages, Science, Commercial Subjects, Gymnastics, Swimming, Cadet Company. Prospectus from Secretary.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

SCHOLARSHIP EXAMINATION IN DECEMBER.
Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors.
Enquiries should be addressed to the BURSAR.

EDUCATIONAL.

CROYDON. Croham Hurst School for Girls.

House built for the purpose in healthy and beautiful situation. Limited number of girls taken. Thorough education on modern lines. Special encouragement given to reading and leisure pursuits, and to interest in current movements.
Hockey. Tennis, &c., &c. Swimming. Riding. Much outdoor life.
Principals { THEODORA E. CLARK. K. M. ELLIS.

RESIDENCE FOR WOMEN STUDENTS,
18, ENDSLEIGH STREET, W.C.
Founded and carried on by Members of Society of Friends.
Convenient for University College, Slade School, Women's Medical School, &c. Apply Principal.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager,
R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C.
Telegrams: "TRIFORM, LONDON." Telephone No. GERRARD 1854.

SCHOOLS IN ENGLAND OR ABROAD
FOR BOYS AND GIRLS.

Messrs. J. and J. PATON, having an intimate knowledge of the BEST SCHOOLS and TUTORS in this country and on the Continent, will be pleased to aid parents in their selection by sending (free of charge) prospectuses and full particulars of reliable and highly-recommended establishments. When writing please state the age of pupil, the district preferred, and give some idea of the fees to be paid.—J. and J. PATON, Educational Agents, 143, Cannon-st., London, E.C. Telephone 5,053, Central.

HIGHEST QUALITY
TURKISH TOWELS
AND SIMILAR GOODS.
SOFT AND ABSORBENT.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWEL.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH SHEET.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH MAT.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH GOWN.

THE "OSMAN" Turkish Goods enumerated here are an absolute necessity in every household. They are a luxury, but not expensive, and can be obtained at prices within reach of every one. Be sure to buy the "Osman" brand and avoid imitations.

MADE BY
BARLOW & JONES, LIMITED, MANCHESTER;
And Sold by all High-class Drapers and Upholsterers.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE DRINK THE

RED WHITE & BLUE

Delicious for Breakfast & after Dinner.

In making, use LESS QUANTITY, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

TOURS.

£6 6s. LUCERNE TOUR.

Nine days. Short Sea Route. No extras for Conductor or Gratuities.

HENRY S. LUNN, M.D.

5, Endsleigh Gardens, N.W. 25, Cannon Street, E.C.
4, Charing Cross, S.W. 84, Piccadilly, W.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout, Bathrooms on every Floor, Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard and Smoking Rooms. Heated throughout.

Fireproof Floors. Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 6/0.

Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hote, Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London." Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.

HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplace. "The English Home."

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.

THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and Subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER THE NATION, and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following booksellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—W. H. Smith & Son, Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—Gordon and Gotch.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions are received.

Scale of Charges for Advertisements.

	FULL PAGE.	½ PAGE.	¼ PAGE.
Back Page, or Page facing matter ...	£10 0 0	£5 0 0	£2 10 0
Other Pages ...	8 0 0	4 0 0	2 0 0

Hotels, Hydros, and Educational

13 Insertions ... ... 8d. per line.
52 „ ... ... 6d. „

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LONDON.

WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. Wild, C.C., Man. Direc. 30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

BLACKPOOL.

67, ALEXANDRA ROAD. Board and Residence. 5s. per day.

PROSPECT HOUSE BOARDING ESTAB., 33, Central Par., facing Sea, Central for Amusements. South Aspect. Tel. 575 Manageress.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.

IDEAL RESIDENCE.

Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.

THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye.
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate.

SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30s. week.

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.

BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport.

BRIGHTON.

THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager.

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston.

BUXTON.

ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel.

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.

THE TORS PRIVATE HOTEL (en pension). Tel. 199. Mrs. F. Sara.

DARTMOOR DOUSLAND, Nr. YELVERTON.

BARONS' PRIVATE HOTEL. Close to Moors. J. Wonnacott. Prop.

DEAL.

BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson.

EASTBOURNE.

CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Grdns. 5/- day.

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day.

EDINBURGH.

ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading Hotel.

GREAT YARMOUTH.

HILLS MARINE VIEW BOARDING HOUSE.

MELTON LODGE RESIDENTIAL MANSION. Facing sea. 10/- per day

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.

THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl.

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.

RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta course.

ILFRACOMBE.

COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea.

LANCASTER.

BOAR'S HEAD HOTEL. Wm. McIntosh.

STONEWELL RESTAURANT. T. M. Hey, Proprietor.

MARKET HALL RESTAURANT. Prop. J. E. Dowthwaite.

LEEDS.

HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station.

LIVERPOOL.

COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell.
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone: 3032 Royal, 3 wires.

LLANELLY.

CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver.

MALVERN.

HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & M'g'r.—J. Wilson.

MATLOCK.

SMEDLEY'S Hydropathic Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Mnger

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links. (18 holes).

OXFORD (near).

SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, etc. Lecture

PENTRE.

PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles.

PORTSMOUTH.

SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director.

SOUTHPORT.

KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St., Band and Illuminations. Turkish, Electric, Hydropathic. &c., Baths and Treatment.

ROWNTREE'S CAFE, Lord St., Hot Luncheons, Afternoon Teas, Tel. 647.

HOTEL CAFE CONTINENTAL, 207, Lord St., French and English Confectioners, Dinners, Teas and Suppers. Parties Catered for.

SOUTHSEA.

STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress.

SWANAGE.

"CRAIGSIDE," Board Residence. Tel.: 6. Misses Fell.

TEIGNMOUTH.

REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner.

WHITBY.

WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt.

CHATTO & WINDUS'S FIRST AUTUMN LIST.

MR. SWINBURNE'S
THE AGE OF SHAKESPEARE

Is now ready. Crown 8vo. pure rag paper, buckram, gilt top, 6s. net. Also 100 Large-Paper Numbered Copies, bound in buckram, gilt top, 21s. net.

FROM THE NORTH FORELAND TO PENZANCE:

The Ports and Harbours of the South Coast.

By CLIVE HOLLAND. Fully Illustrated after Water Colours by MAURICE RANDALL. Large fcap. 4to. cloth, gilt top, 12s. 6d. net. Also 50 Large-Paper Copies, 21s. net.

"A charming and readable colour-book. . . . Mr. Randall's delightful pictures are always happy in catching the spirit of the scene, and their atmospheric effects are well charged with ozone."—Scotsman.

IN THE ABRUZZI:

The Country and the People.

By ANNE MACDONNELL, Author of "Sons of Francis," "Touraine," &c. With 12 Illustrations after Water Colours by AMY ATKINSON, Illustrator of "Touraine," &c., and End-Paper Maps. Extra crown 8vo. cloth, 6s. net.

LEGENDARY BALLADS FROM PERCY'S "RELIQUES"

Edited, and with Introduction, Notes, and a Glossary, by F. SIDGWICK. Illustrated with 10 Full-Page Reproductions after the Water Colours by BYAM SHAW, R.I. Large fcap 4to. cloth, gilt top, 6s. net. Also 250 Numbered Copies on pure rag paper, the Plates mounted, bound in parchment, 12s. 6d. net. Uniform with "Ballads and Lyrics of Love."

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

WEEPING CROSS

By HENRY LONGAN STUART.

"A most interesting, vivid, clear, and delightful love-story. It is full of observation and knowledge of the human heart."—T.P.'s Weekly.

"Mr. Stuart has a good literary style, and his first work gives evidence of scholarship and—rare discovery in a modern novel!—deep thought."—Westminster Gazette.

SHIPS OF DESIRE

By L. S. GIBSON, Author of "The Freemasons," "Burnt Spices," &c.

"This is a very good love story . . . well above the ordinary level, and may be heartily recommended as an admirable piece of work, as interesting as it is worthy."—Daily Telegraph.

THE GALLEON OF TORBAY.

By E. E. SPEIGHT.

"'The Galleon of Torbay' is worthy of a place beside 'Westward Ho.' . . . There is a charm and distinction about Mr. Speight's narrative."—Glasgow Herald.

"It is an original, admirably written, and genuinely romantic novel."—Morning Leader.

JUNIA

By JESSIE HERBERTSON, Author of "The Stigma," "Mortal Men," &c.

FROM ISLAND TO EMPIRE

A Short History of the Expansion of England by Force of Arms.

By J. S. C. BRIDGE. With an Introduction by Admiral Sir CYPRIAN BRIDGE, G.C.B., K.C.B. With many Maps and Plans. Large crown 8vo. cloth, 6s. net. [Immediately.

OF THE IMITATION OF CHRIST

[Now ready.

By THOMAS A KEMPIS. As Translated out of the Latin by RICHARD WHYTFORD (A.D. MDLVI). Re-edited into Modern English, with an Historical Introduction by WILFRID RAYNAL, O.S.B. With Reproductions in Four Colours, and Decorations, End-Papers, &c., in Line, after Water Colours by RUSSELL FLINT. The Binding after a fine Sixteenth Century Example now in the British Museum. With 8 Plates in Four Colours. Large crown 8vo. buckram, 7s. 6d. net.

THE LITTLE FLOWERS OF ST. FRANCIS OF ASSISI

Being a New Edition, wholly Revised and in part Augmented, of the Translation by Professor T. W. ARNOLD. The Binding Design on both Editions is after the fine Original by Aldus Manutius of Venice; the Title Design has been adapted from the Italian Harley MS. of St. Bonaventura's Life of St. Francis, dated 1504. With 8 Four-Colour Illustrations and 24 in Half-Tone. Large crown 8vo. buckram, gilt tops, 7s. 6d. net. Special Edition, pure rag paper, deckle edges, 4 additional Four-Colour Illustrations and Special Coloured Frontispiece. Small 4to. whole parchment, gilt top, 15s. net; whole vellum, 20s. net; whole red morocco, £1 10s. net. [Immediately.

ASSISI OF SAINT FRANCIS

Being an Historical and Topographical History of the City of Saint Francis. With which is incorporated the Story of St. Francis and His Order. By Mrs. ROBERT GOFF. With an Essay on the Influence of the Franciscan Legend on Italian Art by J. KERR-LAWSON. Fully Illustrated in Colour and otherwise after Water Colours and Pencil Drawings by Col. R. GOFF, and with Reproductions (8 in Colours) after the Chief Paintings inspired by the Franciscan Legend; also Plans of Assisi and its Environs. Large fcap. 4to. cloth, with Map and Index, 20s. net. Also 100 Large-Paper Copies, 42s. net. [Immediately.

THE WORKS OF JANE AUSTEN

In 10 vols., each Illustrated with 10 Reproductions after Water Colours by A. WALLIS MILLS. With Bibliographical and Biographical Notes by R. BRIMLEY JOHNSON. Small crown 8vo. coloured tops, cloth, with special Binding Design and Coloured End-Papers, 3s. 6d. net per vol.

Vols. I. & II. PRIDE AND PREJUDICE. [Now Ready.
Vols. III. & IV. SENSE AND SENSIBILITY. [Now Ready.
Vol. V. NORTHANGER ABBEY. [Shortly.
Vol. VI. PERSUASION. [Shortly.

"The type is admirably clear, and the illustrations truly Georgian."—Spectator.

"It is a comely and well-printed edition, which should be a success."—Athenæum.

THE MEDICI SERIES OF COLOURED REPRODUCTIONS
AFTER THE OLD MASTERS

All Medici Prints are sold separately, subject only to the prior claim of Subscribers to the Annual Series (The Italian School). Yearly Subscription, £3, prepayable January 6th. Present rate for Series 1908. £3 3s., post free. Subscribers to the Annual Series have further privileges, for which see the Illustrated Prospectus, which will be sent post free on application.

Plate X.—TITIAN. The Madonna of the Cherries (Tempera). Colour Surface, 16 by 20 in. [Now ready. 17s. 6d. net.
Flemish Plate, II.—RUBENS. Fruitfulness. Colour Surface, 20¼ by 11⅞ in. [Now ready. 12s. 6d. net.
Flemish Plate, III.—FRANZ HALS. A Family Portrait Group. Colour Surface, 25 by 15 in. [At press. 17s. 6d. net.
The Price of this Plate will be raised to 20s. on publication.
English Plate, I.—SIR JOSHUA REYNOLDS. The Holy Family. Colour Surface, 20⅜ by 15 in. [At press. 12s. 6d. net.
The price of this Plate will be raised to 15s. on publication.
National Portrait Series I. Portrait of Milton as a Boy. By CORNELIS JANSSEN, painted in 1618. Colour Surface, 18 by 14 in.
The Price of this Plate will be raised to 12s. 6d. on publication. [At press. 10. 6d. net.

Please write for detailed illustrated Prospectus, in which will be found full particulars of suitable Frames in many styles, post free on application from CHATTO & WINDUS, Publishers to the Medici Society, Ltd., 111, St. Martin's Lane, London, W.C.

London: CHATTO & WINDUS, 111, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

"THE NATION," with which is incorporated "The Speaker," printed for the Proprietors by the NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY LIMITED, Whitefriars House, London, E.C., and Published by THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY LIMITED, at the Offices, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C. Registered at the General Post Office as a Newspaper.—SATURDAY, OCTOBER 3, 1908.

The Nation

Vol. IV., No. 2.] SATURDAY, OCTOBER 10, 1908. [Price 6d.
Postage: U.K., ½d. Abroad, 1½d.

CONTENTS.

PAGE

DIARY OF THE WEEK 37

POLITICS AND AFFAIRS:—
The Cynicism of the Powers ... 40
The Future of Turkey 41
The State and the Unemployed 42
The Church and Social Reform 43

LIFE AND LETTERS:—
The Permanence of Macaulay 44
Personalism 45
Grammaticals 46
The Oak and the Acorn ... 48

SHORT SKETCH:—
The Last Enemy. By Rev. S. Henry 49

SCIENCE:—
Popular Anthropology. By Dr. A. C. Haddon 50

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:—
Bad Harvests and Unemployment. By J. A. Hobson ... 51
President Diaz. By the Writer of the Article 52
"The Doctrine of Tolerance." By a Yorkshire Liberal ... 52
"Is Constitutional Government in Turkey Possible?" By G. F. Abbott 53
"The Prison Population." By the Writer of the Article ... 53
The Newcastle Election. By a Radical Churchman and John Evans 53
Meore's "Lalla Rookh." By H. Beveridge 54

PAGE

The Significance of Richard Strauss. By Adrian C. Boult 54
A Green Heaven. By Samuel Wilks and Edward E. Heathfield 54
Lord Crewe and Electoral Reform. By John H. Humphreys 55
The Budget. By Albert Raphael 55

POETRY:—
Nil Nisi Divinum Stabile Est. By A. R. 55

THE WORLD OF BOOKS 56
Books to be Read 56

REVIEWS:—
The Flavour of the East ... 57
A Great Preacher 58
Wren and the Renaissance 60
More Books on Gardens ... 62
The Realities of War 62

BOOKS IN BRIEF:—
Realities and Ideals 64
Seven Splendid Sinners ... 66
Some Women Loving or Luckless 66
The "Londons" of the British Fleet 66
A Mariner of England 66
The Century Shakespeare ... 68
Lessons for the Day 68
Sylvia in Society 68
A Novel Reader's Guide ... 68

THE WEEK IN THE CITY ... 68

The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

On Monday at Tirnovo, the ancient capital of the Bulgarian Tsars, Prince Ferdinand proclaimed Bulgaria's independence of Turkey and accepted from Parliament the title of Tsar of the Bulgarians. On Tuesday the Emperor Francis Joseph announced the annexation of Bosnia-Herzegovina as an Imperial domain and the grant to those provinces of a constitution under which the people would send no representatives to the Reichsrath, but elect a Diet with limited powers on the effete curial system. As a compensation to Turkey the Austrian garrison is to be withdrawn from Novi Bazar. On Wednesday Crete declared itself annexed to Greece, and Montenegro, after condemning Austria's action, announced that she held herself no longer bound by the Berlin Treaty and would insist on an equivalent. This is not the whole of the collapse of the Balkan system. Italy knew beforehand of Austria's intentions, and has been squared apparently by being given a free hand in Tripoli; Russia will ask for other concessions, in particular the opening of the Dardanelles; while Servia denounces Austria for having blighted her hopes, threatens war, and probably hankers after the reversion of Novi Bazar. On the other hand the Greek Government has communicated directly with the Porte on the question of the Cretan proclamation, disavowing all responsibility, and expressing the hope that the friendly relations between Turkey and Greece will not be disturbed. The attitude of the Young Turks has been throughout dignified and restrained, and so far they appear able to hold their own with the people. At the same time each successive blow clearly strengthens the reactionaries.

Sir Edward Grey has promptly and decisively taken up the only attitude possible to a Liberal Minister. He declines to recognise any of these infractions of the Treaty of Berlin until all its signatories, and more particularly Turkey, are prepared to condone them. Towards the suggested Congress his attitude is very wisely one of cold reserve. Austria and Germany cannot expect the rest of the world to regard them as Powers whose signature to a new Treaty would possess anything but a temporary value, and the case of Italy and Russia differs from theirs, we fear, only in degree. Moreover, there is reason to fear that a Congress would resolve itself into a highly predatory festivity, in which most of the Powers would unite to "compensate" themselves at Turkey's expense, for the wrong-doing of Austria and Bulgaria. These Powers would be allowed to keep their stolen rights on consideration of tolerating a like aggressiveness in others. Greece has a much better claim to Crete than Austria has to Bosnia, for the Cretans desire to be annexed, whereas the Bosnians are as violently anti-Austrian as they were when first they fought with such stubborn gallantry to resist the Austrian occupation. Yet the uncompensated cession of Crete at this moment would be yet another blow to the prestige of the Young Turkish movement.

* * *

Russia's main object is, we suppose, to obtain a free passage for her warships through the Dardanelles. We can have no selfish objection to that concession, for it would admit our superior naval force on the same terms to the Black Sea. But unless the Turks should themselves desire to abandon a measure designed for their protection, we can be no party to it. Italy, it is suggested, will ask for some "compensation" for her friends, the Montenegrins, in Albania, or possibly for herself in Tripoli. Amid all these interesting proposals there is no hint of any "compensation" to Turkey, the one Power which has really suffered loss. The withdrawal of the Austrian garrison from Novi-Bazar may, we fear, be only a cunning device to embroil the Turks with the Servians and the Montenegrins, who regarded the Austrian occupation with some reason as nothing but a wedge driven into the heart of their divided race. Whether the Turks themselves can suggest any form of compensation which would satisfy them we have yet to learn. The decision for or against a Congress ought in any event to lie with them. Our policy is, and ought to be, guided by one simple consideration—a determination to respect their independence, to consider their self-respect, and to forward by every means in our power the prospects of their liberal and tolerant reformation. Their trials are not at an end, nor is the enmity of the reactionary Empires exhausted. They stand in need of a friend both loyal and resourceful. There is in the world no better work for us to do.

* * *

The condition of the unemployed has given rise to several demonstrations in the course of the week, the most remarkable of which was the action of the Hunger Marchers in Trafalgar Square on Sunday. At the close of the meeting, the leader, Mr. Gray, proposed that those who were homeless and unemployed should sit down in the Square, "starving, to ask the right to work from their fellow-citizens." About a score of those present conformed to the suggestion and were carried off by the police. The distress in Lancashire continues, and, unfortunately, the cotton dispute, by which it is seriously aggravated, shows no immediate signs of coming to an end. It is, at present, developing into a somewhat acute quarrel between the card-room operatives and the spinners, the former having opposed the application of the spinners for financial aid from the General Federation of Trade Unions. The ground taken is remarkable enough. The card-room operatives are, it is said, engaged in a dispute, and are, therefore, entitled to relief. The spinners, having accepted the employers' terms, are not engaged in a dispute, they are merely suffering from the action of the card-room hands; therefore they are entitled to no relief. It will be interesting to see whether the Federation will in the end accept logic of this kind.

* * *

Mr. Balfour spoke as the exceedingly candid friend of Tariff Reform at Dumfries on Tuesday. It could do much, he maintained, for the unity of the Empire and the stability of trade. But Mr. Balfour threw a douche of the coldest water over those who are making capital out of the distresses of the unemployed. "I do not pretend," he said, "that the alternations of affluence and depression, of feverish over-production and melancholy under-production can be cured by any system of fiscal reform. Fiscal reform can improve the general conditions of trade. It cannot—nobody who desires to fix their thoughts upon it and be clear, moderate, and sober will say that it can—do away with all those oscillations." The importance of this admission is not likely to be overlooked by Free Trade advocates during the autumn. But Mr. Balfour's own economics are hardly less unsound than those of the Tariff Reformers, for, in proceeding to criticise Mr. Lloyd George, he speaks as though the income of wealthy men were a source of employment to those who provide them with the comforts and luxuries of life—as though the property would not be there if it were not concentrated in one hand. For the rest, Mr. Balfour is very triumphant over the swing of the pendulum, as revealed in the bye-elections, which he declares to be quite unexampled. But he overlooks the fact that the electoral pendulum started from an altogether abnormal height, and that with so enormous a majority it was certain the party in power must experience a larger proportion of losses than usual.

* * *

Both at Earlston last Saturday and at Kirkcaldy on Monday, Mr. Asquith strongly emphasised the attitude of the Government to social reform. At Earlston, dealing particularly with the Scottish Land Bill, he pointed to the indirect but real and permanent effect of the land system on the general problem of employment, showing that in Scotland there had been a falling-off of 43,650 in the number of people engaged in the cultivation of the soil during twenty years. Like Mr. Lloyd George, he insists that the Old Age Pensions Act is but the first step towards a comprehensive scheme for "the complete reclassification of the subjects of our so-called Poor Law." The phrase may, we imagine, be taken as indicating the principal lines of the Government programme for next year. At Leven on Wednesday he made an effective reply to Mr. Balfour's most unfortunately conceived claim for credit to the Unionist Party in the matter of Old Age Pensions. Mr. Asquith showed with ease that the achievement of the Unionist Government consisted in obtaining credit with the electors which in all their years of power they did nothing to justify.

* * *

The Church Congress was opened at Manchester on Tuesday with an inaugural address by the Bishop, on which we comment elsewhere. It proceeded to a discussion as to the limits of Biblical Criticism, a somewhat unfortunate title, as the most conservative authority who took part had to begin by admitting that in one sense there could be no limit at all. If reason is to be brought to bear upon the Bible at all, it is clearly impossible to draw a line beyond which it is not to extend its functions, though there may be the widest possible difference of opinion as to the results which criticism has established. The discussion on Socialism on Wednesday led to an animated debate, in which pure individualism found a thorough-going advocate in Mr. St. Loe Strachey, while a contribution of some originality was made by Mr. Emmott, who boldly took as a test of social legislation its effect upon the family, and argued that on this ground such "Socialistic" measures as Old Age Pensions were justified by their fruits.

* * *

The Presidential election campaign has fallen rather flat once more. Mr. Hearst has for the present contented himself with finally demolishing the reputations of the politicians he has already exposed, though he claims to have more ammunition in reserve, to be used when convenient. Mr. Taft has been stumping the North-West, and professes to be confident of victory in these States; but Mr. Bryan says the same, and both claims are taken to be purely tactical. Mr. Sherman, the Republican candidate for the vice-Presidency, has not done his cause much good by raising the North v. South issue, and Mr. Longworth, the President's son-in-law, has recalled Mr. Borchard, of "Ruin, Rome, and Rebellion" fame, by saying that Mr. Roosevelt intends to succeed Mr. Taft. The Republicans are in by no means good spirits, though their Press exaggerates the party's pessimism in order to induce Mr. Roosevelt to go on the stump. The striking reception given to Mr. Debs, the Socialist candidate, in New York and the East generally is taken as a sign of the times.

* * *

Sir Christopher Furness addressed a remarkable proposal to a conference of trade union representatives at West Hartlepool on Wednesday. Moved by a desire to put an end to the friction which is seriously injuring the shipbuilding industry of the N.E. Coast, he puts before the trade unions concerned two alternative offers. He is willing to dispose of his whole business to a combination of unions on a valuation, or, if this is declined, to institute a co-operative scheme of a somewhat complicated character. The offer of sale is probably to be understood rather as a demonstration to the workmen of their own inacpacity for the function of management, on which Sir Christopher Furness lays much stress, than for any other purpose. The co-operative scheme, however, is worked out in much detail, and includes, on the one hand, a proposal for making the workpeople shareholders in the company, and, on the other hand, for the formation of a Works Council to settle all disputes. The Works Council is to represent both employers and employed, and provision is made for a Court of Arbitration with an independent referee in cases of serious dispute. This part of the proposal seems to us the most likely to commend itself to the workpeople. It is something of a coincidence that the present scheme of profit-sharing should have been put forward within a few days of the death of Sir George Livesey, who will always be remembered for his success in carrying through a somewhat similar scheme.

* * *

The Convention to consider closer union of the South African Colonies which meets next Monday at Durban consists of delegates nominated by the Governments of the four Colonies and of Rhodesia. Among them are most of the active statesmen from both races and parties, including Messrs. Merriman and Sauer, Malan and Dr. Jameson from Cape Colony, General Botha, Messrs. Smuts, Hull, and Fitzpatrick from the Transvaal, General De Wet, Messrs. Fischer and Hertzog from the Orange River Colony, and Mr. Moore from Natal. Mr. Hofmeyer and Mr. W. P. Schreiner are about the only two men of the first prominence who do not appear. The Convention will be presided over by the Chief Justice of Cape Colony, Sir H. de Villiers, and it is probable that a draft Constitution, or the outline of a Constitution, merging the four existing Colonies in a single State, will be submitted. It is understood that, while the delegates of the three Colonies in which the Dutch are at present predominant, favor unification, the Natal delegates will resist any proposals going beyond federation. Unless, however, either on the native franchise question, or on the railroads, or the question of financial adjustment, they can detach Cape Colony from the others, it is unlikely that they can gain their way even temporarily. The fact that no division of opinion runs along racial lines, and that the Progressives at the Cape and in the Transvaal are in close accord with the views of the Governments renders it unlikely that Natal can do more than utter an ultimately futile threat to stand out of a proposed union.

* * *

The trial of Dinizulu has at last been fixed to begin at the end of this month. Mr. W. P. Schreiner is to be his counsel, having renounced his nomination as a delegate to the Durban Convention, in order to undertake the case. Though the constitution of the Special Court that has been provided has every appearance of offering a fair trial, the extraordinary procedure adopted by the Natal Government, both in the original seizure of Dinizulu last December, in the lingering and irregular examinations they have since conducted, and in the disgraceful attempt to deprive him of the financial means of defence by illegally withholding his salary as Supreme Induna, will warrant some anxiety. It will be remembered that when Colonel McKenzie arrested Dinizulu ten months ago he had the indiscretion to announce that he would never be allowed to return to Usutu, and the whole conduct of the subsequent proceedings bore out the view that the Government had fixed the punishment before trying the prisoner. Only what Mr. Moore styled "the damnable interference" of the Imperial Government prevented the consummation of this plot, if, indeed, it is prevented. We suppose that by this time Dinizulu and his counsel have been made acquainted with the nature of the charges that are brought against the Zulu chief, and that access to witnesses and documents systematically withheld during the "preliminary examination" has now been granted.

* * *

The text of the Shah's edict convoking the Megliss for November 14th has been published, and it confirms the worst that has been said of it. The assembly is to be one of "upright and pious" men and a new Constitution is to be drafted to bring it into harmony with the Sacred Law. The Constitution which the Shah swore to observe has been annulled. What Russia and England think of this move is not clear, but that it will perpetuate civil war is certain. The Nationalists of Tabriz credit Russian agents in Teheran with the responsibility for the new Constitution, and they are determined to resist. The Royalist troops after the failure of their direct attack are blockading the roads to Tabriz, and the "Times" correspondent speaks in bitter terms of the suffering and the loss which the greatest commercial city in Persia is suffering and of the danger to Europeans of a prolongation of the existing anarchy.

* * *

In an interview and letter published in the "Manchester Guardian," Mr. Bipin Chandra Pal, the Indian Nationalist who has come to England to put before the English public the Indian situation, explains the point of view of his party. The movement, he says, is not the work of a few agitators, but the agitators are themselves merely the mouthpieces of an idea which is leavening the whole people—the idea of a free Indian nation, Nothing less than absolute autonomy would content them. They desired peaceful methods only, but rigid repression, which might be effective against a handful of agitators, was condemned to futility when directed against a nation, and would inevitably provoke violence and conflict. Lord Curzon had precipitated the crisis by trying to perpetuate British supremacy instead of adopting the one wise course, of so conducting Indian administration that England and India could part as friends and allies.

* * *

Some measure of the risks which motoring has added to life may be derived from the recent Report of the Commissioner of Police for London, issued in the course of last week. From the comparative tables of accidents there given it appears that from 1891 to 1904 the number of fatal accidents, notwithstanding the growth of population, scarcely increased. In the first year mentioned there were 147 deaths, and in the last 155. In the three subsequent years the number of deaths has rapidly mounted up, till last year it reached 283. The increase is almost entirely due to tram-cars and motor-cars. Comparing 1907 with 1904, tram-cars account for an increase of 18 in the deaths, motor-'buses for an increase of 33, motor-cars for an increase of 44, motor-cycles for an increase of 4, and motor-cabs for 2. This accounts for 101 out of the 128 extra deaths, the only other important increase being due to vans. The report does not say whether the vans are horse-drawn or motor-driven, but it is remarkable that the numbers of fatal accidents from vans were also stationary from 1891 to 1904, and since that year have increased from 35 to 67. If from deaths we turn to accidents, the figures are also most remarkable. From 1897 to 1901 the numbers were stationary. From that year onwards they began slowly to rise, and in 1904 mounted to 10,384. Last year the number was 16,772. Of this vast number, electric tram-cars account for 2,119, motor-'buses for 1,108, motor-cars for 1,558, and motor-cycles for 274. Accidents from ordinary bicycles have, moreover, shown a strange increase since the motor-car became common. It must be remembered that the presence of swiftly moving vehicles in the streets makes all others more difficult to manage to the safety of the public, and that the vehicle to which the accident is attributed is not necessarily that most fully responsible. However this may be, the rapid increase in accidents from all causes during the last three years points to a serious neglect of duty on the part of the responsible auhorities in the regulation of the traffic.

Politics and Affairs.

THE CYNICISM OF THE POWERS.

Since General Ignatieff deliberately set himself to destroy the Turkey of 1876, which Midhat Pasha had begun to reform, there has been no more cynical appeal to the right of the stranger than Austria has made this week. We are far from desiring to spare the Bulgarians, who have played an incendiary and disloyal part in this intrigue, but we can hardly affect to regard them as principals. The real responsibility for all that has happened lies with Austria, and with the Powers whose complicity she has purchased. Very soon after the fall of the Hamidian régime, Austrian statesmen must have begun to consider what obstacles they could place in the way of a Turkish renaissance, and how best they could draw profit for themselves from the momentary disorganisation which every revolution causes. Austria has no reason to-day to fear a Valmy; national armies cannot be improvised under modern conditions, and Vienna can for the moment afford to pursue its traditional policy with apparent impunity. To Austria and Bulgaria alike, two considerations appeared to be decisive. The Turks could not afford to defend their rights, and, had they attempted to do so, a war must have destroyed the hope of internal reform, re-opened the Macedonian question, and prepared the way for an immediate division of the spoils. These motives have been admitted with cynical effrontery by the Austrian Ambassador in Paris, who reminded an interviewer in the "Gaulois," that the Power on whose rights his Government has trampled, "was hardly likely at the present moment of the Turkish renaissance to indulge in warlike preparations. . . . Furthermore, where was Turkey to get the money to make war?" Turkey, in short, is defenceless, and it is precisely her impulse to reform which has exposed her to the predatory instincts of Europe. It is true that she has been, in fact, no better able to defend herself for some years past. But so long as a corrupt clique ruled at the Palace, it suited Austrian and German policy much better to weaken her peacefully by opposing reform. They paid themselves in railway concessions for her weakness. To-day their influence at Yildiz is a thing of the past, and open hostility has become the more profitable policy. The intrigue has been managed with a mixture of cynicism and hypocrisy, which has failed to deceive the public opinion of Europe. A fortnight ago the first military measures were taken in Bosnia and Novi-Bazar to prepare for the coming coup de main. Simultaneously the partnership between Bulgaria and Austria was announced at Budapest, and the Bulgarians were allowed to use a railway, which happened to belong to an Austrian company, as the material for their first essays in provocation. It was then arranged that Prince Ferdinand, yielding, of course, to that impatient Bulgarian opinion which turns out, after the fact, to be far from unanimous, should proclaim the independence of his principality on Monday. On Tuesday, because King Ferdinand—himself an Austrian Princeling—had forced her hands, Austria felt herself bound to complete the rent in the Treaty of Berlin, by annexing Bosnia and Herzegovina. Meanwhile, M. Isvolsky had been in personal conclave with Baron von Aerenthal and Signor Tittoni. It is admitted that the eventuality of annexation was discussed between them, though it is said that M. Isvolsky was not informed of its date. However that may be, the Russian contribution to the intrigue fitted accurately into the time-table. Her part was to draft a circular note to the Powers, inviting them to a European Conference. This step was officially announced on Tuesday, and the note itself was despatched on Thursday. The rôle of Germany appears to have been passive, but at least she had approved in advance of her ally's intentions. The Italian official Press, so far from manifesting alarm or surprise at the aggrandisement of Austria, declares that Italian diplomacy was not taken by surprise, and looks forward with calm to the steps which will certainly be taken to protect "the particular interests" of Italy. Russia alone is anxious to deny her complicity in this intrigue. But it is improbable that Bulgaria, whose Ministry happens to be, for the first time since the early months of 1903, avowedly Russophil, can have acted without obtaining her assent. It is equally unlikely that M. Isvolsky could have taken so rapid a decision to summon a European Conference had he really been in complete ignorance of the dates in the Austrian time-table. At every stage of this intrigue both Austrian and Bulgarian statesmen have made free with the truth. Russian diplomatists are not usually more scrupulous. The Austrians, we suspect, deviated into truth, when they announced that they had secured the assent of Italy and Russia in advance.

It seems almost an irrelevance to pass a moral judgment upon proceedings which presuppose a frank repudiation of all international morality. Bulgaria may plead in excuse that she was not a signatory to the Treaty of Berlin, and that she has never affected to be anything but a young and adventurous State, carving out her fortunes by self-reliance and a faith in her own right arm. Her worst crime is one of ingratitude, and of treachery to the progressive ideals which she professes at home. She has waited to insult and provoke the Turks until they had become a liberal and tolerant people. She has chosen for her aggression the moment when they had ended the secular oppression of her kinsmen in Macedonia, conjured away the spell of race-hatred, brought about a fraternisation of creeds and peoples, and admitted her "little brothers" over the mountains to complete equality and full political rights. She has so timed and managed her act of self-assertion as to inflict the maximum of injury upon the Young Turkish movement, and to cause the maximum of prejudice to the chances of a racial peace in Macedonia. She knew that her act might lead to war, and at the least she was consciously giving the signal for the spoliation of a Liberal Turkey. Indeed, to those who know the realistic and calculating temperament of the Bulgarians, it seems unlikely that they would have risked so much merely for the pleasure of calling their unpopular Prince a Tsar. Their status as an independent nation had been practically settled by their admission on equal terms to the Second Hague Conference. Moreover, the Young Turks were quite prepared and even anxious to concede independence on a basis of friendship and alliance. The Bulgarians would not have chosen to snatch violently and prematurely at an empty dignity, unless they had desired to damage the Young Turks, and, perhaps, to provoke complications that might lead to their aggrandisement in Macedonia. In the case of Austria this disloyalty of motive was aggravated by a past of almost offensive correctitude. Austria was the respectable and aristocratic Conservative of Europe, beside whom Russia was merely a noisy reactionary. She had invariably pleaded her almost superstitious respect for the status quo, when any question arose of furthering reform or checking outrage in Turkey. She was the unwearying advocate of the Sultan's sovereign rights, so long as Abdul Hamid governed as well as reigned. She has broken a treaty, but that is an almost venial offence in comparison with the deliberate treason to humanity involved in her plot to ruin the Turkish renaissance. It is necessary also in judging her conduct to remember that in 1878, when her occupation of Bosnia was sanctioned, she gave a written pledge that the "sovereign rights" of Turkey should not thereby suffer, and that her occupation should be considered strictly "provisional." As long as Macedonia groaned under an unspeakable tyranny she could allow no far-reaching reforms out of respect for the sacro-sanct integrity of the Turkish Empire, as guaranteed by the Treaty of Berlin. No sooner has Turkey reformed herself, put an end to tyranny and disorder, and shown signs of reviving strength and a new career, than Austria discovers that Turkish integrity is a meaningless and antiquated name, tears up the Berlin Treaty, ignores her own separate and solemn agreement, and enters as sovereign on the possession of two Turkish provinces.

THE FUTURE OF TURKEY.

THE history of last week in the Balkan Peninsular may appeal to those who doubt the possibility of human progress, but to no one else. It would seem as though the fates—which is, after all, but a brief name for the endless complication of human affairs—would neither allow Turkey to be reformed from outside nor from within. In the unrestrained egoism of nations no consideration of humanity, no thought of forbearance is allowed. Be the stakes what they may, the salvation of whole races from long years of suffering on one side, and the pettiest diplomatic advantage or political vanity on the other, it is all one with self-seeking of this kind. Enough for Austria and Bulgaria that they saw their chance. How their action might affect Turkey and Europe was not a question about which they were going to trouble themselves.

The question for Europe is, to what lengths this disregard may be pushed. On this subject the Prime Minister and Sir Edward Grey have spoken, and it is satisfactory to feel that they have behind them a united nation. They have laid down the general principles of our policy with perfect clearness. We are not prepared to recognise a one-sided violation of an international Treaty. It is not sufficient for us that Austria should announce that she has broken her word. Before we recognise the new distribution of sovereignty that she has effected, we wish to know what is thought by the Powers whose mandatory she was, and by Turkey, with whom she entered into the most definite and binding engagement not to use her mandate for purposes of permanent territorial acquisition. It is not sufficient for Bulgaria to announce that she has thrown off the status conferred on her by others, nor for Crete to declare that she is a part of Greece. Both these countries owe their existing freedom to other nations, and have no right on their own account to throw over the engagements into which they entered. Treaties have been violated ere this, but the debauch of treaty-breaking which the past week has seen is unique, and if it passes unreproved will put an end to all confidence in international undertakings. If the combined attack on Turkey were justifiable in itself, it would still be necessary to oppose the manner in which it has been carried out.

It is true, of course, that the actual change made in the condition of the Turkish provinces which have been declared separated is nominal rather than real. This fact, while depriving the hasty action of Austria and Bulgaria of any plea of urgency, also renders the trouble more capable of ultimate adjustment. The immediate problem is to tide over the crisis without such an explosion of feeling in Turkey as will either destroy the existing Government or drive it into a desperate and fruitless war. Can this corner be passed, it should not be impossible for the statesmanship of Europe to maintain peace, and secure the readjustment of relations not by high-handed action but by mutual agreement. At both stages this country has an important function. Her moral support is doing more than anything to maintain the confidence of the Turkish people in their Government, and if war or revolution is to be averted it can only be by the maintenance of this attitude of mind—a feat, under the recent experience of the nation, of extraordinary difficulty. At the next stage we shall have to set ourselves to consider by what means a fair bargain is to be struck. We do not stand alone. We can count on the disinterested support of France, and we know that it is not to the interest of Russia that the conflagration should break out. Unfortunately, when people begin to speak of bargain in this matter, and in particular when Great Powers speak of "compensation," they do not mean compensation to Turkey. They are not thinking of a quid pro quo which they might give the Turks to set against the loss of their suzerainty in province after province. They are thinking of compensation to themselves for gains which others who have stolen a march on them have secured at Turkey's expense. They are not thinking of Turkey as a bargainer, but as prey to be bargained about. Like the rest they look on the crisis as an occasion out of which they are to suck some small advantage to equal if possible the advantage already sucked by others. Against all compensations of such a kind this country will steadily set her face. Her aim will be to postpone the crisis as ten years ago she postponed it in the Far East. There she succeeded in delaying a break up till the time came when the Far East became able to take care of itself. Her policy in Turkey will be the same and animated by the same hope. We shall set ourselves to the task of maintaining the independence and upholding the status of Turkey while her Government remains free and humane. If, indeed, there is to be any question of "compensation" for what has been done, since it cannot take the form of territorial expansion, it is natural to consider whether in point of status something cannot be done not merely to maintain but to improve the existing position. Had Austria and Bulgaria shown statesmanship and patience it would have been a fair proposal to make that a cession of territory should have formed part of a general arrangement in which the new status of Turkey as a free country should have been recognised by the cancelling of the Capitulations. Any such arrangement must now be far more difficult. The position of foreigners in an Oriental Empire is not one with which it is possible to deal precipitately. Yet if we are to speak of any compensation which would be felt as adequate by the Turks it is hard to see in what other direction we are to look.

THE STATE AND THE UNEMPLOYED.

THERE exists no need to prove the want of foresight in the direction of human affairs. If such need were, the dealings of the State with unemployment would be a leading case in point. Experience, extending over a century, has shown us beyond doubt that trade is subject to alternate movements of expansion and contraction; that at its best there is always a fringe of casual labor half unfit, half unwilling to work; that as it descends into the trough the number is swollen, first by the less efficient among regular workers, and then by increasing numbers of those who in ordinary times are quite sure of a job, and are selected by fortune to suffer merely because they have been unlucky in the employer whom they serve or in the circumstances of the mill or workshop where they are engaged. Thus to the unemployable are added in increasing numbers the respectable bonâ-fide unemployed. As weeks and months pass, and these men are reduced to begging their bread or to cadging about for odd jobs of work, as they go hungry from day to day and lose the habit of regular industry, they sink a point or two in the social scale, and the unemployed recruit the ranks of the unemployable. The evil perpetuates itself. But meanwhile in the trough of the depression an outcry has been raised—an outcry which grows louder, and is heard further with each fresh quickening of the social conscience. Meetings are held, angry protests are heard; here and there comes a dramatic demonstration, perhaps an abortive riot. Funds are started, and on all sides there is a cry that something should be done. Statesmen and thinkers protest that what is done should not be done in a hurry; we should not yield to emotion; we must be careful that in relieving one kind of unemployment we do not cause another. While the discussion goes on the trough of the wave is past, and trade begins to mend. With the first sign of returning prosperity we cheerfully banish the troublesome question. Trade is good once more, let the bad times take thought for themselves.

Yet if ever the problem is to be handled in the detached spirit of pure reasonableness which is recommended to us, surely it can only be by laying down the lines of action when times are easy. During the years of almost unexampled prosperity which followed on the accession of the present Government to power there were still here and there men and women unemployed. There was, moreover, the certainty—as great as a long experience could make it—that the good times would not last. Then was the time for statesmen to prepare deliberately, without hurry, without emotional bias, for the rainy day. Then was the time to consider some comprehensive scheme of public works, and some scientific method of classification distinguishing the unemployed from the unemployable, and of finding for both classes suitable treatment. Then, in short, was the time to set up the skeleton outline of a scheme which, as soon as the evil days came, might be filled in. Statesmanship, in its wisdom, has refused to make any such provision for the future, and we have now the full—long foreseen—crisis of unemployment upon us, to deal with in the best way we can improvise. Dealt with it has to be. If the eloquent pleas for social reform that we have heard from Mr. Asquith and Mr. Lloyd George in the past few days mean anything, they must be taken as binding the Government to some attempt at an alleviation of the trouble, which presses most acutely of all on the working classes. We cannot, under the conditions, deal with the problem in the slow, patient, scientific way for which it calls. For this the neglect of past years is responsible. But one or two guiding considerations may be set down as marking out the lines within which action may be taken.

First, there can be no doubt as to the reality and urgency of the evil. To dismiss the whole mass of unemployed as worthless idlers is impossible in the face of the figures. The "Labor Gazette" returns show us that in a year there has been in round figures an increase of trade unionists unemployed from 3 to 8 per cent. in those unions which make returns. There is not the smallest reason to charge the 5 per cent., who make the difference, with incompetence, laziness, or any other bad quality. They are victims, purely and simply, of a decline in trade which is provable in many other ways at the same time. Secondly, those responsible have hitherto failed to cope adequately with the problem. A few sentences will prove this point. The twelve months ending on March 31st last were, on the whole, months of good trade. During that period 90,057 applications were made to Distress Committees for work. Of these, 54,613 only were entertained, the rest being weeded out in various ways; and of those entertained, again, only 37,092 were provided with work. This is less than a half of those who applied, and it represents the total number of those who obtained any work at all. But in many cases we are told that the average number of days' work provided was only seven or eight. In others it amounted to some weeks. Often it consisted in periodic employment of three days at a time, alternating with idleness—a most unsatisfactory scheme. These figures show that even in a good time the Distress Committees have only touched the fringe of the trouble.

How, then, is their usefulness to be extended? We have to deal as best we can with an immediate problem. There can be no question of awaiting the report of the Poor Law Commission. That Commission may, or may not, suggest useful ideas for a permanent solution. But we have to handle the need of the moment, and for this purpose we shall do best to avoid contentious legislation, and expand and develop the existing law. The manifesto of the "Right to Work Council" raises a most contentious point when it demands that the Act should be made compulsory on local bodies. If compulsion is thrust forward, the autumn will be spent, not in work, but in controversy. The manifesto is on stronger ground when it calls for the general opening of the Unemployed Registers. Wherever this has not been done, it should be done, and it should be the immediate business of the Local Government Board to see that it is done. The first steps needed, in fact, are rather administrative than legislative. The Local Government Board should take the initiative, not waiting for the action of the local bodies, but explaining to them by circular their powers and duties and its means of helping them. It is to the interest of every locality to prevent the unemployed from settling down as a permanent burden upon the rates, and in most cases the authorities probably need nothing but stimulus and guidance to help them to put the Act to its full use. But it is absurd to suppose that the little sum of £200,000 voted by Parliament—a large proportion of which is already mortgaged—will suffice for the assistance of local works if they are to be pushed forward on anything near the scale required. Parliament should give authority for further expenditure. The municipalities should be assured of support in carrying out works of public utility, and the appeals to private charity should be dispensed with. Changes in the law will in the end be necessary, but what is needed for the moment is a new spirit in administration, particularly at the centre. These are palliatives only, but it is to the devising of palliatives and the gradual groping through hard experience towards better methods that lack of foresight and of statesmanship has condemned us. No mere mistake in execution is to be named alongside of the moral blunder of passing by on the other side while men sink day by day into despair and degradation because that great machine which grinds us out comfort and luxury has flung them on the waste-heap, where brain and heart and muscle rot slowly from disuse.

THE CHURCH AND SOCIAL REFORM.

The Bishop of Manchester raised some interesting questions in his President's address to the Church Congress on Tuesday. The Pan-Anglican Conference had thrown this lesser demonstration into the shade, but circumstances have combined to give it an interest and a distinction of its own. The Bishop seized his opportunity. Speaking in the capital of a diocese of smoke, where every horizon is darkened by the mill chimney, and where a special anxiety throws its shadow at this moment over the factory and the home, a diocese, too, created in the year that the Corn Law was repealed and the Ten Hours Bill became law, the Bishop saw that time and place alike demanded that the Congress should postpone the esoteric preoccupations of the Church to the larger issues that confront the Church as part of the nation. His own chief contribution to the discussion was an appeal for a new religious revival which might do for our times what the eighteenth century revival did for the development and emancipation of the England that struggled slowly out of the barbarities of the early days of the Industrial Revolution. It is an interesting and significant precedent. The Bishop, it will be noted, talks not of the social services of the Church, but of the social services of the Evangelical Revival. Nobody would contend that the Church did anything through its leaders to aid the social and political reforms of the period, which the Bishop thinks were closely connected with the religious revival. The speeches and the votes of the Bishops are on record. No humane cause is in their debt. Further, the movement to which the Bishop refers was a revival that was scarcely distinguishable from a revolt, and the Bishops were, perhaps, the last people to be touched by its influences.

Whether the movement effected all that the Bishop claims for it is, we think, open to question. That it effected a great deal nobody will doubt: the work of John Howard in prison reform is a conspicuous example. It is true, again, that some of our earliest factory legislation had a religious motive. This is seen in the first Factory Act of all, which provides that apprentices shall be confirmed and sent to church. It is seen also in the character of Lord Shaftesbury, who felt not one whit less strongly about the truth of the Mosaic creation than he did about the miseries of the factory children. Michael Thomas Sadler, one of the bravest and earliest of social reformers, plunged as a boy into the Methodist movement. It is a sad illustration of the strange manner in which good and bad causes get intertwined that Sadler was helped into Parliament by the Duke of Newcastle to resist Catholic Emancipation. The religious movement, speaking roughly, had two great influences. It taught the rich a philanthropy which combined with restrictions on the pleasures of the poor a real spirit of pity for their misery. But its other influence we think was certainly inimical to political reform. It braced up a religious and moral temper which was hostile to all revolutionary ideas. The religious party in the House of Commons rarely gave a vote—we will not say for political freedom, but against political oppression—and there was some point in Romilly's retort on Wilberforce when Wilberforce voted for suspending the Habeas Corpus in 1817—"The honorable and religious member could hardly vote for any measure more thoroughly opposed to vital Christianity." The religious revival made the governing classes more pitiful, but it did not make them more ready to yield political power. And on the governed its effect was in some ways a bad one. Wesley boasted that the world had to admit that the Methodists could die well. It may be doubted whether a mission that taught crushed and wronged men and women to think so passionately of the next world left them much energy to think passionately enough about this one. The pressure which ultimately broke down the resistance of the governing classes came from a propaganda of a very different kind. When we make the fullest allowance for the actual achievements of the revival and its atmosphere of social pity, we have to remember how many of the greatest of the emancipating forces of the time were outside and hostile.

We are not attempting, however, to discuss this large question in a short article. We are rather interested in the Bishop's precedent on other grounds. For one characteristic of the Evangelical Revival was that, whatever its mistakes and weaknesses, it never made the political interests of the Established Church its main care. It merged and enveloped all those self-regarding instincts which the Bishops of the day followed in the House of Lords, in a larger enthusiasm and a wider compassion. It is not easy for an Established Church to do this, particularly when that Established Church is so closely allied by its history and traditions with the privileges of a class supremacy. But there are many indications that this kind of spirit is beginning to penetrate the Anglican Church. The agitation over the Licensing Bill is only one conspicuous example. Certainly no less comprehensive and magnanimous a public spirit can hope to contribute anything to the settlement of those questions on which the Bishop of Manchester very rightly fixed the attention of the Congress. For our part we welcome these discussions, not so much for any promise they give of actual remedies, but because they tend to develop the range of what Mr. Wells calls the people of goodwill. If Bishops begin to talk of Socialism with the sympathy which found expression at Manchester, it will be less easy to beat up that terrified and ignorant resistance to all forms of social reconstruction on which the friends of the uttermost rights of property rely. It is too late in the day to dismiss anything and everything that is called Socialism as a kind of Jacobin outrage on all the sacred and intimate instincts of the race.

Life and Letters.

THE PERMANENCE OF MACAULAY.

It is no doubt due partly to the singular charm of the book in which Macaulay's life is described and revealed that that life still commands so wide a sympathy and interest. Sir George Trevelyan's "Life and Letters," now reappearing in a new edition, which includes many of the marginal notes Macaulay made from time to time in volumes he was reading, is by general consent one of the best biographies in the English language. But the popularity shed not only over Macaulay's writings but also over his career, though that career was not distinguished by any of the successes that dazzle in politics, is not to be explained away as the splendid creation of his nephew's pious talent. There is something in Macaulay's qualities and character that appeals with a constant spell to one generation of his countrymen after another. "Qui sic historiam scribebat ut vera fictis libentius legerentur." The writer of the epitaph in Trinity College, Cambridge, in telling the secret of a just popularity, summed up the achievement of Macaulay the historian. It would be difficult to name any better title to the gratitude of posterity. Every schoolboy (not, of course, that strange abstraction, Macaulay's schoolboy, but the real Philistine schoolboy who recoils from learning) starts in life profoundly indebted to the writer who made history interesting and alive. It is easy to find fault with Macaulay's style, to catch him out in extravagant judgments, to complain that his verdicts are sometimes wanting in subtlety, his analyses wanting in finesse, his language rhetorical and flamboyant, but nobody can dispute the fascination of his treatment, the power of his eloquence, his illuminating sweep of vision. He regarded history, to borrow the phrases of a modern controversy, as an art, and not only as a science. He did not conceive of the historian as a man whose sole function was the collection in cold blood of the facts of a buried life, or a buried century. He thought it was his function to array those facts in the rich and generous setting of literature. History, in his hands, was not a mere sequence of events or procession of persons, but an agitated and various landscape, in which the spectator could see the play of vile or heroic passions, the storms of crime and folly, earthquake and revolution and catastrophe, and high above them all the sign of the rainbow in the sky.

Now, Macaulay's historical genius was part of his character, and it was a character that Englishmen like. His method of writing came all the easier to him from his natural disposition to form very definite conclusions. These conclusions, if sometimes they looked hasty and impatient, were, it must be remembered, the result of laborious and exacting enquiry. We know from Sir George Trevelyan's Life that Macaulay was as scrupulous and conscientious in his search for truth as the most tormented of those anxious minds who hover over every adjective and argument. And if this assurance made it easier for Macaulay to write, it has made it easier for the world to read him. Lord Melbourne said that he wished to God he was as certain of anything as Tom Macaulay was of everything. The epigram has not the air of a compliment. Yet it is safe to say that humanity is grateful to Macaulay for his certainty. The mind of the average man, after tossing uncomfortably in the doubts and perplexities of undecided historians, finds a happy anchorage in his secure and confident eloquence. Moreover, if his praise and blame are not too delicately shaded, there is, for that very reason, nothing at all insidious in Macaulay's manly and candid partialities. The historian who is really a danger to the interests of truth and justice is the clever tactician who surprises his readers into a wrong or unfair opinion, after conducting them through a maze of judicial-looking arguments. Macaulay's pages are singularly free from this treacherous atmosphere. There are no ambushes or traps lurking in them. There is no affectation of neutrality or indifference, no dissimulation of passion and prejudice. Macaulay draws in bold outline the figures and the scenes and the lessons of history as he sees and reads them. He does not pretend to be judging from some impersonal or Olympian point of view. He does not steal the independence of other minds by masking the sympathies of his own. With all his magic of style he is pre-eminently simple and transparent. And those who accuse him of using his art to bewitch his readers have to explain how it is that, though he remains the most popular of historians, his hero, William the Third, remains the least popular of men.

Macaulay had the limitations of the Whig character, if he had in a special degree its best attributes. Posterity has liked him on both accounts. His faith in the essential structure of English society, in its capital institutions, is almost complacent in its optimism and composure. He had no sympathy with the passionate discontents that made the rebels of his day. He refused to attend the celebration in Edinburgh of the memory of the Radicals whom Pitt and Dundas sent to die in penal settlements; in his speech on the People's Charter he declared that universal suffrage was incompatible with civilisation; his speech in defence of national education, if it denounced those who thought that the only duties of a Council were those of a hangman, is yet steeped in the sympathies and prepossessions of a humane oligarchy. "It is the duty of Government to protect our persons and property from danger. The gross ignorance of the common people is a principal cause of danger to our persons and property. Therefore it is the duty of the Government to take care that the common people shall not be grossly ignorant."

Macaulay's profound respect for the arrangements of English society, for its distribution of power, for its hegemonies and traditions, his shrinking from the type of man who is regarded as violent and futile, if to some critics it implies an imperfect penetration into the depths of social life, is to most Englishmen a ready introduction to their sympathy and hearing. "England is so great," he wrote in a sentence which rings with a very genuine English feeling, "that an Englishman cares little what others think of her, or how they talk of her." The man who wrote that is too much of a John Bull to be a puzzle to his countrymen. They can understand him; there is nothing that wounds or shocks in his point of view; much that reconciles and reassures. And Macaulay blended this temper with that quality of generous and tolerant common sense which is often unattractive to a man's own generation, but rarely fails to impress the generations that come after. His robust admiration for the English liberty the Whigs had made was combined with an equally robust resistance to the crimes and follies of those who governed England by the power of its narrowest and meanest prejudices. One of his finest speeches contrasts the ingenuity and skill of the inventive mind which was giving England her great industries with the crude, brutal system of law and punishment which was administered by an unenlightened Government. "Surely we see the barbarism of the thirteenth century and the highest civilisation of the nineteenth century side by side; and we see that the barbarism belongs to the Government and the civilisation to the people." Macaulay was too much the master of his own mind ever to become a mere party man or a mere formalist. What could be better than his retort on those who thought that the Ten Hours Bill would reduce the wealth of England, and end by making the poor still more wretched? "Never will I believe that what makes a population stronger and healthier and wiser and better can ultimately make it poorer. You try to frighten us by telling us that in some German factories the young work seventeen hours in the twenty-four, that they work so hard that among thousands there is not one who grows to such a stature that he can be admitted into the army; and you ask whether, if we pass this Bill, we can possibly hold our own against competition such as this? Sir, I laugh at the thought of such competition. If ever we are forced to yield the foremost place among commercial nations, we shall yield it not to a race of degenerate dwarfs, but to some people pre-eminently vigorous both in body and in mind."

Macaulay's power has been, of course, much more considerable as a beneficent influence on thought than as an actual legislator—and this in spite of the fact that he was the author of the Indian Penal Code. There is one contribution that he made to the structure of our public life which is sometimes forgotten. The Civil Service used to be the patronage of political parties, and though the most flagrant abuses of the system had been corrected and the beginnings of competition introduced between 1834 and 1841, it was not until 1853 that the foundations of the present system were really laid. In that year two things happened. Macaulay presided over the commission which reported on the selection and training of candidates for the Civil Service of India, and Sir Stafford Northcote and Sir Charles Trevelyan were appointed by Mr. Gladstone to inquire into the condition of the Civil Service in England. Mr. Gladstone himself put the finishing touch to the reforms which were gradually made in the English system by the famous Order in Council of June, 1870, which finally established the principle of open competition. But if we look into the special features of our system of filling the higher branches of the Civil Service, the two names that stand out most distinctly are those of Lord Macaulay and Sir Charles Trevelyan, the latter of whom figures, as everybody knows, in Trollope's satirical novel, "The Three Clerks." Macaulay's report on the Indian Civil Service is chiefly important for our purposes because it laid down the principle on which examinations have been conducted for Civil Service appointments ever since. That principle is that the subjects for examination should be those which a man studies as part of a liberal education and not those which have a direct bearing on the employment he hopes to obtain. This principle Macaulay adopted on two grounds, the first that such an examination was the best test of a candidate's ability and culture, the second that the alternative method would demoralise education and oblige a great many young men (that is to say, all the unsuccessful candidates) to study subjects which would be useless to them in after life. Mr. Lawrence Lowell mentions in his book on "The Government of England" that the system Macaulay rejected was tried in Holland for admission to the Colonial Service in Java, and that it was abandoned because it led to the very results Macaulay had predicted. He also points out that examinations for the English Civil Service have tended more and more to be arranged on Macaulay's ideas, in contrast with the American system, which tries to test a candidate's immediate fitness for a particular appointment. Of course, any system of competitive examination has its own vices and dangers, and it can only be accepted as a choice of evils. But it is not fair to blame the ideas of Macaulay and Trevelyan for the consequences of our mistakes in other directions, and, if the results of the system they introduced are sometimes disappointing to democrats, it must be remembered that a liberal education is still in most cases in England the luxury of the comfortable classes.

PERSONALISM.

It would very much surprise the Londoner if some popular journal, to which causes and ideas are anathema, and the Absolute a term of sheer vacuity, whose interest is entirely devoted to startling deeds and sufferings, were to be described as an adherent of the personalist philosophy. In a sense, indeed, personalism is the living creed of all of us. Nature as subject-matter for Art or Science, the pursuit of knowledge for its own sake, the study of laws and systems, soon begin to pall; art becomes artifice, literature linguistics, religion theology, as soon as the human note of personality is lost. How naturally do all of us turn to "personalities" as a welcome relief to our most dignified and valued occupations!

Since the entire weight of human interest is thus thrown persistently on the side of personality, the production of elaborate treatises of philosophy and politics in the defence of Personalism might appear superfluous. Yet there are whole schools of thinkers who see everywhere in modern thought and policy insidious attacks upon the fortress of personality. In biology they detect an endeavor to substitute the progress of the species for that of the individual, and to regard the latter as a mere passing incident, a bubble upon the life-stream of the race. Psychology is seen undermining the unity of the self with its doctrines of divided and attenuating personalities, while sociology suggests a federation or a fusion of selves in some larger conscious aggregate, a social organism, which may assert some directing or limiting influence upon individual personality. Nor must we leave out of account the widespread rejection of the dogma of personal immortality that has accompanied the weakening of the hold of the orthodox religions. To some, moreover, it appears as of the wave of oriental influence let loose upon our civilisation by the new awakening of Asia might subtly undermine the keener valuation of separate selfhood which has hitherto marked off the occidental character.

Though we may well doubt whether all these movements in the world of ideas affect in any considerable degree our conduct or our estimates of life, this is evidently not the view of Dr. Boune, a well-known American philosopher and theologian, who appears to champion the cause of "Personalism" (Constable), and deals vigorous blows alike upon Naturalist and Absolutist. The former degrades and virtually destroys personality by making a man a mere part of Nature and cancelling all "free will," while the latter empties out all positive contents of personality alike for man and for the Universe. Dr. Boune makes a vigorous rally for the view of a hierarchy of personalities as the only possible approach to a coherent explanation of the Universe. To each of us his own personality is the most real of all things and the medium through which all other reality is got. In our actual experience of that personality the apparently insoluble problems of uniting subject and object, past and present, change and ideality, are in fact solved. If then we wish to get order into our conception of life and the world we must construct it in terms of personality. We must recognise in man a hard kernel of indissoluble will, endowed with freedom or power of separate self-determination, in society an ordered relation of such persons, and in the Absolute a supreme Personality. In the substance of this doctrine there is, of course, nothing new, but Dr. Boune's use of the modern idealistic metaphysics for the reassertion and reinforcement of the old theology is a noteworthy feat of dialectics. It is, perhaps, something more. For only in our direct personal experience do we feel the actual current of that energy which we impute to all Nature, animate and inanimate, as the efficient causes of the changes we see; hence it is almost inevitable that not merely in our poetry and our religion, but in our philosophy and even our science we should envisage that energy in terms of personality.

But the danger of the personalist doctrine is its tendency to confine and overcentralise its conception, to lead to a hard-shell spiritual individualism. Indeed, we foresee considerable popularity for Personalism upon its political and practical side, and it is very significant that along with Dr. Boune's philosophic treatise should appear a little volume, "The Foundations of Liberty," by Mr. E. F. B. Fell (Methuen), in which the very term is applied to a defence of individual rights against the encroachments of Society and the State. The general trend of modern political theory and practice has been towards a repudiation of the older radical conception of "natural rights," and in favor of a conception of the political and civil rights of citizens as bestowed by society, and dependent entirely upon social sanctions. This translation of the doctrine "Salus reipublicae suprema lex" into a complete subordination of the individual to the public good, as interpreted by any existing Government upon "utilitarian" considerations, is evidently capable of grave abuse. Mr. Fell protests alike against the unlimited power given to the State and the utilitarian standard it would apply. Though he does not fall back into the sheer anarchism which is the logical outcome of the teaching to which Mr. Auberon Herbert gives final expression in his Herbert Spencer Lecture, "The Voluntarist Creed" (Frowde), he insists upon confining the State to rigorous limits and subordinating its activities entirely to the provision of opportunities for individual self-realisation along lines of development laid down by considerations of man's place not in society, but in the Universe. A society is conceived, not in the Greek spirit of a πόλις, nor in the modern philosophic sense as a spiritual organism, a system of co-operating wills seeking a common good in which the individuals find their good, but simply as a convenient instrument by which individuals help themselves and one another to gain individual perfection. This repudiation of the organic conception of society, with its reassertion of personal rights which are absolute as against the State, is a doctrine which carries very important and to our mind embarrassing implications. To hold that individuals have "rights" in defence of which they may even defy an oppressive or malignant Government, and that they are morally entitled to determine for themselves what acts of government do, in fact, constitute unjust infringements of their "rights," are propositions we need not question. But it is equally valid to urge that the State has a "right" to enforce its interpretation of the public good even upon individuals who urge that in their private judgment such enforcement infringes their "natural rights." Either the individual or the State may be mistaken in such a conflict; but if a State is entitled to exist at all, it must be entitled to enforce its will in such a case. The danger of Mr. Fell's doctrine of personal rights is that it lends itself so easily to anti-social limitations of the power of the State. It is one thing to hold that man's place in the Universe and his moral nature imply that society should recognise his "rights" to realise himself, quite another to hold that Governments must not interfere with "property," and must not apply "confiscatory" methods of taxation. Mr. Fell's own illustrations show that he is really building up a wall of philosophical defence for vested interests, i.e., for the retention by individuals and classes of "property," which is not, as he appears to think, the simple expression of their personal energy and skill, but which owes its existence, and, in a still fuller sense, its value, to the co-operation of society with the individual. A wise State will recognise that an individual is not merely a member of society, but that his place in the Universe imposes on him whole spheres of action in which he ought to have a large and growing liberty; it will hold also that this fuller personality will make him a better member of society. In final fact, there is no conflict between the "general will" as expressed through a wise and well-ordered State and the personal rights of individuals. But we cannot assent to any doctrine of Personalism which shall set any arbitrary restrictions upon the operations of the general will, or regard the individual's notions of his "natural" rights as a court of final appeal from the verdict of society.

GRAMMATICALS.

Who among us would have ventured to take Lord Acton to task over a simple rule of concord? Once, and probably not twice, a student of his class in Modern History might have done so. For, in the lecture on "Frederic the Great," Lord Acton says:—

> "The Saxon Army held out for some weeks, and was then forced to serve in the ranks of their conqueror," &c.

The shock of such a blunder is as grievous as the effort to explain it is embarrassing. We know, in the first place, how scrupulous Lord Acton was in the composition of his lectures; we know, in the second, from a beautiful description by Mr. John Pollock, how leisurely, emphatic and emotional he was in their delivery. "He pronounced each sentence as if he were feeling it, poising it lightly, and uttering it with measured deliberation." In what moment of intellectual oblivion did Lord Acton utter with measured deliberation a sentence in which a singular verb collides with a plural pronoun? Nor are we yet at the end of our bewilderment. Lord Acton writes the sentence in his study and reads it in the classroom; the lectures, after his death, are prepared for the Press, not by an editor, but by a brace of editors, lecturers at Cambridge. May they soon, in a second edition, find their chance of purgation!

Strange that so considerable a slight upon the language should disfigure the pages of so many writers of quality! Here it is again, in form still worse, in the fourth sentence of Mr. Stopford Brooke's delightful "Primer of English Literature":—

> "Every English man and woman has good reason to be proud of the work done by their forefathers in prose and poetry."

Ruskin, a more consummate rhetorician than either of these, can write thus:—

> "It is true that when perspective was first discovered everybody amused themselves with it."

Leslie Stephen writes of Charlotte Brontë:—

> "Nobody ever put so much of themselves into their work."

Charles Reade, in "Hard Cash":—

> "One fine afternoon everybody was on deck, amusing themselves as they could."

The truth is (and it is a truth to lay us all low) very few writers, whether of talent or of genius, are strictly and consistently loyal to grammar. Was it not R. L. Stevenson, the most conscientious and evenhanded stylist of his day, who said that, though some three or four sentences might be compassed, a perfect page lay within no man's pen? Superior persons have been heard to protest that English is a language free from the shackles and conventions of grammar—meaning by this, no doubt, that we can all speak and write it properly without instruction. Alas for the superior, grammar there is; and, by the breaches that we make therein, we know it. In a dozen easy laws of English grammar there lurk at least a dozen easy pitfalls.

It is nearly thirty years since a little book by Dr. William Hodgson, an Edinburgh professor, appeared posthumously under the title, "Errors in the Use of English." Dr. Hodgson says in his introduction:—

> "Acting on the principle that example is better than precept, the Spartans impressed upon their children the wisdom of sobriety by showing them the folly of intemperance in the person of the drunken Helot. Similarly this work is meant to set forth the merits of correctness in English composition by furnishing examples of the demerits of incorrectness—to bring home the abstract rule that 'a sentence must be lucid in order and logical in sequence'—by citing such concrete specimens of obscure disorder as 'The beaux of that day painted their faces as well as the women.'"

The blunder under which the bucks are seen painting their mistresses pink is fastened upon the elder Disraeli, but he is one only out of scores of famous writers whom Hodgson leads to the pillory. There they stand, pour encourager les autres (and might not the rest of us stand with them?): Gibbon, Grote, Sir Henry Holland, Swift, Fielding, Smollett, Alison, Burke, Mill, Emerson, Hazlitt, Bulwer Lytton, Beaconsfield, James Bryce, Kingsley, Farrar, G. H. Lewes, Lord Houghton, Moncure Conway, A. W. Ward, Wendell Holmes, Ruskin, Lecky, J. R. Lowell, Barham, Dickens, Jane Austen, Sydney Smith, Lockhart, William Black, Mrs. Lynn Linton, Mrs. Oliphant, Mrs. Gaskell, Leslie Stephen many times, and Matthew Arnold again and again. Not one escapes, and mistakes are exposed in almost every review, magazine, and newspaper of note. Every mistake is verified by chapter and verse reference. Other works similar to Hodgson's may be consulted, but no one else has marshalled so many interesting authors imperfectly attired. Curious in especial degree are the cases of Leslie Stephen and Matthew Arnold. Stephen, the first editor of the "Dictionary of National Biography," was a scholar with a deep knowledge of the language; yet he is here constantly convicted of errors that the schoolmaster makes fun of in the schoolboy. Arnold (an inspector of schools) was the nice and very erudite and somewhat scornful critic whom, with no hint of satire, we dubbed our Apostle of Culture, yet, as we view him here, his literary raiment seems a patchwork of false concords. Truly—as careful as we seek to be—these instances should make us quake!

A blunder so common as to be well-nigh invariable is made with the adjective in the degrees of comparison. Things must be compared with other things. When, for instance, we say: "Never was there seen such a man as Napoleon," what we probably mean is that Napoleon was in some way the greatest of men; what we actually state is that no such person as Napoleon ever existed. If there never was seen such a man as Napoleon, it is obvious that Napoleon is himself excluded. When we compare two things only, we are bidden to use the comparative; Leslie Stephen is therefore wrong in saying:—

> "Cowper was as indisputably the most virtuous man as Rousseau the greatest intellectual power."

The pronoun is constantly employed in such a manner as to puzzle and confound the reader. This is from Fielding's "Amelia":—

> "We now quitted the inn, and went to our lodgings, where my husband, having placed me in safety, as he said, he went about," &c.

This from Arnold's "Literature and Dogma":—

> "And this prevents their attending enough to what is in the Bible, and makes them battle for what is not in the Bible, but they have put it there."

Awkward and careless verbal constructions are of many kinds. Lockhart says:—

> "For neither did I feel the night breeze chill me as we rushed through it, nor partook, in any sort," &c.

In "Mansfield Park" Miss Austen writes:—

> "I never was so long in company with a girl in my life—trying to entertain her—and succeed so ill."

The perfect form of the infinitive, after a perfect verb, is incorrectly used for the simple form. Even Macaulay (though, to be sure, the example is taken from a letter) writes: "I had hoped never to have seen the statues again." The same error is Ruskin's in "I intended to have insisted"; and Mrs. Lynn Linton's in, "He would have liked to have read it."

A dreadful snare is the contracted sentence:—

> "I am anxious for the time when he will talk as much nonsense to me as I have to him."—Landor.
>
> "I never have, and never will, attack a man for speculative opinions."—H. T. Buckle.
>
> "He ridicules the notion that truth will prevail; it never has, and it never will."—Leslie Stephen.

The little error of the "hanging" participle, the participle that lacks a subject:—

> "Looking back on the affair, after the lapse of years, the chief mistake seems," &c.—Lord Houghton.
>
> "Entering the factory gate, the evidence offered his visual organs might lead," &c.—Jas. Greenwood.
>
> "This copy is now in my possession, having purchased it at," &c.—A. Constable.
>
> "Looking back from this distance of time . . . it appears difficult to understand," &c.—Justin McCarthy.

Sad tricks are played with the adverb. Thackeray makes mention of a "seldom" entertainment; and such a shocking expression as "the failure or otherwise" is frequent. The preposition is sorely abused. Kingsley has the phrase "found rest into"; Miss Mitford, by letter, informs a friend that her "state of extremity" has been "doubted to"; and George Augustus Sala is "not averse from a moderate quantity of good, sound, fruity port." Mill must have known quite well that things which are unlike do not differ "to" but "from" one another, yet the phrase "different to" occurs in the "Logic"; and Addison, Coleridge, Thackeray, and John Henry Newman are guilty of "different than." Matthew Arnold employs "directly" as a conjunction, and puts "one" for "one's" in this sentence from "Literature and Dogma":—

> "But this does not make it the less really trifling, or hinder one nowadays seeing it to be trifling directly we examine it."

The whole sentence, indeed, is almost as bad as it could be. Bulwer Lytton, in the "Last Days of Pompeii"; Hawthorne, in the "House of the Seven Gables"; and William Black, in "A Daughter of Heth," fall into the not uncommon vice of using "than" after "scarcely."

"Scarcely had she gone, than Claudius," &c. Mill lapses into the terrible "and which":—

"Those whom privileges not acquired by their merit, and which they feel to be," &c.

Faults in syntax are as plentiful as faults in accidence. A few examples, bearing on the rule of the concord of subject and verb, were given at the outset; they might, were space of no importance, be added to. Matthew Arnold:—

"Culture points out that the harmonious perfection of generations of Puritans and Nonconformists have been, in consequence, sacrificed."

"No action or institution can be salutary and stable which are not based on reason and the will of God."

Goldwin Smith:—

"The obstinate maintenance, in the interest of a class, of an alien church and an alien land-law in Ireland are faults, not misfortunes, now."

Leslie Stephen:—

"The rational and the emotional nature have such intricate relations," &c.

"The fire which glows in Macaulay's history, the intense patriotic feeling, the love of certain moral qualities, is not," &c.

G. H. Lewes:—

There is little illustration, and no sidelights of suggestion."

Certain authors are frequently in trouble with their relative pronouns, and Beaconsfield's:—

"The very two individuals whom he thought were far away," could be matched a thousand times. "Pray remain single and marry nobody (let him be whom he may)," says Sydney Smith; and Louisa Alcott caps it with: "The sign of the Good Samaritan is written on the face of whomsoever opens to the stranger."

In the matter of government we may fail as egregiously as in that of concord. Mrs. Lynn Linton:—

"I wish that little Mavey would find them closeted together, he softened by her tears, and she receiving his devotions with effusion."

Kingsley:—

"God forbid that John Hawkins's wife should refuse her last penny to a distressed mariner, and he a gentleman born."

Fielding:—

"He hath given away above half his fortune to the Lord knows who."

George Eliot:—

"The domain of the husband to whom she felt that she had sold herself, and had been paid the strict price."

Is then English a language without a grammar, or is it the writers of English that are lacking?

THE OAK AND THE ACORN.

Two oaks are growing side by side. They belong to the same species and as likely as not were grown from the seed of the same tree. One has been allowed to follow its aspirations, and is a tall and graceful tree; the other was lopped, perhaps in its fortieth year, and reaped again as a pollard thirty years ago. The acorns under the pollard are short and thick, sensibly approaching the sphere, while those under the tall tree are long and slender. The difference is greater than that between the eggs of hedge-sparrow and redstart. We take a walk through a neighbouring oak-wood with our eyes on the ground, identifying by their acorns ten pollards and not missing one. The inference is inevitable—that the mutilation of these trees has produced its effect in their offspring. To say so would be rankest unorthodoxy, for the current verdict of science is that there is no inheritance of acquired characters. It is doubtful whether we may still inherit our grandfather's gout. If so, it is by some special ordinance such as the following:—

"He (Weismann) allows, indeed, that in the course of generations, if the conditions of change persist, the variations will become more deeply rooted, the reproductive elements will somehow come to feel the change, and the modification will be transmitted, and, for a time at least, stereotyped."

This interpretation of Dr. Weismann, which seems so much like the saying of an Irishman—that he would not be able to get his boots on till he had worn them once or twice—is seized upon by Professor Henslow as the pivot by means of which he will overthrow the whole theory of somatic disinheritance. The object of his new book on "The Heredity of Acquired Characters in Plants" (Murray) is thus stated: "To prove that these hypothetical admissions are positive facts, as far as plants are concerned." To many the experiments described in this book are known from his earlier writings. Their former purpose has been to show that varieties are not selected from hap-hazard variations, but the result of the plant's invariable response to changes in the environment. The response is never complete in a single generation, and it is difficult to see how, without some transmission of the capital of experience, any progress could be made. On the other hand, the transmissibility of acquired characters is difficult to prove, and there is little in this book that Weismannians will not be able to explain away with satisfaction to themselves.

The vetch that has been climbing in the hedge all the summer by means of tendrils has set its seed, from which will come a vetch next year that will climb with like tendrils. It is not the tendrils that are inherited, says Weismann, but the capacity to produce tendrils. Professor Henslow takes the advanced case of the Virginia creeper, in which the tendril has become a sucker that clings to the wall. In the American species, each sucker is only produced when pressure against the wall has taken place. The capacity to produce the sucker is awakened by the irritation. But in the Japanese species (Veitchii) the pads are produced before they are required. The writer curtly calls them hereditary. Here, we suppose, is one of those cases hypothetically admitted by Weismann, according to the passage set out above. The reproductive elements have "somehow come to feel the change, and the modification is transmitted."

To come to the experiments. Generally speaking, it is true that trees and shrubs that produce spines, such as rest-harrow, gorse, blackthorn, berberry, live in arid situations, and it is generally safe to assume that the spines have been produced by the habitat. The experimenter took seeds of the rest-harrow and planted them in moist air under a hand-light. They came up, bearing in the first year the spines of their forefathers, but "instead of their being long and stout, they were not an inch long, and like needles." In the second year there were no spines at all; the plants bloomed, and, "taken altogether, there was no appreciable difference from O repens" (the wild spineless rest-harrow). Those half-hearted spines of the first year Professor Henslow calls hereditary. It is at least another case of an acquired character that has become stereotyped by "somehow" getting into the reproductive elements. But is it more? Weismann would require the Professor to plant the seeds of his spineless rest-harrow in conditions suited to the spiny kind. He would prognosticate that they would grow up just as spiny as their grandparents, and differing from them, if at all, merely in their susceptibility on a second subjection to the moist-air treatment. If the little bit more that the hereditarians claim came out, he would explain it by saying that "somehow" the moist-air treatment had affected the reproductive elements. Another anti-Henslow school would expect the progeny of the spineless creation to vary among themselves, some being less spiny than others. Clearly, then, it is an experiment "to be continued."

Another experiment is with the water crowfoot, that interesting plant which produces two distinct types of leaf—one for that portion of the stem that lives under water, the other for use in the air. The under-water leaf, as most of us know, is finely dissected, a mass of hairs so thin and feeble that the air cannot support them, so that they fall into a mere clot as soon as they are taken from the water. The number of these is determined by the depth of the water, for as soon as the surface is reached, full, round, floating leaves are formed. The line between air and water is so sharply drawn that often a single leaf is half of filaments and half filled in. What is going to happen to the water buttercup when it is planted entirely out of the water? Still it grows a few dissected leaves, but stiff enough, like those of fennel, to remain extended in the air, and studded with stomata, whereas the water leaves were, of course, without them. Next come the true buttercup leaves as before. It is to be supposed, though it has not been shown, that these dissected leaves would soon disappear, and the whole plant resemble R. hederaceus, a very nearly allied plant that grows close to the water's edge. But the point is that, if there were no heredity of acquired characters, the change would come about more rapidly. The extreme non-inheritance theory is that this water-adapted plant inherits only the faculty of producing divided leaves, if the presence of water should demand it. But when not only is there no demand for them but good reason why divided leaves should not be grown, the alleged faculty still works. The plant, to speak a little imaginatively, tries to produce the best leaves, namely, broad aerial leaves such as its ancestors have produced as soon as they could get above the water. It gets to the length of producing leaves that are aerial in function, but their form is determined by a sort of hereditary curse. It cannot get out of the habit acquired by its ancestors. That is merely one way of putting the argument, and not Professor Henslow's. He merely remarks after this and the several other similar instances that he adduces: "The experiment proves that the two kinds of leaf were hereditary."

There are hundreds of similar cases in botany. Professor Henslow thinks that the prevalent school of biologists would modify its theories if it could be induced to look at the facts of the plant kingdom. It has, however, met and circumvented similar, if not greater, difficulties in the animal world. The chick within the egg and every other animal embryo reproduces not merely the acquired and functionally obsolete characters of the last generation but traces of the experience of ancestors millions of generations removed. We do not say that Recapitulation is a fact inconsistent with the absolute rule of the germ-plasm, still less that, by means of a little give and take, they cannot be reconciled. So, as we have seen, were the results of these experiments of Professor Henslow discounted before he wrote the present book. The position seems to be that characters that have been acquired in a generation are not inherited, while those that are acquired in an age may be. And yet the ages are composed of generations.

Short Sketch.

THE LAST ENEMY.

A HEAVY shower of rain drove me into the carpenter's shop; for the man's attitude towards the Church, while always tolerant and respectful, was scarcely such as to encourage pastoral visits. I found him whistling, with more spirit than tunefulness, something which he evidently composed as he went along. Considering the immediate nature of his task, however, his cheerfulness afforded me food for reflection.

"You're wond'rin', sir," he said, leisurely, without looking round, having observed my entrance, as would appear, through the back of his head; "you're mebbe wond'rin' who this 'ere coffin is for I'm manni-facturin'?" Either with the view of keeping me in this inquisitive frame of mind, or to illustrate the important and unusual nature of the order, he applied his eye to a section of the work as though it were a telescope.

"An adult," I supposed, sadly.

"You might ha' made a worse guess, for a fust," was the satirical rejoinder. "There's a good few spec'mens springin' up in present gen'ration, thank the Lord! It's for a man as 'anged hisself."

"How dreadful!"

The carpenter, with suspended plane, stared at me in a surprise and disappointment hardly deserved by my conventional exclamation. He seemed to ask dumbly in what outlandish part of the universe I was born and bred. Then he fell to his distinguished task again with an energy which threatened to consume the timber.

"It'll make the gallows look foolish, for one thing," was his startling comment.

"You surely don't approve of suicide?" I asked aghast.

"In a wide world like this, sir," he replied, evasively, "there's a many things as 'appens reg'lar which don't fill us with 'mediate satisfaction; but, as far as I can see, they go on all the same. Perhaps it's just as well, too. Time'll tell an' frost'll try the 'taters!"

"There's such a thing as an 'Act of God,'" I reminded.

"You don't tell me!" he exclaimed. "It's very good o' people to 'low Him do even that much. But I s'pose now," he continued, practically, "you're afraid that if you didn't dock the Berril Service, 'alf the parish might follow our friend's bad example here." He laughed scornfully at his own suggestion. "The majority of us take such fine care o' ourselves, that th' Almighty has a easy time o' 't. The bother with 'Im is that we're more like crabs than 'tell'gent 'uman beens. But I'll tell you w'at, sir: If you want to put a stop to this sort o' thing, which may be all very good an' right o' you, you're goin' the 'zact wrong way about it. A man might be quite contented an' so on in his own house; but if you came an' tried to lock the door on him, he'd leave a duck an' green peas to see what the blazes you were doin.' Leastways, that's my way o' lookin' at it. People won't enjoy their life any the worse for knowin' they're not pris'ners."

"All depends on what awaits them outside," I said, more than half ashamed of the fallacy. "Did you know this—this unfortunate poor person?" I hurried on.

"Sometimes," was the whimsical answer. "Him an' me went to day an' Sunday school together, among other comrade features. An', which was more his misfortune than his fault, Mary Dillow married him i'stead o' me."

"She proved a bad wife to him, then?" I sympathetically inferred.

"She left him, 'bout two months ago. In a 'carse," he added, as an afterthought.

The reply made me feel strangely foolish and uncomfortable.

"It was a rather sad case," this paradoxical creature explained, without pausing for a moment in his work. "She missed her foot, goin' to bed, an' fell downstairs from top to bottom, can'le an' all. It might ha' bin a lamp. Lucky they 'ad only toast an' water to supper as the beer man forgot to call, or all the fools an' pharisees in the place 'd be sayin' it was the drink."

"And the tragedy preyed on her husband's mind?" I naturally concluded.

"More fool 'e, if it did," was the virile comment. "Did the mortal hexpect her to live for ever?"

"But a man should love his wife," I expostulated.

"Tell a cat to drink milk!" was the masculine reply. "Women may be testy, but they're better than nothink," he qualified.

"Then you can't account for this poor fellow's act?" I said, anticipating the inquest.

"Oh, yes, sir, I can!" was the oracular answer.

"It's information for the coroner only?" I presumed, after a long pause.

"I don't mind who knows it," he returned boldly. But again he waited another minute or two, doubtless with the view of completing my discipline.

"When God made all things, He naturally intended us to like everythink," was the very unexpected explanation.

"At the right time and place," I amended.

"I didn't know there was any other," he returned. "People don't go to bed till they're tired. All the same, as the cemet'ry keeper said, I'll make Jim 'Asty as good a deal coffin as was ever lowered intil a grave, let parsons an' juries please theirselves. The world's reared, as you might say, when a man can die o' his own 'cord like that." He patted his workmanship gently with the hammer. "He may be unsane; but if I was a Cor'ner, I'd want better proof than the corp. As for a coward, the 'Postle hisself calls death the 'last henemy!' We may be fools, but there's no reason we should be knaves as well. The heasier it is to die, the heasier it is to live. When I was a young 'un, we was all so scared o' our miserable little lives that we never 'ad a minute's reel fun or freedom. We didn't know what life was in them days just because we was so ter'ble concerned about it. If we showed our noses outside the door, or went into the water up till our knees, it was a nine days' wonder. Our elders made it even worse for us, fear we'd get killed! It might be very nice an' kind of 'em, but it was har'ly complimentary to th' Almighty. One-'alf the round world was like a 'aunted house; but the new tenants are throwin' open the windows an' doors like magic."

"To their own destruction, I fear."

"That's for theirselves to say," he reproved. "Any'ow, you can't conquer a foreign country without some loss o' life. An' it isn't as if there was conscription," he added meaningly.

"Neither Church nor State would ever agree with you," I pointed out.

"I should think not, indeed!" was the ambiguous answer. "But we're not so opposed as you might 'magine, for all our methods is different. There's more ways o' savin' life than perservin' it. Pers'nally, I prefer to go on plain facts. I find 'em less dis'pointin'. Moreover, a paten' lock isn't o' much use to a match-box; so you might as well keep your money. An' a open hexit doesn't pervent a crowded house enjoyin' the play."

With this analogy ringing in my ears, I continued my journey.

S. Henry.

Science.

POPULAR ANTHROPOLOGY.*

The belated interest in the comparative study of mankind which is now being awakened is manifested in the publication of numerous books and memoirs dealing with uncivilised conditions. These are apt to be repellent to the general reader, who is more likely to be interested by comparative accounts and the conclusions to be drawn therefrom than by the perusal of more detailed or technical writings. In this country there are but few works of this nature that have been written by Englishmen, popularisation of this kind appearing to be more prevalent in Germany. This perhaps is the reason for the translation of a popular book by Dr. Leo Frobenius, which has been ably done into English by Dr. A. H. Keane. Dr. Frobenius is known as an enthusiastic student and a prolific writer, and the book now under review is the result of diligent reading and sympathetic study of the data accumulated, but it gives one the impression of having been compiled in a library by one who has had no first-hand knowledge of savage conditions. Since the original edition of this book was published, Dr. Frobenius has travelled in Africa, and it will be interesting to see how far experience in the field will modify his earlier conclusions.

The opening chapters of "The Childhood of Man" deal with the adornment of the person by means of ornaments and skin decoration. Under the former heading the author rightly refers the wearing of ornaments to various causes, such as simple decoration, the wearing of trophies, a convenient method of transporting currency, and he gives one example of neck pendants in connection with ancestor worship, but he omits the very widely-spread use of so-called ornaments for magical purposes. In dealing with skin decoration, he follows the prevalent error of classing under "tattooing" all forms of permanent skin decoration. He gives a number of sketches of the scarifications of Central African tribes, and says:—

> "The process in question is a deep-rooted indication of tribal kinship. . . . Here we may see how each group, how even every village, bears, so to say, visibly on its head its own coat of arms." "We know, however, as a fact, that in the central islands of Polynesia, it was customary to have his tutelar deity or sacred animal tattooed on each person; we know that on festive occasions the tokens were recorded on the breast of all the participators, and we find the same rite in Africa, as, for instance, with the western Niam-Niams. Here the young man carries marks recording his reception as a warrior amongst the elders of the tribe; the married couple has its tattooed sign instead of a wedding-ring, and the mother the number of her children permanently indicated in a way legible by all experts."

An example is given of a woman from the interior of Africa who, being a member of a certain tribe, had seven incisions in the upper lip; then she fell into the hands of a member of another tribe, who married her, and as an indication of her new tribal connection she had a disc inserted in her upper lip. Thus were her wanderings and changed relations indefaceably recorded by documentary evidence.

The author draws attention to one of the reasons for the origin of labor. In various parts of the world, especially in the West Pacific at the present day, shell currency is greatly prized. This consists of shells ground down into round discs and threaded on long strings, with which they buy their ornaments and wives, they buy themselves free from troubles and complications, they appease their bitterest enemy even though they may have killed his nearest relative. In parts of New Britain a hut is specially set apart for keeping the property of all the villagers, and thousands of fathoms of the shell currency (dewarra), belonging to the rich as well as the smallest savings of the poor, are here accumulated. The making of this currency is a tedious business, but it is a labor of love, for > "whoever possesses the largest store enjoys the highest esteem, exercises the greatest influence. The women must pass their whole life toiling from early morning to nightfall, in order to pile up dewarra for their husbands, while the men plot and plan how to rob their neighbor of his store."

The evolution of the communication of ideas is illustrated by the wampum necklaces and belts, the colors and patterns of which had a mnemonic significance which, however, was only known to the instructed; but wampum had also a magical virtue. Also among the North American Indians notched and painted feathers were worn to denote certain distinguished deeds on the part of the wearer. In the chapter on Sign and Gesture Language the facts are mainly culled from Dr. Hofmann's investigations among the American Indians. Of a special interest is the account of the drum-language of Africa, in illustration whereof Dr. Frobenius gives the following account:—

> "Governor Five was returning late in the evening to his camp in a secluded village of the Basako district, and sent orders by the drum-telegraph to keep his supper ready; on reaching the place a few hours later he found the meal served up. The message had been received long before his arrival, and shortly after the despatch of the 'telegram.' It ran: 'Bula Matadi come evening; don't eat all up.'"

The author adds that he is convinced that this peculiar drum-language is current throughout Central Africa east of the chain of lakes, as well as in the Congo region and the Cameroons. He also describes and figures a remarkable little signal drum which is attached to the bows of several tribes in Mangbattuland. The suggestion is put forward that the long upright drum of Africa and possibly the Far East is derived from two sources. He says: "The drum is a hybrid sort of instrument, one part of which, the sounding-case, owes its origin to the pounding of corn, the other, the skin, to the measured beat in leather-dressing."

The general survey of the modifications in pictography and decorative art from the Eskimo in the North, through the Indian tribes of the plains and of Mexico to the Southern Mayas of Yucatan is interesting but inadequate, his contention being that in the first we have realistic drawings and the lack of ornamentation, and amongst the last an extraordinary richness of ornamentation but a total lack of the power of realistic representation. He says:—

*"The Childhood of Man: A Popular Account of the Lives, Customs, and Thoughts of the Primitive Races." By Leo Frobenius. Translated by A. H. Keane. With 415 Illustrations. Seeley & Co. 16s. net.

> "Anybody can understand an Eskimo drawing. To explain it we have no need of a native. To decipher the Maya writings the most eminent scholars have worried themselves for several decades past. For the Maya culture died out, and we know very little about it."

The greater portion of the book is an exposition of the author's idea of the evolution of religion; he deals with certain folk tales, funeral customs, ideas of the ghost, skull worship and head-hunting, ancestor worship and fetishism, secret societies and masks, the examples being mainly drawn from Africa. Two grades of evolution are distinguished: the first period when "man held himself no better than the beast, when man and beast wrestled for the mastery. This period in the progressive observation of the environment bears the name of animism." The translator rightly calls attention to the fact that the term animism is here wrongly applied. The author defines his second period by the barbarous term "manism," in which man knew nothing about the obvious nature of death, not even knowing that death was inevitable. According to him, at this period arose a belief in ghosts and the origin of ancestor worship and fetishism. The account of totemism is very inadequate, and no distinction is made between totemism proper in North America and the cult of guardian spirits.

The last part of the book is devoted to the author's explanation of various customs and folk tales from different parts of the world. He is an ardent disciple of that recrudescence of astromythology which is now so popular amongst certain of our German colleagues, and the reader has here presented before him the main points elaborated by the author in his "Weltanschauung der Naturvölker" and "Zeitalter des Sonnengottes." Twenty years ago Mr. Andrew Lang published his famous "Myth, Ritual, and Religion," in which he combated similar views propagated in this country by Max Müller concerning the Vedic and Ancient Grecian deities. The bird in symbolic art, according to Dr. Frobenius, bears the soul aloft through the air up to the sun. Numerous legends are given concerning the sun in savage mythology, but the author appears to have over-stated the case by including folk tales which can only be regarded as bearing this significance by the most exuberant fancy. "But here is the solution of the whole problem: The soul of the dead man follows the sun." The following quotations from the author indicate briefly his point of view:—

> "From a general survey of the whole, it results that in the myths concerning the origin and the destruction of the world, we should see nothing more than variants of those ideas with which we have long been familiar from the solar mythology. The sunrise becomes changed to a story of the origin of the world, so that the origin of the world is nothing more than the first sunrise. On the other hand, the sunset is in like manner introduced as a single great event, as a first great going down of the sun in the remote past."
>
> "Many of the fire-stealing myths begin with the words: 'The ghosts, the spirits of the departed, possessed the fire.' Naturally this again means nothing more than that, as the souls of the departed follow to the land of the sun, the departed are thus, so to say, the possessors of the sun, the sun must have been stolen by the departed. And such, too, is always the trend of these myths. Sagas, which begin in the way just described, always wind up with the fire being wrested from the spirits."

In conclusion, this book is an exposition of the author's views rather than of the results generally held by ethnologists. He gives a large number of very interesting quotations, many being from unpublished sources, but the absence of references to accounts derived from published sources is a great drawback. The book is copiously illustrated with excellent figures and plates, but a number of these have no bearing on the text. The general reader will find much that is entertaining and instructive in "The Childhood of Man," while the student cannot afford to overlook it.

A. C. Haddon.

Letters to the Editor.

BAD HARVESTS AND UNEMPLOYMENT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—It is nothing to the point for Mr. Bisgood to pretend that he is not a theorist, but merely a business man. His argument, like mine, is directed to the theoretical explanation of unemployment. But, if any result is to be reached, it must be by sticking to one point at a time, and not by diverging into the theory of credit or the theory of the decline of the interest of City men in Political Economy. The issue is the extent to which, and the manner in which, a bad harvest affects employment. If the same amount of money were paid, prices being higher, for a short crop as for a normal crop, it is agreed that, the agricultural income being the same as before, no unemployment need be caused in other industries by a diminution in the demand for their goods. This supposition that a smaller crop will fetch as big a sum as a larger crop is not so absurd as it appears to Mr. Laycock.

But assume, as is more likely, that a bad harvest does mean a smaller income for agriculture, prices not rising sufficiently to offset the reduced supply, then it is evident that agriculturalists will demand a smaller quantity of other goods. But are we obliged to assume that no one is in a position to buy these other goods, that they will not be produced at all, and that, therefore, the labor which could produce them will be unemployed? We have admitted that a smaller total sum of money, a smaller part of the general income, has been spent on agricultural produce. Though, therefore, the agricultural classes have less to spend on other goods, the non-agricultural classes have more, and can buy and consume the goods which the agricultural classes cannot.

It is, of course, true that what actually takes place through money is the exchange of commodities against commodities. If wheat is short in a particular year, while other goods are not, this means that a bushel of wheat will exchange against a somewhat larger quantity of other goods than before: if wheat is abundant, the rate of its exchange against these other goods will fall. These alterations in ratio of exchange are continually taking place from thousands of causes affecting either supply or demand, but there is no reason to attribute to them any considerable quantity of unemployment. One qualification to this doctrine I admitted in my former letter, and "J. B. M.'s" letter gives it point. If a failure in the champagne crop took place, and we suppose the champagne growers to be going to spend a large sum on motor cars, it is unlikely that the income of champagne buyers, which they do not spend this year on champagne, will be mostly directed either into buying more motor cars or into buying claret, and so enabling the claret growers to buy more motor cars. There would be some damage to employment in the motor trade, though, so far as general employment were concerned, this would be balanced by increased employment in those trades producing whatever goods are bought with the income not expended on champagne.

If Mr. Bisgood's argument were sound, there would be no limit at all to the amount of unemployment caused by a bad harvest. For if a bad harvest, reducing by one quarter the income of agriculturalists, so diminished the demand they exercised for other goods as to throw out of employment 100,000 men, these men in their turn, having now no income to spend, will cause another diminution of demand, which throws out another 100,000 men, and so on, until, as a result of the propagation of the original force, no employment at all remains. This argument proves too much.

Some unemployment is attributable to bad harvests. There is, first, the reduction of employment in the harvesting, carrying, milling, baking, and other trades connected with handling the wheat or other materials which are short in supply. There is, secondly, some unemployment due to admitted alterations in the direction, as distinct from the volume, of demand.

How slippery an issue this is, is well illustrated by a critical sentence in Mr. Laycock's letter. "A bad harvest means a lower income for agriculturalists, because of the smaller quantity to sell, and the higher price involves a smaller surplus for expenditure on other objects by those consumers who, despite the higher price, insist on having the same total of agricultural produce." Now, if the total income for agriculture is lower, though some consumers pay a larger amount than before (buying the same quantity at higher prices) it follows that other consumers must pay a smaller amount than before, notwithstanding that they pay a higher price for the smaller quantity they buy. If the larger amount paid by the former class leaves them less income to expend on other goods, and so makes for unemployment in other trades, the smaller amount paid by the latter class leaves them more income for other purchases, and counteracts the tendency towards unemployment. Mr. Laycock cannot have it both ways.—Yours, &c.,

UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS LIBRARY

J. A. Hobson.

October 6th, 1908.

PRESIDENT DIAZ.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—His Excellency the Mexican Minister, in his letter to you of September 29th, takes exception to part of the article on President Diaz in your issue of the 19th.

The article, though necessarily brief, does not omit to mention the President's high qualities and the great work he has done for his country. It justly describes him as a hero, compares him, in many respects, with the greatest general and ruler of antiquity, points out the traits which make him beloved as well as respected. But it falls short of fulsome and indiscriminate laudation. It tries, in a few paragraphs, to sketch him impartially and as he really is. He is eminently a man of his time, and he is a past master in the methods of material progress characteristic of his time. One of these methods, and one more honored in the observance every day, is advertisement. Diaz has advertised his country with conspicuous success. Nowhere in the article is he described as "courting advertisement for himself." But he has facilitated the publication of the attractions of Mexico in many books and countless periodicals; sometimes, as in the case of Mr. Bancroft of San Francisco, by supplying the traveller with a staff of guides and instructors; sometimes by no more than the flattering urbanity of his politeness to the passing stranger; sometimes by information systematically supplied to the consuls of foreign countries, or distributed through the Department of Fomento. The result of making Mexico and its better government known to the world is a stream of foreign capital and foreign immigration.

Señor Covarrubias will only admit that General Diaz has consented to receive two writers. One, he says, came with an introduction from President Roosevelt, the other "had written previously" an admirable book on Mexico. As to this last, is his Excellency not under a misapprehension? I have to-day procured a copy of the book referred to, and it describes several interviews of its author with General Diaz, conversations with him through an interpreter, the furniture of his house, his "footmen in English livery," and other interesting things. Turning over the pages, I find instance after instance recorded of the President's furnishing with introductions, and instructing officials and others to help in every way, this writer, who had not "previously" written, but was going to write, a book on Mexico.

The other writer received by General Diaz published, it seems, in "Pearson's Magazine," a report of his interview. Señor Covarrubias regrets that I did not read it (unfortunately I did not happen to meet with it), for it would have informed me of General Diaz's reasons for continuing so long in office against his will, and of his desire to retire at the end of his present term; and also because it would have confirmed what I myself, as he says, bore testimony to, the safety of the life and property of the well-behaved in Mexico. This last, although flattering, was superfluous, my statement being based on personal knowledge. As for General Diaz's long continuance in office, I contented myself with stating the period of it, without comment. I do not doubt that General Diaz would like to retire when his present term comes to an end in 1910. He will then be eighty years of age. I regard it as most fortunate for Mexico that he has held the reins so long, and if he can now place them in other hands with safety to the State, that is chiefly due to his wise and firm rule. The turbulent spirits of former days have had time to pass away, and he has accustomed the new generation to peace and order.

Señor Covarrubias traverses the statement in the article that Mexico has, as yet, but an "emerged tenth." May I refer him to the figures of last census? There the population is stated at nearly fourteen millions, of whom only about a million and three quarters (including, I suppose, the 75,000 foreigners) can read and write. I notice that Mrs. Alec Tweedie, in the book which his Excellency so highly commends, remarks, on her first page, that in some respects Mexico remains utterly barbaric, and, again (page 107), that Mexican Indians (a large proportion of the population) are most terrible thieves. The government still raises a large revenue by public lottery, and there are licensed gambling hells in every town.

His Excellency complains that I say that Mexican ideals of progress are chiefly such as can be expressed in dollars and cents. Yet he ingenuously hastens to prove Mexican civilisation, not by her schools, literature, or art, but by the proud announcement that her commerce has grown to nearly five hundred million dollars. He certainly omits the cents.

I regret that his Excellency should be dissatisfied with anything I wrote. I greatly respect and admire the illustrious President, as all must do who know him. I said that he had nearly attained apotheosis among his countrymen. For us over here he is still a man, though a very remarkable one, and, indeed, probably one of the very ablest rulers living in the world.—Yours, &c.,

The Writer of the Article.

October 7th, 1908.

"THE DOCTRINE OF TOLERANCE."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—I do not think the letters of "H. W. Francis" and "A Liberal M.P." on this subject should go unanswered.

Firstly, as to the former gentleman's argument that the Roman Catholic procession should not have been allowed because it was too large. It was certainly no larger than the publicans' demonstration of last Sunday, or than many others which have been held without interference. If this new principle is to be adopted, let it be applied impartially to all sects and parties, and let a definite number be established as the maximum number permitted to walk in procession. But as nothing was ever heard of this limitation until the Roman Catholics had organised their celebrations, one cannot help suspecting this sudden outcry against large processions to be somewhat insincere.

Mr. Francis' next excuse for the prohibition is that the procession was "an insult to Protestant consciences." This is an argument with which no Liberal can palter for a moment. It is the old cry of bigots and persecutors of all creeds and all countries. Once admit the principle that religionists, whose creed happens to be unpleasing to Mr. H. W. Francis and his congeners, are not to be allowed the benefit of equal laws with the rest of the population, and it will be impossible to stop. They will next assert, with equal plausibility, that the publication of Catholic or Jewish or atheistic literature is "an affront to their consciences," and before we know it we shall be back in the sixteenth century.

Mr. Francis' final justification for the prohibition is that "it was a symbolical act for the return of the nation to the rule of the Pope." Here, again, no Liberal can listen to him. In a free country, citizens are, or should be, at perfect liberty to make "symbolical acts for" the turning or returning of the nation to any creed or opinion they choose. For instance, many of us regard the recent publicans' demonstration as a "symbolical act" for the perpetuation of many abuses in connection with the licensing system. But, being Liberals, we did not howl for its prohibition. Still less, if possible, could we tolerate the prohibition of a Methodist or Presbyterian or Jewish procession on the ground that it was "designed as a symbolical act for" the extension of Methodism or Presbyterianism or Judaism. And the same liberty to make "symbolical acts" should, on Liberal principles, be extended even to those religious bodies which Mr. Francis happens to dislike. In other words, we cannot swallow our principles merely in order to flatter his prejudices.

"A Liberal M.P." is, if less fanatical, less lucid. He begins, apparently, by upholding Mr. Francis' doctrine that creeds which he himself happens to think wicked ought, on that account, to be laid under special restrictions. Then, possibly remembering how he means to sign himself, he falls back on the dictum (unexceptionable if impartially carried out) that no religious processions should be allowed in the streets. But this rarified atmosphere of impartiality is too much for him, and he relapses into the opinion that religious processions may be allowed, but not "ceremonies." I don't think, somehow, that I do him injustice in opining that by "ceremonies" he means "Catholic ceremonies" exclusively. If I am wrong perhaps he will tell us. We must remember in this connection that the Catholics did not propose to "consecrate" their wafer in the streets, but merely to carry it. And if that is to be considered a "ceremony," it is impossible to see why the carrying of Orange banners by a procession, or the singing of ultra-Protestant hymns, or the thumping of Salvationist drums, should not be considered to be "ceremonies." Here, again, one cannot but suspect "A Liberal M.P." of trying to find excuses for differentiating against religions which he happens to dislike, a frame of mind most antipathetic to real Liberals.—Yours, &c.,

A Yorkshire Liberal.

Middleham, Yorkshire,
October 6th, 1908.

"IS CONSTITUTIONAL GOVERNMENT IN TURKEY POSSIBLE?"

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Mr. Edwin Pears, in his interesting letter on the Turkish Constitutional movement, while doing ample justice to the reality of the progress of Liberal ideas among the followers of Islam, commits the mistake of regarding certain of those ideas as the outcome of Western influence during recent years. An example of such a mistake is offered by his remarks on the position of women in Mohammedan society. He quotes with approval, as an illustration of Moslem thought on the subject, Hood's line, "Along with the barbarous Turk, where woman has never a soul to save," adding that "Moslem teachers have been proclaiming for some years that this is a popular error, and that woman has a soul."

As a matter of fact, the alleged belief in woman's want of soul has never been even "a popular error" among Mohammedans. It has never been anything more than a Christian fiction—one of the numerous libels, due partly to grotesque ignorance and partly to deliberate malice, which Christians (even such unorthodox Christians as Voltaire) have, from time immemorial, delighted in attaching to Islam. Some two centuries ago Lady Mary Wortley Montagu wrote:—"Our vulgar notion, that they (the Turks) do not own women to have any souls, is a mistake" (letter to the Abbé Conti, dated Constantinople, May 29th, 1717). —Yours, &c.,

G. F. Abbott.

Royal Societies Club,
St. James's Street, S.W.,
October 1st, 1908.

"THE PRISON POPULATION."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—It is quite obvious that your correspondent, "Radix," has not been following the recent controversy on the Prevention of Crimes Bill which is now before Parliament, otherwise he would not confound, as he does, the habitual offender with the professional criminal. In this, as in every other civilised community, there is a large class composed of the beggar, the drunkard, the semi-imbecile, &c., the members of which are continually being committed to prison. These it is the custom to style habitual offenders. The professional criminal is a man of a totally different class, as the article on the "Prison Population" clearly pointed out. He is the professional burglar, the professional housebreaker, the professional thief, the man who makes his living by this kind of life; in other words, the man who is technically known as the professional criminal.

We have no means of knowing with absolute certainty how many men and women belong to this class. Our only possible test is the number of previous convictions which its members have undergone. Mr. Gladstone, in his speeches, assumed that a man who had been more than three times sentenced to penal servitude was a member of the professional criminal class. This is probably the best test we can have.

In the whole of the convict prisons in March last the number of men and women who had been more than three times sentenced to penal servitude amounted to exactly 104. I multiplied this number by five to include professionals who might possibly be in local prisons charged with petty offences. I therefore repeat that there are not 5,000 professional criminals in the prisons of England at the present moment, and that the Prison Commissioners have made a serious blunder in making such a statement in their annual report.

The great difficulty we have in dealing with public matters in this country is that excellent men like your correspondent, "Radix," do not examine things radically. —Yours, &c.,

The Writer of the Article.

London, October 5th, 1908.

THE NEWCASTLE ELECTION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—In a footnote to "An Elector's" letter on the Newcastle election, you say: "Our correspondent overlooks the fact that if the Government had any clear mandate for constructive legislation from the electors it was to deal with the Education question." Granting your observation to be true, that cannot mean that the Government had a mandate to force upon an unwilling country what is called "Simple Bible teaching" As a Radical I must, and do, support "full popular control" and "no tests" in the public schools of our land, but, as a Churchman, I do not like, and will not have, that "monstrosity"—denominational "Undenominationalism" Your correspondent is evidently a reformer to the core, but he is, perhaps, in the same boat as myself when I say I cannot weep over the fate of Mr. Birrell's Bill (though I regret the instrument of its destruction), nor could I express regret were a similar fate to befall Mr. McKenna's effort. As a Lancashire man "living in a foreign land," I have been asked, since North-West Manchester: "How do you explain the great cotton centre sending a Protectionist: are you beer ridden?" I have indignantly replied: "No"; and afterwards added that I could not blame the people of Lancashire for loving their religion more than their politics. My opinion that the Education question was the principal cause of Mr. Churchill's defeat is confirmed, I think, by the failure of certain Liberal newspapers to face the problem in their leaders on the result. After the next general election maybe we shall be told that Lancashire is going over to Protection, but if the present educational policy is persisted in I shall know that is another fiscal fallacy. I believe that the only correct Liberal policy is the traditional one of neutrality in religious matters. Only when our leaders get back to this and settle this question shall we able to get the votes of Churchmen, as a class, to tackle the great land and social problems, a fact well known to Balfour the strategist. Why was Mr. Masterman's "secular" amendment to Mr Birrell's Bill not accepted?—Yours, &c.,

A Radical Churchman.

Hull, October 8th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Your correspondent who shelters himself behind "An Elector" evidently thinks Nonconformists should have no political opinions, and make no demands on the Government on the education question; that that should be left to Churchmen and Roman Catholics. Perhaps he does not know that Nonconformists are quite half of the religious part of the nation; also that they regard education in the schools as a citizens' question. It has been forced to the front not by Nonconformists, but by Churchmen, who have broken the compromise of 1870 and thrown their schools on the rates. Has your correspondent forgotten the mandate of the people at the General Election on this question, that with their huge majority they declared that the dual system of schools must give place to a national one, and be controlled by the people, who pay the entire cost of the education; also that the schools must be freed from all sectarianism, and the teachers from tests? I ask your correspondent whether their will is to rule the Government, or the will of Churchmen and Roman Catholics? The Nonconformists are asking for no favor for themselves in the schools from the Government; they only demand that the will of the people should rule and not the will of Lord Halifax and the Church Union. Your correspondent must see that with Mr. Birrell's Bill the Government tried to meet the wishes of Churchmen and Roman Catholics by compromises till they spoilt their Bill for the people. I hope with the present Bill the Government will determine to carry out the wishes of the people, but at the same time do all that can be done to meet the wishes of Churchmen and Roman Catholics by facilities outside school hours. Contracting out pleases no party.

Thus far the secular solution, throwing the religious teaching on the churches outside school hours, seems the only way to peace, but the people are not ripe for it, and demand simple Bible teaching by the teachers, the same as has satisfied the parents for nearly forty years, in the Council schools. If the clergy would let it alone there would be no trouble, and a peaceable settlement soon made. —Yours, &c.,

JOHN EVANS.

6, Park Road, Clevedon,
October 7th, 1908.

MOORE'S "LALLA ROOKH."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Lord Curzon and Mr. Crawshay Williams make merry over Moore's "Kishma's amber vines." They do not, by the way, even quote correctly, for Moore does not speak of amber vines, but of "Kishma's golden wine." His lordship, in his work on Persia (Vol. I., 5, Note 1), says "Kishma's amber vines are in comical contrast with the treeless sterility of the real Kishma," and Mr. Williams follows suit, in his "Across Persia" (p. 184), by remarking that Kishma is "an island which is as desolate as the Sahara, and which by no conceivable process could ever be, or have been, transformed by man into anything else." But is this young traveller, who apparently never saw Kishma, so right, and was the poet so wrong? Blackie's "Imperial Gazetteer" says that the northern part of the island of Kishma contains tracts of black loam on which grapes, &c., are raised in sufficient quantities for the consumption of the inhabitants (5,000 in number). Lord Curzon, apparently (see Vol. II., 410), only saw the southern shore of the island, and did not, like Tavernier, land and spend some hours on it. Yet his lordship, at the page mentioned above, gives away his remark about a "treeless sterility" by saying that a large portion of Kishma is amenable to the cultivation of grain, melons, grapes, &c., and that there are large date groves in the interior of the island! Moore's description refers to the seventeenth century, and he is quite justified in his remark about vines by Tavernier and Mandelsto. Tavernier says that the island surpasses in fertility all the islands in the East, and Mandelsto says that the island supplied Gombroon with all sorts of fruits. Lord Curzon and Mr. Williams may be more correct in their criticism about Bendemeer's stream and its nightingales. But even this is doubtful. Bendemeer is near Shiraz, and according to Tavernier, it waters all the vineyards of that region. Reclus speaks of it as winding under the shade of willow trees—surely, not an unlikely habitat for the Persian nightingale which, by the way, is not our European bird. True, the Bendemeer is spoken of by some authorities as rapid rather than calm, and it may be so in one part of its course, but why should not Moore's description apply to one of the many channels by which the river is, or was, diverted for purposes of irrigation?—Yours, &c.,

H. BEVERIDGE.

October 1st, 1908.

THE SIGNIFICANCE OF RICHARD STRAUSS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—In reading the very able article on Richard Strauss in last Saturday's NATION, I notice that your correspondent, like many other writers on programme-music, has completely overlooked the very interesting and important fact that Dr. Strauss, when himself directing performances of his "Symphonic Poems," subordinates, to a very great extent, the details, in order to bring out with greater force the atmosphere and general feeling of the work.

Now this seems to me to have an important bearing on the weight which Dr. Strauss himself attaches to the bleating sheep in "Don Quixote," and the many other touches of realism to which your correspondent, together with most other serious musical thinkers, takes exception. Mr. Kalisch and others have often said that beneath the programmes which he allows his misguided admirers to attach to his works there lies a deeper meaning; and it is this that the composer always accentuates in performance.

To me, passages like the exquisite little epilogue to the "Eulenspiegel"—where realism is put aside, and the inner meaning is given full play—mean a thousand times more than all the "grotesque exaggerations," so dear to some conductors, to which your correspondent refers, but even these—when Dr. Strauss holds the bâton—play their part in the deeper scheme, help to bring out the real beauty of the works, and make them worthy of their title of "Poems."

Surely then, Strauss's realism is merely a toy, provided for those intellectual children who need something to quarrel about, and who, without it, would see nothing in his work but a senseless maze of elaborate orchestration.—Yours, &c.,

ADRIAN C. BOULT.

The Abbey Manor,
West Kirby, Cheshire,
September 28th, 1908.

A GREEN HEAVEN.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The above-named subject may have ceased to occupy a prominent position in your journal, but, if not, I should like to direct your readers to a letter I wrote on the subject in your impression of August 29th. In this letter I stated that the commonest view of heaven was a place of rest or sleep implied in the oft-sung hymn, "Now the laborer's task is o'er." I, however, added that some of our most distinguished philosophers and moralists maintained that in this world the only happiness depended on activity, accompanied by its various vicissitudes, and that idleness and having nothing to do was the real horror of life. I was not then aware that so eminent a man as Lord Houghton had suggested that a counterpart of this might correspond to heaven and hell, or, instead of using these terms, I might say that the happiness of the good, according to him, depended on a condition of action or movement, while the misery of the wicked was one of idleness. I am indebted to my neighbor, Miss Martelli, for pointing out to me this poem, from which I extract the following:—

> —"it may be, that the Abyss
> Of the Lost is only this;
> That for them all things to come,
> Are inanimate and dumb,
> And immortal Life they steep
> In dishonourable sleep:
> While no power of pause is given
> To the inheritors of Heaven.
> And the holiest still are those,
> Who are farthest from repose."

—Yours, &c.,

SAMUEL WILKS.

Hampstead, October 4th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Ideas of Heaven have to cope with the inherent difficulty that, if they are wholly derived from this world, they make Heaven a poor place, while if they transcend our present experience they falter as they rise.

The verses of "Hereafter," quoted by one of your correspondents, do little more than paint a pleasant spot for a summer holiday, with freedom from sorrow thrown in. They further introduce the difficulty to which Pascal alludes when he says that a good portrait cannot be painted without harmonising opposite traits. If Heaven is to be "a world of dear, familiar ways, the country laborer, quoted by "W. J. B.," will claim "a bar parlour, with plenty to drink, a good fire, and a fiddle agoin'," and the horrid boy, depicted by Mr. John Higgins, must have provision for the indulgence of his purely animal desires. How reconcile these opposing traits?

But all, at times, at least, rise above such ideals. If the picture of the boy is taken as typical of boys as a class, it is a libel on mankind. Many boys are gross and animal enough, but they have other qualities. No one who has joined with 500 boys in a public school chapel in singing such hymns as "Nearer, my God, to Thee," or

"My God, my Father, while I stray Far from my home in life's rough way," can have forgotten the intense reality with which the boys' voices rang true to the words. And does not the latter hymn give the true key to the happiness of Heaven? The last verse runs:—

"Then, when on earth I breathe no more
The prayer, oft mixed with tears before,
I'll sing upon a happier shore,
Thy will be done."

It was in like submission to the will of God that Dante after all his trials found Heaven. It is the stepping-stone to close intercourse with God. St. John makes this intercourse the chief joy of the future life. "They shall see His face"; "we shall be like Him for we shall see Him as He is." And St. Paul urges the same truth when he says, "Now we see through a glass darkly; but then face to face." The pilot is known on "crossing the bar."

As for the conditions under which this intercourse will be enjoyed the description is largely negative: "There shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain." "The first things are passed away." They were preliminary to a better state. A life of trial here may be made the ante-chamber to Heaven.

The failure in accurate description of the positive side is easy to understand. A higher state of being cannot be made plain to the lower. Symbols may convey some impression of a future which man's present capacities cannot apprehend in fullness. The new Jerusalem, which "Hereafter" thrusts aside, is wholly symbolical; few but children would think it otherwise. It has its story beneath the symbols.

I think that such ideas of Heaven are more elevating than "leafy boughs to make a cool retreat."—Yours, &c.,

EDWARD E. HEATHFIELD.

LORD CREWE AND ELECTORAL REFORM.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The significance of the carefully phrased utterance of Lord Crewe at Ulverston on the 1st inst. has, curiously enough, been overlooked by a considerable section of the Press, and I therefore beg leave to direct the attention of your readers to the following passage:—

"He did not regard the loss of a seat here and there as of itself a disheartening fact, but there were two conclusions to which some of the results of their recent elections led them. As the state of parties in this country now existed, it was very possible, and even probable, that there might be returned to Parliament a man who only represented a minority of the electors. That was a state of things which, if it became generally prevalent, would be a national misfortune, and therefore they would have to devise some method, and there were various methods, by which the difficulty might be met. The Government were paying very close attention to this particular point, with a view to taking action when the proper time came. They must take care, though, not to fall into the opposite pitfall; they must mind that minorities did not go unrepresented altogether. It would be a great misfortune if the representatives of labor, who held far more extreme views than he did, were not representated in the House of Commons in proportion to the influence which they wielded in the country, and that wa a point which had to be safeguarded."

Lord Crewe's statement needs no comment.—Yours, &c.,

JOHN H. HUMPHREYS,
Hon. Sec., The Proportional Representation Society.
107, Algernon Road, Lewisham,
London, S.E.,
October 6th, 1908.

THE BUDGET.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The average Chancellor of the Exchequer is a man always in want of money, and history shows that he is sometimes afraid, on Budget night, to present a tax which might touch the big pockets of the monied classes, and has, consequently, asked for the last drops of blood of those who can ill afford taxation.

A short time ago I suggested in your columns the taxation of contract notes on a sliding scale ad valorem, based on the gigantic annual returns of the Bankers' Clearing House. This should produce many millions, and the project is still under consideration by the Treasury.

The nation is wealthy, and there are many untapped sources of revenue available for the Chancellor of the Exchequer, if he has courage to depart from the old ruts.

Although Budget night is still half a year ahead, this and next month is the right time for the great patriotic financial thinking boxes of Great Britain and Colonies to send in reasonable and feasible propositions to the Chancellor, in order to produce, say, a net revenue of about five millions per annum from legitimate sources.

Here is a possible hen-roost for Mr. Lloyd George to raid.—Yours, &c.,

ALBERT RAPHAEL.

National Liberal Club,
October 6th, 1908.

Poetry.

NIL NISI DIVINUM STABILE EST.

AGAIN I trod the purple heath,
Again beheld the golden grain,
And eastward saw the summer main
That crowns the hollows far beneath.

Far other was that cold grey tide
When we two climbed o'er cliff and dale;
No glory shone through Nature's veil,
Yet all was sun with thee as guide.

We dreamed not that thy force would end,
Thy prophet's voice and fire and might.
With Thought and Love thy source and light
We called thee comrade, hailed thee friend.

Again by thy loved sea I trod
And marked the heather's purple glow;
Still thou wast with me, for I know
Undying are the sons of God.

A. R.

The World of Books.

THURSDAY NIGHT.

THE publication of the correspondence between Dickens and Maria Beadnell by the Bibliophile Society of Boston throws a certain amount of fresh light upon Dickens's character and writings, though most of what is in the volume had been known or guessed at by previous biographers. Dickens fell in love with Maria Beadnell in 1832. She treated him rather badly, and two years later he married Catherine Hogarth. None the less, his love for Maria was the most serious and lasting passion of his life, and when twenty years later the correspondence was renewed, he had nothing but tender memories of the past. "I fancy," he wrote, "though you may not have thought in the old time how manfully I loved you, that you may have seen in one of my books a faithful reflection of the passion I had for you, and may have thought that it was something to have been loved so well, and may have seen in little bits of 'Dora' touches of your old self sometimes, and a grace that may be revived in your little girls years hence, for the bewilderment of some other young lover—though he will never be as terribly in earnest as I and David Copperfield were." When some time afterwards Dickens met Maria his disillusionment was complete, and the interview in "Little Dorrit" between Arthur Clennam and Flora Finching is apparently suggested by the encounter. The letters prove that "David Copperfield" and "Little Dorrit" are even more autobiographical than had generally been supposed.

* * *

ANOTHER series of love letters which is sure to create great interest is announced by Mr. Lane for publication next year. "The Love Letters of Mrs. Carlyle" contain, we are told, evidence that the marriage of the Carlyles was a genuine love marriage on both sides, and that it remained so. The domestic relations of the Carlyles have been dragged so much into the public view that it is perhaps as well—objectionable as the publication of such letters is as a rule—that all remaining evidence should be made available.

* * *

FOR an example of how an apparently well-intentioned critic may misinterpret a poet's attitude towards public affairs it would be hard to beat an appreciation of Mr. William Watson's verse to be found in a recent number of "East and West." Mr. Watson, says the writer, "resembles Rudyard Kipling in the exhibition of a haughty and exclusive spirit of national imperialism which is inconsistent with the breadth of sentiment that must characterise a true poet. His voice is not raised in the cause of universal freedom and liberty. The struggles of fallen nations in their efforts for emancipation command no sympathy from him as they do from Byron or Shelley, nor do the triumphs and achievements of countries other than his own call forth his unstinted admiration." If we delete all the negatives in the last two sentences we shall be nearer the truth. If any poet of our day can claim to have defended struggling nationalities even against the dominant sentiment of his own country we should have thought that it was Mr. Watson.

* * *

IF we are to judge from an interview with Mr. Joseph Pennell reported in the Saturday edition of "The New York Times," the coming biography of Whistler will give a decidedly different impression from that ordinarily set forth by those who have written about him. "The Whistler pictured by my wife and me," said Mr. Pennell, "is not at all the cantankerous, conceited, combative person who has been made to strut around in Whistler's clothes. We have tried to reveal a more intimate, truer side of the man than has been attempted heretofore. You know, Whistler had had a rough time of it in many ways during his life; he had suffered much and was innately sensitive. It was this fact, I think, that led him to adopt a rather repellent, disagreeable attitude towards people, an attitude that served him, as it were, as a kind of rough armour through which the casual thrusts incident to human intercourse could not penetrate. Personally, outside of his art, he was one of the most lovable and interesting of friends, besides being a wit and a thorough man of the world . . . a modern Benvenuto Cellini in his way of looking at things." Whistler gave Mr. and Mrs. Pennell great help in collecting materials, and their book will contain a full account of such slightly known passages in the painter's life as his curious filibustering expedition to Chile, his first studies in Russia, as well as his own version of Bohemian life in Paris. Another feature of the book will be the illustrations, many of them being from pictures by Whistler which have not been reproduced elsewhere. It will be issued by Mr. Heinemann towards the end of the month.

* * *

EVERY reader of Mr. Lionel Tollemache's essays must have been struck by the skilful way in which their author can form a mosaic of the characteristic sayings and doings of the many distinguished men he has known. "Safe Studies" and "Stones of Stumbling" are two books that it would be hard to beat either for witty anecdotes or for the apt use of "unfamiliar quotations from familiar authors." Indeed, Mark Pattison scarcely exaggerated when he said that it seemed as if Mr. Tollemache "could draw at pleasure upon all literature, from the classics down to Robert Montgomery and Swinburne." We may accordingly expect an abundance of good stories in a volume of reminiscences extending over half a century which, under the title "Old and New Memories," will be published shortly by Mr. Edward Arnold. The author's father, the first Baron Tollemache, Dr. Vaughan of Harrow, the Duke of Wellington, Lord Houghton, Lord and Lady Mount Temple, and Fitz-James Stephen are a few of those concerning whom we are promised characteristic anecdotes to be published for the first time in Mr. Tollemache's volume.

* * *

A NEW edition on an elaborate plan of Montaigne's "Essays" will be published by Mr. Grant Richards in the late autumn. The text is that twice revised by Florio and printed in 1632, nearly thirty years after the editio princeps of 1603. The introduction by Mr. Thomas Seccombe will be in four sections, dealing respectively with the preliminary history of the essayist, his seclusion and intellectual development as seen in the essays, his public life as magistrate and traveller, and finally the building up of Montaigne as we know him through legend, commentary, and translation, since his death in 1592. Much stress must always be laid on the travels, both those in the book-tower and those in the world outside, by anyone who would understand Montaigne, and we gather that Mr. Seccombe has given considerable attention to this side of his subject. Those interested in the resolute John Florio will find a very interesting portrait engraved by W. Hole, and dated 1611, in one of the show-cases in the King's Library at the British Museum. It is attached to the English-Italian Dictionary dedicated to James I.'s Consort, Queen Anne, whose "praelector" Florio was.

* * *

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

"The Collected Works in Verse and Prose of William Butler Yeats." Vols. I. and II. (A. H. Bullen and Chapman & Hall. 4 guineas the set of eight vols.)

"Memoirs of the Dukes of Urbino, 1440-1630." Edited by Edward Hutton. (Lane. 3 vols. 42s. net.)

"Memories of My Life." By Francis Galton. (Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.)

"Reminiscences of Lady Randolph Churchill." By Mrs. George Cornwallis West. (Arnold. 15s.)

"The Greatness and Decline of Rome." By Guglielmo Ferrero. Vol. III. (Heinemann. 6s. net.)

"The Early History of the Tories." By C. B. Roylance Kent. (Smith, Elder. 12s. 6d. net.)

"The Medici Popes." By Herbert M. Vaughan. (Methuen. 15s. net.)

"New Zealand." Painted by F. & W. Wright. Described by W. P. Reeves. (Black. 20s. net.)

"Along the Rivieras of France and Italy." By Gordon Home. (Dent. 7s. 6d. net.)

"The People of the Polar North." By Knud Rasmussen. (Kegan Paul. 1 guinea net.)

"A Short History of Engraving and Etching." By A. M. Hind. (Constable. 18s. net.)

"Man and the Universe." By Sir Oliver Lodge. (Methuen. 7s. 6d. net.)

"Buddhist Essays." By Paul Dahlke. (Macmillan. 10s. net.)

"Literary and Biographical Essays." By James Baker. (Chapman & Hall. 7s. 6d. net.)

"The Man Who Understood Women." By Leonard Merrick. (Nash. 6s.)

"Amabel Channice." By Anne Douglas Sedgwick. (Arnold. 6s.)

"La Foire sur la Place." Roman. Par Romain Rolland. (Paris: Ollendorff. 3 fr. 50.)

Reviews.

THE FLAVOR OF THE EAST.*

"THERE are certain notes of the East," writes Miss Jebb, "which form part of a tune sung all the world over, but which give a clearer and more definite sound in the land which first gave them birth." These "notes," the tune of an intimate daily life from which the life of a restless Western civilisation is but a variation, and perhaps a transitory one, may serve as a test of the success or failure of any book of travel. It is not important that the wayfarer should describe places, estimate economic or military possibilities, grimace or guffaw over the abnormal adventure. What is important is that the encompassing atmosphere of strange and far-off places should be embedded in the narrative, immediately recognisable by those who have traversed similar journeys: so that the reader at once enters into a region where his customary experience is challenged by an existence remote from, but as real as, anything that he has ever known. And here Miss Jebb has been wonderfully successful. In this record of pilgrimage by desert ways to Baghdad she has been able, by careful observation of the passing phase, the panorama of life leisurely unfolded, to soak into her pages the very sense and flavor of the East. The "enormous disarray" of that Turkish dominion which occupies the site of so many vanished nations rises up and envelops like a garment. The peoples are here, and the places which have fashioned the peoples; the conquering and the subservient races, the mud and stones and ruins of dead cities. The very scent of the East is sharp and tingling to the nostrils. Its acquiescence, its patience, its weariness, stretch away to a far horizon. The author knows the importance of the little things, that the expectation of dinner counts for more than the expectation of death; that a few words by the roadside, a meeting or a parting, a momentary quarrel, offer a revelation of forces operative beneath a mask of indifference supremely valuable to the observer. The journey was unconventional, and the record of it unconventional also. The narrator possesses a quick and lively sense of humor, and can rejoice over many discomforting incidents. The route of travel lay through unfrequented ways, across scenes of historic interest. And the result is one of the most entertaining and most illuminative books of Eastern travel which has recently been issued. The changes—long resisted, now it appears hurrying eagerly forward—which have swept this congeries of nations which we term the Turkish Empire into the full stream of modern progress, will, in a few years' time, make this "unchanging East" but the memory of a dream. Already, over a great part of this route, the coming Baghdad railway is rolling back the domination of caprice and temporal decay. It is well that, before this process is accomplished, some such records as these should continue to reveal in literature the life of this lost land of dead Empires, while yet its sleep remained unharmed.

The journey undertaken by Miss Jebb and Miss "X" was of three parts. The first was the progress through comparatively settled districts and in part by the railway, from Brusa over the Taurus and the Euphrates to Diarbekr, high on the Tigris. The second was the floating down the river on a raft made of skins from Diarbekr to Baghdad. The third was the return journey past the site of Babylon and the ruins of Palmyra across the desert to Damascus. The travellers thus sampled all the variable influences of Eastern things—the River, the Mountains, the Desert. Adventures—in the recognised sense of the word—were not noteworthy: there was an attempted attack by brigands at a narrow gorge of the Tigris, a risky storm on the same river; one dangerous moment, when, in a distant centre of fanaticism, a sacred mosque was almost violated by the heedless step of the infidel. But in the main the adventure is of the kind common to all travel: the discomfort of storms and misfortune, the varying company of the way. It is a series of pictures that Miss Jebb presents to her readers: now the start of the caravan before dawn: now the welcome relief at sunset—sunset in the desert, with the evening meal preparing, and the tired travellers glad that the day is done: now the tranquillity and timeless rest of floating day after day down a river which never has an end: now the peculiar impression of the poetry of time in the visit to Harran or Nineveh or Babylon. Eastern travellers will rejoice with her over the permanent assets of Eastern travel. The present writer has also experienced that system of personal intercourse, at first so awkward to the Western impatience, afterwards so attractive, of communication and sympathy expressed in silence rather than in speech: has been first exasperated and then amused by the complete indifference to time and appointments: has learnt that it is better to laugh—not at the East, probably—if all the truth were known—with the East—rather than to attempt to "hustle" it. To every traveller such conversation as this will awake agreeable memories:—

> "The cook came in with a pleasing expression.
> "'What will you have for supper?' he asked.
> "'What can we have?' we answered, with the caution arising from long experience of limited possibilities.
> "'What you wish,' he said, with as much assurance and affability as if he was presenting a huge bill of fare.
> "'Get a fowl,' I said.
> "'There is not one left here,' he answered.
> "'Eggs, then,' I suggested, with the humor of desperation.
> "'No fowl, how eggs?' he answered, with pitying superiority.
> "'Well, we will have what there is,' I said.
> "'There is nothing,' he answered, cheerfully."

Miss Jebb, like most Eastern travellers, was charmed with the Turk, and moved to no enthusiasm over the Eastern Christian. In a fine piece of portraiture she draws the contrast vividly: between Hassan, the Turk who accompanied them, faithful, dignified, courteous, picturesque; and Arten, the Armenian cook, "quick, thin, methodical, dirty, intelligent, untruthful." In his shabby European clothes, his voluble futility, his alternating boastings, terrors, and boastings renewed, he stands as a figure suitable for nothing (in the opinion of many) but to be driven and controlled by a more reputable Government of a dominant and conquering race. This writer, however, does not fall into that facile error. She recognises the Armenian as the product of a system—the result of so many centuries of oppression. The Turk, an aristocracy, cultivating the arts of life upon the servile labor of other races, can exhibit, like all similar aristocracies—the aristocracy of the Southern States of America, the aristocracy of the English in Ireland—attractive human qualities. But these human qualities are sucked from the degradation of the races below them. Arten trembling in terror before the menace of Ibrahim Pasha is a sufficiently disconsolate spectacle; but there is point and some pathos in his reply to the English persons who reproach him with his cowardice. "'What is it to you?' he said one day. 'You have rich relations, kind friends, and a just Government. If you are robbed, justice is done to you. But what can I expect but more abuse and ill-treatment—and I have a wife and small children also?'" The travellers suffer from disgust at such a spectacle, at the inefficiency and impudence of this representative of Christianity in presence of the Mahommedan: yet the final verdict is a kindly one. "A man who was meant by nature to be light-hearted and happy," is Miss Jebb's summary, "kind to his fellows, energetic and interested in his work, ambitious for his children, but who fate dictated was to have his spirit quenched, his nature hardened, and mean and cowardly qualities developed, owing to the fear, injustice, and poverty in which, like the rest of his countrymen, he was condemned to live."

How far this will be changed, or, indeed, can ever be changed, is a doubtful question to which this book provides no answer. Certainly change is here—knocking at the doors:—

> "The Baghdad railway was everywhere in the air. No one spoke openly about it; its coming seemed enveloped in such a shroud of mystery that one felt there was a sort of halo around its birth. At first one mentioned it boldly by name: and at once the official would put on his most discreet and

* "By Desert Ways to Baghdad." By Louisa Jebb (Mrs. Roland Wilkins). Fisher Unwin. 10s. 6d. net.

impressive manner, and refer to the will of Allah: the merchant would nod mysteriously and then wink with evident satisfaction. 'It comes! oh yes, it comes! but it is better not to talk of it yet.' And the Zaptieh would sigh heavily, thinking of his unpaid wages, and say 'Please God, it comes'; and then look hastily round to see who had overheard him."

Certainly the East changes: and on no surface of the world is the evidence more vocal, written large on the rock and the sand, of the fulfilment of all historic prophecy of doom on Empires which established themselves upon conquered and oppressed peoples. Here is Babylon as described by Herodotus, with its square walls each fourteen miles long, each with twenty-four gates of brass, quays, balconies, palaces, hanging gardens—the wonder of the world. And here is Babylon as seen by the explorer to-day, a literal vindication, complete to the letter, of those amongst its subjugated races who prophesied its destruction. The great city has become a heap: mounds and marshes and barren stones, inhabited by doleful creatures, the owl and the jackal, doomed perpetually, as in the exultant vision of her enemies, to remain "a dry land, a wilderness, a land where no man comes."

A GREAT PREACHER.*

This is an abbreviation or summary of Mr. Allen's previous work. Much of it has, as he says, been rewritten. But he claims to have preserved whatever was valuable in the larger book, and to have omitted nothing of permanent or personal interest. Phillips Brooks was the most popular preacher that the United States ever heard. His eloquence was famous in a country of speakers, and yet it never sank to mere rhetoric. He put life into everything he took up, and he was absolutely fearless in the expression of his opinions. He often came into conflict with local prejudices and even with theological principles. Nor was he indifferent to the opposition he encountered. Yet he continued his course without flinching and those who dissented from him the most did not respect him the least. He was in sympathy with all Christian churches, though the Broad Church party in the Church of England was that which attracted him most. Maurice and Stanley among modern divines seemed to him the most in harmony with the rational godliness which he preached. To be spiritual without being dogmatic was the aim of his life, and the foundation of his creed. A thorough American in the tone and temper of his mind, he appreciated other countries, especially England, which he understood better than almost any of his compatriots. He preached in Westminster Abbey, and other London churches, with immense rapidity of utterance, readiness of thought, and fluency of language. Yet everything he said had been most carefully prepared, and he frequently had to protest against the notion that he trusted to the inspiration of the moment. He was, in fact, one of the most painstaking men that ever addressed an audience, never losing an opportunity of acquiring information, or correcting knowledge by experience.

Phillips Brooks first became known to his countrymen at the Harvard Commemoration of 1865 after the close of the war. He had been chosen to offer the special prayer on the occasion, and his words, which have not been preserved, were described at the time as the "crowning grace" of the ceremony. They had more immediate effect than Lowell's famous Ode. After this he began to be recognised as an American celebrity, and any position he desired in the Episcopal Church seemed open to him. Yet he was never able to understand the reason, or to forget the duty which lay nearest him, be it what it might. Even Trinity Church, Boston, which became the chief scene of his labors, was only accepted after a long period of reluctant hesitation. As soon as he came he filled the Church, and full it remained while he was there. It was a strange fascination that he exercised, but not more strange than true. Perhaps it was in some measure due to the fact that he went his own way, quite heedless of public opinion unless he happened to agree with it. The most genial of men, he always followed the light of his own principles in the simple faith that it could not lead him astray. He persuaded himself that he was a Broad Churchman, and yet no Ritualist could have been more punctilious in the performance of minute ecclesiastical details. Even his theological orthodoxy proved quite impervious to assault, because he did not commit himself to statements which he had not thoroughly worked out in his own mind. Intolerant he could never be. He had a natural gift for detecting what was good in all creeds, and producing it for the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States. "It is," he said, "the religion of most demands that has most ruled the world." Mr. Allen says that "preaching was what he lived for," and the subject seems to have constantly filled his mind. His apparent spontaneity resulted from a preparation which was not mechanical, but the regular process of a mental training that never wholly ceased. If he seemed to learn without trouble, and retain without effort, the reality was that preparation had made it difficult for him to misunderstand, and impossible for him to forget. He was, before all things, practical, and had a noted power of putting himself in sympathy with an audience by discussion of a difficulty from their point of view. There was no haziness or mistiness in his methods, and he did not shrink from repetition if by repeating he could be more impressive. His extraordinary fluency of expression never led him to preach for the sake of talking. It was characteristic of his sermons that he came to the point at once instead of leading up to it by degrees, and amplified it afterwards if it required amplification. Although he was not much restrained by conventional rules, he did not aim at being unconventional, and there was in his nature an element of intense Conservatism. It was hard to make him give up anything to which he had been accustomed. In the end he almost always had his own way. Opponents were compelled at last to acknowledge that his reasons were sound, and they were urged with such temperate mildness that they could not give offence. His influence over the minds of others was so wonderful that it might be compared with some of these phenomena which men of science find most difficult to explain. He never set up for a faith-healer, or a thought-reader. He merely tried to share with others the radiant confidence that he felt himself. His own personality was the source of interest, though his sermons might be the principal means of calling it forth. All his efforts were directed to unselfish ends, and succeeded because they never aimed at success. He could not ignore the fact that he was a popular preacher. He could only treat his popularity as an accident, and his work as the essence of his life. Although there was no step in the progress of his age which he did not follow with sympathetic ardour, he lived in the duties of his post, whatever it might be, uniting the highest with the simplest, and treating nothing as either too high or too low. He had a robust belief in democratic institutions, and at the same time a faith that it was the people which made them sound. To him the force of character was almost everything, and the forms in which it expressed itself were almost nothing. He had grown up during the great struggle for the emancipation of the slaves, and had never lost throughout it his confidence in Lincoln as the one man who could guide the Union to victory. Yet he was wholly free from national arrogance, feeling that the place of the United States in history did not require any adventitious support. With him tolerance was not compromise, charity involved no surrender of conviction, and his own opinions were held with the more tenacity because he never tried to control the opinions of others. He knew too well how he came by his views to admit the possibility of forcing assent.

It is not the events of Phillips Brooks's life, but the life itself, that justifies a book like this. Brevity has not been studied, even in the abbreviation. But the salient points are easily seen, for the character of the man stands out in the sharpest of outlines, and the reader seems to hear his voice. Much of what the voice said is remote from the problems which the American people have to solve now. But still they cannot do better than solve them by an application of the principles, an acceptance of the doctrines, and an adoption of the methods which Phillips Brooks here lays down.

* "Phillip Brooks 1835-1893." Memoirs of his Life, with Extracts from his Letters and Notebooks. By Alexander V. G. Allen. Hodder & Stoughton. 10s. 6d. net.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE Announcements

THEOLOGICAL TRANSLATION LIBRARY

Subscribers obtain Three Vols. for 22s. 6d. post free, payable in advance. Separately the Volumes cost 10s. 6d. net, postage extra.

Subscriptions for forthcoming year now due, and will include :—

NEARLY READY. DEMY 8VO.

ETHICS OF THE CHRISTIAN LIFE.

By THEODOR HAERING,

Professor of New Testament Dogmatics and Ethics at Tubingen.

IN THE PRESS.

PRIMITIVE CHRISTIANITY :

Its writings and Teachings in their Historical Connection.

Vol. II.—Historical Books.

By OTTO PFLEIDERER, D.D.,

Professor of Practical Theology in the University of Berlin.

The Third Volume to complete this Subscription has not yet been decided upon. Complete List of Volumes in the Library post free.

NEW EDITION, entirely Reset, with much new matter and Maps. ALMOST READY.

THE MISSION AND EXPANSION OF CHRISTIANITY IN THE FIRST THREE CENTURIES.

By ADOLF HARNACK, D.D., Berlin.

Translated and Edited by Rev. JAMES MOFFATT, D.D.

In Two Vols., about 1,100 pages. Demy 8vo, cloth, 25s. net.

CROWN THEOLOGICAL LIBRARY.

IN ACTIVE PREPARATION. Crown 8vo, cloth.

PHILOSOPHY OF THE CHRISTIAN LIFE.

By RUDOLF EUCKEN, Professor of Philosophy in Jena.

DR. ADOLF HARNACK'S NEW TESTAMENT STUDIES.

Vol. III. Nearly Ready. 6s. THE ACTS OF THE APOSTLES.

Vol. II. Ready. 6s. THE SAYINGS OF JESUS.

Vol. I. Ready. 6s. LUKE THE PHYSICIAN.

READY. Demy 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d. net.

NATIONAL IDEALISM AND THE BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER.

An Essay in Re-interpretation and Revision.

By STANTON COIT, Ph.D.

Viewing the Church as ideally the country's moral university and the clergy as its ethical teachers, he urges that a revision of the Prayer Book should be governed by the principles of psychology and sociology, and directed to the end of strengthening and disciplining individual character for social service.

Just Ready. Large Crown 8vo, cloth, 5s.

DEMOCRACY AND CHARACTER.

By REGINALD STEPHEN, M.A.,

Canon of St. Paul's Cathedral Melbourne. Being the Moorhouse Lectures for 1908.

Just Ready. Crown 8vo, cloth 5s. net.

DE PROFUNDIS CLAMAVI, AND OTHER SERMONS.

By JOHN HUNTER, D.D.

SIR EDWARD RUSSELL, in Liverpool Post: 'What we chiefly notice is that Dr. Hunter is distinguished from other advanced divines of the time by retaining stoutly the old severe ideas as to the fact and importance of personal sin, which has of late been daringly and dangerously sophisticated."

Just Ready. Crown 8vo, cloth 3s. net ; 3s. 3d. post free.

LIGHT FROM EGYPTIAN PAPYRI

On Jewish History before Christ.

By Rev. C. H. H. WRIGHT, D.D.

Demy 8vo, 2 Vols., cloth, 10s. 6d. each.

HISTORY OF THE HEBREWS.

By R. KITTEL,

Ordinary Professor of Theology in the University at Breslau.

Demy 8vo, 2 Vols., 10s. 6d. each.

THE APOSTOLIC AGE.

By Prof. CARL VON WEIZSACKER.

WORKS BY HERBERT SPENCER.

"Extremely Interesting Volumes."—Spectator.

REDUCED EDITION, JUST READY.

2 vols. demy 8vo, cloth, gilt tops, with a number of Illustrations, some in Photogravure, 12s. 6d. net; 13s. 6d. post free.

AN AUTOBIOGRAPHY BY HERBERT SPENCER.

"Without committing ourselves to any definite opinion in regard to the two methods, we may say that he was in many ways singularly well equipped for the undertaking.

"Though betrayed at times into a mood of not unnatural complacency, he contrives to maintain throughout an attitude of detachment and impartiality as consistent as it is remarkable."—Spectator.

"It is the work of a man who devoted his life to high and disinterested aims, and accomplished a task to which no parallel can be found in the history of English thought."—Times.

A SYSTEM OF SYNTHETIC PHILOSOPHY.

	s.	d.
FIRST PRINCIPLES. Thoroughly Revised. Popular Re-issue now ready	7	6
PRINCIPLES OF BIOLOGY. 2 Vols. (Revised and Enlarged)	36	0
PRINCIPLES OF PSYCHOLOGY. 2 Vols.	36	0
PRINCIPLES OF SOCIOLOGY. Vol. I.	21	0
Ditto Vol. II.	18	0
Ditto Vol. III.	16	0
PRINCIPLES OF ETHICS. Vol. I.	15	0
Ditto Vol. II.	12	6
JUSTICE (Separately)	6	0

READY.

Uniform with New Edition of "First Principles." Entirely reset. Cloth, 3s. net.

THE DATA OF ETHICS.

OTHER WORKS.

	s.	d.
THE STUDY OF SOCIOLOGY	10	6
EDUCATION (Cheap Edition)	2	6
ESSAYS. 3 Vols. ... 30s. (or each Vol. 10s.)
FACTS AND COMMENTS	6	0
VARIOUS FRAGMENTS. Enlarged Edition	6	0
SOCIAL STATICS AND MAN v. STATE ...	10	0
MAN v. STATE (Separately)	1	0
AGAINST THE METRIC SYSTEM. Third Edition, with Additions	0	3

Digest of Mr. Herbert Spencer's Works. Fifth and Enlarged Edition. The Philosophy completed, now ready. 8vo, cloth, price 21s.

Epitome of the Synthetic Philosophy of Herbert Spencer.

By F. HOWARD COLLINS. With a Preface by HERBERT SPENCER.

Fourth Large Impression.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. net; 2s. 9d. post free.

LIFE AND MATTER.

By SIR OLIVER LODGE.

Demy 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d.

The Religions of Authority and the Authority of the Spirit.

By the late AUGUSTE SABATIER, Professor of the University of Paris.

Demy 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d. net.

INTRODUCTION TO THE CANONICAL BOOKS OF THE OLD TESTAMENT.

By CARL CORNHILL,

Professor of Old Testament Theology at the University of Breslau.

OCTOBER NUMBER READY. 2s. 9d. post free.

THE HIBBERT JOURNAL.

Yearly Subscription 10s. post free.

THE MISCARRIAGE OF LIFE IN THE WEST. By P. RAMANATHAN, C.M.G., K.C.

A GREAT SOCIAL EXPERIMENT. By Rev. CHAS. PLATER, S.J.

HEGEL AND HIS METHOD. By Prof. WILLIAM JAMES.

A CHINESE STATESMAN'S VIEW OF RELIGION. By CHARLES JOHNSON.

From other CONTENTS:

THE MOSLEM TRADITION OF JESUS' SECOND VISIT ON EARTH. By Captain F. W. VON HERBERT.

INFALLIBILITY AND TOLERATION. By F. C. S. SCHILLER.

A NEGLECTED ARGUMENT FOR THE REALITY OF GOD. By C. S. PEIRCE.

DETERMINISM AND MORALS. By the Hon. BERTRAND RUSSELL.

PAIN. By Miss CAROLINE STEPHEN.

THE "JERAHMEEL THEORY." By the Rev. T. K. CHEYNE, D.Litt., D.D.

HOW MAY CHRISTIANITY BE DEFENDED TO-DAY? By Professor A. C. M'GIFFERT.

BOOKLESS RELIGION. By JAMES MOFFATT, D.D.

EVANGELICAL BARGAINING. By JOHN PAGE HOPPS.

Discussions. Reviews. Bibliography of Recent Literature.

WILLIAMS and NORGATE. 14, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

WREN AND THE RENAISSANCE.*

In estimating the work of a man like Wren, a man admittedly of genius, standing head and shoulders above all others as the exponent of a certain style of architecture as that style is known in England, there is always a danger of our judging by our own local interpretation of such a style, and ignoring the more universal standard of excellence which properly belongs to it. It was not so many years ago that English writers habitually spoke of English Gothic as though it were supreme of its kind, and only recently have we come to recognise that, in many essentials, French Gothic is of a far higher type than our own. In the same way it is usual for critics to refer to Wren's Renaissance churches as buildings of positive excellence of their kind, without considering what their relation may be to Renaissance architecture in general. Miss Milman, who has just written a very excellent life of Wren, and whose remarks on his work are carefully thought out and full of penetration, nevertheless falls into this mistake. Because Wren is by far the most powerful and consistent architect in the Renaissance manner we have had in England, she seems to assume that he must necessarily rank as one of the great leaders of that style, forgetting, apparently, that the principles of Renaissance architecture, to which we must appeal before we can speak of positive excellence, were developed and must be sought elsewhere than in England.

Technically, no doubt, the cut and dried explanation of the Renaissance, that it was a revival of classic forms, is correct, but it is important to notice that the mind of Italy had been ripening for this kind of architectural expression for a long time previous to its adoption of classic models. It had, that is to say, been for long fumbling and feeling its way towards an architecture of horizontal rather than vertical development. From Fergusson downward, all northern authorities agree in their indictment of Italian Gothic, which they assure us was but a feeble and ill-understood imitation of the strenuous original. Still, a close inspection does reveal this: that all the alterations wrought by Italian builders in the northern style were wrought with a definite and uniform purpose. Their design was, invariably, to give breadth and spaciousness to a mode of building certainly very ill-adapted to the embodiment of those qualities. The fervour, the spiritual enthusiasm, of genuine Gothic were, from the first, distasteful to the Italian temperament. The Italian temperament, with its strong admixture of classic breeding and sentiment, never found itself in the intense spirituality of Gothic. Its instincts were more genial and humane, but, at the same time, more mundane. Its chief thought was the old classic thought, not so much to gaze upward as to look around and make the most of the present world, and the architectural expression of that thought is not vertical, but horizontal expansion. Accordingly, it set about widening and expanding the rigid proportions of Gothic, and giving them that air of breadth and spaciousness which it prized above all things as the expression of its own view of life. And this it did with a perseverance and consistency which clearly reveal the trend of its endeavor; so that when the classic revival really came it came as a solution towards which the country had evidently been working for a long time previously; indeed, it is obvious that, if there had been no classic models existing, and, consequently, no classic revival possible, Italy would still have evoked a style of her own in all essentials similar. There is no very distinct break between Italian Renaissance and the style that preceded it, for the noble width of the buildings of Brunelleschi and Bramante is but the triumph of a determination which had long been working towards this end.

All this shows how deep and genuine, how native to the soul, the love of the horizontal style in Italy has always been. We must, if we can, if we are to judge rightly of Renaissance architecture, identify ourselves with this feeling. We must experience the attraction of the many-sided culture and universal curiosity and love of all mundane knowledge which were seething in the mind of Italy at that time, and experience them to that degree that the ample scope and space which were the effects they wrought in architecture, and which are their own aesthetic expression, become in turn beautiful. Having thus grasped, through and under the forms it employed, the spirit of Renaissance architecture, if we turn again westward and observe this style making its unwilling appearance and slow progress in England, we shall be struck by a curious coincidence. We shall find all the conditions reproduced in England in regard to Renaissance architecture which we had observed in Italy in regard to Gothic. Not only was the Renaissance style as alien to the north as Gothic to the south, and received with the same tardiness and unwillingness, but it was open to exactly the same kind of criticism It was a misunderstood style; it imitated, as Freeman says of Italian Gothic, "the form but not the spirit" of the original. Yet, here again, if we examine the modifications upon which the north insisted, we trace a distinct purpose in them. Their aim always is to diminish and contract the amplitude of the imported style and substitute some of the Gothic narrowness and height. The northern mind has a certain hankering all through the Renaissance epoch after the proportions of that architecture in which its own deepest emotions had once been incarnated, and even when this hankering was not strong enough to effect a revival of Gothic forms it was strong enough to hinder a genuine and full appreciation of the Italian ideal. We have, in short, only to familiarise ourselves sufficiently with the beauty and harmony of the ideal of lateral expansion, as exemplified in the palaces and churches of Italy, to be conscious that this beauty was just as little understood in England as the beauty of vertical development had been understood in Italy.

This was the handicap which Wren labored under. Without doubt he was a man of genius, but he had the misfortune to be dealing with a set of ideas, not in their full vigor and at their source, but as they appeared reflected in the medium of a national temperament, in the main antipathetic to them. The consequences are felt in all he did. In the case of his most famous achievement, St. Paul's, Miss Milman argues that the central area beneath the dome is in itself an adequate expression of the idea of breadth. But it is not very easy in any building to separate any portion from the rest and accept that portion as embodying an ideal not elsewhere carried out. The eye involuntarily grasps the capabilities of the whole structure, and as the nave, aisles, and transepts of St. Paul's entirely fail to convey the sensation of lateral development, it follows that the total effect of the interior lacks the kind of influence and power which that style of architecture was intended to contain. Nor does Miss Milman altogether meet this criticism by the contention that, the church being built on earlier Gothic foundations, its restricted area was a matter of necessity, and therefore should not be objected to. For, in truth, there could scarcely be a severer indictment of the insight of Wren's generation into the Renaissance style of building than that it proposed to force that style into conformity with Gothic designs. Appreciation of breadth as an aesthetic ideal can scarcely have been lively when we find the greatest architectural effort of the age planned on lines which entirely precluded such a development. The truth is that Wren and his contemporaries, though learned in classic forms and details, had little real sympathy with the mental attitude to which those forms corresponded. Cornices, pilasters, architraves, and friezes were used conscientiously and diligently, but the effects which those features were intended to express were much less clearly understood.

In this sense Renaissance architecture is just as provincial in England as Gothic had been provincial in Italy. It may, perhaps be a blow to our amour propre to realise the fact, but the realisation brings its own reward. It enables us to use architecture as an interpretation of the mind of its age, and if the reader will proceed to compare the state of intellectual culture of London during the reign of Charles II. with the state of intellectual culture of Florence in the time of the Magnificent, he will at once appreciate the fidelity with which, in either case, architecture performs its interpretative functions.

* "Sir Christopher Wren." By Lena Milman. Duckworth. 7s. 6d.

SMITH, ELDER AND CO.'S PUBLICATIONS.

AUTUMN NOVELS NOW READY.—Crown 8vo, 6s. each.

DIANA MALLORY. By Mrs. HUMPHRY WARD.

FIRST LARGE EDITION EXHAUSTED. SECOND EDITION NOW READY.

From the Liverpool Daily Post.—"'Diana Mallory' is a great book, great in the charm, correctness, and restraint of its style, great in the fascinating skill with which its story is unfolded, great in its swift and dazzling flashes of portraiture."

Mr. W. L. COURTNEY, in the Daily Telegraph, says:—"One of the best of Mrs. Ward's works, dramatic in character, full of descriptive and illuminating detail, and enshrining the life history of one of the sweetest heroines whom she has ever put upon canvas."

CATHERINE'S CHILD.

By Mrs. HENRY DE LA PASTURE.

Author of "Deborah of Tod's," "Peter's Mother," &c.

Scotsman.—"Some of the best qualities of the work of the author of 'Catherine of Calais' are revealed in 'Catherine's Child.' It exhibits her genial yet shrewd philosophy of life, and the simplicity, combined with strength, of her style and the charm of her humour."

Glasgow Herald.—"Mrs. de la Pasture is a born story-teller. She has ease, genuine simplicity, and a certain fluency of style. . . . She can and does move you to tears and laughter over the doings of her characters."

WROTH. By AGNES and EGERTON CASTLE.

Athenæum.—"There is ample excitement throughout, for the story gallops along with a fine swing."

Academy.—"In this story there is no question as to the entertainment, it is capitally done."

Daily Telegraph.—"The splendid gift of straightforward narrative which Mr. and Mrs. Egerton Castle employ so skilfully sweeps away all sentiment but that of spellbound interest."

ROUND-THE-FIRE STORIES.

By A. CONAN DOYLE. With a Frontispiece.

The Times.—"When Sir Arthur Conan Doyle set about preparing a series of sensations like 'Round-the-Fire Stories' he had two qualifications very useful in such an undertaking—versatility of invention and terse style . . . there is not a dull story in the book."

Daily Telegraph.—Sir Arthur has collected such of his stories as deal with the weird, bizarre and supernatural, and who among living novelists can excel him in this particular form of literature?"

A PAWN IN THE GAME.

By W. H. FITCHETT, B.A., LL.D., Author of "Deeds that Won the Empire."

Punch.—"We know Dr. Fitchett as one who fulfils,
With quite a remarkable meed of success,
The function of gilding historical pills
By decking them out in a readable dress.
And now he's combining his facts with romance
In a novel entitled 'A Pawn in the Game';
It deals with the great Revolution in France,
And Messrs. Smith, Elder, they publish the same."

THE GREEN PARROT. By BERNARD E. J. CAPES, Author of "The Secret in the Hill," "A Castle in Spain," &c.

THE HOUSE OF THE CRICKETS. By KATHARINE TYNAN, Author of "Love of Sisters," "Her Ladyship," &c.

TORMENTILLA; or, The Road to Gretna Green. By DOROTHEA DEAKIN, Author of "The Smile of Melinda," "The Poet and the Pierrot," &c.

THE WOUNDS OF A FRIEND. By DORA GREENWELL MCCHESNEY, Author of "Cornet Strong of Ireton's Horse," &c. [In preparation.

MY FIRST AND LAST APPEARANCE, and other Original Recitations. By EDWARD F. TURNER. Being Specially Revised Selections from "T Leaves," "Tantler's Sister, and other Untruthful Stories," and "More T Leaves." Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

Dundee Advertiser.—"Just now, when the winter entertainments are beginning, the volume should be in much demand.

THE EARLY HISTORY OF THE TORIES, From the Accession of Charles II. to the DEATH OF WILLIAM III. (1660-1702). By C. B. ROYLANCE KENT, M.A., Trinity College, Oxford, and of Gray's Inn, Barrister-at-Law. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

RECOLLECTIONS OF A LIFE IN THE BRITISH ARMY during the Latter Half OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY. By General Sir RICHARD HARRISON, G.C.B., Author of "The Officer's Memo Book," &c. With Illustrations, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

CHATEAU AND COUNTRY LIFE IN FRANCE. By MARY KING WADDINGTON, Author of "Letters of a Diplomat's Wife," "Italian Letters of a Diplomat's Wife," &c., With 24 Illustrations, 8vo, 10s. 6d. net. [Ready to-day.

ON THE COROMANDEL COAST. By Mrs. F. E. PENNY, Author of "The Inevitable Law," &c. Small demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net. [October 15th.

THE STORY OF MAJORCA AND MINORCA. By Sir CLEMENTS R. MARKHAM, K.C.B., F.R.S., Author of "Richard III.: his Life and Character Reviewed in the Light of Recent Research," "King Edward VI.: An Appreciation," &c. Small demy, 7s. 6d. net. [October 15th.

PERCY, PRELATE AND POET. By ALICE C. C. GAUSSEN, Author of "A Later Pepys," "A Woman of Wit and Wisdom," &c. With a Preface by Sir GEORGE DOUGLAS. With a Photogravure Frontispiece and 7 Half-tone Illustrations, small demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net. [October 15th.

MEGGIE: a Day-Dream. By LADY ALGERNON PERCY. With 8 Full-page Illustrations by F. D BEDFORD. Crown 8vo, 6s. [In October.

SELECTED SPEECHES, POLITICAL AND FORENSIC. By Sir EDWARD CLARKE, K.C., Solicitor-General, 1886-1892, Author of "Treatise on the Law of Extradition," &c. Small demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

MEMORIES OF HALF-A-CENTURY, A Record of Friendship. By R. C. LEHMANN, M.P., Author of "Harry Fludyer at Cambridge," "The Sun Child, &c. With a Photogravure Frontispiece, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net. [In the Press.

BLACKSTICK PAPERS. By Lady RITCHIE. Mostly Reprinted from the Cornhill Magazine and the New Quarterly. With Portraits, including an unpublished Portrait of W. M. Thackeray, from a recently discovered miniature painting, large post 8vo, 6s. net. [In the Press.

EPISODES IN THE LIVES OF A SHROPSHIRE LASS AND LAD. By Lady CATHERINE MILNES GASKELL, Author of "The New Cinderella," "Spring in a Shropshire Abbey," &c. Crown 8vo, 6s. [In the Press.

THE HUMAN WOMAN. By Lady GROVE, Author of "The Social Fetich," &c. Demy 8vo, 5s. net. [In the Press.

THE MAN OF THE MASK: A Study in the Bye-ways of History, By the Very Rev. ARTHUR STAPYLTON BARNES, M.A., University College Oxford, and Trinity College, Cambridge, Chamberlain of Honour to H.H. Pope Pius IX.; Author of "The Popes and the Ordinal," "St. Peter at Rome," &c. Large post 8vo, 10s. 6d. net. [In the Press.

THE LIFE OF MIRABEAU. By S. G. TALLENTYRE, Author of "The Life of Voltaire," "The Friends of Voltaire," &c. With Illustrations, small demy, 8vo, 10s. 6d. net. [In preparation.

THE ORIGIN OF THE SENSE OF BEAUTY. By FELIX CLAY, Architect to the Board of Education; Author of "Modern School Buildings, Elementary and Secondary," &c. Large post 8vo, 6s. net. [In preparation.

Re-issue of the DICTIONARY OF NATIONAL BIOGRAPHY

Edited by LESLIE STEPHEN and SIDNEY LEE. IN TWENTY-TWO VOLUMES.

Cloth, gilt top, 15s. net each; or in half-morocco, marbled edges, 21s. net each.

VOLUMES I.—VII. NOW READY. VOL. VIII. (CLOVER-HARRIOTT) READY TO-DAY.

The Athenæum, of March 28, in reviewing the first volume of the Re-issue said:—"The series has long been appreciated by every scholar who has had anything to do with the history or biography of his own country. The popular writer appears learned by its means, and the expert differs from its results and verdicts with trepidation. It is a monument of wonderful organisation and scholarly restraint, and its mere existence in this age of hasty and ill-considered compilation is an encouragement to the 'honourable minority' who do not scamp their work, and know what real research and criticism are."

Prospectus and Specimen Pages post free on application.

London: SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15, Waterloo Place, S.W.

MORE BOOKS ON GARDENS.*

There are books about gardens, and there are books about gardening. Probably the reader knows quite as well as we do the difference between them by now, because he has been bombarded heavily with both kinds during the past few years, and they still pour from the press. Incidentally, perhaps, he has written at least one specimen himself, for the reason, as Mr. Eden Phillpotts puts it, that he is desirous "of escaping charges of eccentricity."

The two books before us are books about gardens, or, rather, one is a book about gardens, and the other is a book with "gardens" in the title, and a few passing references to plants in one or two of the chapters. This constitutes a third, and probably the largest, class. It is at least doubtful whether the reading public would tolerate the brand in any other subject, but it is a feature of the charm of the garden spirit that it accepts everything with a certain indulgence. We are not sure that "Gardens of England" is not somewhat too pretentious a title for the larger of the volumes before us. After all, there are only twenty illustrations and a dozen chapters in it. But, having said so much, we can gladly surrender ourselves to the charm of Miss Beatrice Parsons's paintings, and to the interesting and practical thoughts of Mr. E. T. Cook. We know the work of both artist and author well, and are certain of entertainment and instruction when we turn to them.

Miss Parsons does not belong to the impressionist school of flower painters, a prominent member of which is Miss Margaret Waterfield. The methods employed by the two classes of artist are essentially different. As those who have seen Miss Parsons's pictures in Dowdeswell's galleries are aware, her style is almost microscopic in fidelity to detail. This note is struck in the very first illustration in the volume before us. It depicts a London garden, with a blazing clump of scarlet gladiolus brenchleyensis in the foreground, and lofty single hollyhocks in the rear. Clumps of marigolds, poppies, sweet peas, and other brilliant summer flowers show up in lifelike array. There is the same "sharpness" in "The Dovecot, Stonelands, Sussex," the flowers in which are white Japanese anemones, red phloxes, and glaucous sea hollies. There is a shade of inequality about the rose gardens, but the "Rose Garden at Waxwell Farm, Pinner," charms us with its brick paths, its rectangular, box-lined beds full of creamy hybrid teas and flaming crimson perpetuals. "Tulips in the Garden of Peace" and "The Round Garden, Drakelowe," illustrate our point still further. Miss Parson's method may be open to criticism; certainly she oversteps the impressionist limit of giving what the ordinary observer sees, and no more. But we think that no plant student, and few flower lovers, will complain that she gives too much.

Mr. Cook chats agreeably about lavender and rosemary, about roses, about plant grouping, about flowers of the waterside, and about spring, summer, and autumn gardens. He is indubitably right when he pleads for natural masses of a limited number of kinds in herbaceous borders, and we agree with him when he asks for soft blends rather than violent contrasts. He writes both sympathetically and truly when he says:—

> "Contrasts are often very beautiful in the garden, and arrest and fascinate the eye, but it is well in the herbaceous border not to strive after contrasts so much as to endeavour to furnish a color scheme in which the strong tints shall merge imperceptibly into softer and fainter shades, thus creating a restful effect."

The chapter on roses is a sheer delight, alike in the tenderness of treatment, the suggestiveness as to methods, and the practical value of the selections of varieties. We see, from our own gardening experience, that the author both knows and loves roses. And the chapters on the seasons are so good that we are driven to regret the absence of an index, which would help us to turn up the various plants recommended at moments when pressure prevented the luxury of a re-perusal.

The pictures are admirably reproduced, and the volume, well printed and bound, will make a welcome addition to the shelf of garden books.

We are glad to have "Memories of Gardens," if only as a reminder of a clever writer, much of whose literary work was anonymous. But we do not think that Sir Rowland Blennerhassett should use the fact that he has written a memoir of the late Alexander Innes Shand to speak of Lord Ripon as "a tin god in a fool's paradise." To begin with, it is somewhat "cheap," and, in the second place, it is quite out of harmony with the spirit of the volume, which, if containing little on the subject of gardens, and that of no intrinsic value, is, nevertheless, pleasantly pastoral. Shand may have had his moments of "mocking laughter" and "grim satisfaction" at the discomfiture of men from whom he differed politically, but we do not think it was under their influence that he wrote these agreeable essays on cottage gardens, angling, golf, old waterways, and bowling greens.

* "Gardens of England." Painted by Beatrice Parsons. Described by E. T. Cook. A. & C. Black. 20s. net.
"Memories of Gardens." By Alexander Innes Shand. The West Strand Publishing Co. Ltd. 10s. 6d. net.

THE REALITIES OF WAR.*

In "Peter Moor's Journey" Gustav Frenssen has written a little masterpiece, a story that we trust will find its way into the hands of hundreds of thousands of readers, not merely in Germany, but in all parts of the civilised world. If scattered widely and published cheaply—say at sixpence instead of the four-and-six net asked for the English translation—the book would have more effect, we believe, in enlightening the plain man as to the wars of aggressive Imperialism than all the publications of the Peace Society put together. In "Peter Moor's Journey" Frenssen has woven together and summed up the experiences of various German soldiers in the Herero war, a few years back, in South-West Africa. Seemingly artless, the narrative is one of those rare pieces of art which appeal to everybody by their simple directness and force. It is not a piece of propaganda: it is a page torn from life—one of those pages, sinister, stupid, and atrocious, which history hastens to forget, and the living witnesses are always in a silent conspiracy to suppress.

Peter Moor, the son of a blacksmith, and apprenticed to his father, while doing his military service at Kiel, at the age of twenty, volunteers for South-West Africa, where, he is told by the newspapers and his commanding officer, the blacks have treacherously murdered all the farmers and their wives and children. The attitude of his parents is capitally drawn: his father asks him all sorts of questions about the country, the climate, the enemy, and the wild animals; his mother stares at the floor with great, set eyes, and suddenly throws her arms round him and weeps. On the night of departure parents, relatives, sweethearts, and friends come to the barracks, and, after dancing, drinking, and talking, the young soldiers are addressed by an old veteran, and all feel they want to fight honorably, and, if needs be, die for the honor of Germany. The voyage out is well described, and so are the soldiers' anxiety to fight, and their anger to think that the fighting may be all over before they arrive. The troops are landed at Swakopmund, where there is nothing but a few scattered houses, barren, hot sand, and pounding surf, "and not a soul to offer us a friendly greeting." After being marched inland, the men are entrained in "little rough sand-cars," and conveyed up-country. They pass through broad plateaus of reddish, yellowish earth, sparsely grown with coarse, yellow, dry grass as high as a man's knee, in which grow scattered, tough, thorny bushes, and then through endless flat land, somewhat more fertile, where everything, still, is dried up and of a grayish green color. At night they rest in station buildings of corrugated iron, walled and loopholed for defence, and in the meagre little garden they see "heaps of white stones," the graves of the German settlers who have been killed by the negroes. Then follow days and weeks of marching, "to surround the enemy in a great arc, so that they may not escape to English territory," marching under a brazen sun through thorny brush, up to the knees in wet grass, or in hot sand. The nights are bitterly cold, the rations are scanty, and the country is waterless, save at clearings, where the troops, suffering

* "Peter Moor's Journey to South-West Africa: A Narrative of the German Campaign." By Gustav Frenssen. Translated by Margaret May Ward. Constable. 4s. 6d. net.

EVENING NEWSPAPER DEVELOPMENT.

On Monday next the WESTMINSTER GAZETTE will be permanently enlarged. More space will be devoted to news, and the later editions will contain a more complete record of the news of the day than can be obtained in any other evening paper. Special features will be:

A full and accurate report of Parliament,

The latest political gossip gathered during the day by our own representatives,

Special reports of all sporting events,

Financial and trade notes, together with a full service of City and Stock Exchange news,

The news from all quarters reported with fulness and accuracy,

Making the "WESTMINSTER GAZETTE"

THE MOST COMPLETE EVENING NEWSPAPER.

Order the Enlarged WESTMINSTER GAZETTE, Beginning on MONDAY NEXT.

AUTUMN 1908

At all Libraries. At all Bookshops.

Booklovers please write for Complete Autumn List.

THE LIFE OF TOLSTOY: First Fifty Years. By AYLMER MAUDE. Demy 8vo. Illustrated. 10s. 6d. net.

"Mr. Maude brings this portent before us until we seem to see and hear him; and he has done it without flattery and exaggeration."—Pall Mall Gazette.

DOROTHEA BEALE OF CHELTENHAM. By ELIZABETH RAIKES. Demy 8vo. Illustrations. 10s. 6d. net.

"As we close the book we thank God for what Dorothea Beale was more than for what she did."—Guardian.

"Ought to be read by every intelligent Englishman and Englishwoman, especially by those who are the parents of daughters."—The Lady.

"We say to all teachers, 'Read this book, it is earnest, stimulating, and helpful.'."—The Schoolmistress.

THE PRINCESSE DE LAMBALLE. A Biography, By B. C. HARDY. Demy 8vo. Illustrated. 10s. 6d. net.

The history of the faithful Princess is here disentangled, her early disasters recorded, and the whole story brilliantly illustrated with quiet sincerity and truthfulness.

"The whole tragedy is interesting in this, its latest reconstruction, and the figure of the Princesse de Lamballe is none the less fascinating and pathetic because the author, instead of throwing about her the usual romantic veil through which she is seen as the incarnation of all the angelic virtues, depicts her as a woman with many harmless foibles and frailties, whose brain-powers were not above the average, but whose heart was true, and who was faithful even unto the death of a martyr."
—Westminster Gazette.

LIFE OF THOMAS BAILEY ALDRICH. By FERRIS GREENSLET. Demy 8vo. Illustrated. 12s. 6d. net. An Authoritative Biography, based on Letters. Famous literary men appear in these pages.

LIFE OF JOHN KEATS. By ALBERT E. HANCOCK. Demy 8vo. Illustrated. 8s. 6d. net. Professor Hancock interprets the personality of Keats in the light of fresh knowledge of the details of the poet's life.

NADIR SHAH. By SIR H. MORTIMER DURAND. Demy 8vo. Illustrated. 10s. 6d. net. The theme of this volume concerns one of Persia's national heroes. Sir Mortimer Durand has woven the historical events of this romantic biography into the form of a romance.

LIFE AND LETTERS OF H. TAINE. Volume III. Conclusion, 1871-1894. Translated from the French of E. Sparvel Bayly. Uniform with Volumes I. and II. Crown 8vo. Illustrated. 7s. 6d. net.

The Reviewer in the Spectator speaks of Taine's Letters "as one of the most interesting books he has seen for some years."

1s. net each Volume. RELIGIONS: ANCIENT AND MODERN. PHILOSOPHIES: ANCIENT AND MODERN. An excellent Series of Introductions to the great Religious and Philosophical Movements of the World. Each Volume is written by a leading authority. Detailed Prospectus post free. Write for one. 1s. net each Volume.

THE DEVELOPMENT OF THE EUROPEAN NATIONS. By J. HOLLAND ROSE. 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

"A solid, excellent, and most useful piece of work."
—Manchester Guardian.

STUDIES AND MEMORIES. By SIR CHARLES VILLIERS STANFORD. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

A collection of papers on musical subjects, dealing with, among others, Brahms, Joachim, and National Opera.

FROM AN EASY CHAIR. By SIR E. RAY LANKESTER. Crown 8vo, paper, 1s. net; cloth, 2s. net.

A book to be dipped into in leisure moments; for though its subject-matter is for the most part scientific, every word is readable and instructive.

FIRST AND LAST THINGS. By H. G. WELLS. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

Sets forth a corrected, revised, and final version of his personal religion and his social creed. "First and Last Things" knits together what he most surely believes, and is bound to take a prominent place among his books.

A SHORT HISTORY OF ENGRAVING AND ETCHING. For Collectors and Students. With full Bibliography, Classified Lists, and Index of Engravers. By A. M. Hind, of the Department of Prints and Drawings, British Museum. With many illustrations, 8vo, 18s. net.

The volume forms a corpus of information and of direction to the best authorities and sources, and makes a comprehensive book of reference for the collector and the student.

HORACE POCKET-BOOK. Arranged by S. E. WIMBOLT, with an Introduction by T. E. PAGE. Uniform with "Virgil Pocket Book." 16mo, cloth, 2s. net; leather, 2s. 6d. net.

SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

On October 14 will be published a New Story, the first for four years, by

MARY JOHNSTON, entitled

LEWIS RAND.

It will be found one of the most powerful novels of this generation.

DESIRE - - - By U. L. SILBERRAD.

THE BORDERLAND. By ROBERT HALIFAX

THE LEAVEN OF LOVE. By CLARA LOUISE BURNHAM.

LUCIUS SCARFIELD. By J. A. BEVERMORT.

THE TRAIL OF THE LONESOME PINE. By JOHN FOX, Jun.

MAYA. By LAURENCE OLIPHANT.

THE PRINCESS DEHRA. By JOHN REED SCOTT.

ARCHIBALD CONSTABLE & CO. Ltd. 10 Orange Street, Leicester Square, London, W.C.

terribly from thirst, dig for water, "often salt or brackish, or milky from lime," and oftener they don't find "even this miserable, loathsome water," and march on further, far into the night. The horses begin to die, and the soldiers get more and more weary and indifferent and flabby and weak. Three of Peter's comrades are killed at night by snipers; a month passes, and no one has yet seen the enemy. Peter gets into the habit of going over to the fire of the old African settlers, and learns with surprise how much German blood has already been spilled in this worthless and barren land. The missionaries have preached to the Hereros that the white man has come to bring them the blessings of civilisation, but the traders, the farmers, and soldiers "want to take their cattle and land gradually away from them, and make them slaves without legal rights." The uprising is a revolt of a nation against their European oppressors.

Four weeks after landing a scouting party of forty men is ambushed, and half of them are killed, their bodies, "naked, mutilated, and half devoured," being found some days after, lying in the long dry grass on a bushy slope, over which are hovering numberless eagles and vultures. Peter is promoted to be corporal, and on Easter day the column, after a serious engagement, repulses a great Herero onslaught, losing, however, thirty-two men, while many, Peter included, are wounded, and fall sick. The soldiers, ragged, ill-fed, and exhausted by the heat, fall into despondency, some dying every day of dysentery and typhoid. Peter is sent back to a typhoid camp, and thence to a place near the coast, which, in five months, has grown from five or six corrugated iron houses into an army encampment, stocked with Argentine horses and mules, oxen and wagons from Cape Town, ammunition, clothing, food, and hospital supplies from Germany. The campaign is reorganised, and again the columns trek through the bush, this time being accompanied by troops of Wittboys, "hideous-looking natives, with wild, yellow faces," recruited from the South. Peter is in the centre division of the six great divisions which are, this time, going to surround the enemy in a half-circle and crush them. There is an indecisive engagement, and the next day the division learns that the enemy has "fled to the east with their whole enormous mass—women, children, and herds"—and here we will let Peter speak for himself:—

> "The next morning we ventured to pursue the enemy. We left our unmounted men with the sick and wounded in camp, and set out towards the east, two hundred horsemen in number. But our horses were weak, half-starved or sick, and the region into which we were advancing was a waterless land and little explored. The ground was trodden down into a floor for a width of about a hundred yards; for in such a broad, thickly crowded horde had the enemy and their herds of cattle stormed along. In the path of their flight lay blankets, skins, ostrich feathers, household utensils, women's ornaments, cattle and men dead and dying and staring blankly. A shocking smell of old manure and of decaying bodies filled the hot still air oppressively.
>
> "The further we went in the burning sun, the more disheartening became our journey. How deeply the wild, proud, sorrowful people had humbled themselves in the terror of death! Wherever I turned my eyes lay their goods in quantities: oxen and horses, goats and dogs, blankets and skins. And there lay the wounded and the old, women and children. A number of babies lay helplessly languishing by mothers, whose breasts hung down long and flabby. Others were lying alone, still living, with eyes and noses full of flies. Somebody sent out our black drivers, and I think they helped them to die. All this life lay scattered there, both man and beast, broken in the knees, helpless, still in agony, or already motionless; it looked as though it had been thrown down out of the air.
>
> "At noon we halted by water-holes which were filled to the very brim with corpses. We pulled them out by means of the ox-teams from the fieldpieces, but there was only a little stinking, bloody water in the depths. We tried to dig deeper, but no water came. There was no pasturage either. The sun blazed down so hot on the sand that we could not even lie down. On our thirsty, starving horses, we thirsting and starving men rode on. At some distance crouched a crowd of old women, who stared in apathy in front of them. Here and there were oxen bellowing. In the last frenzy of despair man and beast will plunge madly into the bush, somewhere, anywhere, to find water, and in the bush they will die of thirst."

The column, for want of water, is at length forced to turn back along "the broad field of death." It returns to camp, but pestilence is in the air, and every tenth man falls sick of dysentery. News comes that "the enemy, after overcoming and passing the great stretch of waterless country, where thousands of them had perished, were situated far to the east, by some miserable water-holes." And the general decides to follow and attack them, "and force them to go northwards into thirst and death." The natives fire the bush, scouting parties are sent out to prevent them slipping by, and Peter discovers a little band of fugitives, the men of which are led away and shot, and the women and children, looking pitiably starved, are hunted into the bush. At last the forces come in touch again for a grand battue, and the army chaplain addresses the troops after they have sung the hymn, "We come to pray before a just God." The chaplain, who has a cartridge-belt round his waist, and a gold cross hanging on his breast, and is dressed in uniform, says that "a people, savage by nature, has rebelled against the authorities God had set over them. It is a serious hour. It might be that one or another might not live till the next night, but to those who seek the face of God He will bestow upon them of His eternal holiness." The columns start at ten, march all night, reach the hills by morning, and see nothing from the heights except a monstrous cloud of dust moving swiftly across the plain in the distance. The enemy, the proud nation, has lost all courage and hope, and has preferred to die in the desert. In spite of the water-holes being dry, the troops pursue the Hereros for a day and night, till every fourth man is sick with dysentery, and all are utterly exhausted, and still ahead they see two mighty clouds of dust, moving rapidly to the north and north-east towards certain death from thirst. It is the Herero nation perishing in the wilderness. But the Germans have reached their limit and turn back. A few scouts, however, volunteer to push on for some hours more, and, further on, Peter, peering by chance into some bushes, sees the dying natives sitting in crowds, shoulder against shoulder, quite motionless. "The heads of some drooped on their breasts, and their arms hung down as if they were asleep. Others sat leaning against a bush or a neighbour, breathing fast and hard, their mouths open: they regarded us with stupid eyes. Some, women and children, had laid themselves down across the legs and laps of those who were sitting. I quietly told my companions what I saw. They cast a long glance in the direction which I indicated, but said nothing." Then one of the scouts, a guardsman, realises that he had trusted too much to his strength, and that he will have to die in that place. He keeps begging mournfully for water, for only a single drop of water, but when he understands there is none, in a paroxysm of rage he kills a native whom he drags out from the bush. This incident is typical of the quiet skill of Frenssen's method. He makes us realise, in a wonderful way, the tortures of fever, sickness, thirst, and delirium borne by these German lads who have been shipped overseas, and the hideous gulf between their moral instincts as men and their deeds as mere instruments of a great State's blundering, ruinous, and ruthless policy. We speak of the atrocities of the Hun, but documents such as "Peter Moor's Journey" leave one wondering whether the Huns could ever have equalled the record of modern Europe in contact with the black races. The worst horrors are, of course, veiled by the narrative, as when Peter, after remarking on "the remarkably large number of dead and few wounded," is answered by a comrade, "Don't be so stupid, they don't make prisoners. We don't, either."

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

Mr. Frederic Harrison's new volume, to which he has given the title "Realities and Ideals" (Macmillan, 7s. 6d. net), concludes the series which began with "The Creed of a Layman," published last year. The essays included in it were written at various times during nearly half a century. They vary greatly, not only in subject, but also in length. The first one, the essay on England and France, reprinted from the book, "International Policy," occupies more than sixty pages, and there are many which are short enough for a daily paper. The book is divided into two parts, the first being called Social and Political, the second Literature and Art. There is, as Mr. Harrison contends in his preface, a unity throughout the volume, a unity of philosophy. There is, too, a unity of color. Mr. Harrison calls himself

Just Published. F'cap. 8vo. 1s. net.

DOGMA AND HISTORY.

By Professor Dr. GUSTAV KRÜGER, of Giessen.

Intended for those who have little acquaintance with the historical development of religious ideas, and especially for those who, while becoming ever more uncertain about the validity of Creeds and Dogmas, cannot see their way to true religion without them.

Crown 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

WHOSE SON IS CHRIST?

TWO LECTURES ON PROGRESS IN RELIGION.

By Professor FRIEDRICH DELITZSCH, of Berlin (Author of "Babel and Bible").

The author holds that Protestantism, when possessed of a full consciousness of its sacred task of serving the truth, will free the life and the teaching of Jesus from the dross which has collected on both and threatened to smother them.

LONDON: PHILIP GREEN, 5, ESSEX STREET, STRAND, W.C.

BOOK BARGAINS.—Garnier's English Landed Interest, 2 vols., 6s. 6d. (published 21s.) Cruikshank's 400 Humorous Illustrations, 4s. 6d. (published 16s.) Pepy's Diary, 4 vols., 15s. (published 30s.) Fennimore's Cooper's novels, 32 vols., 42s. Thackeray's complete works, 26 vols., 45s. (cost £4 12s.). Chaffer's Pottery and Porcelain, 28s. 6d. (cost 42s.). Art of Extempore Speaking, 2s. 6d. 100,000 books for sale and exchange. Menpe's World's Children, 8s. 6d. (cost 20s. net). Wood's Complete Natural History, 5 vols., 2,000 illustrations, 27s. 6d. (cost £2 12s. 6d.). Harmsworth's Encyclopædia, 8 vols., 25s. Please state wants. Catalogues free.—HOLLAND BROS., Book Merchants, 21, John Bright Street, Birmingham.

The October BOOK MONTHLY, 6d., was ready with the month, and if you have not got it do so, because it contains full information about the new books of the autumn season, with many illustrations. The number begins a new annual volume—the fifth—so now is the time to subscribe to an excellent publication. The annual subscription, post free, is 8s., or you can order the BOOK MONTHLY from any bookseller at 6d. a month.

Publishers: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & CO., Stationers' Hall Court, London, who, on hearing from you, will be glad to send a specimen copy free.

The Economist.

(ESTABLISHED 1843.)

Weekly Commercial Times, Bankers' Gazette, and Railway Monitor.

A POLITICAL, LITERARY, FINANCIAL AND GENERAL NEWSPAPER.

PRICE 8d. BY POST, 8½d. ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM, £2. COLONIES AND ABROAD, £2 4s.

The established authority on all Financial and Commercial subjects. In addition to a large high-class general circulation, the ECONOMIST is subscribed to by Banking Houses, Chambers of Commerce, Mercantile Firms, and Railway, Insurance, and other Companies throughout the United Kingdom, the Colonies and Abroad; and, as its columns from week to week show, it is the recognised organ for the announcements of some of the most important trades in the Kingdom.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY IN TIME FOR THE MORNING MAILS

Offices: GRANVILLE HOUSE, ARUNDEL STREET, STRAND, W.C., and of all Booksellers and Newsagents.

THE INDEX TO VOLUME II. OF THE NATION

Is NOW READY and can had free on application to the Manager.

MAUNSEL'S AUTUMN LIST.

CONTEMPORARY IRELAND AND THE IRISH QUESTION.

By PAUL DUBOIS. An English Translation. Edited by T. M. Kettle, M.P. In one volume. Demy 8vo. Cloth. 7s. 6d. net. [Ready 21st Oct.

This book is a translation of an important, and, perhaps, the widest, study of the Irish question that has appeared within recent years—M. Paul Dubois' "L'Irlande Contemporaine." He writes out of a great knowledge and research, having made a lengthy stay in Ireland, where he met and discussed his subject with Irishmen of all parties, and made himself familiar with every historical authority. M. Dubois starts with an historical survey, and then deals with his subject in three parts, treating of the social and political condition of Ireland at the present day, then of her material decay, and lastly of her future possibilities, her intellectual and material regeneration.

PRESS OPINIONS OF THE FRENCH VERSION.

"There can be no doubt that the reader who assimilates this book will have a thorough knowledge of present and past conditions in Ireland."—Revue d'Historie Diplomatique.

"Those who wish to follow Irish affairs will find no safer or more enlightened guide than M. Paul Dubois."—Revue Idealiste.

"The most natural expression to formulate after reading the book which M. Paul Dubois publishes so opportunely is the wish that it had appeared also in an English translation."—Daily Chronicle.

FORTHCOMING NOVELS.

BALLYGULLION. By LYNN DOYLE, Author of "The Ballygullion Creamery Society." Cr. 8vo. 6s. [Ready Oct. 25th.

A PRISONER OF HIS WORD. By LOUIE BENNETT, Author of "The Proving of Priscilla." Cr. 8vo. 6s. [Ready Oct. 30th.

DRAMA.

SEVEN SHORT PLAYS. By LADY GREGORY. With a portrait by MANCINI. Will contain "Spreading the News," "The Gaol Gate," "The Jackdaw," "Hyacinth Halvey," "The Travelling Man," "Workhouse Ward," and "The Rising of the Moon."

WHEN THE DANE HAS COME. A Play in Two Acts. By THOMAS McDONAGH. 1s. net.

POETRY.

SONGS OF ORIEL. By SHANE LESLIE. Fcap. 8vo, boards, 1s. net. [Ready Immediately.

KIRBY'S HARP. By JAMES H. COUSINS. Fcap. 8vo, 1s. net. [In Preparation.

MAUNSEL AND CO. LTD., 96, Mid Abbey Street, Dublin.

CONCERNING DEBATING CIRCLES.

ALL who are interested in the formation of Debating and Reading Circles in Clubs and Social Institutes, in town and country, should send a penny stamp for a sixteen-page booklet on HOW TO FORM A DEBATING CIRCLE to PUBLIC OPINION, 31 and 32, Temple House, Tallis Street, E.C.

Each week PUBLIC OPINION gives a series of subjects for debate. It not only gives subjects, but puts the questions to be answered and furnishes a multitude of facts and opinions with which speeches can be made on all sides. No other paper gives so much valuable information on all the great topics of the day. It presents the cream of all the best thought in the best papers and magazines and books.

Every week lengthy and informing summaries of two of the most important books are given, so that in the course of a year the reader is put in possession, by direct quotation, of over one hundred books. In fact, the information contained in this paper could not be obtained in any other way without the expenditure of many pounds.

If a paper like this interests you, write for a free specimen copy to the

MANAGER OF

PUBLIC OPINION.

31 & 32, TEMPLE HOUSE, TALLIS STREET, LONDON, E.C.

It is published at twopence weekly. Post free in the United Kingdom 10s. 10d. yearly, or 13s. yearly abroad.

an optimist, but his enthusiasm for the ultimate future of humanity seems to have reduced him to a state of despair about its immediate prospects. Politics, literature, art, wherever he looks he finds little comfort and much cause for impatience and pessimism. "As I look back over the sixty years since I first began to read freely for myself, English literature has never been so flat as it is to-day." Art is decadent, and Rodin himself is "the high priest and apostle of decadence," who, "in his desire to attain to something new in his art, has desperately plunged into the negation of art." This sad refrain runs throughout almost all Mr. Harrison's reflections on contemporary life and manners, and that, if nothing else, would save the volume from the reproach against which Mr. Harrison defends himself by anticipation in the preface—the reproach of discussing topics that are beneath the attention of a serious moralist. One of the most interesting of the essays in the volume is a slashing attack on modern examinations, which appeared during the great controversy of 1888 in the "Nineteenth Century." "Education," said Mr. Harrison in his piercing analysis, "tends to become a highly exciting match, not so much between the players as between the 'bowlers' and the 'coaches.' The teachers are slowly thrust out and controlled by the examiners: they in turn are checked and dodged at every turn by the examinees; so that learning is fast passing into the grasp of two classes of specialists, neither of whom are teachers nor pretend to teach." This essay is an admirable example of Mr. Harrison's telling combative style. But, taking all the essays together, there is a little too much of the atmosphere of combat. Mr. Harrison gives the impression of a person who is always expecting somebody to snap his head off. More than once he uses language that suggests it is almost dangerous to life and limb to say what one thinks about contemporary fashions and manners. This is unfortunate, for it gives a quite adventitious rancour to a writer who has every reason to expect a courteous and respectful audience. The most modern topic touched on is, of course, Woman's Suffrage, and Mr. Harrison discusses the whole Positivist theory of the place of women. His is a general theory that is put up to be knocked down in Mr. Meredith's "A Ballad of Fair Ladies in Revolt." But Mr. Harrison makes a handsome offer to the militant suffragettes, for he will not "impose on woman any disability which he is not willing personally to accept." It is a fine piece of old-fashioned gallantry, but we doubt whether it will pacify Miss Pankhurst or silence a single dinner bell.

* * *

In the preface to Mr. W. R. H. Trowbridge's "Seven Splendid Sinners" (Unwin, 15s. net), the author declares, with emphasis, that "in history the Individual is all in all." "The dagger of Brutus," he continues, "the eloquence of Antony, the corpse of Cæsar, possess greater significance than all the influence that converted Rome from a republic into an empire." We believe that few readers will share Mr. Trowbridge's view of history, and we are quite sure that no one who dissents from it will be won over by reading the lives of the seven ladies whom he chooses to call "splendid sinners." The claims to distinction of the Duchesse de Châteauroux and of the Duchess of Kendal lie in the exalted rank of their lovers rather than in any influence they exerted on the course of events, or of any quality of distinction possessed by either. Elizabeth Chudleigh is remembered, if she be remembered at all, as the original of Thackeray's "Beatrix." The part played by the Comtesse de Lamotte in the affair of the Diamond Necklace has made her name notorious, but she was merely the tool of others. The Duchesse de Polignac encouraged Marie Antoinette's folly, but so did dozens of others. There remain Catherine II. of Russia and Lola Montez. The latter was a mere adventuress, for whom one might easily find a fitter epithet than splendid. The former, though hypocritical and unscrupulous, did much to improve her country, and played a great part in the affairs of Europe for more than thirty years. None of the seven can be regarded as of quite the importance Mr. Trowbridge seems to imagine. Each of the seven biographies is prefixed by a quotation from Mr. Swinburne's "Dolores," a detail which is, perhaps, illustrative of Mr. Trowbridge's method of treatment.

M. Teodor de Wyzewa's "Some Women Loving or Luckless" (Lane, 7s. 6d. net), an English translation of which has been made by Mr. C. H. Jeaffreson, belongs to the same class as Mr. Trowbridge's book, though, in most respects, it is decidedly superior. We have here also a collection of biographies that make no pretension to research, and add nothing of importance to what had been known before about the subjects. The first two essays in M. de Wyzewa's book deal with "The Princess Sophia Dorothea and Philip von Königsmark" and "Queen Caroline Matilda and John Frederick Struensée." They seem to be reviews of books on these subjects by Mr. W. H. Wilkins published a few years ago, and, doubtless, served to inform French readers of the contents of these volumes. The remainder of the book is divided into three sections: "Queens in Profile," "Great Ladies and Bourgeoises," and "Authors' Wives and Literary Women." Among the Englishwomen dealt with by M. de Wyzewa in the latter section are Fanny Burney, Mary Wollstonecraft, and Mrs. Browning. The translation is capably done, and, doubtless, the book will find readers among those who like occasionally to replace fiction by the lighter forms of biography.

* * *

Following in the footsteps of Captain Mahan, Mr. Edward Fraser has established a reputation as the sympathetic interpreter of British naval history. The primary aim of his latest book on this subject, "The 'Londons' of the British Fleet" (Lane, 6s. net), is to tell the story of a famous line of warships that have borne that name; but, incidentally, he has written what is virtually a history of our Fleet from the Commonwealth to the present day. Considering the intimate connection between London and the Royal Navy since the nucleus of the latter was formed, it is strange that it was not until the middle of the seventeenth century that a battleship was named after the capital. Cromwell was responsible for so naming the vessel that was launched in 1657—the progenitor of a race that still survives in the first-class battleship of 1898, which is to-day only surpassed in her armament by the "Dreadnought." This first "London" was blown up accidentally in 1665, whereupon the City of London, by way of a display of loyalty to Charles II., presented that monarch with a second, which was named the "Loyall London." The latter fell a victim to De Ruyter's raid of the Medway in 1667. But the shell was preserved from the flames, and upon it rose the superstructure of the third "London," the prefix being struck off the title by Charles, because on this occasion the loyalty of his London citizens was not manifested in the required pecuniary form. The third "London" endured till 1701, when she was rebuilt, and was not finally broken up till 1756, after having done duty in Prince Rupert's campaign in the North Sea, at La Hogue, and—as a guardship—at the Nore. George III.'s "London" was launched in 1766. She figured chiefly in American waters during the War of Independence, and was Admiral Graves' flagship after the recall of Admiral Arbuthnot. Repaired and regunned, she was the flagship of Vice-Admiral Colpoys at the time of the Spithead Mutiny of 1797. Engaged subsequently in the attack on Copenhagen, she missed being at Trafalgar, and, after forty-five years of existence, went to the shipbreakers in 1811. There was another "London"—the last of the old order—which played her part before the batteries of Sebastopol, and the dynasty, as we have said, is not extinct. Mr. Fraser not only knows his naval history and naval architecture, past and present; he also has the quality of imagination that gives life to the expression of this knowledge. A lucid and, at the same time, dramatic style renders his book thoroughly enjoyable, even by the most casual student of a historical subject teeming with romantic and dramatic color.

* * *

"A Mariner of England" (Murray, 10s. 6d. net), consists of a selection from the journals of William Richardson, edited and prepared for publication by Colonel Spencer Childers. Richardson entered the merchant service as a cabin boy in a ship commanded by his father. He had an adventurous life, was twice the victim of the press-gang, rose to the rank of warrant officer in the Royal Navy, and died at Portsmouth in 1867 at the age of ninety-seven. His

BOOKSELLERS.

A Beautiful Large Emerald Type
10/6 OXFORD TEACHER'S BIBLE for 5/11 POST FREE.
Latest Illustrated Edition. Size 7 x 5-in.
To which are appended Notes analytical, critical, chronological, historical, and geographical, a glossary of antiquities; an abstract of modern discoveries; a dictionary of Scripture proper names; a biblica index concordance; new series of maps; and compendium of Scripture natural history. Handsome Limp Morocco binding, with overlapping sgeed, round corners, elastic band.
THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE, 53, Paternoster Row.

J. POOLE & CO., 104, Charing Cross Road, LONDON.
School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific, and Students'
BOOKSELLERS.
NEW AND SECOND-HAND.
All enquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered.

406 pages, 8vo, cloth, 2s. post free.
HEAVEN AND HELL:
Things Heard and Seen.
By EMANUEL SWEDENBORG.
JOHN GREENLEAF WHITTIER wrote:—"There is one grand and beautiful idea underlying all Swedenborg's revelations or speculations about the future life. His remarkably suggestive books are becoming familiar to the reading and reflecting portion of the community."
LONDON: SWEDENBORG SOCIETY, 1, Bloomsbury St.

SECOND IMPRESSION.
Towards a Social Policy
SUGGESTIONS FOR
CONSTRUCTIVE DOMESTIC REFORM.
By Various Writers.
Representing the conclusions of a Committee consisting of Messrs. C. R. BUXTON, H. C. FAIRFAX-CHOLMELEY, J. L. HAMMOND, F. W. HIRST, L. T. HOBHOUSE, J. A. HOBSON, C. F. G. MASTERMAN, M.P., J. H. MORGAN, and VAUGHAN NASH.

"We must all welcome, therefore, such a volume as the Speaker Office has produced under the title of 'Towards a Social Policy.' It is full of hard thinking and solid information, and should be a mine for platform speakers."—DAILY CHRONICLE.
"The book should be in the hand of everyone who loves his country. It is a lucid and comprehensive statement of the causes of the blight that is falling upon the race, and the remedies to be applied."
—DAILY NEWS.
"'Towards a Social Policy' decidedly 'gives us to think.' Its authors are doing the Liberal Party a notable service."—WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.
"They (the readers) will find within its hundred and twenty odd pages much keen diagnosis of existing evils, much outspoken criticism of the slipshod palliatives with which we have hitherto been content to attempt to meet them, and many bold suggestions—some very bold indeed—as to the direction in which the real remedies are to be found. They may not agree. They cannot fail to be interested."
—MORNING LEADER.

Crown 8vo, 1s. net; post free, 1s. 2d.

LONDON: THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY, LIMITED
14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C.

"PYRENO"
(REGISTERED).
A PERFECT UNDERWEAR.
Should any Garment shrink in the wash it
WILL BE REPLACED.

100 POINTS FOR FREE TRADE
By L. G. CHIOZZA MONEY, M.P.
PRICE ONE PENNY.
(Reprinted from "The Daily News.")

The publication of 100 POINTS for FREE TRADE day by day during the last few months in "The Daily News" has been followed with the keenest interest. These 100 Points are now issued in convenient pamphlet form (100 Pages). Free Traders all over the country have thus an opportunity of possessing in handy form the material for an immediate answer to the fallacies of the Tariff Reformer.

100 POINTS FOR FREE TRADE
PRICE ONE PENNY.
The price of this 100-page pamphlet, which is of a handy shape for the pocket, is 1d. for a single copy or 1½d. post free. A comprehensive index to the entire subject matter makes every item of information contained readily accessible.
We have arranged for special terms to be in force for large orders as follows:—
SPECIAL TERMS FOR QUANTITIES.
(Carriage Paid.)

2 dozen and upwards	-	1d. each.
200 and upwards	- -	1d.	„ less	2½	per cent.
500 „ „	- -	1d.	„ „	5	„
1,000 „ „	- -	1d.	„ „	10	„

1d. 100 POINTS FOR FREE TRADE. 1d.
Applications to be made to THE MANAGER, Publications Dept., "The Daily News," Bouverie Street, Fleet Street, E.C.

BIRKBECK BANK
ESTABLISHED 1851.
SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.
2½ per cent. INTEREST
allowed on Deposits repayable on demand.
2 per cent. INTEREST
on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.
All General Banking Business transacted.
ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.
C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

HIGHEST QUALITY
TURKISH TOWELS
AND SIMILAR GOODS.
SOFT AND ABSORBENT.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWEL.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH SHEET.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH MAT.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH GOWN.
THE "OSMAN" Turkish Goods enumerated here are an absolute necessity in every household. They are a luxury, but not expensive, and can be obtained at prices within reach of every one. Be sure to buy the "Osman" brand and avoid imitations.
MADE BY
BARLOW & JONES, LIMITED, MANCHESTER;
And Sold by all High-class Drapers and Upholsterers.

THE INDEX TO VOLUME II. OF THE NATION
Is NOW READY, and can be had free on application to the Manager.

diary makes excellent reading. It gives a description of life on a merchant ship in the later years of the eighteenth century, while the author's experiences in the Navy are also well worth recording. He served in the West Indies under Sir Ralph Abercromby, and in the Walcheren Expedition, and was at Lisbon during part of the Peninsular War. His description of flogging in the Navy makes one marvel at the extent of human toleration. The sentence was often so severe that the culprit would have died under the lash if the whole punishment had been inflicted at once. In these cases the prisoner was kept in hospital until he had recovered sufficiently to endure the remainder. Richardson's narrative is straightforward and unaffected, and the book throws some interesting light on conditions that, fortunately, have now passed away.

* * *

"The Century Shakespeare," issued by Messrs. Cassell, is an excellent edition, and we shall not be surprised if it becomes the most popular of the many cheap reprints of Shakespeare now on the market. Each volume contains a photogravure frontispiece from paintings by Millais, Holman Hunt, and other famous artists, and has end papers in green designed by Mr. R. L. Knowles. Dr. Furnivall contributes an introduction to each play, and there is a supplementary volume on "Shakespeare's Life and Work," forming an admirable introduction to Shakespearian study. As the price is only ninepence a volume, a large sale may be expected. Messrs. Cassell are to be congratulated on the excellent way in which they have produced this latest edition of Shakespeare's works.

* * *

The Rationalist Press Association has published a selection of London lectures, by the late Dr. Moncure D. Conway, under the general title of "Lessons for the Day" (Watts & Co., 6d. net). These lectures date back to a quarter of a century ago, and, save for the correction of a few errata, the insertion of a few dates, the addition of some explanatory footnotes and minor alterations, they have not changed their original form; yet, read in the light of the advance of modern thought, and in spite of allusions to topics of the hour, which to-day have lost their freshness, they are satisfying essays. In the eternal question of the struggle between Reason and Revelation in religion, or free thought and orthodoxy, the author assumes the rôle of a mediator rather than of a champion. He pleads for reconciliation between conventional and natural religion—for a modus vivendi possible of acceptance by the clericals and the scientists. His personal point of view is, necessarily, that of the latter, but it was temperately, as well as finely, expressed at a time when it was more difficult to be temperate than it is now, and the rehabilitation of his opinions will shock nobody who is in sympathy with the present trend of advanced religious thought, which, indeed, is all towards the compromise—or, perhaps one should say, the readjustment—he advocates.

* * *

Regular readers of the "Westminster Gazette" will recognise the sketches by Mrs. George Norman that are republished in volume form under the title of "Sylvia in Society" (Unwin, 3s. 6d. net). Sylvia is a very young, very American, and wholly delightful, person, who is precipitated on to "this side" from her native land for the purpose of Continental travel. Accompanied by the aunt, to whose care she is confided, and who tells the story, she flits from one French place of fashion to another, and in each leaves a memento of her visit in the shape of a youthful escapade. The society through which she moves is, in the main, highly aristocratic; but Sylvia has her republican instincts, which assert themselves emphatically at her "New Year Party," and on other occasions, when she introduces a bourgeois element into her aunt's select circle, often with amusing results. Most of the episodes move to laughter, but here and there a note of pathos is struck, and in its alternation of light and shade the book is genuinely human. Mrs. Norman possesses no mean gift in character-drawing and the creation of an atmosphere.

* * *

A Novel Reader's Guide.—"By Faith Alone," by René Bazin (Nash, 6s.). A thoughtful and carefully arranged picture of French rural life, both noble and peasant. M. Bazin upholds the thesis that a return of faith in Catholicism can alone save France a class war.—"The Result of an Accident," by Beatrice Whitby (Methuen, 6s.). A domestic story showing insight into human nature and a keenly observant eye.—"The Grey Above the Green," by Mrs. H. H. Penrose (Hodder & Stoughton, 6s). A love story simply and attractively written.—"The Borderland," by Robert Halifax (Constable, 6s.). A rather unconvincing story of slum life.—"Round the Fire Stories," by Sir Arthur Conan Doyle (Smith, Elder, 6s.). A collection of mystery stories constructed with Sir Arthur Conan Doyle's usual skill and marked by his well-known limitations.

The Week in the City.

The Movement of Leading Stocks

	Price Friday Morning, Oct. 2.	Price Friday Morning, Oct. 9.
Consols 2½ per cent.	85 11/16 ...	84 3/4
German 3 per cent.	82½ ...	82
Russian 5 per cent. 1906	99 ...	96
Bulgarian '92	100½ ...	99
Turkish Unified	92 ...	88
Grand Trunk 1st Pref.	107 ...	103
Grand Trunk Ord.	22 1/8 ...	20
Canadian-Pacific...	181⅜ ...	178⅜
Rand Mines	7 1/32 ...	6 1/16
Cons. Goldfields	5 3/32 ...	4 1/8

Bulgaria's declaration of independence was a terrible blow to financiers, who were just spreading their sails to catch the auriferous breeze of popular speculation. All the cheering effects of easy money and increasing confidence vanished on Monday morning. Bulgarian, Turkish, and even Russian bonds fell heavily. Other internationals, and particularly Peruvians, weakened in sympathy. Consols fell sharply. The Home railway market drooped; but, perhaps, the most general and depressing effect was felt in the Kaffir Circus, which has been really enjoying something like its old pre-war prosperity in the last few weeks. Quite a large speculative account had been built up by hopeful operators, who counted on a continuation of easy money and on the growing interest of the investing public. The Bulgarian scare caused a general fright, and many who had been fervent bulls realised hastily on Monday and Tuesday, determined to run no more risks until the cloud in the Near East had disappeared. Wednesday's and Thursday's news brought no relief, though the danger seemed to have shifted from the Bulgarian to the Servian frontier. Opinion in the City has been, from the first, that war is possible, and that all commitments should be reduced in the meantime to the smallest possible dimensions. Hence the fall in market quotations, which has been mainly caused by the closing of speculative accounts. On Thursday Canadian Pacifics and Grand Trunks were hard hit in this way, for, strange to say, people have been found of late to back even Grand Trunks for a rise. Apart from the trouble in the East, things look more cheerful. The last Board of Trade returns point distinctly to a revival.

Standard Oil Politics.

The Foraker-McLaurin-Sibley-Archbold correspondence, writes the "Wall Street Journal," reacts very strongly upon the publicity campaign inaugurated some two years ago at 26, Broadway, to cultivate a less hostile public sentiment towards the Standard Oil Co. "Considerable headway had been made in that direction, the work being most adroitly performed, and now a lot of it is undone." This would seem to dispose bodily of the theory advanced by some that the Standard Oil people themselves, feeling that they had been badly treated by politicians generally, furnished the letters. Mr. Rockefeller's autobiography is, no doubt, part of the publicity campaign, and contrasts sharply with his determination twenty-five years ago to keep everything in connection with Standard Oil a profound secret. "It begins to seem,' moralises our New York contemporary, "that the only perfectly moral relation one may have with the Standard Oil Co. is that of a consumer of oil, and that even this relation could not be held altogether blameless unless the individual were prepared to prove that other oil was unobtainable."

Lucellum.

SMOKED EVERYWHERE BY (NEARLY) EVERYBODY.

No. 1, Equestrians

PLAYER'S "NAVY" MIXTURE

"THE MIXTURE OF MATCHLESS MERIT."

Sold in Two Strengths

Medium 4½d. per oz.

Mild 5d. per oz.

JOHN PLAYER & SONS, Nottingham, will forward testing samples post free to applicants mentioning this paper.

0522

The Imperial Tobacco Company (of Great Britain and Ireland), Ltd.

THE FIRST SYMPTOMS OF

Liver troubles

SHOULD NEVER BE NEGLECTED.

That feeling of depression, lassitude or irritability is a sure sign that the system is becoming overcharged with bile, which the Liver ought to filter out of the blood. If you suffer from Liver sluggishness, commence taking

MERIT'S (FAVRINE) Liverets

STRENGTHEN WHILE THEY RELIEVE

to-day. The longer you allow the trouble to continue, the more difficult it is to remedy it. MERIT'S LIVERETS act gently but firmly upon the Liver, and not only promote healthy action, but the valuable tonic properties they contain strengthen the Liver while they cure the trouble, and finally leave it sound and strong enough to easily perform its duties in a perfectly natural way. Price 1/1½ of all Chemists and Stores, or, if unable to obtain, send direct to

MERIT & CO., 66, St. Mary Axe, London, E.C.

CAUTION.—None are genuine unless the name MERIT'S LIVERETS, and the signature MERIT & Co. is on the package. Spurious imitations are useless.

THE

LEADING EGYPTIAN CIGARETTES

Kyriazis'

EGYPTIAN CIGARETTES

CAIRO.

Try them. They are the finest imported, and can be obtained from all High-class Tobacconists, Stores, &c.

Wholesale depot—20, Cheapside, London, E.C.

TANGYE OIL ENGINE

AUTOMATIC TUBE IGNITION.

NO LAMP EXCEPT FOR STARTING.

TANGYES LTD BIRMINGHAM.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE DRINK THE

RED WHITE & BLUE

Delicious for Breakfast & after Dinner.

In making, use LESS QUANTITY, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

Curio Club Bargains

Private persons desirous of disposing of antiques at bargain prices will find a ready sale for same at the "London Opinion Curio Club" 107, Regent Street, London, W.

Don't throw away anything broken in the home but buy

"FORTAFIX"

which is the strongest cement in the world and withstands boiling water. White in colour, it mends and repairs anything from a saucepan to a piece of china. Heat has no effect upon it.

It is fire-proof and chemical-proof.

It does not require stirring and will not be hard in the Tubs.

"FORTAFIX" is the last word in household cements and replaces liquid glues which will not withstand heat or damp, and generally smell most unpleasant. Buy a tube to-day.

Of all Stationers, Ironmongers, Oilmen, Chemists and Stores.

per 6d. tube

or sent post free through nearest Agent on receipt of 6d. in stamps to—

BENJAMIN & GEE, 31, St. Mary Axe, LONDON, E.C.

TYPEWRITING.

TYPEWRITING. — Typewriting of every description high-class work. Author's MSS. 10d. per thousand words prompt, accurate. E. C. PEARCE, 30, College Road, Reading.

EDUCATIONAL.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE, TAMWORTH.

YOUTHS TRAINED FOR HOME OR COLONIES.

Farm, 1,000 acres. Carpentry, Smith's work. Riding and Shooting taught. Prospectus.

CHANTRY MOUNT SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
BISHOP'S STORTFORD.

Head Mistress Miss ESTHER CASE, M.A., Dublin (Class. Tripos, Camb. Second Mistress: Miss ESTERBROOK HICKS, B.SC., London.

A limited number of boarders received.

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.

BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING

Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.

Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.

Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

CO-EDUCATION BY THE SOCIETY OF FRIENDS.

Friends' School, Great Ayton in Cleveland, Yorkshire.

A Boarding School for Boys and Girls (9-16). Modern Education. Preparation for Exams. Unique health record. Ten acres Recreation Grounds, Gymnasium, Swimming Bath, Laboratories, Domestic Science School. 30 Guineas per annum. Apply to the Headmaster for Prospectus, etc.

The Abbey School, Beckenham.

FINE POSITION, SIXTEEN ACRES OF GROUNDS.
TEN MILES FROM LONDON.

Preparation for the best Public Schools. Write for List of Scholarships won last year.

TANGLEWOOD, BARNT GREEN, THE LICKEY HILLS,
Near Birmingham.

BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

On approved Modern Lines. Thorough Education with individual care and character training. Games, gardening, and open air life in lovely country, with bracing air. Good train service on main line. Escorts provided.

Principal - - MISS EBBUTT, M.A.

(Newnham College, Cambridge—Trinity College, Dublin.)

LINCOLNSHIRE COAST.

ESSENDON GIRLS' SCHOOL, SKEGNESS.

Headmistress, MISS PAGAN, M.A. Full Staff. L.R.A.M. Swedish Gymnastics. Higher Examinations. Tennis, Hockey, Swimming. Dry sunny climate. Bracing sea air. Exhibitions offered.

SOUTHPORT MODERN SCHOOL.

A First-Class School for Boys. Staff includes B.A., M.Sc., F.C.V., Mus. Bac., etc. Languages, Science, Commercial Subjects, Gymnastics, Swimming, Cadet Company. Prospectus from Secretary.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

SCHOLARSHIP EXAMINATION IN DECEMBER.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors. Enquiries should be addressed to the BURSAR.

RESIDENCE FOR WOMEN STUDENTS,
18, ENDSLEIGH STREET, W.C.

Founded and carried on by Members of Society of Friends. Convenient for University College, Slade School, Women's Medical School, &c. Apply Principal.

EDUCATIONAL.

CRAIGMOUNT, EDINBURGH.

Private Boarding and Day School for Girls.

THE Principals, the Misses Gossip, are assisted by highly-qualified residents, English and Foreign Mistresses and visiting Professors. The aim of the school is a sound education, special attention being given to the study of English Literature, Modern Languages, and Music. The Gymnasinm is fitted with Swedish apparatus and the school has its own Swimming Bath. The situation of the school is bracing and very healthy, and the grounds give ample scope for games. Prospectus on application to the Principals.

CROYDON. Croham Hurst School for Girls.

House built for the purpose in healthy and beautiful situation. Limited number of girls taken. Thorough education on modern lines. Special encouragement given to reading and leisure pursuits, and to interest in current movements.

Hockey. Tennis, &c., &c. Swimming. Riding. Much outdoor life.

Principals { THEODORA E. CLARK. K. M. ELLIS.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager,

R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C. Telegrams: "TRIFORM, LONDON." Telephone No. GERRARD 1854.

SCHOOLS IN ENGLAND OR ABROAD

FOR BOYS AND GIRLS.

Messrs. J. and J. PATON, having an intimate knowledge of the BEST SCHOOLS and TUTORS in this country and on the Continent, will be pleased to aid parents in their selection by sending (free of charge) prospectuses and full particulars of reliable and highly-recommended establishments. When writing please state the age of pupil, the district preferred, and give some idea of the fees to be paid.—J. and J. PATON, Educational Agents, 143, Cannon-st., London, E.C. Telephone 5,053, Central.

ONE & ALL BULBS

The Brand Guarantees One & All Quality.

ONE & ALL FLOWERING BULBS AND ROOTS

Produce a most effective display.

COLLECTIONS FOR THE OPEN GROUND, 1/-, 2/6, 4/-, 7/6, and 15/-

FOR THE CONSERVATORY OR ROOM DECORATION, 7/6 and 15/-.

ESTABLISHED 1867.

For details see Illustrated Catalogue free on application at any One and All Seed Agency, or by post from Edward Owen Greening, Managing Director Agricultural and Horticultural Association, Ltd., Wholesale Seed Warehouses, 92, Long Acre, London, W.C.

TOURS.

£6 6s. LUCERNE TOUR.

Nine days. Short Sea Route. No extras for Conductor or Gratuities.

HENRY S. LUNN, M.D.

5, Endsleigh Gardens, N.W. 25, Cannon Street, E.C.
4, Charing Cross, S.W. 84, Piccadilly, W.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout, Bathrooms on every Floor, Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard and Smoking Rooms. Heated throughout.

Fireproof Floors. Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 6/0.

Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hote, Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London." Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.

HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplace. "The English Home."

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.

THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and Subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, THE NATION, and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following booksellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—W. H. Smith & Son, Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—Gordon and Gotch.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions are received.

Scale of Charges for Advertisements.

	FULL PAGE.	½ PAGE.	¼ PAGE.
Back Page, or Page facing matter ...	£10 0 0	£5 0 0	£2 10 0
Other Pages ...	8 0 0	4 0 0	2 0 0

Hotels, Hydros, and Educational

13 Insertions ... ... 8d. per line.
52 ,, ... 6d. ,,

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LONDON.

WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. Wild, C.C., Man. Direc. 30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

BLACKPOOL.

67, ALEXANDRA ROAD. Board and Residence. 5s. per day.

PROSPECT HOUSE BOARDING ESTAB., 33, Central Par., facing Sea, Central for Amusements. South Aspect. Tel. 575 Manageress.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.

IDEAL RESIDENCE.

Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.

THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye.
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate.

SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30s. week.

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.

BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport.

BRIGHTON.

THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager.

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston.

BUXTON.

ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel.

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.

THE TORS PRIVATE HOTEL (en pension). Tel. 199. Mrs. F. Sara.

DARTMOOR DOUSLAND, Nr. YELVERTON.

BARONS' PRIVATE HOTEL. Close to Moors. J. Wonnacott. Prop.

DEAL.

BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson.

EASTBOURNE.

CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Grdns. 5/- day.

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day.

EDINBURGH.

ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading Hotel.

GREAT YARMOUTH.

HILLS MARINE VIEW BOARDING HOUSE.

MELTON LODGE RESIDENTIAL MANSION. Facing sea. 10/- per day

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.

THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl.

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.

RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta course.

ILFRACOMBE.

COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea.

LANCASTER.

BOAR'S HEAD HOTEL. Wm. McIntosh.

STONEWELL RESTAURANT. T. M. Hey, Proprietor.

MARKET HALL RESTAURANT. Prop. J. E. Dowthwaite.

LEEDS.

HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station.

LIVERPOOL.

COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell.
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone: 3032 Royal, 3 wires.

LLANELLY.

CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver.

MALVERN.

HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & M'g'r.—J. Wilson.

MATLOCK.

SMEDLEY'S Hydropathic Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Mnger

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links. (18 holes).

OXFORD (near).

SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, etc. Lecture

PENTRE.

PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles.

PORTSMOUTH.

SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director.

SOUTHPORT.

KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St., Band and Illuminations. Turkish, Electric, Hydropathic, &c., Baths and Treatment.

ROWNTREE'S CAFE, Lord St., Hot Luncheons, Afternoon Teas, Tel. 647.

HOTEL CAFE CONTINENTAL, 207, Lord St., French and English Confectioners, Dinners, Teas and Suppers. Parties Catered for.

SOUTHSEA.

STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress.

SWANAGE.

"CRAIGSIDE," Board Residence. Tel.: 6. Misses Fell.

TEIGNMOUTH.

REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner.

WHITBY.

WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt.

Kindly write to Messrs. METHUEN for their New Illustrated Announcement List, which is full of the most interesting matter. Please ask to see Messrs. METHUEN'S New Books at your Libraries and Booksellers'. In interest and value it is a remarkable set of volumes.

GENERAL LITERATURE

Messrs. Methuen have just published a delightful book by Kenneth Grahame, Author of "The Golden Age." It is entitled "THE WIND IN THE WILLOWS." Crown 8vo, 6s.

They have also just published "THE MEDICI POPES," by Herbert M. Vaughan, demy 8vo, 15s. net, and "ARA COELI," by the Bishop of Bloemfontein, crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

MAN AND THE UNIVERSE. By Sir OLIVER LODGE. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net. [Now ready.
This is a study of the influence of the advance in scientific knowledge upon our understanding of Christianity.

MEMORIES OF MY LIFE. By FRANCIS GALTON. F.R.S. With Portraits, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.
This book contains the reminiscences of eighty-six years of a very varied life—the life of the most distinguished man of science of the day.

MARTIN HUME'S NEW BOOK.

TWO ENGLISH QUEENS AND PHILIP. By MARTIN HUME, M.A., Pembroke College, Cambridge. With a Frontispiece in Photogravure and 12 other Illustrations, demy 8vo, 15s. net. [Romantic History.

MADAME DE LAFAYETTE. By LILIAN REA. With Illustrations, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.
The history of the woman beloved of Madame de Sévigné and La Rochefoucauld.

MY MEMOIRS. By ALEXANDRE DUMAS. Translated by E. M. WALLER. With Frontispieces in Photogravure. In 6 vols., 6s. each.
Vol. V. One more volume will complete the translation of this great book.

THE COMPLETE FOXHUNTER. By CHARLES RICHARDSON. With 46 Illustrations, of which four are in Colour, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.
The keynote of the book is the modern conditions of hunting, and there are chapters on the Master of Hounds, the Field and its duties, on Foxhounds, Harriers and Beagles, on Horses and Stables, and various kindred matters.

COROT AND HIS FRIENDS. By EVERARD MEYNELL. With 23 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

ALL THINGS CONSIDERED. By G. K. CHESTERTON. Fcap. 8vo, 5s. [Second Edition.
A new volume of essays which plays over the whole range of modern life.

CHAUCER'S ENGLAND. By G. G. COULTON. With 32 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.
A picture of Chaucer the man, with a background of the world in which he lived.

THE HOLLAND HOUSE CIRCLE. By LLOYD SANDERS. With 24 Portraits and Illustrations, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.
A delightful gallery of witty and distinguished men and women—Rogers, Bacon, Moore, Sydney Smith, Macaulay among them.

HUNGARY AND THE HUNGARIANS. By W. B. FORSTER-BOVILL. With 12 Illustrations in Colour by W. PASCOE, and 12 from Photographs, demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.
Hungary past and present—her people, her scenery, her customs, her charms.

AN INTRODUCTION TO SOCIAL PSYCHOLOGY. By W. MCDOUGALL. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.
In the first part the principal motive forces that underlie all the activities of individuals and of societies are defined, and the way in which they become organised in the individual mind. The second part illustrates the ways in which each of them plays its part in the life of society.

COUNTRY WALKS ABOUT FLORENCE. By EDWARD HUTTON. With 32 Drawings by ADELAIDE MARCHI, and 20 other Illustrations, fcap. 8vo, 5s. net.
This new book of Mr. Hutton's deals with an unknown country, unknown though so near to the best known of all. The book is concerned with the byways, village churches, wayside shrines, villas, and gardens of the country in the vicinity of Florence, within a radius of ten miles or so.

HOME LIFE IN ITALY. By LINA DUFF GORDON (Mrs. Aubrey Waterfield). With many Illustrations, of which 12 are by Aubrey Waterfield, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.
The life of modern rural Italy is described with sympathy and intimate knowledge. A charming book.

JAMES II. AND HIS WIVES. By ALLAN FEA. With 40 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

GREAT RALEGH. By HUGH DE SELINCOURT. With 16 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

A GROUP OF SCOTTISH WOMEN. By Captain HARRY GRAHAM. With 16 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

THE OLD-TIME PARSON. By P. H. DITCHFIELD, M.A. With 16 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.
The author of "The Parish Clerk,' which reached a third edition in three months, has turned his attention to the study of old-fashioned parsons and their ways.

COINS AND HOW TO KNOW THEM. By GERTRUDE BURFORD RAWLINGS. With many Illustrations, crown 8vo, 6s.

SELECTED POEMS OF FRANCIS THOMPSON. Edited by WILFRID MEYNELL. With a Portrait in Photogravure, fcap. 8vo, 5s. net.

FLORENTINE SCULPTORS OF THE RENAISSANCE. By WILHELM BODE, Ph.D. Translated by J. HAYNES. With 94 Illustrations, wide royal 8vo, 12s. 6d. net. [Classics of Art.

THE LITTLE DAUPHIN. By CATHARINE WELCH. With 16 Illustrations, crown 8vo, 6s.

A SUMMER TOUR IN FINLAND. By PAUL WAINEMAN. With 16 Illustrations in Colour by A. FEDERLEY, and 16 other Illustrations, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net

METHUEN'S POPULAR NOVELS

Six Shillings each.

The Publishers call attention to this brilliant list. Most of the books are already in a Second and Third Edition.

Now is ready a long new novel by W. W. Jacobs, entitled SALTHAVEN. Illustrated.

HOLY ORDERS. The Tragedy of a Quiet Life. By MARIE CORELLI. [Second Edition ready.

THE GREAT MISS DRIVER. By ANTHONY HOPE. [Second Edition in the Press.
"A sunny charity floods it; it is depicted humorously, but with a wise understanding that softens the foibles and weaknesses that it so shrewdly discovers. The satire is of the kindliest. A gracious spirit pervades the story, in keeping with the manner of telling it. And with that we commend it heartily to our readers."—Daily Chronicle.
"Mr. Hope enthrals us, and certainly Miss Driver is 'great.'"—Morning Post.

INTERPLAY. By BEATRICE HARRADEN, Author of "Ships that Pass in the Night." [Third Edition in the Press.
"'Interplay' strikes us as the most complete, direct, and self-conscious expression of the reawakening of the spirit of wonder and joy that is reflected in the best and most characteristic works of the imagination that have been published during the last two or three years. Miss Harraden has given us her best in this book, which should gain, and more deservedly, the large popularity of 'Ships that Pass in the Night.'"—Morning Post.

SALTHAVEN. By W. W JACOBS, Author of "Many Cargoes." Illustrated.
Mr. Jacobs's new novel is the story of several love affairs, and of the means by which one of them was imperilled. The characters have that smack of the sea which seems to be inseparable from the author's work.

OVER BEMERTON'S: an Easy-Going Story. By E. V. LUCAS, Author of "Listener's Lure." [Second Edition in the Press.
This is not like the author's first exercise in fiction, "Listener's Lure," a story told in the form of letters, but a more direct effort. Bemerton is a second-hand bookseller of some quaintness of character, whose humours and customers are observed by the gentleman occupying the rooms above his shop.

THE HEART SMITER. By MARY E. MANN, Author of "The Sheep and the Goats." [Third Edition in the Press.

MIRAGE. By E. TEMPLE THURSTON.
"Everywhere the story is told with such dainty art, and with such a tender, unaffected sensibility, that it seems to us capable of charming all tastes."—Daily Telegraph.
"Unique in its simplicity and charm."—Bystander.

A DAUGHTER OF FRANCE. By CONSTANCE MAUD, Author of "An English Girl in Paris." With a Frontispiece.
"A bright, kindly, discerning book, full of humour, and instinct with broad sympathies."—Times.
"The situation awakens the warmest sympathies for the exquisite Jeanne, and ensures the reader's engrossment."—Pall Mall Gazette.

COUSIN CINDERELLA. By SARA JEANNETTE DUNCAN (Mrs. Coates).
"A very welcome, pleasant, and effective book."—Pall Mall Gazette.
"Charmingly frivolous—thoroughly enjoyable."—Morning Leader.

THE SPIRIT OF REVOLT. By PHILIP GIBBS.

HILL RISE. By W. B. MAXWELL, Author of "Vivien.', [Third Edition.
"A more wholesome, a sweeter, sounder story will hardly be found on the library lists this winter."—Daily Graphic.
"An exceptionally clever and interesting story; an excellent example of ingenious and wholesome fiction; skilfully told and of absorbing interest."—Scotsman.

ANTHONY CUTHBERT. By RICHARD BAGOT. [Second Edition.
"The plot is skilfully developed, and the dramatic episode which gives the key to the action is original and unexpected. Certainly a novel worth the reading."—Daily Express.
"A singularly original and powerful story."—Dundee Courier.

SPANISH GOLD. By GEORGE R. BIRMINGHAM. [Second Edition.
"The book is as good as a holiday; it is pure undiluted humour from beginning to end . . . gloriously amusing."
—Morning Leader.
"We are taken captive by the curate. The humour is irresistible."
—Manchester Guardian.
"As scene follows scene the reader's heart beats quicker with excitement, and laughter, and admiration."—Daily News.

MR. APOLLO: a Just Possible Story. By FORD MADDOX HUEFFER.
"It is almost delightfully human—it is enthralling and dramatic."
—Standard.
"Full of knowledge and sympathy, and written with quiet humour."—Punch.
"The personal sketches are excellent, the writing is lucid and unrestrained."—Saturday Review.

ARNOUL THE ENGLISHMAN. By FRANCIS AVELING.
"The incident is good and the descriptive passages will delight those readers who care for careful writing and graceful scholarship."
—Westminster Gazette.

THE RESULT OF AN ACCIDENT. By BEATRICE WHITBY. [Second Edition.
"A very tender and charming story, in which Mrs. De Carteret stands out with delightful grace and finish."—Standard.
"The story attracts by its sympathetic human interest and careful characterisation."—Dundee Courier.

A SET OF SIX. By JOSEPH CONRAD. [Second Edition.
"Mr. Conrad's mastery of English prose is remarkable, and every page he writes has real distinction."—Athenæum.

THE EASY-GO-LUCKIES; or One Way of Living. By MAUD STEPNEY RAWSON. [Second Edition.
"The book makes its way by sheer lightness of heart and touch, and a sense of humour is never absent from these lively pages."
—Daily Telegraph.

METHUEN & CO., 36, Essex Street, London, W.C.

"THE NATION," with which is incorporated "The Speaker," printed for the Proprietors by the NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY LIMITED, Whitefriars House, London, E.C., and Published by THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY LIMITED, at the Offices, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C. Registered at the General Post Office as a Newspaper.—SATURDAY, OCTOBER 10, 1908.

The Nation

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 10, 1908.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S NEW BOOKS

Lollardy and the Reformation in England. An Historical Survey.

By JAMES GAIRDNER, C.B., Hon. LL.D.Edin. 2 vols. 8vo, 21s. net.

VOL. II. JUST PUBLISHED.

A History of English Prosody

From the Twelfth Century to the Present Day.

By Prof. GEORGE SAINTSBURY, M.A., Hon. LL.D. 3 vols. 8vo. Volume II. From Shakespeare to Crabbe. 15s. net.

Previously published: Vol. I. From the Origins to Spenser. 10s. net.

Annual of the British School at Athens. Session 1906-7.

With Numerous Illustrations. Super Royal 8vo, 25s. net.

PRINCIPAL CONTENTS: EXCAVATIONS AT SPARTA, 1907, R. M. Dawkins, A. J. B. Wace, J. P. Droop, G. Dickins M. N. Tod, A. M. Woodward, E. S. Forster. MEDIAEVAL FORTRESSES OF THE N.W. PELOPONNESUS, R. Traquair. BITHYNICA, F. W. Hasluck. EXCAVATIONS AT THEOTOKOU, A. J. B. Wace and J. P. Droop. A STATUTE OF AN ATTIC THIASOS, M. N. Tod. DAMOPHON OF MESSENE II., G. Dickins. EARLY AEGEAN CIVILISATION IN ITALY, T. E. Peet. CRETAN PALACES AND THE AEGEAN CIVILISATION, III., D. MacKenzie.

The Book of the Pearl. The History, Art, Science, and Industry of the Queen of Gems.

By Dr. G. F. KUNZ and Dr. C. H. STEVENSON. With 100 Full-page Plates. Royal 8vo, 2 guineas net.

SEVENTH EDITION JUST PUBLISHED.

Introduction to the Study of the Law of the Constitution.

By A. V. DICEY, K.C. Seventh Edition. 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

MRS. MOLESWORTH.

Fairies—of Sorts.

By Mrs. MOLESWORTH. With Illustrations by GERTRUDE DEMAIN HAMMOND. Crown 8vo., gilt edges, 3s. 6d. [Tuesday.

Fairy Tales from South Africa.

Collected from original Native sources, and arranged by Mrs. E. J. BOURHILL and Mrs. J. B. DRAKE. Illustrated by W. HERBERT HOLLOWAY. Crown 8vo, gilt edges, 3s. 6d.

The Philosophy of Gassendi.

By G. S. BRETT, Professor of Philosophy, Government College, Lahore. 8vo, 10s. net.

PART III. JUST PUBLISHED.

Æschylus in English Verse.

Part III. Agamemnon. Choëphoroe, or The Mourners; Eumenides, or The Reconciliation. By ARTHUR S. WAY, D.Lit. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

Working Lads' Clubs.

By CHARLES E. B. RUSSELL and L. M. RIGBY. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

STEPHEN PHILLIPS AND J. COMYNS CARR.

Faust. A Drama in Four Acts.

Freely adapted from Goethe's Dramatic Poem. By STEPHEN PHILLIPS and J. COMYNS CARR. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net. [October 16.

AUSTIN DOBSON.

De Libris. Prose and Verse.

By AUSTIN DOBSON. With Illustrations by HUGH THOMSON and KATE GREENAWAY. Extra crown 8vo, 5s. net. [October 16.

F. MARION CRAWFORD.

The Little City of Hope.

A Christmas Story. By F. MARION CRAWFORD. A New Edition. With Illustrations in Colour by A. S. HARTRICK. 8vo, 5s. net. [October 16.

RUDYARD KIPLING.

The Jungle Book.

By RUDYARD KIPLING. With 16 Illustrations in Colour by MAURICE and EDWARD DETMOLD. 8vo, 5s. net.

An English Holiday with Car and Camera.

By JAMES JOHN HISSEY. With 28 Full-page Illustrations, and a Map. 8vo, 10s. net.

FREDERIC HARRISON.

Realities and Ideals:

Social, Political, Literary, and Artistic.

By FREDERIC HARRISON. Extra Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

Herculaneum, Past, Present, and Future.

By CHARLES WALDSTEIN, Litt.D., Ph.D., L.H.D., and LEONARD SHOOBRIDGE, M.A. With Coloured Frontispiece, numerous Photogravure Plates, and other Illustrations and Maps. Imperial 8vo, 21s. net.

Buddhist Essays.

By PAUL DAHLKE. Translated from the German by BHIKKHU SILACARA. 8vo, 10s. net.

NEW 6/- NOVELS.

The Diva's Ruby.

By F. MARION CRAWFORD. A Sequel to "The Primadonna" and "Soprano."

OUIDA'S LAST NOVEL.

Helianthus. A Romance of Modern Europe.

Mamma. By RHODA BROUGHTON.

The Sunny Side of the Hill.

By ROSA N. CAREY.

The Forbidden Boundary and other Stories.

By B. L. PUTNAM WEALE, Author of "Manchu and Muscovite."

Paths of the Righteous.

By L. DOUGALL, Author of "Beggars All," &c.

 Macmillan's Autumn Announcement List post free on application.

MACMILLAN & CO., Ltd., London, W.C.

HODDER & STOUGHTON.

POSTPONED.

Owing to the great demand for the Panmure Papers, which contain the secret history of the Crimean War, the first large edition has been found inadequate to meet present repuirements and the publication has been postponed for a few days.

THE SECRET HISTORY OF THE CRIMEAN WAR IS TOLD IN

THE PANMURE PAPERS.

Edited by SIR GEORGE DOUGLAS, Bart., M.A., and SIR GEORGE DALHOUSIE RAMSAY, C.B. 2 Vols. With photogravure portraits 24s. net. Prospectus on application.

READY MONDAY WEEK.

IAN MACLAREN: THE LIFE OF THE REV. JOHN WATSON, D.D. By W. ROBERTSON NICOLL. With Photograve Frontispiece. 6s.

READY MONDAY NEXT.

THE GIRLHOOD OF MARY QUEEN OF SCOTS. By JANE T. STODDART. With Photogravure Portrait. 12s. net.

THE WORLD I LIVE IN. By HELEN KELLER. With Ilustrations. 3/6 net.

NOW READY.

THE BRONTES: LIFE AND LETTERS. By CLEMENT SHORTER. With Photogravure Portraits. 2 Vols. 24/- net.

THE LIFE OF BEETHOVEN. By ALICE M. DIEHL. With Photogravure Portrait. 10/6 net.

THE LIFE AND LETTERS OF GEORGE BANCROFT. By M. A. DE WOLFE HOWE. Illustrated. 2 Vols. 16s. net.

NOVELS.

THE WILD GEESE. By STANLEY WEYMAN. Third Edition. 6/- [Now Ready.

THE SOUL OF DOMINIC WILDTHORNE. By JOSEPH HOCKING. 3/6. [Monday Next.

RACKET AND REST. By HAROLD BEGBIE. 6s. " "

69, BIRNAM ROAD. By W. PETT RIDGE. 6/-. [Now Ready.

MISS CHARITY. By KEBLE HOWARD. 6/-. " "

PURPLE LOVE. By MORICE GERARD. 6s. [Monday Next.

THE RIVERMAN. By STEWART EDWARD WHITE. 6s. " "

THE HAND OF THE SPOILER. By SIDNEY PATERNOSTER. 6s. " "

A detailed Catalogue of Autumn Publications will gladly be sent post-free on application to HODDER & STOUGHTON, Warwick Square, London, E.C.

The Nation

The Pick of the Publishing Season.

The following is a selection of the more interesting Books appearing in the Publishers' Autumn Lists, grouped under different subject headings.

ART AND ARCHÆOLOGY.

The Etched and Engraved Works of Frank Short. Edited by E. F. Strange. (Allen. 21s. net.)

The Lewis Bequest at the National Gallery. By Maurice Brockwell. (Allen.)

Painting in the Far East. An Introduction to the History of Pictorial Art in Asia, especially China and Japan. By Laurence Binyon. (Arnold. 21s. net.)

The Mistress Art. By Reginald Blomfield, A.R.A. (Arnold, 5s. net.)

The Pinafore Picture Book. The Story of "H.M.S. Pinafore." Told by W. S. Gilbert. (Bell. 5s. net.)

Sheffield Plate: Its History, Manufacture, and Art. By Henry Newton Veitch. (Bell. 25s. net.)

The British Institution (1806-1867): A Complete List of Exhibitors and Their Works. By Algernon Graves, F.S.A. (Bell, £3 3s. net.)

Arts and Crafts of the Middle Ages. By Julia de Wolf Addison. (Bell. 7s. 6d. net.)

John Pettie, R.A. By Martin Hardie. (Black. 20s. net.)

William Callow, R.W.S. By H. M. Cundall. (Black. 7s. 6d. net.)

Pictures in the Menpes Series of Great Masters. Facsimile Reproductions in Color of the Original Paintings. (Black.)

The Tempest. By William Shakespeare. Illustrations in color by Paul Woodroffe, and Songs by Joseph Moorat. (Chapman & Hall. 10s. 6s. net.)

Scenes and Characters from the Works of Charles Dickens. (Chapman & Hall. 10s. 6d. net.)

Early Painters of the Netherlands, from the Van Eyck to Pieter Brueghel the Elder. By Pol de Mont. In ten parts. (Chatto & Windus. £5 5s. net per part.)

Italian Painters of the Quattrocento and Cinquecento. By Wilhelm Bode. In fifteen parts. (Chatto & Windus. £5 5s. net per part.)

The Early German Painters from Meister Wilhelm of Cologne to Adam Elsheimer. By Max Friedländer. In ten parts. (Chatto & Windus. £5 5s. net per part.)

The Medici Series of Colored Reproductions after the Old Masters. (Chatto & Windus.)

Notes on the Science of Picture-Making. By C. J. Holmes, M.A. (Chatto & Windus. 7s. 6d. net.)

A Short History of Engraving and Etching. By A. M. Hind. (Constable. 18s. net.)

English Heraldic Stamps. By Cyril Davenport, F.S.A. (Constable. 25s. net.)

Theodore M. Davis's Excavations. The Tomb of Siptah, The Monkey Tomb, and the Gold Tomb. (Constable. 42s. net.)

Scarabs: An Introduction to the Study of Egyptian Seals and Signet Rings. By Percy E. Newberry. (Constable. 8s. 6d. net.)

A History of Italian Painting. By J. A. Crowe and G. B. Cavalcaselle. 3 Vols. (Dent. 15s. net per vol.)

Jacob Jordaens. By Max Rooses. Translated from the Dutch by Miss Elizabeth C. Broers. (Dent. £2 2s. net.)

Old Masters. Examples of their work reproduced in color, with Notes on the Pictures and the Painters. 2 Vols. (Dent. 21s. net.)

Christopher Wren. By Lena Milman. (Duckworth. 7s. 6d. net.)

Sermons in Art by the Great Masters. Interpreted by the Rev. J. Burns. (Duckworth. 7s. 6d. net.)

Art in the British Isles. By Sir Walter Armstrong. (Heinemann.)

Byzantine Art. By M. Millet. (Heinemann.)

The Art of India. By M. Foucher. (Heinemann.)

Flemish Art. By Dr. Max Rooses. (Heinemann.)

French Art. By M. Horticq. (Heinemann.)

German Art. By Dr. Popp. (Heinemann.)

A Midsummer Night's Dream. By Wm. Shakespeare. Illustrated by Arthur Rackham. (Heinemann.)

The Story of American Painting. The Evolution of Painting in America from Colonial Times to the Present. By Charles H. Caffin. (Hodder & Stoughton. 10s. 6d. net.)

Shakespeare's Comedy of The Tempest. Illustrated with 40 Plates in Color by Edmund Dulac. (Hodder & Stoughton. 10s. 6d. net.)

Shakespeare's Comedy of Twelfth Night. Illustrated with 40 Plates in Color by W. Heath Robinson. (Hodder & Stoughton. 10s. 6d. net.)

Faust. A Fine Art Edition of Goethe's Great Classic. (Hutchinson. 15s. net.)

The Year's Art, 1908. Compiled by A. C. R. Carter. (Hutchinson. 3s. 6d. net.)

Masterpieces in Color Series: Franz Hals, by Edgcumbe Stalay; Luini, by James Mason; Rubens, by S. L. Bensusan; and others. (Jack. 1s. 6d. net.)

The National Gallery. By P. G. Kennedy, Maurice W. Brockwell, and F. W. Lippmann. (Jack. 17 parts at 1s. net.)

Complete Guide to Heraldry. By A. C. Fox-Davies. (Jack. 10s. 6d. net.)

Arms and Armour: British and Foreign. By Charles H. Ashdown. (Jack. 10s. 6d. net.)

Scottish Painting: Past and Present. By James L. Carr. (Jack. 21s. net.)

Vincenzo Foppa of Brescia, Founder of the Lombard School, His Life and Work. By Constance Jocelyn Foulkes and Monsignor Rodolfo Maiocchi, D.D. (Lane, 105s. net.)

Aubrey Beardsley. By Robert Ross. With a List of Drawings by Aymer Vallance. (Lane. 3s. 6d. net.)

A History of Engraving, from its Inception to the Time of Thomas Bewick. By Stanley Austin. (Werner Laurie. 6s. net.)

The Cathedral Series.—The Cathedrals of Norway, Sweden, and Denmark. By T. Francis Bumpus. (Werner Laurie. 16s. net.)

A History of Architectural Development. (In three volumes.) Vol. II. Medieval. By F. M. Simpson. (Longmans.)

George Baxter (Color Printer): His Life and Work. By C. T. Courtney Lewis. (Sampson Low. 6s. net.)

The Glasgow School of Painters. By J. Craig Annan and G. Baldwin Brown. (MacLehose. £5 5s.)

The Book of the Pearl. By Dr. G. F. Kung and Dr. C. H. Stevenson. (Macmillan. £2 2s. net.)

French Prints of the Eighteenth Century. By Ralph Nevill. (Macmillan.)

The Marks of Pottery and Porcelain. By William Burton and R. L. Hobson. (Macmillan.)

Herculaneum, Past, Present, and Future. By Charles Waldstein, Litt.D., and Leonard Shoolridge, M.A. (Macmillan. 21s. net.)

The Acropolis at Athens. By Martin L. D'Ooge. (Macmillan.)

Earthwork of England: Prehistoric, Roman, Saxon, Danish, Norman, and Medieval. By A. Hadrian Allcroft, M.A. (Macmillan.)

Monuments of Christian Rome. By Professor A. L. Frothingham. (Macmillan.)

Rubens. By Edward Dillon. (Methuen. 25s. net.)

Florentine Sculptors of the Renaissance. By Wilhelm Bode, Ph.D. Translated by J. Haynes. (Methuen. 12s. 6d. net.)

Corot and his Friends. By Everard Meynell. (Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.)

Ghirlandaio. By Gerald S. Davies. (Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.)

Coins and How to Know them. By Gertrude Burford Rawlings. (Methuen. 6s.)

The Quest of the Antique. Being some Personal Experiences in the Finding of Old Furniture. By Robert and Elizabeth Shackleton. (Milne. 10s. 6d. net.)

Dutch Painting in the Nineteenth Century. By G. Hermine Marius. (Moring. 15s. net.)

Indian Sculpture and Painting. Illustrated by Typical Masterpieces. By E. B. Havell, A.R.C.A. (Murray. £3 3s. net.)

A History of British Water-Colour Painting. By H. M. Cundall, I.S.O. (Murray. 21s. net.)

The Arts in Early England. By G. Baldwin Brown, M.A. Vol. III. (Murray.)

A Century of Archæological Discoveries. By Professor A. Michaelis. (Murray.)

Douris and the Painters of Greek Vases. Translated from the French of Edmund Pottier by Bettina Kahnweiler. (Murray. 7s. 6d. net.)

Chinese Porcelain. By Hsiang Yuan-P'ien. Translated by S. W. Bushell. (Oxford University Press.)

Fonts in English Churches. By Francis Bond. (Oxford University Press.)

Artists of the Low Countries. By Eugène Fromentin. 2 vols. (Putnam.)

The Gospel in the Old Testament. A Series of Pictures by Harold Copping, with descriptive letterpress by Handley C. G. Moule, D.D. (Religious Tract Society.)

Evolution in Italian Art. By Grant Allen. With an Introduction by J. W. Cruickshank. (Grant Richards. 10s. 6d. net.)

Great English Painters. By Francis Downman. (Grant Richards. 3s. 6d. net.)

Peter Paul Rubens. By R. A. M. Stevenson. (Seeley. 2s. net.)

What is a Picture? By G. G. Millar. (Stock.)

Pre-Historic Rhodesia. An Examination of Ethnological and Archæological Evidences as to the Origin and Age of the Rock Mines and Stone Buildings, with a Gazeteer of Mediæval South-East Africa. By R. N. Hall. (Unwin. 12s. 6d. net.)

BIOGRAPHY AND MEMOIRS.

The Letters of a Noble Woman. (Mrs. La Touche of Harristown.) Edited by Margaret Young. (Allen. 12s. 6d. net.)

The Months. A Volume of Social Reminiscence. By the Right Hon. George W. E. Russell. (Allen. 5s. net.)

The Reminiscences of Lady Randolph Churchill. By Mrs. George Cornwallis West. (Arnold. 15s. net.)

Old and Odd Memories. By the Hon. Lionel Tollemache. (Arnold. 12s. 6d. net.)

Madame Elizabeth de France. 1764-1793. A Memoir. By the Hon. Mrs. Maxwell Scott. (Arnold. 12s. 6d. net.)

Memoirs of Benvenuto Cellini. A New and Complete Translation based on Roscoe's Text. By R. Hobart Cust, M.A. 2 vols. (Bell.)

The Life of William Pitt. By J. Holland Rose, Litt.D. 2 vols. (Bell.)

Life of Field-Marshal Sir Neville B. Chamberlain, G.C.B., G.C.S.I. By G. W. Forrest, C.I.E. (Blackwood. 18s. net.)

Life and Letters of Hannah E. Pipe. By Anna M. Stoddart. (Blackwood. 15s. net.)

Napoleon and his Fellow Travellers. By Clement Shorter. (Cassell. 12s. net.)

George Borrow: the Gipsy Scholar. By R. A. J. Walling. (Cassell. 6s. net.)

The Gay Gordons. Some Strange Adventures of a Famous Scots Family. By J. M. Bullock. (Chapman & Hall. 10s. 6d. net.)

The Life and Times of Simon Fraser: Lord Lovat. By W. C. Mackenzie. (Chapman & Hall. 10s. 6d. net.)

Letters of Alessandra Mancinghi Strozzi, a Florentine Lady of the Cinquecento. Translated by R. Hobart Cust. (Chatto & Windus.)

Melba. An Authorised Biography. By Agnes M. Murphy. (Chatto & Windus. 16s. net.)

The Life of Tolstoy: First Fifty Years. By Aylmer Maude. (Constable. 10s. 6d. net.)

The Life of Dorothea Beale of Cheltenham. By Elizabeth Raikes. (Constable. 10s. 6d. net.)

Life of Thomas Bailey Aldrich. By Ferris Greenslet. (Constable. 12s. 6d. net.)

Life of John Keats. By Albert E. Hancock. (Constable. 8s. 6d. net.)

Life and Letters of H. Taine. Vol. III. Conclusion 1871-1894. Translated from the French by E. Sparvel-Bayley. (Constable. 7s. 6d. net.)

Nadir Shah. By Sir H. Mortimer Durand. (Constable. 10s. 6d. net.)

The Princesse de Lamballe. A Biography. By B. C. Hardy. (Constable. 12s. 6d. net.)

Aeneas Silvius, Pope Pius II. By W. Boulting. (Constable. 12s. 6d. net.)

Memoirs of the Comte de Rambuteau. (Dent. 15s. net.)

The Lawrences of the Punjaub. By F. P. Gibbon. (Dent. 4s. 6d. net.)

Some Eminent Victorians. Personal Recollections in the World of Art and Letters. By J. Comyns Carr. (Duckworth. 12s. 6d.)

Sir Richard Tangye. By Stuart J. Reid, D.C.L. (Duckworth. 6s.)

The Life of Col. Fred Burnaby. By Thomas Wright. (Everett. 12s. net.)

The Life of James McNeill Whistler. By E. R. and J. Pennell. 2 vols. (Heinemann.)

My Story. Autobiography by Hall Caine. (Heinemann.)

Jean Jacques Rousseau. By Jules Lemaître. (Heinemann.)

Recollections of a Spinster Aunt. By S. Sophia Beale. (Heinemann.)

Recollections of Baron de Freuilly. Peer of France, 1768-1828. Edited by Arthur Chuquet. (Heinemann.)

Ian Maclaren. The Life of the Rev. John Watson, D.D. By W. Robertson Nicoll. (Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.)

The Life of Dr. Robertson. By Ralph Connor. (Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.)

The Brontës. Life and Letters. By Clement Shorter. In 2 vols. (Hodder & Stoughton. 24s. net.)

Pepys. By Percy Lubbock. A new volume of "Literary Lives." (Hodder & Stoughton. 3s. 6d.)

The Life and Letters of George Bancroft. By M. A. de Wolfe Howe. (Hodder & Stoughton. 2 vols. 16s. net.)

The Panmure Papers. Edited by Sir George Douglas, Bart., and Sir George Dalhousie Ramsey, C.B. (Hodder & Stoughton. 24s. net.)

The Girlhood of Mary Queen of Scots. By Jane T. Stoddart. (Hodder & Stoughton. 12s. net.)

The Story of My Life. By Ellen Terry. (Hutchinson. 6s. net.)

Mr. Pope of Twickenham. By George Paston. In 2 vols. (Hutchinson. 24s. net.)

Queen Anne and her Court. By P. F. William Ryan. (Hutchinson. 24s. net.)

Lanzun: Courtier and Adventurer. The Life of a Friend of Louis XIV. By Mary F. Sandars. (Hutchinson. 24s. net.)

Richard Jefferies. A Biographical Study. By Edward Thomas. (Hutchinson. 10s. 6d. net.)

The Empress Josephine. Napoleon's Enchantress. By Philip W. Sergeant. (Hutchinson. 24s. net.)

King's Favourite. The Love Story of Robert Carr and Lady Essex. By Philip Gibbs. (Hutchinson. 16s. net.)

The Life of Joan of Arc. By Anatole France. A translation by Winifred Stephens. (Lane. 25s. net.)

Dumouriez and the Defence of England Against Napoleon. By J. Holland Rose, Litt.D., and A. M. Broadley. (Lane. 21s. net.)

Louis Napoleon and the Genesis of the Second Empire. By F. H. Cheetham. (Lane. 16s. net.)

Memoirs of a Vanished Generation, 1813-1855. Edited by Mrs. Warrenne Blake. (Lane. 16s. net.)

Stars of the Stage. A Series of Illustrated Biographies of the Leading Actors, Actresses, and Dramatists. Edited by J. T. Grein. New Volumes.

George Bernard Shaw. By G. K. Chesterton.
Arthur Wing Pinero.
Henry Arthur Jones.

(Lane. 2s. 6d. each net.)

Living Masters of Music. An Illustrated Series of Monographs dealing with Contemporary Musical Life, and including Representatives of all Branches of the Art. Edited by Rosa Newmarch.

Richard Strauss. By Ernest Newman.
(Lane. 2s. 6d. net.)

Brittany to Whitehall. Life of Louise Renée de Kéroualle, Duchess of Portsmouth. By Mrs. Colquhoun Grant. (John Long. 12s. 6d. net.)

The Magic of Sport. Mainly Autobiographical. By Nat Gould. (John Long. 12s. 6d. net.)

The Journal of Elizabeth Lady Holland (1791-1811). Edited by the Earl of Ilchester. (Longmans. 21s. net.)

Thomas George, Earl of Northbrook, G.C.S.I. A Memoir. By Bernard Mallet. (Longmans.)

The Life of Henry Irving. By Austin Brereton. 2 vols. (Longmans. 25s. net.)

The Bernstorff Papers: the Life of Count Albrecht Von Bernstorff. By Dr. Karl Ringhoffer. (Longmans.)

Memorials of Two Sisters: Susanna and Catherine Winkworth. Edited by their Niece, Margaret J. Shaen. (Longmans. 10s. 6d. net.)

Henry Stuart, Cardinal of York, and his Times. By Alice Shield. With Preface by Andrew Lang. (Longmans.)

The Maid of France: being the Story of the Life and Death of Jeanne d'Arc. By Andrew Lang. (Longmans.)

William Haig Brown, Sometime Master of Charterhouse. By Some of his Pupils. Edited by Harold E. Haig Brown. (Macmillan.)

William Morris. By Alfred Noyes. (Macmillan. 2s. net.)

Memories of My Life. By Francis Galton, F.R.S. (Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.)

The Women Bonapartes. By H. Noel Williams. (Methuen. 24s. net.)

Lorenzo the Magnificent: or, Florence in her Golden Age. By E. L. S. Horsburgh. (Methuen. 15s. net.)

James II. and his Wives. By Allan Fea. (Methuen. 12s. 6d. net.)

The Holland House Circle. By Lloyd Sanders. (Methuen. 12s. 6d. net.)

The First Governess of the Netherlands, Margaret of Austria. By Eleanor E. Tremayne. (Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.)

Great Ralegh: Being the Life and Times of Sir Walter Ralegh. By Hugh de Sélincourt. (Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.)

The Little Dauphin. By Catharine Welch. (Methuen. 6s.)

The Life of Henry Pelham, Fifth Duke of Newcastle. By John Martineau. (Murray. 12s. net.)

The Life of Philibert Commerson, D.M., Naturaliste du Roi. By the late Captain S. Pasfield Oliver, R.A. (Murray.)

From Ploughshare to Parliament. A Short Memoir of the Potters of Tadcaster. By Georgina Meinertzhagen. (Murray. 6s. net.)

Life of Lord Norton. By William S. Childe-Pemberton. (Murray.)

The Military Memoirs of Lieut.-General Sir Joseph Thackwell, G.C.B. Arranged from Diaries and Correspondence by Colonel H. C. Wylby, C.B. (Murray. 15s. net.)

The Life of Sir William Russell. By J. B. Atkins. (Murray.)

A Mariner of England. An Account of the Career of William Richardson (1780-1817) told in his own words. Edited by Colonel Spencer Childers, R.E. (Murray. 10s. 6d. net.)

Baldassare Castiglione, the Perfect Courtier: His Life and Letters. By Julia Cartwright. 2 Vols. (Murray.)

A Favorite of Napoleon. (Memoirs of Mademoiselle George.) Edited by Paul Chesamy. (Nash. 10s. net.)

Rousseau and the Women He Loved. By Francis Gribble. (Nash. 15s. net.)

The Life of an Empress (Eugénie de Montijo). By Frédéric Loliée. (Nash. 15s. net.)

The Wife of Lafayette. By M. MacDermot Crawford. (Nash. 15s. net.)

Louis Philippe and His Sister. Translated from the French of Raoul Arnaud by E. L. Charlwood. (Nutt. 10s. 6d. net.)

The Story of a Life-Time. By Lady Priestley. (Kegan Paul. 12s. 6d. net.)

Anne Seymour Damer: Sculptor and Woman of Fashion (1748-1828). By Percy Noble. (Kegan Paul. 12s. 6d. net.)

The Cardinal Democrat: Being the Life and Work of the late Cardinal Manning. By I. A. Taylor. (Kegan Paul. 5s.)

Sir John Field, K.C.B.: Soldier and Evangelist. A brief memoir by one of his sons, Claud Field. (Religious Tract Society. 5s. net.)

Rutland Barrington: A Record of Thirty-five Years' Experience of the English Stage. By Himself. With a Preface by Sir W. S. Gilbert. (Grant Richards. 7s. 6d. net.)

Charles Dickens and His Friends. By W. Teignmouth Shore. (Sisley. 7s. 6d. net.)

The Real Ninon de l'Enclos. By Helen Kendrick Hayes. (Sisley. 7s. 6d. net.)

Memories of Half-a-Century: A Record of Friendships. By R. C. Lehmann, M.P. (Smith, Elder. 10s. 6d. net.)

A Memoir of Sir Wilfrid Lawson. By George W. E. Russell. (Smith, Elder. 7s. 6d. net.)

The Life of Mirabeau. By S. G. Tallentyre. (Smith, Elder. 10s. 6d. net.)

Recollections of a Life in the British Army during the Latter Half of the Nineteenth Century. By General Sir Richard Harrison, G.C.B. (Smith, Elder. 10s. 6d. net.)

Percy, Prelate and Poet. By Alice C. C. Gaussen. (Smith, Elder. 10s. 6d. net.)

The Sisters of Napoleon. From the French of Joseph Turquan, by W. R. H. Trowbridge. (Unwin. 15s. net.)

A Royal Quartette. By Mrs. Bearne. (Unwin. 10s. 6d. net.)

The Birth of Modern Italy. The Posthumous Papers of Jessie White Mario. (Unwin. 12s. 6d. net.)

Spencer Perceval. A Biography. By Philip Treherne. (Unwin. 5s. net.)

Joseph Skipsey. A Memoir. By the Right Hon. Robert Spence Watson. (Unwin. 2s. 6d. net.)

Friedrich Nietzsche. His Life and Work. By M. A. Mügge, Ph.D. (Unwin. 10s. 6d. net)

CHILDREN'S BOOKS.

The Sword of Welleran, and other Stories. By Lord Dunsany. (Allen. 6s. net.)

The Love Family. By Mrs. M. H. Spielmann. (Allen. 3s. 6d.)

These Little Ones. Studies of Child Life. By E. Nesbit. (Allen. 3s. 6d. net.)

Peep-in-the-World. By Mrs. F. E. Crichton. (Arnold. 3s. 6d.)

Red Cap Adventures. By S. R. Crockett. (Black. 6s.)

The Children's Book of Celtic Stories. By Elizabeth Grierson. (Black. 6s.)

The Children's Book of Art. By Miss A. E. Conway and Sir Martin Conway. (Black. 6s.)

The Bull of the Kraal and the Heavenly Maidens: A Tale of Black Children. By Dudley Kidd. (Black. 6s.)

In the Fairy Ring: A Book of Verses and Pictures for Children. By Florence Harrison. (Blackie. 6s. net.)

Three Jovial Puppies: A Book of Pictures and Rhymes. By J. A. Shepherd and E. D. Cuming. (Blackie. 6s. net.)

How Canada was Won: A Tale of Wolfe and Quebec. By Captain F. S. Brereton. (Blackie. 6s.)

Roughriders of the Pampas: A Tale of Ranch Life in South America. By Captain F. S. Brereton. (Blackie. 5s.)

The White Trail: A Story of the Early Days of Klondike. By Alexander Macdonald, F.R.G.S. (Blackie. 6s.)

A Middy in Command: A Tale of the Slave Squadron. By Harry Collingwood. (Blackie. 6s.)

Cousin Sara: A Story of Arts and Crafts. By Rosa Mulholland. (Blackie. 6s.)

The Hill That Fell Down: A Story of a Large Family. By Evelyn Sharp. (Blackie. 3s. 6d.)

Anne's Terrible Good Nature, and Other Stories. By E. V. Lucas. (Chatto & Windus. 6s.)

Margery Redford and Her Friends. By Mrs. M. H. Spielmann. (Chatto & Windus. 5s. net.)

The Dumpy Books for Children:—

Simple Simon. By Helen R. Cross.
The Little Frenchman. By Eden Coybee.
The Potato Book. By Lily Schofield.
(Chatto & Windus. 1s. net. each.)

A Treasury of Verse for Little Children. Selected by M. G. Edgar. (Harrap. 7s. 6d. net.)

In Nature's School. By Lilian Gask. (Harrap. 3s. 6d. net.)

Days Before History. By H. R. Hall. (Harrap. 3s. 6d. net.)

Grandmother's Favorites. New Series, including Birthday Present, Holiday House, &c. (Jack. 2s. net.)

The Dwellers. A New Nature Series. Six Vols. (1) In the Garden; (2) In the Pond; (3) River Bank; (4) Woodland; (5) Meadows; (6) Underground. (Jack. 1s. net.)

Told to the Children. New Vols. Stories of Beowulf, Stories from the Ballads, &c. (Jack. 1s. net.)

The Book of Princes and Princesses. By Mrs. Lang. Edited by Andrew Lang. (Longmans. 6s.)

The Golliwogg Series:—The Adventures of Borbee and the Wisp: A Fairy Story. By Florence K. Upton. (Longmans. 6s.)

Little Miss Quixote. By Robert Haymes and Dorothy Rose. (Longmans. 5s.)

The Golden Series of Illustrated Juvenile Books:—

Fairies of Sorts. By Mrs. Molesworth. (Macmillan. 3s. 6d.)

Fairy Tales from South Africa. Collected from original Native Sources, and arranged by Mrs. E. J. Bourhill and Mrs. J. B. Drake. (Macmillan. 3s. 6d.)

Nelson's Nursery Book. (Nelson. 4s. net.)

Gowrie's Vengeance. By Evelyn Everett-Green. (Nelson. 2s. 6d.)

Young Nemesis: A Story of Piracy. By F. T. Bullen. (Nisbet. 6s.)

That Master of Ours: A Story of School Life in the Olden Days. (Nisbet. 5s.)

A Plucky School-Girl. By Dorothea Moore. (Nisbet. 3s. 6d.)

Fairy Tales from the Harz Mountains. By Alfred C. Fryer. (Nutt. 3s. 6d. net.)

Nutt's Juvenile Series:—

Midshipmen Afloat; or, Life in the Navy Fifty Years Ago. With Introduction by Lieut-Gen. Sir William Wright, K.C.B. (Nutt. 2s. net.)

Me and Nobbles. By Amy le Feuvre. (Religious Tract Society. 2s.)

The Family Next Door. By Evelyn Everett-Green. (Religious Tract Society. 2s. 6d.)

The Life and Letters of an Eminent Dog. Told by himself, and written by Muriel D. C. Lucas. (Religious Tract Society. 1s. 6d.)

The Boys' Book of Steamships. By J. R. Howden. (Grant Richards. 6s.)

Finn the Wolfhound. By A. J. Dawson. (Grant Richards. 6s. net.)

The Russian Fairy Book. Translated by Nathan Haskell Dole. (Grant Richards. 3s. 6d. net.)

Grant Richards's Nursery Library. Peter Pixie. By A. Thorburn. (Grant Richards. 1s. 6d. net.)

Psyche. By Louis Conperus. (Rivers. 3s. 6d.)

Babel. By Louis Conperus. (Rivers. 3s. 6d.)

Happy Hearts. (Ward Lock. 3s.)

COUNTRY LIFE, GARDENING, and SPORT.

An Artist's Garden. By Anna Lea Merritt. (Allen. 21s. net.)

Scottish Gardens. By the Right Hon. Sir Herbert Maxwell, Bart. Illustrated in colour by Mary M. G. Wilson. (Arnold. 21s. net.)

Skating By E. F. Benson. (Bell. 7s. 6d. net.)

The Royal Botanic Gardens, Kew. Historical and Descriptive. By W. J. Bean, Assistant Curator. (Cassell. 20s. net.)

Little Gardens. How to Make the Most of Them. By H. H. Thomas, Editor of "The Gardener." (Cassell. 1s. net.)

Life Histories of Familiar Plants. By John J. Ward. (Cassell. 6s.)

Leaf and Tendril. By John Burroughs. (Constable. 5s. net.)

From St. Ives to Land's End. By A. G. Folliott-Stokes. Pictures by J. C. Douglas. (Greening. 1s. net.)

The Land's End. A Naturalist's Impressions in West Cornwall. By W. H. Hudson. (Hutchinson. 10s. 6d. net.)

Messrs. BELL'S ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Ready October 22. THE SENSATION OF THE YEAR. Cloth, 6s.

THE WAR IN THE AIR.

By H. G. WELLS. With 16 Illustrations by A. C. MICHAEL.

In view of the world-wide interest which has been evoked by aviators in their attempts to overcome the difficulties of flight, Mr. H. G. Wells's new novel is of special and topical interest. In it he has set himself to show, in the most vivid way, how far the welfare of the future is likely to be revolutionised by the new discoveries in aeronautics. His hero, an everyday suburban Londoner, who is accidentally carried away in a balloon, is plunged by a whimsical fate into a war which involves Great Britain, Germany, America, and Japan, and uses up all the new inventions of flight and battle; and his experiences make up a story of the highest imagination and the most absorbing interest.

NEW NOVEL BY MR. W. H. MALLOCK.

READY OCTOBER 29. Cloth, 6s.

AN IMMORTAL SOUL

BY W. H. MALLOCK.

Author of "A Human Document," "The Individualist," &c.

In his new novel Mr. Mallock gives a psychological study of absorbing interest. It deals with the special mental problems arising out of the social conditions of to-day, and shows all those gifts of clear insight and sure characterisation which have won so distinguished a place for its author among the novelists of to-day.

Cloth, 6s.

THE TRAMPING METHODIST

By SHEILA KAYE-SMITH.

"The title of 'The Tramping Methodist' tells its own tale, but it hardly conveys its charm. The story is told by the Methodist himself, and the narrative is simple, sincere, and at times beautiful. . . . We welcome a new writer of real merit."—Morning Post.

"A thoroughly well-told and interesting story, in which the author's love of humanity is only second to her love of nature."—Daily Telegraph.

"A tale with many fine sympathetic touches, which has a note of sincerity throughout."—Times.

Just Published. THE "PINAFORE" PICTURE BOOK. Crown 4to, 5s. net.

The Story of "H.M.S. Pinafore" told by W. S. GILBERT. With 16 Illustrations in Colour, numerous Black-and-White Drawings, and special Cover and End-papers by ALICE B. WOODWARD.

Also an EDITION DE LUXE, limited to 250 copies, printed on Hand-made Paper, with the plates mounted, 10s. 6d. net.

Ready end of October.

Uniform with "PEWTER PLATE." Imperial 8vo, freely Illustrated, 25s. net.

SHEFFIELD PLATE

Its History, Manufacture, and Art. By HENRY NEWTON VEITCH.

Just Published. Post 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

ARTS AND CRAFTS OF THE MIDDLE AGES

A Description of Mediæval Workmanship in several of the Departments of Applied Art, together with some account of Special Artisans in the Early Renaissance. By JULIA DE WOLF ADDISON. With 4 Coloured Plates and 70 other Illustrations.

Ready Shortly. Small 4to.

THE ITINERARY OF JOHN LELAND

Newly Edited from the MSS. By LUCY TOULMIN SMITH. Vol. IV., containing Parts VII. and VIII.

BOHN'S LIBRARIES.

FORTHCOMING VOLUMES.

Completion of Mr. TEMPLE SCOTT'S Edition of SWIFT.

THE PROSE WORKS OF JONATHAN SWIFT

Edited by TEMPLE SCOTT. With an Introduction by the Right Hon. W. E. H. LECKY, M.P. In 12 Vols. With numerous Portraits and Facsimiles. 5s. each. Vols. I.-XI. ready.

Vol. XII. completing the edition. Bibliography by W. SPENCER JACKSON, and Full Index, with Essays on the Portraits of Swift and Stella by the Right Hon. Sir FREDERICK FALKINER, K.C., and on the Relations between Swift and Stella by the Very Rev. J. H. BERNARD, D.D., Dean of St. Patrick's. With 2 Portraits and a View of Woodpark. [Ready immediately.

MORE'S UTOPIA

Robinson's Translation of the "Utopia"; together with Roper's "Life of Sir Thomas More" and "More's Letters to Margaret Roper," and others. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by GEORGE SAMPSON. Ready Shortly.

A New Translation of Homer's Iliad.

In 2 Vols. Vol. I., containing Books I.-XII., in the Press.

THE ILIAD OF HOMER

Translated into English Prose by E. H. BLAKENEY, M.A., Headmaster of the King's School, Ely.

Ready immediately. 8vo. With 123 Illustrations. 10s. 6d. net.

BIOLOGY AND ITS MAKERS

By WILLIAM LOCY, Ph.D., Sc.D.

Now Ready. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

TURKEY AND THE TURKS

An Account of the Lands, the Peoples, and the Institutions of the Ottoman Empire. By W. S. MONROE. With 48 Illustrations.

Ready November. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d.

IN VIKING LAND

An Account of the Lands, the Peoples, and the Institutions of Norway. By W. S. MONROE. Illustrated.

Ready Shortly. Small 8vo. With many Illustrations. 7s. 6d.

SKATING

By E. F. BENSON.

A book on English combined figure skating, with instantaneous photographs of well-known skaters to illustrate difficult figures taken by Mrs. Aubrey Le Blond.

QUEEN'S TREASURES SERIES.

Small crown 8vo. With 8 Coloured Plates and decorated title page, covers, and end-papers, 2s. 6d. net each.

This series will consist of stories which delighted the young readers of the last generation, and have still retained their old-world fascination. The volumes will be well printed on good paper, illustrated in colour, and daintily bound.

FIRST LIST OF VOLUMES.

COUSIN PHILLIS

By Mrs. GASKELL. Illustrated by Miss M. V. WHEELHOUSE. With an introduction by THOMAS SECCOMBE. [Ready.

SIX TO SIXTEEN

By Mrs. EWING. Illustrated by Miss M. V. WHEELHOUSE. [October.

A FLAT-IRON FOR A FARTHING

By Mrs. EWING. Illustrated by Miss M. V. WHEELHOUSE.

Les Classiques Français Illustrés.

Small crown 8vo. With 8 Full-Page Coloured Plates and numerous Illustrations in Black and White. 5s. net each.

NEW VOLUME.

FRANÇOIS LE CHAMPI

Par GEORGE SAND. Illustrations de GERTRUDE LEESE.

A full List of the Series will be sent on application.

A New Children's Book.

THE ADOPTING OF ROSA MARIE

By CARROLL WATSON RANKIN, Author of "Dandelion Cottage." Illustrated by F. C. SHINN. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

London: GEORGE BELL & SONS, York House, Portugal Street, W.C.

Beautiful Flowers and How to Grow Them. By H. J. Wright and Walter P. Wright. (Jack. 17 parts at 1s. net.)

Gardens: Past and Present. By K. L. Davidson. (Werner Laurie. 6s. net.)

My Garden. By J. T. Prior. (Elkin Mathews.)

The Complete Fox-Hunter. By Charles Richardson. (Methuen. 12s. 6d. net.)

The Complete Oarsman. By R. C. Lehmann, M.P. (Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.)

The Heart of the Wild. Wild Life Studies from Near and Far. By S. L. Bensusan. (Milne. 6s.)

The English House. By W. Shaw Sparrow. (Nash. 10s. 6d. net.)

Children and Gardens. By Gertrude Jekyll. (George Newnes. 6s. net.)

The Romance of Bird Life. By John Lea, M.A. (Seeley. 5s.)

CLASSICAL LITERATURE and PHILOLOGY.

The Frogs of Aristophanes. Translated into English Rhyming Verse by Professor G. Murray. (Allen. 2s. net.)

The Iliad of Homer. Translated into English Prose by E. H. Blakeney, M.A. In 2 vols. (Bell.)

Cicero—Select Letters. By Rev. T. Nicklin, M.A. (Blackwood. 2s. 6d.)

The Horace Pocket Book. Arranged by S. E. Winbolt. (Constable. 2s. 6d. net.)

Caesar's Commentaries on the Gallic War translated into English. By T. Rice Holmes, Hon. Litt.D. (Macmillan.)

Classical Library. New vols.

The Acharnians of Aristophanes. Edited by W. J. M. Starkie. (Macmillan.)

The Characters of Theophrastus. English Translation by the late Sir Richard C. Jebb. New edition, edited by J. E. Sandys. (Macmillan.)

The Annals of Tacitus for English Readers. Book VII.—End. An English Translation. By George G. Ramsay, Litt.D. (Murray. 15s. net.)

Aristotle's Poetics. A revised Greek text. By I. Bywater. (Oxford University Press.)

Oxford Library of Translations:—

Virgil. Translated by John Jackson.

Plato's Republic. Translated by Benjamin Jowett.

Hesiod. Translated by A. W. Mair.

Statius Silvae. Translated by D. A. Slater.

(Oxford University Press.)

Apollonius of Tyana. Edited by F. W. Groves Campbell. (Grant Richards. 3s. 6d. net.)

DRAMA.

Arvat. By Leopold H. Myers. A Drama. (Arnold. 4s. 6d. net.)

The Dowager of Jerusalem. A Romance in Four Acts. By Reginald Farrer. (Arnold. 3s. 6d. net.)

Dramas and Diversions. By W. L. Courtney. (Chapman & Hall. 5s. net.)

Great Actors of the Eighteenth Century. By Karl Mantzius, being Vol. 5 of A History of Theatrical Art. (Duckworth. 10s. net.)

John the Baptist. A Play. By Hermann Sudermann. Translated by Beatrice Marshall. (Lane. 5s. net.)

King Alfred's Jewel. (Lane. 5s. net.)

A Mystery Play in Honor of the Nativity of Our Lord. By Robert Hugh Benson. (Longmans.)

Faust. A Drama in Four Acts. Freely adapted from Goethe's Dramatic Poem by Stephen Phillips and J. Comyns Carr. (Macmillan. 4s. 6d. net.)

The Tragedy of Saint Elizabeth of Hungary. By Arthur Dillon. (Elkin Matthews.)

The Masque of the Grail. By Ernest Rhys. (Elkin Matthews.)

Undine. A Tragedy in Four Acts. By Whitworth Wynne. (Kegan Paul. 4s. 6d. net.)

Queen Mariamne. A Play in Five Acts. By the Author of Borgia. (Sidgwick & Jackson.)

The St. George's Windsor Series of Plays. Words and Lyrics by F. Maynard Bridge. Incidental music by Sir Walter Parratt and M. Ackerman. (Sonnenschein.)

EDUCATIONAL.

Analytical Geometry of the Conic Sections. By the Rev. E. H. Askwith. (Black. 7s. 6d. net.)

Examples in Elementary Mechanics, Practical, Graphical, and Theoretical. By W. J. Dobbs, M.A. (Methuen. 5s.)

Outlines of Physical Chemistry. By George Senter, D.Sc. (Methuen. 3s. 6d.)

Elementary Latin: Being a First Year's Course. By F. J. Terry. (Methuen. 2s.)

Junior English. By F. J. Rantz, M.A. (Methuen. 1s. 6d.)

Examples in Practical Arithmetic. Compiled by J. L. Martin. In Two Parts. (Murray. 6d. each.)

The Teaching of Reading. By H. C. Wyld. (Murray.)

A Primer of French Grammar, in French. By A. A. Somerville, M.A. (Rivington.)

Graduated French Exercises and Questionaires on Accidence and Syntax. By F. E. Robeson, M.A. (Rivington.)

The Transitional French Reader. By R. H. Pardoe, B.A. (Rivington.)

FICTION.

The Seekers. By Frank Savile. (Arnold. 6s.)

The Witch's Sword. By David Kerr Fulton. (Arnold. 6s.)

The Heritage. By Sydney C. Grier. (Blackwood. 6s.)

Salvator. By Perceval Gibbon. (Blackwood. 6s.)

Saleh: A Sequel. By Hugh Clifford. (Blackwood. 6s.)

The Ghost Kings. By H. Rider Haggard. (Cassell. 6s.)

The Virgin in Judgment. By Eden Phillpotts. (Cassell. 6s.)

Miss Fallowfield's Fortune. By Ellen Thorneycroft Fowler. (Cassell. 6s.)

Halfway House. A Comedy of Degrees. By Maurice Hewlett. (Chapman and Hall.)

The Old Wives' Tale. By Arnold Bennett. (Chapman and Hall.)

The Galleon of Torbay. By E. E. Speight. (Chatto and Windus. 6s.)

Ships of Desire. By L. S. Gibson. (Chatto and Windus. 6s.)

Junia. By Jessie Herbertson. (Chatto and Windus. 6s.)

Lewis Rand. By Mary Johnston. (Constable. 6s.)

The Borderland. By Robert Halifax. (Constable. 6s.)

Desire. By Una L. Silberrad. (Constable. 6s.)

Some Ladies in Haste. By Robert W. Chambers. (Constable. 6s.)

The Spy. By Maxim Gorky. (Duckworth. 6s.)

The Bond. By "Neith Boyce." (Duckworth. 6s.)

The Kiss, and other Stories. By Anton Tchekhoff. (Duckworth. 6s.)

In Empire's Cause. By Ernest Protheroe. (Gay & Hancock.)

A Maid of Honor. By Robert Aitken. (Greening. 6s.)

The Sin of the Duchess. By Houghton Townley. (Greening. 6s.)

The Magician. By W. S. Maugham. (Heinemann.)

From J. M. DENT & CO.'S AUTUMN LIST.

A NEW HISTORY OF PAINTING IN ITALY.

By J. A CROWE and G. B. CAVALCASELLE. Edited and Supplemented with Notes by EDWARD HUTTON. 3 vols. demy 8vo, 15s. net per volume; after publication, in sets only, £3 net.

Vol. I. Autumn, 1908. Vol. II. Spring, 1909. Vol. III. September, 1909.

JACOB JORDAENS.

By MAX ROOSES. Translated by Miss ELISABETH C. BROERS. Many very fine Reproductions in Photogravure of this great contemporary of Rubens. 1 vol. imperial, £2 2s. net.

This is the first time the work of this painter of the Flemish School has been reproduced, and as the number of copies will be limited, it is anticipated that the demand will be such that the edition will soon be exhausted.

BEETHOVEN'S LETTERS.

Critical Edition, with Explanatory Notes. By Dr. ALF. CHR. KALISCHER. Translated, with Preface, by J. S. SHEDLOCK, M.A. Photogravure Frontispiece, 2 vols. demy 8vo, 21s. net.

This will be the First Complete English Edition of Beethoven's Letters, and will contain over 1,100 Letters and Notes.

OLD MASTERS.

100 Examples of their Work Reproduced in Colour, with Notes on the Pictures and the Painters. 2 vols. royal 4to, 21s. net.

Each volume contains 50 coloured reproductions of works by various old masters. Twenty are from paintings in the National Gallery, whilst others are from Continental Galleries, such as Rome, St. Petersburg, Vienna, Paris, Dresden, Munich, &c.

THE MYSTICAL ELEMENT OF RELIGION.

Studied in the Lives of St. Catherine of Genoa and her Friends. By BARON F. VON HUGEL. Photogravure Portraits. 2 vols. demy 8vo, 21s. net.

MEMOIRS OF THE COMTE DE RAMBUTEAU.

Many beautiful Photogravures made specially in France, medium 8vo, 15s. net.

This book gives an excellent picture of the society of the day, but its main interest is the light it throws upon Napoleon's character.

LIBERTY AND JUSTICE.

By G. LOWES DICKINSON, author of "The Meaning of Good," "Letters of John Chinaman," etc. Sm. cr. 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

A discussion in dialogue form of the first principles that underlie current political and social controversy, endeavouring to characterise and criticise the existing form of society; and to contrast it with the ideal of autocracy on the one hand and democracy on the other.

FOLKLORE IN LOWLAND SCOTLAND.

By E. SIMPSON. Cr. 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

A volume dealing with the various customs, manners, and superstitions common to Lowland Scotland.

ATTIC AND ELIZABETHAN TRAGEDY.

By LAUCHLAN MACLEAN WATT, author of "In Love's Garden," "The Grey Mother." Large post 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

This volume sets forth, in a popular way, the origins of Tragic Drama in the great poetic ages of Greece and England.

OLD WORLD TRAVEL.

A new and attractive Series of Travel Books. Illustrated in Colour. Sq. medium 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

The aim of this new series is to describe, both by pen and brush, those parts of the Old World, which travellers find most worthy of their attention and to do for countries what the Mediæval Town Series has done for cities. Each volume will contain some twenty-five coloured illustrations, and many line drawings in the text.

THE FIRST TWO VOLS.:

ALONG THE RIVIERAS OF FRANCE AND ITALY.

Written and Illustrated in Colour and Line by GORDON HOME.

VENETIA AND NORTHERN ITALY.

By CECIL HEADLAM. Illustrated in Colour and Line by GORDON HOME.

A NEW LIGHT ON THE RENAISSANCE.

By HAROLD BAYLEY. Super royal 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

The design of this work is to explain to origin and meaning of the multifarious "trade-marks" and decorative designs used by the early printers and papermakers.

A large number of the embellishments used by the early printers such as headlines, tailpieces, initials, and other forms of book decoration are here reproduced, and add much to the general interest and attractiveness of the volume.

INTERNATIONAL PROBLEMS AND HAGUE CONFERENCES.

By T. J. LAWRENCE, M.A., LL.D. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

An account of the Hague Conferences, considered as important points in the evolution of National Society, with the secondary object of providing sound information on the subject in a permanent form.

HADDON HALL LIBRARY.

OUR FORESTS AND WOODLANDS.

By Dr. J. NISBET. A new edition revised and brought up to date. Illustrated in Photogravure. Large crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

THE NEW QUARTERLY.

OCTOBER, 1908.

A Review of Science and Literature.

Edited by DESMOND MacCARTHY.

Contents.

THE MEANING OF SCIENCE.	Norman R. Campbell.
DULCEDO JUDICIORUM.	Max Beerbohm.
OLD BOTTLES.	R. C. Punnett.
FLAUBERT AND SOME CRITICS. (Part I.)	T. Sturge Moore.
RABELAISIAN REGRETS.	G. K. Chesterton.
CONCILIATORY SOCIALISM.	G. A. Paley.
A REPLY.	H. G. Wells.
AN ANTHOLOGY OF CHINESE POETRY.	G. L. Strachey.
THE NOTE-BOOKS OF SAMUEL BUTLER,	the Author of "Erewhon." (IV.)
A NOTE on "MODERN VIEWS of MATTER CRITICISED."

Half-a-Crown net. Yearly Subscription, 10s. post free.

A Complete List of Autumn Publications sent free on application.

J. M. DENT & CO., 19, Aldine House, Bedford Street, LONDON, W.C.

The Uttermost Farthing. By Mrs. Belloc Lowndes. (Heinemann.)

The Guest of Quesnay. By Booth Tarkington. (Heinemann.)

Shadows. By John Galsworthy. (Heinemann.)

Blind Jim. By William De Morgan. (Heinemann.)

69, Birnam Road. By W. Pett Ridge. (Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.)

Purple Love. By Morice Gerard. (Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.)

A Soldier of the Future. By W. J. Dawson. (Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.)

The Grey Above the Green. By Mrs. H. H. Penrose. (Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.)

Love's Magic. By Mrs. Fred Reynolds. (Hurst & Blackett. 6s.)

The Gorgeous Borgia. By Justin Huntly McCarthy. (Hurst & Blackett. 6s.)

A Spirit in Prison. By Robert Hichens. (Hutchinson. 6s.)

The Mayoress's Wooing. By Mrs. Baillie Saunders. (Hutchinson. 6s.)

Colonel Stow. By H. C. Bailey. (Hutchinson. 6s.)

The Royal End. By Henry Harland. (Hutchinson. 6s.)

Three Brothers. By Eden Phillpotts. (Hutchinson. 6s.)

Love and the Interloper. By F. Frankfort Moore. (Hutchinson. 6s.)

The Conventionalists. By Robert Hugh Benson. (Hutchinson. 6s.)

The Works of Anatole France, in English. (Lane. 6s.)

The Doomswoman: A Novel. By Gertrude Atherton. (Lane. 6s.)

Arthur's. By A. Neil Lyons. (Lane. 6s.)

Our Daily Bread: A Novel. By Clara Viebig. (Lane. 6s.)

A Laughing Matter. By Shan F. Bullock. (Laurie. 6s.)

The Adventures of Louis Blake. By Louis Becke. (Laurie. 6s.)

The Life Class. By Keighley Snowden. (Laurie. 6s.)

The Money-Changers. By Upton Sinclair. (John Long. 6s.)

The Bomb. By Frank Harris. (John Long. 6s.)

The Sin of Gabrielle. By Mrs. Coulson Kernahan. (John Long. 6s.)

The Novels of Henry James. In 23 volumes. (Macmillan. 8s. 6d. net each.)

The Forbidden Boundary and Other Stories. By B. L. Putnam Weale. (Macmillan. 6s.)

The Diva's Ruby. By F. Marion Crawford. (Macmillan. 6s.)

Together. By Robert Herrick. (Macmillan. 6s.)

The Great Miss Driver. By Anthony Hope. (Methuen. 6s.)

Interplay. By Beatrice Harraden. (Methuen. 6s.)

Salthaven. By W. W. Jacobs. (Methuen. 6s.)

Hill Rise. By W. B. Maxwell. (Methuen. 6s.)

Over Bemerton's: An Easy-going Story. By E. V. Lucas. (Methuen. 6s.)

Mr. Apollo: A Just Possible Story. By Ford Madox Heuffer. (Methuen. 6s.)

Spanish Gold. By George A. Birmingham. (Methuen. 6s.)

The Broken Honeymoon. By Edwin Pugh. (Milne. 6s.)

The King's Cause. By Walter E. Grogan. (Milne. 6s.)

The Duchess of Dreams. By Edith Macvane. (Milne. 6s.)

The Waters of Jordan. By Horace Annesley Vachell. (Murray. 6s.)

Miss Esperance and Mr. Wycherly. By Mrs. L. Allen Harker. (Murray. 6s.)

The Gentleman. A Romance of the Sea. By Alfred Ollivant. (Murray. 6s.)

By Faith Alone. By René Bazin. (Nash. 6s.)

John Silence. By Algernon Blackwood. (Nash. 6s.)

The Man Who Understood Women. By Leonard Merrick. (Nash. 6s.)

The Luck of Norman Dale. By Barry Pain, and James Blyth. (Nash. 6s.)

Mr. Beke of the Blacks. By John Ayscough. (Nash. 6s.)

The Fighting Line. By David Lyall. (Religious Tract Society. 3s. 6d.)

When the Tide Turns. By Filson Young. (Richards. 6s.)

Renée. By Henry Curties. (Grant Richards. 6s.)

The Crimson Conquest. By C. B. Hudson. (Grant Richards. 6s.)

Fritz the Chauffeur. By Captain Henry Curties. (Rivers. 6s.)

Utopia Island. By Jane Wardle. (Rivers. 6s.)

Diana Mallory. By Mrs. Humphry Ward. (Smith, Elder. 6s.)

A Pawn in the Game. By W. H. Fitchett, B.A. (Smith, Elder. 6s.)

Catherine's Child. By Mrs. Henry de la Pasture. (Smith, Elder. 6s.)

The House of the Crickets. By Katharine Tynan. (Smith, Elder. 6s.)

Patsy. By H. de Vere Stackpoole. (Unwin. 6s.)

The Tempting of Paul Chester. By Alice and Claude Askew. (Unwin. 6s.)

High Life in the East. By James Dalziel. (Unwin. 6s.)

The Woman and the Sword. By Rupert Lorraine. (Unwin. 6s.)

The Mother. New Dartmoor Story. By Eden Phillpotts. (Ward, Lock. 6s.)

Angela's Marriage. By L. G. Moberly. (Ward, Lock. 6s.)

HISTORY.

The History of the "George" Worn on the Scaffold by King Charles I. By Sir Ralph Payne-Gallwey, Bart. (Arnold. 7s. 6d. net.)

State and Family in Early Rome. By Charles W. L. Launspach. (Bell. 7s. 6d. net.)

The Hanoverian Queens of England. By Miss Alice Greenwood. Two Volumes. (Bell.)

The Story of the Pharaohs. A Short History of Ancient Egypt. By the Rev. James Baikie. (Black. 7s. 6d. net.)

Egypt in Asia. A Plain Account of Pre-Biblical Syria and Palestine. By George Cormack. (Black. 7s. 6d. net.)

The Decline and Fall of the Kingdom of Judah. By the Rev. Professor T. K. Cheyne, D.Litt. (Black.)

Famous Duels of the Fleet. By H. B. Money Coutts. (Blackwood. 6s. net.)

Records of the Scottish Volunteer Force, 1859—1908. By Major-General J. M. Grierson, C.V.O. (Blackwood. 25s. net.)

A History of Mediæval Political Theory in the West. By R. W. Carlyle, C.I.E., and A. J. Carlyle, M.A. (Blackwood. 15s. net.)

Ancient China Simplified. By Edward Harper Parker. (Chapman and Hall. 10s. 6d. net.)

The Russian Bastille (The Fortress of Schlnesselburg). By T. P. Youvatscher. Translated by Dr. A. S. Rappoport. (Chatto and Windus. 7s. 6d. net.)

From Island to Empire. A Short History of the Expansion of England by Force of Arms. By J. S. C. Bridge. (Chatto & Windus. 6s. net.)

A Short History of Puritanism. By James Heron, D.D. (T. and T. Clark.)

FROM MR. JOHN LANE'S AUTUMN LIST

THREE WORKS ON NAPOLEON.

DUMOURIEZ AND THE DEFENCE OF ENGLAND AGAINST NAPOLEON.

By J. HOLLAND ROSE, Litt.D., Author of "The Life of Napoleon," &c., and A. M. BROADLEY, Joint Author of "Napoleon and the Invasion of England." Demy 8vo. With numerous Portraits, Maps, and Facsimiles. 21s. net.

Guardian.—"It is impossible to do more than attempt an indication of the varied and significant contents of this fascinating volume, which should appeal alike to all Englishmen and all Frenchmen."

NAPOLEON AND THE ARCHDUKE CHARLES.

A History of the Franco-Austrian Campaign in the valley of the Danube, in 1809. By F. LORAINE PETRE, Author of "Napoleon's Campaign in Poland," "Napoleon's Conquest of Prussia," &c. With 8 Illustrations and 5 Sheets of Maps and Plans. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

[Just out.

LOUIS NAPOLEON AND THE GENESIS OF THE SECOND EMPIRE.

Being a Life of Napoleon III. to the time of his Election to the Presidency of the French Republic. By F. H. CHEETHAM. With numerous Illustrations, reproduced from Contemporary Portraits, Prints, and Lithographs. Demy 8vo. 16s. net.

[Oct. 28.

Just Published—A New Edition of a Standard Work.

MEMOIRS OF THE DUKES OF URBINO.

Illustrating the Arms, Art, and Literature of Italy from 1440 to 1630. By JAMES DENNISTOUN, of Dennistoun. A New Edition, edited by EDWARD HUTTON, with upwards of 100 illustrations. Demy 8vo. 3 vols. 42s. net.

This great work has long been out of print, but it remains the chief authority on the Duchy of Urbino. In addition to fresh notes, the book acquires a new value from the great wealth of illustrations which it contains.

THE DIARY OF A LADY-IN-WAITING.

By LADY CHARLOTTE BURY. Being the Diary Illustrative of the Times of George IV. With original letters from Queen Caroline and other distinguished persons. Edited, with Introduction, by FRANCIS STEUART. 18 Portraits. 2 vols. Demy 8vo, 21s. net. [Second Edition.

"When I resign this world so briary,
To have across the Styx my ferrying.
O, may I die without a DIARY!
And be interr'd without a BURY-ing!"—TOM HOOD.

Westminster Gazette.—"Not easily superseded for the variety of its contents, from that of the purely human point of view to that of high politics, and all those elements which together give to each Monarch and his Court an individual stamp."

JOHN THE BAPTIST.

A Play. By HERMANN SUDERMANN, Author of "Regina," "The Undying Past," &c. Translated by BEATRICE MARSHALL. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

In this sacred drama Sudermann has chosen a theme which Hebbel, Flaubert, and Wilde have exploited before him. Intense excitement prevailed in the Berlin theatrical world when the censor put his veto on the eagerly expected première of "Johannes" at the "Deutches Theatre," a veto soon removed at the personal intervention of William II.

SOME WOMEN LOVING OR LUCKLESS.

By TEODOR DE WYZEWA. Translated from the French by C. H. JEAFFRESON, M.A. With numerous Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

HOLLY, YEW AND BOX.

With Notes on other Evergreens. By W. DALLIMORE and THOMAS MOORE. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

KING ALFRED'S JEWEL.

A Play by the Author of "Mors et Victoria." With a Frontispiece in Colour. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

A Dramatic Portrayal of Alfred the Great, the Scholar, Statesman, Poet, Author, Lawgiver, and Churchman.

THE "LONDONS" OF THE BRITISH FLEET.

By EDWARD FRASER, Author of "Famous Fighters of the Fleet." With 20 Illustrations, 8 in Colour. Crown 8vo, 6s.

Mr. Fraser tells us what Londoners have done for the Navy in the past; how Cromwell first gave the name "London" to a man-o'-war; and how the Dutch burned the "Loyall London" in the Medway.

BIRDS OF THE PLAINS.

By DOUGLAS DEWAR, Author of "Bombay Ducks." With numerous Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

This is a number of vivid pen pictures of Indian birds written in breezy language, to appeal to the general reader as well as to the naturalist.

A CHILD'S GARDEN OF VERSES.

By ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON. New and Cheaper Edition. With over 150 Illustrations by CHARLES ROBINSON. Gilt edges, small 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

Times.—"A dainty little book, with charming little pictures—head and tail pieces—on every page, besides full-page plates."

STRAUSS. A Monograph.

By ERNEST NEWMAN. 2s. 6d. net.

[Living Masters of Music.

THE BOOK OF FERN CULTURE.

By A. HEMSLEY. A guide to the cultivation of ferns in the open and under glass by a well-known fern-grower. Illustrated. Cloth, crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

[Handbooks of Practical Gardening.

ORTHODOXY.

By G. K. CHESTERTON. Uniform with "Heretics." Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

Times.—"By a caprice of the Creator, which Aristotle and Mr. Chesterton have overlooked, there is always a little band of men afflicted with craving for truth. . . . The passion for truth will never break Mr. Chesterton's rest, and that is well. Mr. Chesterton's Rabelaisian orthodoxy."

Daily News.—"Mr. Chesterton's masterpiece."

SIX SHILLING NOVELS.

ARTHUR'S.

By A. NEIL LYONS.

Arthur is the proprietor of a coffee-stall, the centre of a nightly forgathering of shady personalities, who meet to unchain their intellects and get at the bottom of things.

FIRST REVIEW—Times.—"Not only a very entertaining and amusing work, but a very kindly and tolerant work also. At the back of it is understanding and love of life, and that most admirable frame of mind for an artist, the live-and-let-live temperament. . . . Very pretty comedy."

THE HIGH ADVENTURE.

By HUGH DE SELINCOURT, Author of "A Boy's Marriage," &c.

Times.—"A remarkable book."

Manchester Guardian.—"There is much beauty in 'The High Adventure.' He makes one feel what is most worth in the world—life and joy."

OUR DAILY BREAD.

By CLARA VIEBIG, Author of "Absolution."

THE WORKS OF ANATOLE FRANCE IN ENGLISH

3 vols. of Uniform Edition published. Demy 8vo, 6s. each.

RED LILY—MOTHER OF PEARL—GARDEN OF EPICURUS.

Athenæum.—"A magnificent tribute to the greatness of Anatole France."

THE CRIME OF SYLVESTRE BONNARD.

A Translation by LAFCADIO HEARN. [Now Ready.

TO APPEAR SHORTLY.

VINCENZO FOPPA OF BRESCIA, FOUNDER OF THE LOMBARD SCHOOL. HIS LIFE AND WORK.

By CONSTANCE JOCELYN FFOULKES and MONSIGNOR RODOLFO MAIOCCHI, D.D., Rector of The Collegio Borromeo, Pavia. Based on research in the Archives of Milan, Pavia, Brescia, and Genoa, and on the study of all his known works. With over 100 Illustrations, many in Photogravure, and 100 Documents. Demy 4to. Subscription price, Four Guineas. Five Guineas after Publication.

THE LIFE OF JOAN OF ARC.

By ANATOLE FRANCE, a Translation by WINIFRED STEPHENS. With 8 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 2 vols. 25s. net.

KASHMIR: The Land of Streams and Solitudes.

By P. PIRIE. With 25 Full-Page Plates in Colour, and upwards of 100 other Illustrations by H. R. PIRIE. Crown 4to, 21s. net. [Oct 21.

MEMOIRS OF A VANISHED GENERATION.

1813-1855. Edited by Mrs. WARRENNE BLAKE. With numerous Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 16s. net.

CORNISH CHARACTERS AND STRANGE EVENTS

By S. BARING-GOULD, M.A., Author of "Devonshire Characters." With numerous Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 21s. net.

AUBREY BEARDSLEY.

By ROBERT ROSS. With a List of Drawings by AYLMER VALLANCE. Illustrated by 16 Full-page Reproductions. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

AUGUSTUS SAINT GAUDENS: An Appreciation.

By C. LEWIS HIND. Illustrated with 47 Full-page Reproductions from his most famous works. With a Portrait by KENYON COX. Large 4to, bound in cloth. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net. [Oct. 14.

THE ILIAD OF THE EAST.

A Selection of Legends drawn from VALMIKIS Sanskrit Poem, The RAMAYANA.

By FREDERICA MACDONALD. With Illustrations and Cover Design by J. LOCKWOOD KIPLING. Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net. [Oct. 21.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF LONG LIFE.

By JEAN FINOT. A Translation by HARRY ROBERTS. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

TWO DIANAS IN ALASKA.

By AGNES HERBERT, and a SHIKARI. With numerous Illustrations reproduced from Photographs. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net. [Oct. 14.

JOHN LANE, THE BODLEY HEAD, LONDON AND NEW YORK.

Contemporary France. By Gabriel Hanotaux. Volume IV. 1877—1900. Translated from the French. (Constable. 15s. net.)

In the Days of the Councils. By Eustace J. Kitts. (Constable. 10s. 6d. net.)

The Making of Canada. 1763—1814. By A. G. Bradley. (Constable. 12s. 6d. net.)

An Historical Introduction to the Marprelate Tracts. By W. M. Pierce. (Constable. 10s. 6d. net.)

The Declaration of Indulgence, 1672. A Study in the Rise of Organised Dissent. By Frank Bate, M.A. (Constable. 6s. net.)

British Imperialism in the Eighteenth Century. By Gerald Berkeley Hertz. (Constable. 6s. net.)

A New Light on the Renaissance. By Harold Bayley. (Dent. 12s. 6d. net.)

The Mediæval Towns Series:—

Pisa. By Janet Ross and Nellie Erichsen. (Dent. 4s. 6d.)

Lucca. By Janet Ross. Illustrated by Nellie Erichsen. (Dent. 4s. 6d.)

Scotland Since the Union. By Rev. Alexander Macrae. (Dent. 2s. 6d. net.)

The Great Revolution. 1789-1793. By P. A. Kropotkin. (Heinemann.)

The Greatness and Decline of Rome. Vol. III. The Fall of an Aristocracy. Vol. IV. Rome and Egypt. By Guglielmo Ferrero. (Heinemann.)

Romances of the French Revolution. By G. Lenôtre. (Heinemann.)

The Reformation in Scotland: Its Causes, Characteristics, and Consequences. The Stone Lectures for 1907-1908. By D. Hay Fleming, LL.D. (Hodder & Stoughton. 7s. 6d. net.)

The New History of Methodism. Edited by W. J. Townsend, D.D., H. B. Workman, M.A., and George Eayrs, F.R.Hist.S. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

A Short History of Mediæval Peoples. Part II. Italy and the Papacy and the Nations of Western Europe. By Robinson Souttar, M.A. (Hodder & Stoughton. 12s.)

The Kings of England: Their Wives and Mistresses. (Little Books of History Series.) (Humphreys.)

The 2nd Battalion Royal Dublin Fusileers in the South African War. By Majors C. F. Rome and A. E. Mainwaring. (Humphreys.)

The Record of a Regiment of the Line: Being a Regimental History of the 1st Battalion Devonshire Regiment during the Boer War, 1899-1902. By Col. M. Jacson. With a Preface by Lieut.-General W. Kitchener. (Hutchinson. 6s. net.)

Romance of Empire Series. Edited by John Lang.

New Zealand. By Reginald Hersley.

India. By Victor Surridge. Twelve Illustrations in color by A. D. McCormick. (Jack. 6s. net.)

The Plantagenet Roll. By the Marquis of Ruvigny. The Essex Volume. (Jack. £4 4s. net.)

Makers of Canada:—

Lord Sydenham. By Professor Adam Shortt.

Sir James Douglas. By R. E. Gosnell.

W. Lyon Mackenzie. By W. D. Le Sueur, LL.D. (Jack.)

History of the Bank of England. By Prof. A. Andreades. (King. 10s. 6d. net.)

A History of the English Agricultural Laborer. By W. Hasbach. (King. 7s. 6d. net.)

History of the Commercial and Financial Relations between England and Ireland. By A. E. Murray, D.Sc. (King. 3s. 6d. net.)

The Londons of the British Fleet: Events and Deeds of Arms in the Annals of a Name of old renown at Sea. By Edward Fraser. (Lane. 6s.)

Historical Letters and Memoirs of Scottish Catholics, 1625-1793. By the Rev. W. Forbes-Leith, S.J. (Longmans.)

The Dawn of the Catholic Revival in England, 1781-1803. By Bernard Ward, F.R.Hist.S. (Longmans.)

The Russian Conquest of the Caucasus. By J. F. Baddeley. (Longmans.)

History of the Royal Artillery from Waterloo to the Crimean War. By Lieut.-Colonel H. W. L. Hime. (Longmans.)

Historical and Political Essays. By William Edward Hartpole Lecky. (Longmans. 10s. 6d. net.)

The Political History of England. Edited by Rev. William Hunt and Reginald Lane Poole.

Vol. IX., 1702 to 1760. By I. S. Leadam, M.A.

Vol. VI., 1547 to 1603. By A. F. Pollard, LL.D.

Vol. VIII., 1660 to 1702. By Richard Lodge, M.A.

(Longmans. 7s. 6d. net each.)

A History of English Journalism to the Foundation of the "Gazette." With Facsimiles. By J. B. Williams. (Longmans.)

Lollardy and the Reformation in England. A Historical Survey. By James Gairdner, C.B. (Macmillan.)

The Ancient Greek Historians (Harvard Lectures). By J. B. Bury, Litt.D. (Macmillan.)

Social Life at Rome in the Age of Cicero. By W. Warde Fowler, M.A. (Macmillan.)

Early Church History (to A.D. 313). By Henry Melvill Gwatkin, M.A. (Macmillan.)

Woman Through the Ages. By Emil Reich. (Methuen. 21s. net.)

Two English Queens and Philip. By Martin Hume, R.A. (Methuen. 15s. net.)

The Medici Popes. By H. M. Vaughan. (Methuen. 15s. net.)

The Revolt in Hindustan, 1857-1859. By Field-Marshal Sir Evelyn Wood, V.C., K.C.B. (Methuen. 6s.)

A History of Germany, from 1713 to 1815. By C. T. Atkinson, M.A. (Methuen. 12s. 6d. net.)

Chaucer's England. By G. G. Coulton. (Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.)

The City of Genoa. By Robert W. Carden. (Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.)

The Flight of the King: Being a Full, True, and Particular Account of the Miraculous Escape of His Most Sacred Majesty King Charles II. after the Battle of Worcester. By Allan Fea. (Methuen. 7s. 6d. net.)

Oxford in the Eighteenth Century. By A. D. Godley. (Methuen. 7s. 6d. net.)

France Since Waterloo. By W. Grinton Berry, M.A. (Methuen. 6s.)

The Age of the Enlightened Despot, 1660-1789. By A. H. Johnson, M.A. (Methuen. 3s. 6d.)

The Re-making of Modern Europe: from the Outbreak of the French Revolution to the Treaty of Berlin, 1789-1878. By J. A. R. Marriott, M.A. (Methuen. 3s. 6d.)

A Short History of Greece to the Death of Alexander the Great. By Walter S. Hett, B.A. (Methuen. 3s. 6d.)

The Medici. By Col. G. F. Young, C.B. 2 vols. (Murray.)

The Early History of the Church. By the Abbé L. Duchesne. (Murray.)

Treason and Plot. By Martin Hume. (Nash. 12s. 6d.)

The Pageant of British History. By J. Edward Parrott, M.A. (Nelson. 6s. net.)

Scottish Annals from English Chroniclers. Compiled and edited by A. O. Anderson. (Nutt. 10s. 6d. net.)

A History of Missions in India. By Julius Richter, D.D. (Oliphant, Anderson, & Ferrier. 10s. 6d.)

The Renaissance and the Reformation. By E. M. Tanner. (Oxford University Press.)

Auto de Fe and Jew. By E. N. Alder. (Oxford University Press.)

A Short History of the Kingdom of Ireland, from the

From Chapman & Hall's Autumn List

Shakespeare's "The Tempest." With Illustrations in Colour by PAUL WOODROFFE and Songs by JOSEPH MOORAT. Demy 4to. 10s. 6d. net.

The Publishers confidently believe that the faëry phantasy and deep allegorical suggestion of "The Tempest" have never been so exquisitely rendered as in these beautiful pictures by Mr. Woodroffe.

Mr. Woodroffe has no affectations; he is no mannered poseur of the studio. There is nothing in his pictures designed to astonish or excite the incredulity of the spectator; he attempts no artistic gymnastics. But with rare sympathy, and not a little of the intense feeling of the poetic interpreter, he lays his ear to the heart of the poetry and draws what is suggested to him in the full glow of sincerity and intuition.

The Collected Works in Verse and Prose of William Butler Yeats. Containing Portraits of JOHN S. SARGENT, R.A., Signor MANCINI, CHARLES SHANNON, J. B. YEATS. In Eight Volumes. Quarto, vellum back with grey linen sides. £4 4s. net. Printed at the Shakespeare Head Press, Stratford-on-Avon. A thousand and sixty copies printed and the type distributed.

The Gay Gordons. Some Strange Adventures of an Historic Family. By J. M. BULLOCK. With Portraits and Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

Ancient China Simplified. By EDWARD HARPER PARKER, author of "China Past and Present." With Maps and Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

The Life and Times of Simon Fraser, Lord Lovat. By W. C. MACKENZIE. With Portraits and Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

Scenes and Characters from the Works of Charles Dickens. Being 866 Pictures printed from the original Wood Blocks engraved for "The Household Edition" by FRED BARNARD, "PHIZ," J. MAHONY, CHARLES GREEN, A. B. FROST, GORDON THOMSON, Sir LUKE FILDES, R.A., and others. Imperial 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

The Craftsman's Plant Book; or, Figures of Plants Selected from the Old Herbals. With numerous Illustrations in Colour and Black and White. Arranged with Notes and Additional Drawings, and an Essay on the Use of Plants in Decorative Design. By RICHARD G. HATTON, Hon. A.R.C.A. (London). Demy 8vo.

Dramas and Diversions. By W. L. COURTNEY, M.A., LL.D. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.—CONTENTS: Bridals of Blood (Charles IX.)—Kit Marlowe—Gaston Bonnier—Undine—Pericles and Aspasia: A Farce—Time and his Children: A New Year's Card—On the Side of the Angels.

The Literary Man's Bible. A Selection of Passages from the Old Testament Historic, Poetic, and Philosophic, illustrating Hebrew Literature, arranged with Introductory Essays and Annotations. By W. L. COURTNEY, M.A., LL.D. With a New Preface. Large crown 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

TWO FASCINATING ANTHOLOGIES.

FAIRY POETRY.

The Magic Casement.

A Book of Faëry Poems, giving glimpses of the world beyond the casement. Selected and arranged, with Introduction, by ALFRED NOYES. Illustrated by STEPHEN REID. Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

OXFORD POEMS.

The Minstrelsy of Isis.

An Anthology of Poems relating to Oxford and all phases of Oxford life. Selected and arranged by J. B. FIRTH. With Illustrations. Crown 8vo. 6s. net.

TWO VOLUMES OF PLAYS FOR AMATEURS.

DICKENS FOR THE STAGE.

Short Plays from Dickens.

By H. B. BROWNE, M.A. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

NEW PLAYS BY MRS. BARRY PAIN.

More Short Plays for Amateurs.

By Mrs. BARRY PAIN. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net, cloth; 1s. 6d. net, paper.

NEW 6s. NOVELS BY POPULAR WRITERS.

ARNOLD BENNETT.

The Old Wives' Tale.

A complete novel. By ARNOLD BENNETT, Author of "Buried Alive," "Anna of the Five Towns," "The City of Pleasure," &c.

ELLA MACMAHON.

The Court of Conscience.

By ELLA MACMAHON, Author of "The Heart's Banishment," "Oxendale," "Jemima," "The Other Son," &c.

PERCY WHITE.

The Rescuer.

By PERCY WHITE, Author of "Park Lane," "The System," &c.

MAURICE HEWLETT.

Halfway House.

A Comedy of Degrees. By MAURICE HEWLETT, Author of "The Forest Lovers," "Richard Yea and Nay," "The Queen's Quair," &c.

[Third Edition now ready.

MAY BATEMAN.

Farquharson of Glune.

By MAY BATEMAN, Author of "The Altar of Life" and "The Gloworm."

VINCENT BROWN.

The Christian Marriage.

By VINCENT BROWN, Author of "The Fashionable Christians," "A Magdalen's Husband," "The Last Shore," &c.

LONDON: CHAPMAN & HALL, LIMITED.

Earliest Times to the Union with Great Britain. By Charles George Walpole, M.A. (Kegan Paul. 6s.)

The Book of the Kings of Egypt. By E. A. Wallis Budge, M.A., LL.D. (Kegan Paul. 12s. net.)

Ancient Jerusalem. By the Hon. Selah Merrill. (Revell. 21s. net.)

The Church and the Empire. 1003-1304. By D. J. Medley, M.A. (Rivington.)

The Church of Modern Days. 1815-1900. By the Rev. Leighton Pullan, M.A. (Rivington.)

Roman Life and Manners under the Early Empire. By Dr. Friedländer. Translated by Leonard A. Magnus. 2 vols. Vol. I. (Routledge. 6s.)

The Man of the Mask. A Study in the Bye-Ways of History. By the Very Rev. Arthur S. Barnes, M.A. (Smith, Elder. 10s. 6d. net.)

A History of the Ancient Egyptians. By Professor J. H. Breasted, Ph.D. (Smith, Elder. 6s.)

The Early History of the Tories, from the Accession of Charles II. to the Death of William III. 1660-1702. By C. B. Roylance Kent, M.A. (Smith, Elder. 12s. 6d. net.)

The History of South Africa since 1795. By G. McCall Theal, Litt.D., Colonial Historiographer of Cape Colony. (Sonnenschein. 7s. 6d.)

New Light on Ancient Egypt. By G. Maspero. Translated by Elizabeth Lee. (Unwin. 12s. 6d. net.)

A History of Jamaica. From its Discovery by Christopher Columbus to the year 1872. By W. J. Gardner. (Unwin. 7s. 6d. net.)

Story of the Nations. The Roman Empire, B.C. 29—A.D. 476. By H. Stuart Jones, M.A. (Unwin. 5s. net.)

The History of the Australian Bushrangers. By G. E. Boxall. (Unwin. 5s. net.)

The Rise and Progress of the South American Republics. By George W. Crichfield. 2 vols. (Unwin. 25s. net.)

The Evolution of Modern Germany. By W. Harbutt Dawson. (Unwin. 21s. net.)

MISCELLANEOUS.

The Book of Winter Sports. With an Introduction by the Right Hon. the Earl of Lytton. Edited by Edgar Syers. (Arnold. 15s. net.)

Alpines and Bog-Plants. By Reginald Farrer. (Arnold. 7s. 6d. net.)

London Side-Lights. By Clarence Rook. (Arnold. 6s.)

Ancient Tales and Folk-lore of Japan. By Richard Gordon Smith, F.R.G.S. (Black. 20s. net.)

Little People. By Richard Whiteing. (Cassell. 6s. net.)

Life's Contrasts. By John Foster Fraser. (Cassell. 6s. net.)

Letters from an Ocean Tramp. Edited by William McFee. (Cassell 5s. net.)

Choosing a Career. By Duncan Cross. (Cassell. 2s. 6d. net.)

Common Sense Papers. By Sir Fortune Free. (Cassell. 1s. net.)

Half-Hours with the Highwaymen. Picturesque Biographies and Traditions of the Knights of the Road. By Charles G. Harper. Illustrated by Paul Hardy and by the Author, and from Old Prints. 2 vols. (Chapman & Hall. £2 2s. net.)

University Administration. By Charles W. Eliot. The Harris Lectures. (Constable. 6s. net.)

Piccadilly to Pall Mall. Manners, Morals and Man. By Ralph Nevill and Charles E. Jerningham. (Duckworth. 12s. 6d. net.)

Myths of the Norsemen. From the Eddas and Sagas. By H. A. Guerber. (Harrap. 7s. 6d. net.)

Jack's Reference Book. A Universal Encyclopædia, &c. (Jack. 3s. 6d. net.)

The Iliad of the East. A Selection of Legends drawn from Valmikis' Sanskrit Poem, The Ramayana. By Frederika Macdonald. (Lane. 7s. 6d. net.)

The Philosophy of Long Life. By Jean Finot. A Translation by Harry Roberts. (Lane. 7s. 6d. net.)

A Poor Man's House. By Stephen Reynolds. (Lane. 6s.)

Nights with the Gods By Emil Reich. (Werner Laurie. 6s. net.)

Oriental Crime. By H. L. Adam. (Werner Laurie. 7s. 6d. net.)

Occultism and Common Sense. By Beckles Wilson. (Werner Laurie. 6s. net.)

The Physical Phenomena of Spiritualism, Fraudulent and Genuine. By Hereward Carrington. (Werner Laurie. 10s. 6d. net.)

The Westminster Problem-Book. By Miss N. G. Royde-Smith. (Methuen. 3s. 6d. net.)

The Horse in History. By Bazil Tozer. (Methuen. 6s.)

Bridge Developments. By Edmund Robertson and A. Hyde Wollaston. (Kegan Paul. 5s.)

On a Threshold of a New World of Thought. An Examination of the Phenomena of Spiritualism. By W. F. Barrett, F.R.S. (Kegan Paul. 2s. 6d. net.)

Scrap Book of Elementary Mathematics, Notes, Recreations and Essays. By William F. White. (Kegan Paul. 5s. net.)

Passing English of the Victorian Era. By J. Redding Ware. (Routledge. 7s. 6d. net.)

Practical Library Administration. By Walter S. C. Rae. (Routledge. 2s. 6d.)

The Story of Libraries. By Ernest A. Savage. (Routledge. 2s. 6d.

Blackstick Papers. By Lady Ritchie. (Smith, Elder. 6s. net.)

Book Prices Current. Vol. XXII. 1908. Compiled by T. E. Slater. A Record of Book Sales for the Year. (Stock. £1 7s. 6d. net.)

MUSIC.

Violin Playing and Violin Adjustment. By James Winram. (Blackwood. 5s. net.)

Beethoven's Letters. Critical Edition, with Explanatory Notes. By Dr. Alf. Chr. Kalischer. Translated by J. S. Shedlock, M.A. (Dent. 21s. net.)

The Standard Concert Guide. By George P. Upton. (Hutchinson. 5s. net.)

The Standard Opera. By George P. Upton. (Hutchinson. 5s. net.)

A History of English Cathedral Music. By J. S. Bumpus. (Werner Laurie. 2 vols. 6s. net each.)

Forty Years of Music, 1865-1905. Being the Recollections of a Critic. By Joseph Bennett. (Methuen. 16s. net.)

Johannes Brahms. The Herzogenberg Correspondence. Edited by Max Kalbeck, and translated by Hannah Bryant. (Murray.)

Life of Bach. By Sir C. Hubert H. Parry, Bt. (Putnam. 6s. net.)

Vincenzo Bellini. By William A. C. Lloyd. (Sisley. 7s. 6d. net.)

NEW EDITIONS AND REPRINTS.

The Life, Letters, and Works of John Ruskin. Library Edition. Thirty-five Volumes Now Ready. (Allen. 25s. net. per volume.)

Cousin Phillis. By Mrs. Gaskell. With an Introduction by T. Seccombe. (Bell. 2s. 6d. net.)

From MESSRS. ROUTLEDGE'S AUTUMN LIST.

THE IDEAL OF A GENTLEMAN: A Mirror for Gentlefolk and a Manual of Gentlehood. Compiled and Edited by the REV. A. SMYTHE PALMER, D.D. 8vo, cloth extra, gilt, gilt top, silk register and headband. With a Photogravure Frontispiece. 6s.

"A remarkably interesting volume."—Westminster Gazette.

"A fund of information as curious as it is instructive."—Field.

"Facet after facet of the dazzling jewel is exposed to our view."—Nation.

INDIA THROUGH THE AGES: A Popular History of Hindustan. By FLORA ANNIE STEEL, author of "On the Face of the Waters," etc. With 7 Maps. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 4s. 6d.

"Inspired by genius and lit up by imagination."—Literary World.

"In 360 pages she has succeeded in composing a genuinely interesting history of India, and we believe that no one else has done anything like it."—Nation.

THE CASE FOR THE GOAT: With the Practical Experience of Twenty-five Experts. By "HOME COUNTIES." With Introductions by the DUCHESS OF HAMILTON AND BRANDON, President of the British Goat Society, and H. RIDER HAGGARD. With many Photographs of Goats and Goats' Stables. Second Edition. Crown 8vo. cloth extra, gilt, 3s. 6d.

"May help to remove ignorant prejudice against the goat and induce small holders, labourers, and many rural residents to keep this valuable animal. . . . The author fully proves his case."—Nature.

"Full of information and of great interest."—Farm and Garden.

CELESTINA, or the Tragic Comedy of Calisto and Melibea. Translated from the Spanish by JAMES MABBE, anno 1631. Also An Interlude of Calisto and Melibea, for the first time accurately reproduced from the original copy printed by John Rastell, circa 1530. Edited, with Introduction (56 pp.) on the Picaresque Novel, and Tables and Appendices, by H. WARNER ALLEN, Taylorian Scholar in Spanish Language and Literature. 8vo, buckram, gilt, gilt top, 6s. net.

ROMAN LIFE AND MANNERS UNDER THE EARLY EMPIRE. By LUDWIG FRIEDLAENDER. Authorized Translation of the Seventh (enlarged and revised) Edition of the Sittengeschichte Roms. In 2 vols. Vol. I. By LEONARD A. MAGNUS, LL.B. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, gilt, gilt top, 6s.

THE BOOK-HUNTER. By JOHN HILL BURTON. Edited by J. HERBERT SLATER, Editor of "Book Prices Current," etc. 8vo, buckram, gilt, gilt top, with a Frontispiece. 2s. 6d. net.

NEW UNIVERSAL LIBRARY.

Pott 8vo. Cloth, gilt, 1s. net; Royal blue leather, 1s. 6d. net; lambskin, 2s. net.

Recent Additions.

A GENERAL VIEW OF POSITIVISM. By AUGUSTE COMTE. Dr. Bridge's Translation, with an Introduction (1908) by FREDERIC HARRISON, and the Additional Notes (Paris, 1907).

THE JOURNAL OF EUGÉNIE DE GUÉRIN. Published with the consent of the family. Translated, with an Introduction, by WILLIAM LIGHTBODY.

THE TRAGEDIES OF SOPHOCLES. Translated, with a Biographical Essay, by E. H. PLUMPTRE, sometime Dean of Wells.

THE PLAYS OF ARISTOPHANES. A Metrical Version, with Notes, and an Essay on Aristophanic Comedy, by JOHN HOOKHAM FRERE.

ESSAYS. By MARK PATTISON. Two Vols.

NOW COMPLETE.

THE POETS AND THE POETRY OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY. A Popular Encyclopædia of Modern Poetry, covering the area of Greater Britain and the limits of the Nineteenth Century. Edited by ALFRED H. MILES. With Biographical and Critical Notices by the most eminent living Writers, 12 vols., pott 8vo, red cloth binding, full gilt back, each 1s. 6d. net; red lambskin gilt, gilt tops, silk register, each 2s. 6d. net.

Each Volume is sold separately.

Also boxed in Sets. 12 vols., cloth, in cloth case, with red leather label, 21s. net; or, 12 vols., lambskin, in triangular cloth case with drop lid, displaying contents of series, 36s. net.

1. Crabbe to Coleridge.
2. Southey to Shelley.
3. Keats to Lytton.
4. Tennyson to Clough.
5. Kingsley to Thomson.
6. Morris to Buchanan.
7. Bridges to Kipling.
8. Women Poets—I.
9. Women Poets—II.
10. Humorous Poets.
11. Sacred Poets—I.
12. Sacred Poets—II.

GEORGE ROUTLEDGE & SONS, Ltd.,
Broadway House, Ludgate Hill, E.C.

GEORGE ALLEN & SONS' NEW BOOKS.

THE SWORD OF WELLERAN AND OTHER STORIES

By LORD DUNSANY. With 10 Full-page Illustrations by S. H. SIME.

Pott 4to, cloth, designed cover, gilt top, 6s. net.

PALL MALL GAZETTE: "Fine illustrations by Mr. S. H. Sime in his most characteristic manner." [Just Out.

THE MOCKERS AND OTHER VERSES

By JANE BARLOW.

Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 3s. 6d. net. [Just Out.

A Book for Collectors.

THE ETCHED AND ENGRAVED WORK OF FRANK SHORT

Edited, with Appreciation, by E. F. STRANGE.
220 Copies (numbered) for sale.

Arnold handmade paper, demy 8vo, uncut 21s. net.

This work includes a full descriptive list of all Mr. Short's Engravings and Lithographs in their various "states," arranged chronologically from material supplied by the ARTIST, together with several letters by RUSKIN now first published.
[October 14th.

THE LETTERS OF A NOBLE WOMAN

Mrs. LA TOUCHE OF HARRISTOWN.

Edited, with Memoir, by MARGARET YOUNG, with Frontispiece in colour, Portraits, and other Illustrations.

Demy 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 12s. 6d. net. [October.

AN ARTIST'S GARDEN

Tended, painted, and described by ANNA LEA MERRITT. With 16 Full-page Illustrations in colour by the Author.

Medium 4to, cloth, designed cover, 21s. net.

The Garden here described and illustrated lies in one of the most beautiful and quiet valleys of Hampshire. The book will be found serviceable, as it abounds in hints both for the beginner and expert in gardening. [October.

THE FROGS OF ARISTOPHANES

Translated into English Rhyming Verse by Professor GILBERT MURRAY.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. net. [October.

Imp. 16mo, paper covers, 1s. net.

Also the PLAYS OF EURIPIDES, uniform with the above.
Now Ready.

BACCHAE | HIPPOLYTUS
ELECTRA | MEDEA
THE TROJAN WOMEN

THE VARYING YEAR

A Volume of Social Reminiscence.
By the Right Hon. GEORGE W. E. RUSSELL.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 5s. net. [November.

CANNES AND ITS SURROUNDINGS

By AMY M. BENECKE. With 40 Full-page Illustrations, including 16 in colour by the Author.

Foolscap 4to, cloth, 10s. 6d. net. [November.

READY NOVEMBER 12th.

PROBLEMS OF TO-DAY

WEALTH—LABOUR—SOCIALISM, &c.

By ANDREW CARNEGIE.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. net.

London: GEORGE ALLEN & SONS, 156, Charing Cross Road.

Six to Sixteen. By Mrs. Ewing. (Bell. 2s. 6d. net.)
History of the Latin and Teutonic Nations. (1494—1514.) By Leopold von Ranke. (Bell.)
Haunts of Ancient Peace. By Alfred Austin. (Black. 7s. 6d. net.)
Scottish Men of Letters in the Eighteenth Century. By Henry Grey Graham. (Black. 5s. net.)
Early Greek Philosophy. By John Burnet, M.A. (Black. 12s. 6d. net.)
The Red Letter Shakespeare. Edited by E. K. Chambers. (Blackie. 1s. net. per volume.)
From Workhouse to Westminster. The Life Story of Will Crooks, M.P. By George Haw. (Cassell. 2s. 6d.)
The Collected Works in Verse and Prose of William Butler Yeats. Containing Portraits by John S. Sargent, R.A., Signor Mancini, Charles Shannon, J. B. Yeats. In Eight Volumes. (Chapman and Hall. £4 4s. net.)
My Life: A Record of Events and Opinions. By Alfred Russel Wallace. (Chapman and Hall. 6s.)
The Fioretti or Little Flowers of S. Francis. Translation by Professor T. W. Arnold. (Chatto and Windus. 30s. net.)
Pearl. Revised Rendering in Modern English of the Fourteenth Century Poem, Perle, by Professor I. Gollancz. (Chatto and Windus.)
The King's Classics:—
Swift's Battle of the Books; together with Selections from the Literature of the Ancient and Modern Learning Controversy. Edited by A. Guthkelch. (Chatto and Windus. 1s. 6d. net.)
The Four Last Things, by Sir Thomas More; together with A Spiritual Consolation and other Treatises by John Fisher, Bishop of Rochester. Edited by Daniel O'Connor. (Chatto and Windus. 1s. 6d. net.)
Dante's Vita Nuova. Introduction and Notes by Professor H. Oelsner. (Chatto and Windus. 1s. 6d. net.)
The Shakespeare Library:—
The Troublesome Reign of King John. The Play Rewritten by Shakespeare as "King John." Edited by F. J. Furnivall. (Chatto and Windus. 2s. 6d. net.)
The History of Hamlet. Edited by Professor I. Gollancz. (Chatto and Windus. 2s. 6d. net.)
The Play of King Leir and His Three Daughters. The Old Play on the Subject of King Lear. Edited by Sidney Lee, D.Litt. (Chatto and Windus. 2s. 6d. net.)
New Volumes in the St. Martin's Illustrated Library of Standard Works:
The Works of Jane Austen. In Ten Volumes. (Chatto and Windus. 3s. 6d. net. per volume.)
Ballads and Lyrics of Love from Percy's "Reliques." Edited by F. Sidgwick. (Chatto and Windus. 6s. net.)
Legendary Ballads from Percy's "Reliques." Edited by F. Sidgwick. (Chatto and Windus. 6s. net.)
Pippa Passes; and Men and Women. By Robert Browning. (Chatto and Windus. 6s. net.)
A Child's Garden of Verses. By Robert Louis Stevenson. (Chatto and Windus. 5s. net.)
The Development of the European Nations, 1870—1900. By J. Holland Rose, Litt.D. (Constable. 7s. 6d. net.)
The Fight for Canada: A Naval and Military Sketch from the History of the Great Imperial War. By William Wood. (Constable. 6s. net.)
The Fight with France for North America. By A. G. Bradley. (Constable. 5s. net.)
Froissart's Chronicles. Illustrations by Herbert Cole. (Dent. 5s. net.)
The Water Babies. By Charles Kingsley. With an Introduction by his daughter, Miss Mary Kingsley. Ill. Cover design by M. W. Tarrant. (Dent. 5s. net.)
Gulliver's Travels. 2 vols. (Greening. 2s. net.)
John Woolman's Journal. With Whittier's Introduction. (Headley. 1s. 6d. net.)
The Society of Friends: its Faith and Practice. By John Stephenson Rowntree. (Headley. 1s. net.)
The Life of Frederick the Great. By Thomas Carlyle. (Hutchinson. 5s. net.)
The World's Story-Tellers. Edited by Arthur Ransome. Hawthorne, Merimée, and others. (Jack. 1s. net.)
Poet's Country. Edited by Andrew Lang. Contributors: Professor Churton Collins, W. J. Loftie, E. Hartley Coleridge, and others. (Jack. 10s. 6d. net.)
Lamb's Tales from Shakespeare. (Jack. 7s. 6d. net.)
The Byam Shaw Edition of Bunyan. (Jack. 7s. 6d. net.)
English Masterpieces. New Volumes:
Milton's Hymn to the Nativity and Kingsley's Poems. (Jack. 6d. and 1s. net.)
Tudor Facsimile Texts. New Vols. Appius and Virginia, Gorboduc or Ferrex and Porrex, The Chief Promises of God to Man, Damon and Pythias, Jacob and Esau, Mary Magdalene, and others. (Jack.)
Alice's Adventures in Wonderland. By Lewis Carroll. Illustrations by W. H. Walker. (Lane. 2s. 6d. net.)
A Child's Garden of Verses. With over 150 Illustrations by Charles Robinson. (Lane. 2s. 6d. net.)
The Life and Letters of Lord Macaulay. By his Nephew, the Right Hon. Sir George Otto Trevelyan, Bart. (Longmans. 3s. 6d.)
The Early History of Charles James Fox. By the Right Hon. Sir George O. Trevelyan. (Longmans. 3s. 6d.)
Lectures on the Industrial Revolution of the 18th Century in England. Popular Addresses, Notes, and Other Fragments. By Arnold Toynbee. (Longmans. 2s. 6d. net.)
The Critical Philosophy of Immanuel Kant. By Edward Caird, D.C.L. 2 vols. (MacLehose. 25s. net.)
A Short History of Philosophy. By Archd. B. D. Alexander, M.A. (MacLehose. 8s. 6d. net.)
Listener's Lure. By E. V. Lucas. (Methuen. 5s.)
The Works of Oscar Wilde. 13 vols. (Methuen. 12s. 6d. net per vol.)
Readings on the Paradise of Dante. By the Hon. William Warren Vernon, M.A. 2 vols. (Methuen. 15s. net.)
Selected Poems of Francis Thompson. Edited by Wilfrid Meynell. (Methuen. 5s. net.)
Alice's Adventures in Wonderland. By Lewis Carroll. Nine full-page Illustrations in Color by Bessie Gutmann. (Milne. 6s.)
The Letters of Queen Victoria. A selection from Her Majesty's Correspondence, 1837-1861. Published by Authority of His Majesty the King. 3 vols. (Murray. 6s. net.)
The Works of George Borrow. (Murray. 1s. net.)
The Works of Samuel Smiles. (Murray. 2s. net.)
Alice's Adventures in Wonderland. By Lewis Carroll. Illustrated by Harry Rountree. (Nelson. 6s. net.)
Nelson's Shilling Library. First Vols.
Scrambles Amongst the Alps. By Edward Whymper.
Collections and Recollections. By the Right Hon. G. W. E. Russell.
The Great Boer War. By Sir A. Conan Doyle.
Life of John Nicholson. By Captain Trotter.
Memories. By Dean Hole.
Life of Dean Stanley. By R. E. Prothero.
Wild Life in a Southern County. By Richard Jefferies. (Nelson. 1s. net per volume.)
Library Edition of the Collected Writings of the late William Ernest Henley. Vols. V.—VII. (Nutt.)
A Survey of London. By John Stow. (Oxford University Press.)
The Stuart and Tudor Library.
Turberville's Noble Art of Venerie or Hunting.
Wilson's Arte of Rhetorique (1585). Edited by G. H. Mair.
Shakespeare's Merry Wives of Windsor (the quarto of 1602), with Introduction by W. W. Greg. (Oxford University Press.)
The Oxford Thackeray. Final vols. Arranged and edited by George Saintsbury, in 17 vols. (Oxford University Press.)
The Oxford Poets.
Crabbe. Edited by the Rev. A. J. and Mrs. Carlyle.
Thomson. Edited by J. Logie Robertson.
The Oxford Library of Prose and Poetry.
Selected Poems of William Barnes. Edited by Thomas Hardy.
Selected Poems of John Clare. Edited by Arthur Symons.

DUCKWORTH & CO.

PICCADILLY TO PALL MALL:

Manners, Morals, and Man. By RALPH NEVILL, Editor of "Reminiscences of Lady Dorothy Nevill," and CHARLES EDWARD JERNINGHAM ("Marmaduke" of Truth). With Photographs. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

SOME EMINENT VICTORIANS.

By J. COMYNS CARR. With many Illustrations, including Facsimile Letters, Unpublished Drawings by BURNE-JONES, Portraits of Celebrities, &c. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

SIR RICHARD TANGYE.

By STUART J. REID, D.C.L., Author of "Life and Letters of Lord Durham," &c. With a Portrait. Crown 8vo, 6s.

SIR CHRISTOPHER WREN.

By LENA MILMAN. With upwards of 60 Illustrations. Pott 4to, 7s. 6d. net.

CRUIKSHANK.

By W. H. CHESSON. With 50 Illustrations. Cloth, 2s. net.; leather, 2s. 6d. net.

SERMONS IN ART.

By the Rev. J. BURNS, M.A., Author of "The Christ Face in Art." Cloth gilt, Photogravure Frontispiece, and many Illustrations. Cr. 8vo, 6s.

CHRISTIANITY: its Nature and its Truth.

By Prof. ARTHUR S. PEAKE, D.D. Cr. 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

PARALLEL PATHS.

A Study of Biology, Ethics, and Art. By T. W. ROLLESTON. Cr. 8vo, 5s. net.

THE GREATEST LIFE.

By Prof. GERALD LEIGHTON, M.D. F.R.S. Edin. Cr. 8vo, 5s. net.

GOD'S MESSAGE THROUGH MODERN DOUBT.

By the Rev. E. ALDOM FRENCH. Cr. 8vo, 2s. 6d net.

LONGINGS: being Leaves out of the Book of Life intended for Those who Understand.

By JOHN W. DE KAY. Uniform with "The Roadmender." 2s. 6d. net. Large-Paper Edition, 10s. 6d. net.

THE SECOND EDITION OF EDWARD FITZGERALD'S

RUBAIYAT of 'UMAR KHAYYAM

1868. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by E. HERON-ALLEN. 10s. 6d. net.

WOMAN IN INDUSTRY.

From Seven Points of View. Preface by D. J. SHACKLETON, M.P. Cr. 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

PROS & CONS OF VIVISECTION.

By Dr. CHARLES RICHET, Professor of Physiology in the Faculty of Medicine, Paris. Illustrated. Cr. 8vo, 5s. net.

A HANDBOOK OF GEOGRAPHY,

PHYSICAL AND MATHEMATICAL. By Dr. EMIL REICH. With numerous Maps, Diagrams, &c. Two Volumes. 12s. 6d. net.

A BOOK OF ADVENTURE.

A SCOUT'S STORY.

By Capt. A. OWEN VAUGHAN (Owen Rhoscomyl), Ex-Captain of Scouts, Author of "Old Fireproof." With Illustrations in Colour. Cr. 8vo, 6s.

NOVELS AND STORES.

THE SPY.

By MAXIM GORKY. 344 pages. Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE BOND.

A Novel of Matrimony. By NEITH BOYCE. 426 pages. Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE KISS & OTHER STORIES.

By ANTON TCHEKHOFF. 328 pages. Crown 8vo, 6s.

DUCKWORTH & CO., 3, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden.

MR. HEINEMANN'S NEW BOOKS

MODERN ART.

A Comparative Study of the Formative Arts. Being a Contribution to a New System of Æsthetics.

By JULIUS MEIER-GRAEFE.

With about 300 Illustrations. 2 vols., demy 4to, £2 2s. net.*

* Starting from Rubens, whom he pronounces the father of modern painting, Dr. Meier-Graefe traces the development of modern art through various personalities, following this chiefly in its two main currents—that of France, where the Rubens tradition was implanted by Watteau and by Fragonard, and that of England, where it was imported by Van Dyck, and took on new beauty in the hands of Reynolds and Gainsborough.

THE GREATNESS AND DECLINE OF ROME.

By GUGLIELMO FERRERO.
Demy 8vo, 6s. net each.*

VOL. III.

THE FALL OF AN ARISTOCRACY.

Vol. IV. ROME AND EGYPT. [In the press.

PREVIOUSLY PUBLISHED.

Vol. I. EMPIRE BUILDERS. Vol. II. JULIUS CÆSAR.

PERSIA: the Awakening East.

By W. P. CRESSON. F.R.G.S.
Illustrated. 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

MY STORY.

By HALL CAINE. Crown 8vo, 6s.

JEAN JACQUES ROUSSEAU.

By JULES LEMAITRE, of the French Academy. Demy 8vo, 10s. net.

ANATOLE FRANCE.

By GEORGE BRANDES.
With Frontispiece. 1s. 6d. net. [Contemporary Men of Letters.

THE WORLD'S GOLD.

By L. DE LAUNAY,
Professor at the Ecole Supérieure des Mines.

* In this work the author traces the various uses and phases of gold, its geology, its extraction, its economic value. His study is important to any one who wishes to be informed on economical and financial movements which, with the development of personal property, affect us all.

THE NOVELS OF THE DAY.

SIX SHILLINGS EACH.

Mr. Heinemann begs to announce that he will publish a new novel by FLORA ANNIE STEEL, author of 'On the Face of the Waters,' on Thursday next:—

THE PRINCE OF DREAMERS.

By F. A. STEEL.

MAURICE GUEST.

By H. H. RICHARDSON.

THE MAGNATE.

By ROBERT ELSON.

THE MAN WHO LIVED.

By BERYL TUCKER, Author of "The Ring."

MARCIA IN GERMANY.

An Indiscreet Chronicle.

HALF-A-CROWN EACH.

THE UTTERMOST FARTHING.

By Mrs. B. LOWNDES, Author of "The Pulse of Life."

THE BLOTTING BOOK.

By E. F. BENSON, Author of "Sheaves."

THE POWER OF A LIE.

By JOHAN BOJER.
With Introduction by HALL CAINE.

Prospectus of these Works and Mr. Heinemann's Autumn Announcement List post free.*

WM. HEINEMANN, 21, Bedford Street, W.C.

The Heroine. By E. S. Barrett.
The Annals of a Parish. By John Galt.
Memoirs of Shelley. By Thomas Love Peacock.
(Oxford University Press.)

The Light of Asia. By Sir Edwin Arnold. (Kegan Paul. 15s. net.)

Dryden Library.
The Vicar of Wakefield. By Oliver Goldsmith. With a Preface and Notes by Austin Dobson. (Kegan Paul. Cloth, 1s. 6d. net.)

The Essays of Michael, Lord of Montaigne. John Florio's translation. Edited by Thomas Seccombe. (Grant Richards. 31s. 6d. net.)

The Courtship of Miles Standish. By H. W. Longfellow. Illustrations by Howard Chandler Christy. (Grant Richards. 7s. 6d. net.)

A Shropshire Lad. By A. E. Housman. (Grant Richards. 6s. net.)

Picaresque Section.
Celestina. Edited by H. W. Allen, M.A. (Routledge. 6s. net.)
Lazarillo de Tormes, together with Nash's Unfortunate Traveller. (Routledge. 6s. net.)

The Confessions of St. Augustine. (Seeley. 6s. net.)

Edinburgh. By Robert Louis Stevenson. (Seeley. 6s.)

The Works of Thomas Nashe. Edited by R. B. McKerrow. Vol. IV. (Sidgwick & Jackson. 10s. 6d. net per vol.)

Letters of James Boswell to W. J. Temple. With Introduction by T. Seccombe. (Sidgwick. 7s. 6d.)

Colonel Hutchinson: Roundhead. (Sisley. 3s. 6d. net.)

The Nun-Ensign. Translated from the Original Spanish with an Introduction and Notes by James Fitzmaurice-Kelly. (Unwin. 7s. 6d. net.)

The Bridle Roads of Spain (Las Alforjas). By George John Cayley. (Unwin. 7s. 6d. net.)

Democracy and Reaction. By L. T. Hobhouse. (Unwin. 1s. net.)

An Autobiography. By Herbert Spencer. 2 vols. (Williams & Norgate. 12s. 6d. net.)

POETRY, BELLES LETTRES, AND CRITICISM.

The Mockers and other Verses. By Jane Barlow. (Allen. 3s. 6d. net.)

Thysia. An Elegy in thirty-five Sonnets. (Bell. 1s. net.)

Poems. With a few Translations. By Robert Potter, M.A. (Bell. 2s. 6d. net.)

Poems. By R. C. Lehmann. (Blackwood. 5s. net.)

Some Eighteenth Century By-Ways and Other Essays. By John Buchan. (Blackwood.)

Drake. An English Epic. Books IV.—XII. By Alfred Noyes. (Blackwood. 6s. net.)

The Minstrelsy of Isis. An Anthology of Poems relating to Oxford and all phases of Oxford Life. Selected and arranged by J. B. Firth. (Chapman & Hall. 6s. net.)

The Magic Casement. A Book of Faëry Poems, giving Glimpses of the World beyond the Casement. Selected and arranged, with Introduction, by Alfred Noyes. (Chapman & Hall. 6s. net.)

The Age of Shakespeare. By Algernon Charles Swinburne. (Chatto & Windus. 6s. net.)

Studies and Memories. By Sir Charles Villiers Stanford. (Constable. 7s. 6d. net.)

Six Masters of Disillusion. By Algar Thorald. (Constable. 6s. net.)

Lectures on Spanish Literature. By J. Fitzmaurice Kelly. (Constable. 7s. 6d. net.)

The Secrets of our National Literature. Chapters in the History of the Anonymous and Pseudonymous Writings of our Countrymen. By William Prideaux Courtney. (Constable. 7s. 6d net.)

Salvage. By Owen Seaman. (Constable. 3s. 6d. net.)

Poems. By Richard Watson Gilder. (Constable. 6s. net.)

Attic and Elizabethan Tragedy. By Lauchlan Maclean Watt. (Dent. 7s. 6d. net.)

Nature Poems and Others. By William H. Davies. (Fifield.)

William Morris, Craftsman Socialist. By Holbrook Jackson. (Fifield.)

A Happy Half-Century and Other Essays. By Agnes Repplier. (Gay & Hancock.)

Literatures of the World. Edited by Edmund Gosse, M.A.
German. By Calvin Thomas.
Latin. By Marcus Dimsdale.
Hebrew. By Professor Philippo Berger.
(Heinemann.)

Contemporary Men of Letters Series:—
Anatole France. By George Brandes. (Heinemann.)

The Triumph of Life. By William Barry, D.D. (Hodder & Stoughton. 7s. 6d. net.)

The Reader's Library. By W. J. Dawson and Coningsby Dawson. Vols. I. and II. The Great English Letter Writers. (Hodder & Stoughton. 2s. 6d. per vol.)

Nineteenth Century Teachers and Other Essays. By Julia Wedgwood. (Hodder & Stoughton. 10s. 6d. net.)

When All the World is Young: a Book of the Wisdom of this World. By Reginald Lucas. (Humphreys.)

Light o' Love: Poems by Florence Harrison. (Humphreys.)

A Georgian Pageant. By F. Frankfort Moore. (Hutchinson. 16s. net.)

Orthodoxy. By Gilbert K. Chesterton. (Lane. 5s. net.)

The Call of Dawn and Other Poems. By Esmé C. Wingfield-Stratford. (Lane. 5s. net.)

Selected Poems. By A. C. Benson. (Lane. 5s. net.)

Personal Studies. By Wilfrid Ward. (Longmans.)

Oxford Lectures on Poetry. By A. C. Bradley, LL.D. (Macmillan.)

De Libris. Prose and Verse. By Austin Dobson. (Macmillan. 5s. net.)

Peace and Happiness. By the Right Hon. Lord Avebury. (Macmillan.)

Selected Poems. By Horace Smith. (Macmillan.)

A History of English Prosody from the Twelfth Century to the Present Day. By George Saintsbury, M.A. (Macmillan. 10s. net.)

London Visions. By Laurence Binyon. (Elkin Matthews.)

A Selection from the Poetry of Lionel Johnson. (Elkin Matthews.)

All Things Considered. By G. K. Chesterton. (Methuen. 5s.)

Dante in English Literature. By Paget Toynbee, M.A. (Methuen. 21s. net.)

Essays of Merejkowski Flaubert. Marcus Aurelius. (Moring. 1s. 6d. net each.)

From Montaigne to Molière; or, The Preparation for the Classical Age of French Literature. By Arthur Tilley. (Murray. 5s. net.)

The Making of Carlyle. By R. S. Craig. (Nash. 10s. 6d. net.)

The Eye-Witness. By H. Belloc. (Nash. 5s. net.)

Sir Christopher, and other Poems. By A. E. Jessup. (Nutt. 1s. net.)

The Moral System of Dante's Inferno. By W. H. V. Reade. (Oxford University Press.)

Towards the Light. By Her Excellency, the Princess Mary Karadja. (Kegan Paul. 2s. net.)

Literary Reviews and Criticisms. By Prosser Hall Frye. (Putnam.)

An Earth Poem and Other Poems. By Gerda Dalliba. (Putnam. 4s. net.)

From Gretna Green to Land's End: A Literary Journey in England. (Grant Richards. 7s. 6d. net.)

Some Threepenny Bits. By G. W. E. Russell. (Grant Richards. 3s. 6d. net.)

The Testament of John Davidson. (Grant Richards. 3s. 6d. net.)

Great English Novelists. By Holbrook Jackson. (Grant Richards. 3s. 6d. net.)

The Gentle Shepherd. By Tudor Ralph Castle. (Grant Richards. 3s. 6d. net.)

Omar Repentant. By Richard le Gallienne. (Grant Richards. 2s. net.)

G. K. Chesterton: A Criticism. (Rivers. 5s.)

First English Translations of the Great Foreign Classics. By W. J. Harris. (Routledge. 2s. 6d.)

At Large. By Arthur C. Benson. (Smith, Elder. 7s. 6d. net.)

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS' NEW BOOKS.

LETTERS OF CORTES,

The Five Letters of Relation from Fernando Cortes to the Emperor Charles V.

Translated and Edited, with a Biographical Introduction and Notes compiled from original sources, by FRANCIS AUGUSTUS MACNUTT. Illustrated with Portraits in Photogravure and Maps, 2 vols, 8vo, cloth extra (limited to 750 sets printed from type), £2 2s. net.

"The early life of Cortes and his later days are described by Mr. MacNutt in the excellent Biographical Note . . . the information (footnotes and appendices) he has here brought together is of considerable value."—Athenæum.

"It is no mere piece of bookmaking, but a solid contribution to historical literature."—Manchester Guardian.

"Mr. MacNutt's admirable translation."—Scotsman.

"Mr. MacNutt has done a real service to historical students."—Glasgow Herald.

"The editorial work has been admirably done."—Newcastle Chronicle.

"In these two volumes the letters have been admirably translated."—Outlook.

THE SPORTING RIFLE.

By WALTER WINANS, Author of "The Art of Revolver Shooting," "Hints on Revolver Shooting," "Practical Rifle Shooting," &c. With many illustrations in Photogravure and Half-Tone, large 8vo, cloth extra, gilt top, in box, 21s. net.

"Written by one of the finest shots in the world, handsomely printed, and profusely illustrated, it proves a valuable addition to the literature of sport."—Daily Mail.

"'Mighty hunters,' as well as those new to the sporting rifle, will want to read and study it."—Daily Chronicle.

"The work instructs from a long and varied experience."—Scotsman.

"The volume is a veritable mine of information. . . . Mr. Winans in his book gives the novice the benefit of his life-long experience and careful study of his subject in all its bearings."—Sussex Daily News.

AN EARTH POEM AND OTHER POEMS.

By GERDA DALLIBA. With a Prefatory Word by EDWIN MARKHAM. With Portrait. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 7s. 6d. net.

A few years since Miss Dalliba, then a young girl, published a volume of poems entitled "Fate and I." This book was declared by the critics to be a work of promise, and how fully this forecast was justified the public may learn from the present volume, "An Earth Poem and other Poems," containing a long poem and a group of lyrics.

THE TWENTIETH CENTURY AMERICAN.

By H. PERRY ROBINSON. Crown 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d.

"Probably a gentler, a fairer, and a better intended book on America has never before been written."—Daily Chronicle.

"An investigation by a well-informed and thoughtful Englishman."—Times.

THE NATURALISATION OF THE SUPERNATURAL.

By FRANK PODMORE, Author of "Modern Spiritualism," &c. 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

"The book is valuable for the skill with which it has selected and arranged its materials . . . and will be welcomed by many to whom those more voluminous publications are inaccessible or unattractive."—Scotsman.

ROMANCE OF ROMAN VILLAS.

By ELIZABETH W. CHAMPNEY, Author of "Romance of the French Abbeys," &c. With 9 Photogravure, 1 Coloured, and 44 other Illustrations. 8vo, cloth extra, 15s. net.

Hardly a score in a thousand who have delighted in the villas, castles, and palaces of Italy are aware of half of the dramatic episodes which have taken place within their walls.

MIRABEAU AND FRENCH REVOLUTION.

By FRED MORROW FLING, Ph.D. To be Completed in Three Vols. Illustrated. Vol. I. THE YOUTH OF MIRABEAU. Illustrated. 8vo, cloth, 15s. net.

No full and scholarly biography of Mirabeau has appeared in English, and hence the raison d'être for the present work. This first volume is devoted to the youth of Mirabeau, and closes with the year 1774, when he legally came of age.

NEW NOVELS.

FLOWER OF THE DUSK.

By MYRTLE REED, Author of "Lavender and Old Lace," "The Master's Violin," "A Spinner in the Sun." 6s.

"The present story we hold to be in advance of anything she has before written."—Belfast Northern Whig.

"A beautiful story, narrated in poetic language."—East Anglian Daily Times.

THE LAST VOYAGE OF THE DONNA ISABEL: A ROMANCE OF THE SEA.

By RANDALL PARRISH, Author of "My Lady of the North," "Prisoners of Chance," "When Wilderness was King," &c. Illustrated in Colour. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 6s.

"A thrilling romance of the sea, of the Clark Russell type."—Scotsman.

"Mr. Parrish's descriptive powers would be hard to beat, and the story maintains a grip on the reader from start to finish."—East Anglian Daily Times.

JUDITH OF THE CUMBERLANDS.

By ALICE MACGOWAN. With Illustrations in Colour by GEORGE WRIGHT. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

THE SOVEREIGN GOOD.

By HELEN HUNTINGTON. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 6s.

SEND FOR OUR NEW ILLUSTRATED LIST.

24, BEDFORD STREET, STRAND, LONDON; and NEW YORK.

FROM ELLIOT STOCK'S AUTUMN LIST.

FAMOUS LOVE MATCHES.

By C. J. HAMILTON. An unusually interesting work. An ideal Gift Book. Illustrated by several authentic Portraits. Large Crown 8vo. Cloth Gilt, 5/. net.

HOUSE MOTTOES, OLD AND NEW.

By S. F. A. CAULFEILD. Drawn from Many Lands. New Edition. Revised and Enlarged. Crown 8vo. Cloth Gilt, Illustrated, 5s.

JEWISH FAIRY TALES AND FABLES.

By AUNT NAOMI. A most acceptable Gift or Prize Book. Handsome Illustrated Cover. Square Crown 8vo. Illustrated. Cloth, 3/6.

WHAT IS A PICTURE?

By G. G. MILLAR. A Book for the Novice in Art Comprehension. Foolscap 4to. Cloth Gilt, 2/6 net.

CANADIAN LIFE AS I FOUND IT.

By HOMESTEADER. Four Years' Homesteading in the North-West Territories. Crown 8vo. Paper Covers, 1/6 net.

Write for List of New Books free by Post.

London: ELLIOT STOCK, 62, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C.

New and Forthcoming Books.

The Shadow of the Raggedstone (a Romance of the Malvern Range, temp. twelfth century). By C. F. GRINDROD. With Cover-design by AUSTIN O. SPARE. Crown 8vo, 570 pp. 6s. [Monday next.

Poems by Mary E. Coleridge ("Anodos"). Preface by HENRY NEWBOLT. Pott 8vo, 4s 6d. net. [Fourth Edition.

London Visions. By LAURENCE BINYON. Collected and Augmented. Finely printed at the Chiswick Press. Fcap 8vo, 2s. 6d. net. [Immediately.

The Tragedy of Saint Elizabeth of Hungary. By ARTHUR DILLON. Royal 16mo. 4s. 6d. net.

Spirit and Dust. By ROSA MULHOLLAND (LADY GILBERT). Royal 16mo. 2s. 6d. net.

New Poems. By R. G. T. COVENTRY. Royal 16mo. 5s. net.

My Garden. By J. T. PRIOR. With 12 beautiful Collotype Illustrations. Fcap, 4to, 5s. net. [Immediately.

Powder and Patches. By VERA CANUTE. Fcap, 8vo, 1s. net. [Monday next.

The Masque of the Grail. By ERNEST RHYS. Royal 16mo. 1s. net.

"A Pageant in verse full of delicate fancy and exquisite lines."—Spectator.

In a Street—In a Lane. By N. W. BYNG. Fcap, 8vo, 1s. 6d. net. [Immediately.

Ariadne Diainomene, and other Poems. By E. W. SUTTON PICKHARDT. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

"SATCHEL" SERIES. Fcap, 8vo, Cloth 1s. 6d. net, wrapper 1s. net.

Early Victorian and other Papers. By E. S. P. HAYNES. Author of "Standards of Taste in Art." [Just out.

Songs of Good Fighting. By EUGENE R. WHITE. With Prefatory Memoir by H. P. TABER. [Just out.

"VIGO CABINET" SERIES. Royal 16mo. 1s. net.

Friendship. By LILIAN STREET.

A Selection from the Poetry of Lionel Johnson. With Prefatory Memoir by CLEMENT SHORTER. [Immediately.

Whisper! By FRANCES WYNNE. With Prefatory Memoir by KATHARINE TYNAN.

Quatrains of Omar Khayyam, from a literal Prose Translation by E. HERON-ALLEN. Done into verse by ARTHUR B. TALBOT. [Immediately.

Day Dreams of Greece. By C. W. STORK. [In the press.

Christmas Songs and Carols. By AGNES BEGBIE. Illustrated by EDITH CALVERT. [In the press.

A Christmas Morality Play for Children. By EDITH LYTTELTON. [In the press.

London: ELKIN MATHEWS, Vigo Street, W.

A Literary History of the English People. Vol. III. From the Renaissance to the Civil War. II. By J. J. Jusserand. (Unwin. 12s. 6d. net.)

POLITICS.

Problems of To-day. Wealth, Labour, Socialism, &c. By Andrew Carnegie. (Allen. 3s. 6d. net.)

Human Nature in Politics. By Graham Wallas. (Constable. 6s.)

International Problems and Hague Conferences. By T. J. Lawrence, M.A. (Dent. 3s. 6d. net.)

Problems of Unemployment. By N. B. Dearle. (Dent. 3s. 6d.)

Women in Industry; From Seven Points of View. With a Preface by D. J. Shackleton, M.P. (Duckworth. 3s. 6d.)

British Aristocracy and the House of Lords. By Edward Carpenter. (Fifield.)

Socialism: A Solution and Safeguard. By C. D. Smith. (Fifield.)

Philanthrophy and the State. By B. Kirkman Gray. (King. 7s. 6d. net.)

The King's Revenue. By W. M. J. Williams. (King. 6s. net.)

Railways and Nationalisation. By Edwin A. Pratt. (King. 2s. 6d. net.)

The County Lieutenancies and the Army, 1803-1814. By the Hon. John W. Fortescue, M.V.O. (Macmillan.)

Problems of Crown Colony Administration. By Sir Charles Bruce, G.C.M.G. (Macmillan.)

Social and Industrial Problems. By L. G. Chiozza Money, M.P. (Methuen. 5s. net.)

The Foundations of Liberty. By E. F. B. Fell. (Methuen. 5s. net.)

Collectivism. A Study of some of the Leading Social Questions of the Day. By Paul Leroy-Beaulieu. (Murray. 10s. 6d. net.)

Present Day Socialism. By G. E. Raine. (Nash. 2s. 6d. net.)

Dublin Castle and the Irish People. By Barry O'Brien. (Kegan Paul. 7s. 6d. net.)

The Menace of Socialism. By W. Lawler Wilson. (Grant Richards. 6s. net.)

Value and Distribution. A Critical and Constructive Study. By Herbert Joseph Davenport. (Unwin. 15s. net.)

The Process of Government: A Study of Social Pressures. By Arthur F. Bentley. (Unwin. 12s. 6d. net.)

The Hohenzollern Empire. A Political Essay. By the Hon. Edward Cadogan. (Unwin. 10s. 6d. net.)

SCIENCE.

The Dressing of Minerals. By Henry Louis, M.A. (Arnold. 30s. net.)

The Geology of Ore Deposits. By H. H. Thomas and D. A. MacAlister, of the Geological Survey. (Arnold. 7s. 6d. net.)

Steel Roof and Bridge Design. By W. Hume Kerr, M.A. (Arnold. 10s. 6d. net.)

The Body at Work. By Dr. Alexander Hill. (Arnold. 16s. net.)

Biology and its Makers. By Wiliam A. Locy, Ph.D. (Bell. 10s. 6d. net.)

A Treatise on Zoology. Edited by Sir E. Ray Lankester, K.C.B. (Black. 15s. net per part.)

The Development of Tactics from 1740 to the Present Day. By Lieut.-Colonel Walter H. James. (Blackwood.)

Modern Strategy. By Lieut.-Colonel Walter H. James, P.S.C. (Blackwood. 16s. net.)

High-Speed Dynamo Electric Machinery. By H. M. Hobart, Member Institute of Civil Engineers, and A. G. Ellis, Ass. Mem. American Institute of Electrical Engineers. (Chapman & Hall. 25s. 6d. net.)

Secondary Stresses on Bridge Trusses. By C. R. Grimm, C.E. (Chapman & Hall. 10s. 6d. net.)

The Theory and Design of Structures. By Ewart S. Andrews, B.Sc. (Chapman & Hall. 9s. net.)

A Handbook of Geography, Descriptive and Mathematical. By Dr. Emil Reich. (Duckworth. 12s. 6d. net.)

Pros and Cons of Vivisection. By Dr. Charles Richet. (Duckworth. 5s. net.)

The Shilling Scientific Series. Revised edition of "Radium," by Dr. Hampson, and "Motors and Motoring," by Prof. Spooner. (Jack.)

The Origin of Vertebrates. By Walter H. Gaskell, M.A. (Longmans, 21s. net.)

The Human Species: Considered from the Standpoints of Comparative Anatomy, Physiology, Pathology, and Bacteriology. By Dr. Ludwig Hopf. (Longmans.)

An Intermediate Course of Laboratory Work in Chemistry. By Edward K. Hanson, M.A., and John Wallis Dodgson, B.Sc. (Longmans.)

Recent Advances in Organic Chemistry. By A. W. Stewart, D.Sc. (Longmans.)

The Cambridge Natural History. Vol. IV.
Crustacea. By Geoffrey Smith, M.A.
Trilobites, &c. By H. Woods, M.A.
Limulus, Linguatulida, and Tardigrada. By A. E. Shipley, M.A.
Spiders, Mites, Scorpions, &c. By C. Warburton, M.A.
Pycnogonids. By D'Arcy W. Thompson, C.B.
(Macmillan, 17s. net.)

Notes of a Botanist on the Amazon and Andes. By Richard Spruce, Ph.D. Edited by Dr. Alfred Russel Wallace, F.R.S. Two Vols. (Macmillan.)

The prevention of Tuberculosis. By Arthur Newsholme, M.D. (Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.)

Fads and Feeding. By C. Stanford Read, M.B. (Methuen. 2s. 6d. net.)

The Lore of the Honey-Bee. By Tickner Edwardes. (Methuen. 6s.)

Hydrographical Surveying. A Description of the Means and Methods employed in constructing Marine Charts. By the late Rear-Admiral Sir W. J. L. Wharton, K.C.B. Revised by Rear-Admiral Mostyn Field, F.R.S. (Murray. 18s. net.)

Pearls and Parasites. A Series of Essays on Scientific Subjects. By A. E. Shipley, M.A. (Murray. 7s. 6d. net.)

University of London Series:—Intracellular Enzymes. By H. M. Vernon, M.D. (Murray. 7s. 6d. net.)

Injuries of Nerves and Their Treatment. By James Sherren, F.R.C.S. (Nisbet. 5s. net.)

The Diagnosis and Treatment of Surgical Affections of the Knee. By Sir William H. Bennett, C.B. (Nisbet.)

The Physics of Earthquake Phenomena. By C. G. Knott. (Oxford University Press.)

Music: Its Laws and Evolution. By Jules Combarien, Lecturer at the Collège de France. (Kegan Paul. 5s.)

The Transformations of the Animal World. By M. Charles Déperet. (Kegan Paul. 5s.)

Human Speech: Its Physical Basis. By N. C. Macnamara, F.R.C.S. (Kegan Paul. 5s.)

Periodic Law. By A. E. Garrett. (Kegan Paul. 5s.)

Diseases of the Ear. By Macleod Yearsley, Senior Surgeon to the Royal Ear Hospital. (Kegan Paul. 18s. net.)

The Essentials of Dietetics. By Amy E. Pope. (Putnam.)

Health, Strength, and Happiness: a Book of Practical Advice. By C. W. Saleeby, M.D. (Grant Richards. 6s. net.)

Water: Its Origin and Use. By W. Coles-Finch. (Rivers. 21s. net.)

The Childhood of Man. By Dr. Leo Frobenius. Translated by A. H. Keane, LL.D. (Seeley. 16s. net.)

Astronomy of To-day. By Cecil G. Dolmage, M.A. (Seeley. 5s. net.)

Scientific Ideas of To-day. By Charles R. Gibson, A.I.E.E. (Seeley. 5s. net.)

Electricity: Present and Future. By Lucien Poincaré. (Sisley. 7s. 6d. net.)

Bushman Folk Lore. By Miss L. C. Lloyd. (Sonnenschein.)

A Student's Text Book of Zoology. By Adam Sedgwick, M.A. In 3 vols. Vol. III. Completing the work. (Sonnenschein.)

Pain: Its Causation and Diagnostic Significance in Internal Diseases. By Dr. Rudolph Schmidt. (Unwin. 12s. 6d. net.)

Mysterious Psychic Forces. By Camille Flammarion. (Unwin. 8s. 6d. net.)

GREENING'S AUTUMN PUBLICATIONS

ROYAL LOVERS AND MISTRESSES.

The Romance of Crowned and Uncrowned Kings and Queens of Europe.

By Dr. A. S. RAPPOPORT. Author of "The Curse of the Romanoffs," etc.

Illustrated. Demy 8vo, cloth 16s. net.

BUBBLES IN BIRDLAND.

Written by HAROLD SIMPSON. Drawings by G. E. SHEPHARD.

This is one of the cleverest and funniest books for children ever produced. It contains 30 full-page coloured Illustrations 2s. net.

A KNOWING DOG.

By E. HARCOURT BURRAGE. Illustrated by "Yorick." 2s. 6d. net.

GLANCINDA.

A Fairy Tale in Nine Glintings.

By "MARDALE." Drawings by ERNEST SMYTHE. 2s. 6d. net.

DEAN SWIFT'S WORKS.

Bound in a neat cloth binding, and printed on good paper, Uniform with the four previous volumes. 2s. net.

Vol. 5.—GULLIVER'S TRAVELS IN LILLIPUT AND BROBDINGNAG.

Vol. 6.—GULLIVER'S TRAVELS IN LAPUTA AND AMONG THE HOUYHNHNMS.

New Volumes in

THE LOTUS LIBRARY.

Bound in cloth, top edge gilt, 1s. 6d. net.
Bound in leather, 2s. net.

THE MUMMY'S ROMANCE. By THEOPHILE GAUTIER. Translated by G. F. MONKSHOOD.

SALAMMBO. By GUSTAVE FLAUBERT. Translated by J. W. MATTHEWS. With an Introduction by ARTHUR SYMONS.

THE BLUE DUCHESS. By PAUL BOURGET. Translated by ERNEST TRISTAN.

THE LATIN QUARTER. (Scenes de la Vie de Boheme). By HENRY MURGER. Translated by ELLEN MARRIAGE and JOHN SELWYN. With an introduction by ARTHUR SYMONS.

NEW AND FORTHCOMING FICTION.

BRANDED .. .. .. GERALD BISS. 6s.
SEMIRAMIS .. .. .. EDWARD PEPLE. 6s.
LITTLE FRANCE .. .. CYRUS TOWNSEND BRADY. 6s.
A MAID OF HONOUR .. ROBERT AITKEN. 6s.
HENRY OF NAVARRE .. MAY WYNNE. 6s.
A BACHELOR'S LOVE STORY ANTHONY GRIMM. 6s.
PATCOLA .. .. .. ENA FITZGERALD. 6s.
OUT OF THE SHADOWS HENRY CURTIES. 6s.
THE SIN OF THE DUCHESS HOUGHTON TOWNLEY. 6s.
IN THE DAYS OF MARLBOROUGH GEORGE LONG. 6s.
IN THE SHADOW OF THE PEAKS STATA B. COUCH. 6s.
THE ARTIFICIAL GIRL R. W. COLE. 6s.
MRS. PENROSE'S PHILOSOPHER HAROLD SIMPSON. 6s.
LOVE IN A MAZE .. .. BRITON LAMBERT. 6s.
UNDERGROUND .. .. JOHN K. LEYS. 6s.
SWEET ISABEL OF NAIRAGOON LIONEL LAGGARD. 6s.
THE UNLOVED .. .. ETHEL HILL. 6s.

Messrs. GREENING beg to inform readers that the following works by

LUCAS CLEEVE

(MARY WALPOLE)

can be obtained at all Libraries.

THE CARDINAL AND LADY SUSAN . 6s.
THE MASCOTTE OF PARK LANE . . 6s.
THE LOVE SEEKERS . . . . . 6s.
THE HOVERERS . . . . . 6s.
THE GREATER LOVE (in preparation) . 6s.

Complete Catalogue on application.

GREENING & CO., Ltd., 91, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS' FIRST AUTUMN LIST.

A WANDERING STUDENT IN THE FAR EAST

By the EARL OF RONALDSHAY, M.P.
With Map and 60 Illustrations.
2 vols. 21s. net. [This Month

FAMOUS DUELS OF THE FLEET

By H. B. MONEY COUTTS.
6s. [This Month

LIFE AND LETTERS OF HANNAH E. PIPE

By ANNA M. STODDART.
With Portrait and Illustrations.
15s. net. [Ready

Books IV.—XII., Completing

DRAKE: AN ENGLISH EPIC

By ALFRED NOYES.
6s. net. [Ready

DRAKE: AN ENGLISH EPIC

The Complete Work in one Volume.
7s. 6d. net. [This Month

LEAVES FROM THE DIARY OF A CRICKETER

By W. E. W. COLLINS. 6s.

NEW FICTION. 6s.

THE HERITAGE
By SYDNEY C. GRIER. [Ready

SALVATOR
By PERCEVAL GIBBON. [Ready

THE STORY OF ESTHER
By MAUD OXENDEN. [Ready

THE FEAR OF LIFE
By GERALD MAXWELL. [Ready

REALITY
By MARGARET PATERSON. [Ready

CAPTAIN GRANT'S DESPATCH
By GARRETT MILL. [Ready

SALEH: a Sequel
By HUGH CLIFFORD.

THE BIAS
By MARGUERITE CURTIS.

THE SYBIL OF VENICE
By RACHEL SWETE MACNAMARA.

THE RIGHT STUFF
Some Episodes in the Career of a North Britain.
By IAN HAY.

GLENTYRE
By EDMUND SELLAR.

WINGED DREAMS
By HELEN COLEBROOKE.

CURSED LUCK
By Sir GEORGE SCOTT, K.C.I.E. 3s. 6d.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS, Edinburgh and London.

TRAVEL AND TOPOGRAPHY.

Things Seen in China. By J. R. Chitty. (Seeley. 2s. net.)
Chateau and Country Life in France. By Mary King Waddington. (Smith, Elder. 10s. 6d. net.)
The Story of Majorca and Minorca. By Sir Clements R. Markham, K.C.B. (Smith, Elder. 7s. 6d. net.)
On the Coromandel Coast. By Mrs. F. E. Penny. (Smith, Elder. 10s. 6d. net.)
My Climbs in the Alps and Caucasus. By A. F. Mummery. (Unwin. 21s. net.)
The Confessions of a Beachcomber. Scenes and Incidents in the Career of an Unprofessional Beachcomber in Tropical Queensland. By E. J. Banfield. (Unwin. 15s. net.)
By Desert Ways to Baghdad. By Louisa Jebb. (Unwin. 10s. 6d. net.)
Mountaineering in the Land of the Midnight Sun. By Mrs. Aubrey Le Blond. (Unwin. 10s. 6d. net.)
Washed by Four Seas. By H. C. Woods, F.R.G.S. (Unwin. 7s. 6d. net.)
Cannes and its Environs. By Amy M. Benecke. (Allen. 10s. 6d. net.)
Eighteen Years in Uganda and East Africa. By the Right Rev. Alfred R. Tucker, D.D. (Arnold. 30s. net.)
In Search of a Polar Continent. By Alfred H. Harrison, F.R.G.S. (Arnold. 12s. 6d. net.)
In Old Ceylon. By Reginald Farrer. (Arnold. 12s. 6d. net.)
Five Months in the Himalayas. A Record of Mountain Travel in Garhwal and Kashmir. By A. L. Mumm. (Arnold. 21s. net.)
A Parson in the Australian Bush. By the Rev. Charles H. S. Matthews. (Arnold. 6s. net.)
Chronicles of Service Life in Malta. By Mrs. Arthur Stuart. (Arnold. 6s.)
Turkey and the Turks. By W. S. Monroe. (Bell. 7s. 6d. net.)
Memorials of Old London. 2 vols. Edited by P. H. Ditchfield, M.A. (Bemrose. 25s. net.)
Memorials of Old Essex. Edited by A. Clifton Kelway, F.R.Hist.S. (Bemrose. 15s. net.)
Memorials of Old Suffolk. Edited by Vincent B. Redstone, F.R.Hist.S. (Bemrose. 15s. net.)
From Damascus to Palmyra. By John Kelman, M.A. (Black. 20s. net.)
The Flowers and Gardens of Japan. Painted by Ella du Cane. Described by Florence du Cane. (Black. 20s. net.)
New Zealand. Painted by the Brothers F. and W. Wright. Described by the Hon. W. P. Reeves. (Black. 20s. net.)
Southern Spain. Painted by Trevor Haddon. Described by A. F. Calvert. (Black. 20s. net.)
Yorkshire. Painted and Described by Gordon Home. (Black. 20s. net.)
Geneva and its Environs. Painted by J. Hardwicke Lewis and May Hardwicke Lewis. Described by Francis Gribble. (Black. 7s. 6d. net.)
The Light Side of Egypt. Painted and Described by Lance Thackeray. (Black. 10s. net.)
London in the Nineteenth Century. By Sir Walter Besant. (Black. 30s. net.)
Maps of Old London. Edited by G. E. Mitton. (Black. 5s.)
Buried Herculaneum. By Ethel Ross Barker. (Black. 7s. 6d. net.)
A Wandering Student in the Far East. By the Earl of Ronaldshay, M.P. 2 vols. (Blackwood. 21s. net.)
Tragic Russia. By Waclaw Gasiorowski. Translated by the Viscount de Busancy. (Cassell. 7s. 6d. net.)
Assisi of Saint Francis. By Mrs. Robert Goff. (Chatto & Windus. 20s. net.)
The Color of Paris. By MM. Les Académiciens Goncourt. Translated by M. D. Frost. (Chatto & Windus. 20s. net.)
Devon: Its Moorlands, Streams, and Coasts. By Lady Rosalind Northcote. Fully illustrated in colours by Frederick J. Widgery. (Chatto & Windus. 20s. net.)
In the Abruzzi: the Country and the People. By Anne Macdonell. (Chatto & Windus. 6s. net.)
Venice in the Eighteenth Century: A Study by Philippe Monnier. (Chatto & Windus. 7s. 6d. net.)
Ruenzori. An Account of the Expedition of H.R.H. Prince Luigi Amedeo of Savoy, Duke of Abbruzzi, to the Snow Ranges, situated between the Equatorial Lakes of Central Africa. By Filippo de Filippi, F.R.G.S. (Constable. 31s. 6d. net.)
Lands of Summer. Sketches in Italy, Sicily, and Greece. By T. R. Sullivan. (Constable. 6s. net.)
Venetia and Northern Italy. By C. Headlam. (Dent. 7s. 6s. net.)
Along the Rivieras of France and Italy. Written and Illustrated in color and line by Gordon Home. (Dent. 7s. 6d. net.)
A Woman's Wanderings. By Lucy Broad. (Headly. 3s. 6d.)
Dan to Beersheba. Work and Travel in Four Continents. By Archibald R. Colquhoun. (Heinemann.)
Conquering the Arctic Ice. By Ejnar Mikkelsen. (Heinemann.)
Tunis and Kairouan Carthage, &c. By Graham Petrie, R.I. (Heinemann.)
Japan: Rambles in the Sanctuaries of Art. By Gaston Migeon. (Heinemann.)
Persia. The Awakening East. By W. P. Cresson, F.R.G.S. (Heinemann.)
Syria. By Gertrude Lowthian Bell. (Heinemann.)
The Fijians. A Study of the Decay of Custom. By Basil Thomson. (Heinemann.)
My African Journey. By the Right Hon. Winston Churchill, M.P. (Hodder & Stoughton. 5s. net.)
Egypt and its Monuments. By Robert Hichens. (Hodder & Stoughton. 20s. net.)
To the Top of the Continent. Discovery, Exploration, and Adventure in Sub-Arctic Alaska. The First Ascent of Mt. McKinley, 1903-1906. By Frederick A. Cook, M.D. (Hodder & Stoughton. 12s. net.)
The Conquest of the Great North-West. By Agnes C. Laut. (Hodder & Stoughton.)
Egypt and the English. By Douglas Sladen. (Hurst & Blackett. 21s. net.)
Kashmir: The Land of Streams and Solitudes. By P. Pirie. (Lane. 21s. net.)
Two Dianas in Alaska. By Agnes Herbert and a Shikari. (Lane. 12s. 6d. net.)
Under Petraia with Some Saunterings. By the Author of "In a Tuscan Garden." (Lane. 5s. net.)
Camp Fires on Desert and Lava. By William T. Hornaday, Sc.D. (Werner Laurie. 16s. net.)
The South Americans. By Arthur Ruhl. (Werner Laurie. 8s. 6d. net.)
In Morocco with General D'Amade. By Reginald Rankin. (Longmans.)
A Motor Flight through France. By Edith Wharton. (Macmillan.)
An English Holiday with Car and Camera. By James John Hissey. (Macmillan. 10s. net.)
Russian Essays. By the Hon. Maurice Baring. (Methuen. 5s. net.)
Home Life in Italy. By Lina Duff Gordon. (Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.)
A Summer Tour in Finland. By Paul Waineman. (Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.)
A Spanish Holiday. By Charles Marriott. (Methuen. 7s 6d. net.)
Hungary and the Hungarians. By W. B. Forster-Bovill. (Methuen. 7s. 6d. net.)
Country Walks about Florence. By Edward Hutton. (Methuen. 5s. net.)
Wells and Glastonbury. By T. Scott Holmes. (Methuen. 4s. 6d. net.)
Gentlemen Errant. The Travels and Adventures of Four Noblemen in Europe in the Fifteenth and Sixteenth Centuries. By Mrs. Henry Cust. (Murray.)
The East-End of Europe. By Allen Upward. (Murray.)
A Pleasure Pilgrim in South America, 1904-1905. By C. D. Mackellar. (Murray.)
The Inner Life of the United States. By Monsignor Count Vay de Vaya and Luskod. (Murray. 12s. net)

By SIR ROBERT ANDERSON, K.C.B.

CRIMINALS AND CRIME.

Some Facts and Suggestions. 5/- net.

The Glasgow Herald says—"The book is a masterly production and a worthy contribution to one of the many social problems of to-day."

F. T. BULLEN'S New Sea-Story.

YOUNG NEMESIS.

With Coloured Illustrations by A. TWIDLE. 6/-

The Sheffield Daily Telegraph says—"It is so vividly and realistically written that we are at a loss to know whether it is a true story or only fiction."

By the Author of "Dorrincourt."

THAT MASTER OF OURS.

A School Tale of 1745. Illustrated. 5/-

The Belfast Whig says—"The story from beginning to end is one of intense interest, and has in it teaching of a strong and vigorous character."

By Miss DOROTHEA MOORE.

A PLUCKY SCHOOL-GIRL. 3/6.

The Dundee Advertiser says—"She has supplied a rattling story with plenty of incident and healthful excitement."

A HISTORY OF ITALIAN UNITY.
(1814-1871) By BOLTON KING, M.A.
With Maps and Plans. In Two Volumes. 24/- net.

ITALY TO-DAY. A Study of Her Position, Her Politics and Her Society. By BOLTON KING and THOMAS OKEY. With Maps. 12/- net.

Works by J. A. HOBSON.
In Cloth. Each 2/6 net.

SOCIAL PROBLEM. Life and Work.
JOHN RUSKIN. Social Reformer.

J. NISBET & CO. LTD., 22, Berners Street, W.

VOLUME ONE. NOW READY

ENCYCLOPÆDIA OF RELIGION AND ETHICS

Edited by Dr. JAMES HASTINGS.

THE purpose of this Encyclopædia is to give a complete account of Religion and Ethics so far as they are known. It will contain articles on every separate religious belief and practice, and on every ethical or philosophical idea and custom. Persons and places that have contributed to the history of religion and morals will also be described.

The Encyclopædia will cover a distinct department of knowledge. It is the department which has always exercised the greatest influence over men's lives, and its interest at least, if not its influence, is probably greater at the present time than ever. Within the scope of "Religion and Ethics" come all the questions that are most keenly debated in Psychology and in Socialism, while the title will be used to embrace the whole of Theology and Philosophy. Ethics and Morality will be handled as thoroughly as religion.

The work will be completed in Ten Volumes of about 900 pages each, size 11½ by 8.

PRICE:

In Cloth Binding 28/- net per volume.
In Half Morocco 34/- net per volume.

Every reader of the "NATION" interested in this great work is invited to apply for the full Prospectus, which may be had from any bookseller, or from the Publishers, on request.

T. & T. CLARK, 38, George St., Edinburgh, 14, Paternoster Sq., London.

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT & Co. Ltd.

GREAT NEW NOVEL BY

Ellen Thorneycroft Fowler

(Hon. Mrs. Alfred Felkin)

Entitled

Miss Fallowfield's Fortune

6s.

Miss Fallowfield is left a million pounds. She is afterwards married to the Rev. Luke Forrester; who has a son named Claude by a former marriage. The curious legal dilemma in which Miss Fallowfield's fortune is involved through her marriage forms a main issue upon which many happenings hinge.

The Royal Botanic Gardens, Kew

Historical and Descriptive

By W. J. BEAN, Assistant Curator

Cloth, gilt back, 20s. net. Large-Paper Edition, limited to 100 copies, £3 3s. net.
With an Introduction by Sir William Thiselton-Dyer, late director of the Gardens.
Illustrated with 20 Reproductions in Colour from Paintings by H. A. OLIVIER and 40 Reproductions of Photographs by E. J. WALLIS.

This is a volume of entrancing interest to all lovers of and visitors to the historic Kew Gardens, and written, as it is, by the Assistant Curator has the unique advantage of special official knowledge which no other work on the subject possesses.

THE BOOK OF THE MOMENT

By JOHN FOSTER FRASER.

Pictures from the Balkans

With Coloured Plate, Map, and 40 full-page Plates from Photographs.

Apropos of the present happenings in the Balkans, this vivid book should be read by everyone. The Daily Express says: "Such a book as Mr. Foster Fraser's is admirably useful in making crooked things comparatively straight."

JOHN FOSTER FRASER'S NEW BOOK

Life's Contrasts

With Rembrandt Photogravure of the Author and other Illustrations, 6s. net.

"A very interesting book, worth buying and keeping, partly because it is a very individual and self-revealing book—and partly because no Britain of his years has a richer treasury of travel and travail on which to draw. . . . 'Life's Contrast' is very good."—Sunday Chronicle.

Cassell's New 6s. Novels

RIDER HAGGARD "The Ghost Kings"

"A fine romance, more plausible, more vigorous, and more spontaneous than anything Mr. Haggard has written for a long time past."—Morning Leader.

"Mr. Rider Haggard has conceived nothing better; as a story, which may be read by old and young, he has given us probably nothing more enthralling."—Scotsman.

Eden Phillpotts		7th Impression "The Virgin in Judgment"
Warwick Deeping		3rd Impression "Mad Barbara"
Dolf Wyllarde		3rd Impression "Rose-white Youth"
A. W. Marchmont		2nd Impression "My Lost Self"
Headon Hill		2nd Impression "The Hate of Man"
Kate Horn		"Ships of Desire"
Helen Wallace		"Life's Chequer-Board"
Madge Barlow		"The Cairn of the Badger"
Fergus Hume	(3/6)	"The Amethyst Cross"

At all Libraries and Booksellers.

CASSELL'S, LA BELLE SAUVAGE, LONDON, E.C.

The Shores of the Adriatic. The Austrian Side. An Architectural and Archæological Pilgrimage. By F. Hamilton Jackson, R.B.A. (Murray. 21s. net.)
Problems of the Middle East. By Angus Hamilton. (Nash. 10s 6d. net.)
Hungary of To-day. Compiled from various sources under the Editorship of Percy Alden, M.P. (Nash. 7s. 6d. net.)
The People of the Polar North. A Record by Knud Rasmussen. (Kegan Paul. £1 1s. net.)
The Private Palaces of London. By E. Beresford Chancellor. (Kegan Paul. £1 1s. net.)
Travels and Travellers in India. By E. Farley Oaten. (Kegan Paul. 5s.)
Romance of the Roman Villas. By Elizabeth W. Champney. (Putnam. 15s. net.)
A Canyon Voyage. By Frederick S. Dellenbaugh. (Putnam. 15s. net.)
The Baganda at Home. By C. W. Hattersley. (Religious Tract Society. 5s. net.)
The Call of Korea. By H. G. Underwood. (Revell. 2s. 6d. net.)
The Jungle Folk of Africa. By Robert H. Milligan. (Revell. 6s. net.)
Empires of the Far East. A Study of Japan and its Possessions of China, Manchuria, and Korea, and of the Political Questions of Eastern Asia and the Pacific. By Lancelot Lawton. (Grant Richards. 24s. net.)
Mountaineering (British). By E. H. Benson. (Routledge.)

THEOLOGY AND PHILOSOPHY.

A Text-Book of Experimental Psychology. By Dr. C. S. Myers. (Arnold. 8s. 6d. net.)
The Johannine Writings. By Paul W. Schmiedel. Translated by Maurice A. Canney, M.A. (Black. 3s. 6d. net.)
The Problem of Logic. By W. R. Boyce Gibson, M.A., with the co-operation of Augusta Klein. (Black. 12s. 6d. net.)
The Roman Breviary. Translated out of Latin into English by John, Marquess of Bute, K.T. (Blackwood. £3 3s. net.)
The Development of Modern Philosophy. By Robert Adamson. (Blackwood. 10s. 6d. net.)
Encyclopædia of Religion and Ethics. Edited by James Hastings, M.A. Ten vols. (T. & T. Clark.)
A Dictionary of the Bible. Complete in One Volume. Edited by James Hastings, M.A. (T. & T. Clark.)
The Greek and Eastern Churches. By Principal W. F. Adeney. New Volume. "International Theological Library." (T. & T. Clark.)
The Bible of Nature. By J. Arthur Thomson, M.A. (T. & T. Clark.)
The Book of Esther. By L. B. Paton. New Volume. "International Critical Library." (T. & T. Clark.)
A Handbook of Christian Ethics. By J. Clark Murray. (T. & T. Clark.)
An Introduction to the New Testament. By Professor Theodor Zahn. In three volumes. (T. & T. Clark.)
Biblical Criticism and Modern Thought. By Professor W. G. Jordan. (T. & T. Clark.)
Sidelights on Religion. By J. Brierley, B.A. (James Clarke. 3s. 6d. net.)
Messages of Hope. By George Matheson, D.D. (James Clarke. 3s. 6d. net.)
Jesus: Seven Questions. By J. Warschauer, M.A. (James Clarke. 3s. 6d. net.)
Philosophies Ancient and Modern:—
Comte and Mill. By T. W. Whittaker.
Scholasticism. By Father Rickaby, S.J.
Early Greek Philosophy. A. W. Benn.
Stoicism. By Professor St. George Stock.
Plato. By Professor A. E. Taylor.
(Constable. 1s. net each vol.)
First and Last Things. By H. G. Wells. (Constable. 4s. 6d. net.)
The Mystical Element of Religion. By Baron F. von Hugel. (Dent. 21s. net.)
Liberty and Justice. By G. Lowes Dickinson. (Dent. 4s. 6d. net.)
The Sound of a Voice That is Still. A Selection of Sermons by the late Dean of Cairo. Arranged by Mrs. Butcher. (Dent. 4s. 6d. net.)
The Greatest Life. By Professor Gerald Leighton, M.D. (Duckworth. 5s. net.)
Parallel Paths. A Study of Biology, Ethics, and Art. By T. W. Rolleston, M.A. (Duckworth. 5s. net.)
An Encyclopædia of Theology. By the Rev. A. M. Fairbairn, D.D. (Duckworth.)
A Critical Introduction to the Old Testament. By the Rev. George Buchanan Gray, D.D. (Duckworth.)
A Critical Introduction to the New Testament. By Arthur S. Peake, D.D. (Duckworth. 3s. net.)
Collected Works of Rufus M. Jones, M.A. 6 vols. (Headley. 15s. net.)
The Lord's Supper. A Historical Study. By J. W. Graham, M.A. (Headley. 3d.)
Jesus and the Gospel. By the Rev. Professor James Denney, D.D. (Hodder & Stoughton. 10s. 6d.)
The Ethics of Jesus. By the Rev. Professor James Stalker, M.A. (Hodder & Stoughton.)
Lukan and Pauline Studies. By Professor Sir W. M. Ramsay, D.C.L. (Hodder & Stoughton. 12s.)
Fellowship in the Life Eternal. An Exposition of the Epistles of St. John. By the Rev. Professor G. G. Findlay, B.A. (Hodder & Stoughton. 7s. 6d.)
The Priesthood of the Laity. Historically and critically considered (Donellan Lectures). By the Rev. Canon Ryder, D.D. (Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.)
Studies in the History of the New Testament. By the Rev. Principal A. M. Fairbairn, M.A. (Hodder & Stoughton. 12s.)
The St. Ninian Lectures on Religion and the Modern Mind. (Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.)
Light from Anatolia. The New Testament and the new and recently discovered manuscripts of the Græco-Roman world. By Adolf Deissmann, D.D. (Hodder & Stoughton. 12s. net.)
The Gift of Influence. University Sermons. By the Rev. Professor Hugh Black, M.A. (Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.)
Lectures on Preaching. By the Rev. George Matheson, D.D. (Hodder & Stoughton.)
Expositions of Holy Scripture. By the Rev. Alexander Maclaren, D.D. (Hodder & Stoughton. 7s. 6d. per vol.)
The Analysed Bible. By the Rev. G. Campbell Morgan, D.D. (Hodder & Stoughton. 3s. 6d. per vol.)
Epochs in the Life of Jesus. A Study of Development and Struggle in the Messiah's Work. By the Rev. A. T. Robertson, M.A. (Hodder & Stoughton. 2s. 6d. net.)
The Century Bible. Edited by W. F. Adeney, D.D. New vols. "Isaiah." Vol. II. By Dr. O. C. Whitehouse. "Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Song of Solomon." By Professor Currie Martin. "Leviticus and Numbers." By Professor A. R. S. Kennedy. (Jack. 2s. 6d. net.)
The Training of a Priest: an Essay on Clerical Education. By the Rev. John Talbot Smith, LL.D. (Longmans. 6s. net.)
Principles of Logic. By G. H. Joyce, S.J. (Longmans.)
Leadership, Lectures delivered at Harvard University. By the Right Rev. Charles H. Brent. (Longmans.)
Anselm's Theory of the Atonement: The Bohlen Lectures. By the Rev. George C. Foley. (Longmans.)
New Light on Immortality. By E. E. Fournier d'Albe, B.Sc. (Longmans. 6s. net.)
The Book of Faith. By Reginald Pecock. With Introductory Essay by J. L. Morison, M.A. (MacLehose.)
Man and the Universe. By Sir Oliver Lodge, F.R.S. (Methuen. 7s. 6d. net.)
Social Psychology. By W. M'Dougall. (Methuen. 5s. net.)
Ara Coeli. By the Right Rev. Arthur Chandler. (Methuen. 3s. 6d. net.)
The Bible Doctrine of the Sacraments. By the Rev. H. C. Beeching. (Murray. 2s. 6d. net.)
The Doctrine of the Last Things: Jewish and Christian. By the Rev. W. O. E. Oesterley, D.D. (Murray.)
Murray's Illustrated Bible Dictionary. Edited by the Rev. William C. Piercy. (Murray. 21s. net.)
The Second Temple in Jerusalem: Its History and Structure.

SAMPSON, LOW, MARSTON & Co. Ltd.

Captain Mahan's Famous Sea Power Books.

New and Cheaper Issue. Comprising—

THE INFLUENCE OF SEA POWER UPON HISTORY, 1660—1783. With 25 Charts of Great Naval Battles.

THE INFLUENCE OF SEA POWER ON THE FRENCH REVOLUTION AND EMPIRE, 1793—1812. With 13 Maps and Battle Plans. 2 Vols.

THE INFLUENCE OF SEA POWER IN ITS RELATIONS TO THE WAR OF 1812. With Maps and Plates. 2 Vols.

In this Edition the Volumes are not sold separately.

£2 12s. 6d. net. New and cheaper issue, 5 vols., demy 8vo navy blue cloth gilt, gilt top, illustrated caps, £2 12s. 6d. net.

READY SHORTLY.

The Life of Nelson:

The Embodiment of the Sea Power of Great Britain.

By CAPTAIN A. T. MAHAN, D.C.L., LL.D., Author of "The Influence of Sea Power upon History, 1660-1783," "The Influence of Sea Power upon the French Revolution and Empire," "Sea Power in its Relations to the War of 1812," etc., etc.

New and cheaper issue, demy 8vo, cloth gilt, fully illustrated, 784 pages, price 7s. 6d. net; handsomely bound in tree calf, boxed, 14s. net.

A Book of Simples.

Being a Reproduction of the Still-room Book belonging to an Old Manor House

Printed in the most finished style of the Chiswick Press. Demy 8vo, pure rag paper, deckle edged, bound in green parchment, full gilt back, neatly price boxed, 14s. net.

6/- A NEW AND STARTLING NOVEL.

A Royal Bluejacket.

By FRED T. JANE, Author of "Fighting Ships," "Inventor of the Naval War Game" etc., etc.

Crown 8vo. cloth gilt, neat cap, price 6s.

6/- net. IN PREPARATION.

The Story of the Submarine.

By COLONEL C. FIELD.

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, fully illustrated, price 6s. net.

London: SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & Co. Ltd., 100, Southwark St., S.E.

From A. C. FIFIELD'S New List.

By SAMUEL BUTLER

EREWHON. New Edition 2s. 6d. net. Postage 4d.

EREWHON RE-VISITED. New Edition 2s. 6d. net. Postage 4d.

ESSAYS ON LIFE, ART & SCIENCE. 2s. 6d. net. Postage 4d.

THE WAY OF ALL FLESH. New Edition. 6s.

By WILLIAM H. DAVIES

NATURE POEMS AND OTHERS. Grey Boards 1s. net. Postage 1½d. Ready Monday.

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF A SUPER-TRAMP. Preface by Bernard Shaw. 6s. New edition nearly ready.

By HENRY S. SALT

ON CAMBRIAN AND CUMBRIAN HILLS. With 2 Illustrations. 3s. 6d. net. Postage 3d.

By EDWARD CARPENTER

BRITISH ARISTOCRACY AND THE HOUSE OF LORDS. 6d. net. Post free 7d.

By HOLBROOK JACKSON

WILLIAM MORRIS: CRAFTSMAN—SOCIALIST. 6d. net. Post free 7d. ¼ cloth, gilt top, post free 1s. 2d.

By C. D. SMITH

SOCIALISM: A SOLUTION AND SAFEGUARD. A Reply to Mr. J. St. Loe Strachey. 6d. net. Postage 1d.

By HENRY H. SCHLOESSER

COUNT LOUIS AND OTHER POEMS. Grey Boards 1s. net. Postage 1½d.

By BERNARD SHAW.

THE COMMON SENSE OF MUNICIPAL TRADING. With new preface. 6d. net. Postage 1½d. Cloth 1s. 2d.

By GREVILLE MACDONALD

THE SANITY OF WILLIAM BLAKE. With 6 Illustrations. Grey Boards 1s. net. Postage 1½d.

By THOMAS CLUNE

SPIRITUAL PERFECTION. A Discussion. Grey Boards 1s. net. Postage 1½d.

By JOSEPH CLAYTON

ROBERT OWEN: SOCIAL PIONEER. 6d. net. Postage 1d. ¼ cloth, gilt top, 1s. 2d.

By COLONEL PEDDER

HENRY GEORGE AND HIS GOSPEL. 6d. net. Postage 1d. ¼ cloth, gilt top, 1s. 2d.

London: A. C. FIFIELD, 44, Fleet Street, E.C.

Messrs. LONGMANS & Co.'s NEW BOOKS.

THE LIFE OF HENRY IRVING.

By AUSTIN BRERETON.

With 1 Photogravure, 22 Collotype Plates, and 23 other Illustrations. 2 vols. 8vo, 25s. net.

THE JOURNAL OF ELIZABETH LADY HOLLAND (1791-1811).

Edited by The EARL OF ILCHESTER.

With 6 Portraits. 2 vols. 8vo, 21s. net.

[Next Week.

HISTORICAL AND POLITICAL ESSAYS.

By WILLIAM EDWARD HARTPOLE LECKY.

8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

Contents:—Thoughts on History—The Political Value of History—The Empire: its Value and its Growth—Ireland in the Light of History—Formative Influences—Carlyle's Message to his Age—Israel among the Nations—Madame de Staël—The Private Correspondence of Sir Robert Peel—The Fifteenth Earl of Derby—Mr. Henry Reeve—Dean Milman—Queen Victoria as a Moral Force—Old-Age Pensions.

MEMORIALS OF TWO SISTERS: SUSANNA AND CATHERINE WINKWORTH.

Edited by their Niece, MARGARET J. SHAEN.

With 2 Photogravure Portraits. 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

[Next Week.

Catherine, the younger of these two sisters, is the better known, she being the translator of the famous collection of hymns known as "Lyra Germanica." Susanna Winkworth was the translator of several important works by Baron Bunsen, but her best-known work in this direction was that of the "Theologia Germanica," which was issued in 1854 with a preface by Charles Kingsley.

The greater part of the book is composed of letters from the two sisters to members of their family circle and others. Letters are also given from various friends, such as Maurice, James Martineau, Baron Bunsen, Mazzini, and Charlotte Brontë, and in these and other letters glimpses are given of many well-known and interesting persons.

Cheap Re-issue, 2 Vols. 8vo, 7s. net.

MY INNER LIFE.

Being a Chapter in Personal Evolution and Autobiography.

By J. BEATTIE CROZIER, M.D.,

Author of "Civilisation and Progress," &c.

Times.—"A striking, noteworthy book, far removed from the ruck of cheap fugitive reminiscences and recollections."

Spectator.—"Mr. Crozier is known to English readers as one of the most versatile and original thinkers of the day, and there is nothing which he is disposed to say which is not, at least, interesting and suggestive. This work is no exception to the rule."

Daily News.—"Dr. Crozier's style is remarkable, among other things, for its pictorial power. . . . The story of his boyhood now and again reminds one of Tom and Huckleberry's exploits as narrated by Mark Twain. . . . A knowledge of Dr. Crozier's two or three books is in itself a liberal education."

THE LAND OF PROMISE:

An Account of the Material and Spiritual Unity of America.

By RICHARD DE BARY. Crown 8vo, 6s net.

[On Monday next.

NEW LIGHT ON IMMORTALITY.

By E. E. FOURNIER D'ALBE, B.Sc. (Lond.), M.R.I.A., Author of "The Electron Theory," and "Two New Worlds," Hon. Secretary of the Dublin Section of the Society for Psychical Research. With Frontispiece, Portraits, and Diagrams in Text. Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

[On Monday next.

In this volume the new data accumulated by recent physical and biological investigations, on the one hand, and psychical research on the other, are brought to bear upon the question of human survival after death.

ANGLING AND ART IN SCOTLAND:

Some Fishing Experiences Related and Illustrated.

By ERNEST E. BRIGGS, R.I. With 32 Coloured Plates and other Illustrations. 4to, 12s. 6d. net.

LONGMAN'S POCKET LIBRARY—New Volume.

SELECT EPIGRAMS FROM THE GREEK ANTHOLOGY.

Translated by J. W. MACKAIL, M.A., LL.D., Professor of Poetry in the University of Oxford. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 2s. net; leather, 3s. net.

A COMPLETE LIST OF ANNOUNCEMENTS SENT ON APPLICATION.

LONGMANS, GREEN & Co., 39, Paternoster Row, London, E.C.

By the Rev. W. Shaw Caldecott. (Murray. 10s. 6d. net.)

Sayings from the Saints. Collected by Annie Matheson. (Nash. 2s. 6d. net.)

The Church Pulpit Commentary. Second group of six Volumes. (Nisbet. 7s. 6d. each.)

Fact and Faith. A Volume of Studies. By the Rev. J. G. Simpson. (Nisbet. 3s. 6d.)

Bunyan Characters. Fourth Series. Bunyan himself as seen in his Grace Abounding. By Rev. Alex. Whyte, D.D. (Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier. 2s. 6d.)

The Christian Method of Ethics. By Henry W. Clark. (Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier. 3s. 6d. net.)

The Exploration of Egypt and the Old Testament. By J. Garrow Duncan, B.D. (Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier. 5s. net.)

Notes on the Early History of the Vulgate Gospels. By Dom John Chapman, C.S.B. (Oxford University Press.)

Jesus and Modern Religion. By Edwin A. Rumball. (Kegan Paul 3s. 6d. net.)

Avesta Eschatology. Compared with the Books of Daniel and Revelation. By Dr. Lawrence H. Mills. (Kegan Paul. 2s. 6d. net.)

Choice Morsels of the Bread of Life: or Select Readings from the Old Testament. Compiled by Charles Coppens, S.J. (Kegan Paul. 2s. 6d. net.)

Heortology: A History of the Christian Festivals from their origin to the present day. By Dr. K. A. Heinrich Kelner. (Kegan Paul. 10s. 6d.)

American Lectures on Comparative Religions. The Religion of Islam. By Ignaz Goldziher, Ph.D. (Putnam. 6s.)

A Devotional Commentary. Genesis. By the Rev. W. H. Griffith Thomas, D.D. (Religious Tract Society.)

Beyond the Natural Order. By Nolan Rice Best. (Revell. 2s. 6d. net.)

The King and His Kingdom. By Robert W. Veach. (Revell. 2s. net.)

An Introduction to the Literature of the Old Testament. By the Rev. G. H. Box, M.A. (Rivington.)

The Ritual of the Tabernacle. A Devotional Study. By the Rev. E. H. Archer-Shepherd, M.A. (Rivington.)

The Origin of the Sense of Beauty. By Felix Clay. (Smith, Elder. 6s. net.)

A Translation of Hegel's Phenomonology of Mind. By J. B. Baillie. (Sonnenschein.)

Thought and Things. Three Volumes. Volume III. Real Logic. By J. M. Baldwin. (Sonnenschein.)

Prolegomena to a Complete Exposition of Theism. By J. Cohen. (Sonnenschein.)

The Precinct of Religion in the Culture of Humanity. By Professor Charles Gray Shaw. (Sonnenschein.)

The Inner Light. By Arnold M. Whately. (Sonnenschein.)

Physiological Psychology. By Professor E. B. Titchener. In Three Volumes. By W. Wundt. (Sonnenschein.)

Suggestions for Bible Study. By the Rev. F. R. Montgomery Hitchcock, M.A. (Stock. 2s. net.)

Pastor in Ecclesia. By the Rev. Gilbert Monks. (Stock. 5s.)

A History of the Holy Eucharist in Great Britain. By T. E. Bridgett. (Unwin. 21s. net.)

Modernism. The Jowett Lectures, 1908. By Paul Sabatier. (Unwin. 5s. net.)

Thursday Mornings at the City Temple. By the Rev. R. J. Campbell. (Unwin. 5s. net.)

The Faith of a Modern Protestant. By Professor W. Bousset. (Unwin. 2s. 6d. net.)

National Idealism and the Book of Common Prayer: An Essay in Re-Interpretation and Revision. By Stanton Coit, Ph.D. (Williams and Norgate. 10s. 6d. net.)

Philosophy of the Spiritual Life. By Professor Rudolf Eucken. (Williams and Norgate. 5s.)

Ethics of the Christian Life. By Theodor Haering. (Williams and Norgate. 10s. 6d. net.)

Acts of the Apostles. By Adolf Harnack, D.D. (Williams and Norgate. 6s.)

Primitive Christianity: Its Writings and Teachings in Their Historical Connections. Volume II. By Otto Pfleiderer, D.D. (Williams and Norgate. 10s. 6d. net.)

Proceedings of the Aristotelian Society. Volume VIII. (Williams and Norgate. 10s. 6d. net.)

Democracy and Character. By Canon Reginald Stephen, M.A. (Williams and Norgate. 5s.)

From SEELEY & Co's LIST

JUST PUBLISHED.

THE CHILDHOOD OF MAN.

A popular account of the Lives, Customs and Thoughts of Primitive Races.
By Dr. LEO FROBENIUS.
Translated by Professor A. H. KEANE, LL.D., F.R.G.S.
With 416 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 16s. net.
"Brimful of interest."—Evening Standard.
"Interesting and suggestive."—Manchester Guardian.

ASTRONOMY OF TO-DAY.

An Introduction in non-technical language to the understanding of Astronomy.
By CECIL G. DOLMAGE, LL.D., F.R.A.S.
With a Frontispiece in colours and 45 other Illustrations. Extra Crown 8vo, 5s.
"Far more interesting than any of the novels of to-day."—Liverpool Post.
"A capital popular exposition of astronomy."—Scotsman.

SCIENTIFIC IDEAS OF TO-DAY.

A popular account in non-technical language of the nature of Matter, Electricity, Light, Heat, &c., &c.
By CHARLES R. GIBSON, A.I.E.E. Author of "Electricity of To-day."
With 24 Illustrations. Extra Crown 8vo, 5s. net.
"Mr. Gibson's book supplies a real need. He has a fine gift of exposition. —Birmingham Post.

A GREAT RELIGIOUS CLASSIC.

THE CONFESSIONS OF ST. AUGUSTINE.

With illuminated Frontispiece and Title-page, and other illuminated pages. Crown 8vo, bound in white or green cloth, with inset miniatures. 6s. net; classic vellum 10s. 6d.

NEW EDITION.

EDINBURGH.

By ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON.
With coloured Frontispiece and 60 other Illustrations. Extra Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE LIBRARY OF ROMANCE.

With many Illustrations. Extra crown 8vo, each, 5s.

NEW VOLUMES.

THE ROMANCE OF EARLY BRITISH LIFE.

By Professor G. F. SCOTT ELLIOT.
"Every chapter is full of information given in fascinating form." —Dundee Courier.

THE ROMANCE OF MODERN GEOLOGY.

By E. S. GREW, M.A., Editor of "Knowledge."
"A popular introduction to modern geology which anyone can read with pleasure."—Daily Graphic.

THE ROMANCE OF BIRD LIFE.

By JOHN LEA, M.A.
"A very fascinating book."—Liverpool Courier.

LONDON: SEELEY & Co., LTD., 38, Great Russell Street.

HARRAP'S ANNOUNCEMENTS.

MYTHS OF THE NORSEMEN.

From the Eddas and Sagas. By H. A. GUERBER.

Author of "The Myths of Greece and Rome," etc. With Sixty-four Exquisite Full-page Illustrations by eminent Scandinavian, German, and English Artists and a complete Glossary and Index. Demy 8vo, 8⅝ × 5¾ ins., 416 pp. Bound in Handsome Cloth Cover Richly Decorated and embossed with appropriate Design, Gilt Top. Price 7s. 6d. net. Also in Choice Bindings Boxed, Full Morocco, 21s. net; Half Vellum, 15s. net; Half Morocco, 15s. net.

The Oriental Edition.

MESSRS. GEORGE G. HARRAP & CO. have made exclusive arrangements to publish in England and the Colonies the very fine edition of produced in New York by the Dodge Publishing Company. The text of this edition is taken from THE FOURTH EDITION by special permission of Messrs. MACMILLAN & Co., Ltd., but its special feature is the extremely successful attempt by Miss ADELAIDE HANSCOM to reproduce the atmosphere of the poem in her studies from life. This set of illustrations is certainly a unique interpretation of the classic. The method of the artist is to work upon photographs, for which Omar enthusiasts have posed and the combination of camera and brush has produced illustrations which will compel the admiration of all lovers of this classic. Size 10 × 7¾. Bound in Art Canvas, Gilt Top, price 10s. 6d. net. There is also a SPECIAL EDITION on superior paper with the Illustrations printed from photogravure plates upon India paper and mounted. Bound in Full Limp Velvet Morocco, yapp, price £2 2s. net.

THE RUBAIYÁT OF OMAR KHÁYYÁM

A TREASURY OF VERSE FOR LITTLE CHILDREN.

Selected by M. G. EDGAR, M.A.

Profusely Illustrated in colour and black and white by WILLY POGANY.

In Handsome Cover printed with gold and three colours from the Artist's Design, and with specially designed end papers on Japon Vellum, size 9½ × 7½ inches, Gilt Top. Price 7s. 6d. net.

Illustrated List of Books Beautiful now ready.

London: GEORGE G. HARRAP & Co.,
15, York St., Covent Garden, W.C.

SOME R.T.S. NEW BOOKS

ORDERS ARE NOW BEING RECEIVED FOR

THE GOSPEL IN THE OLD TESTAMENT

A Series of Pictures by HAROLD COPPING, with Descriptive Letterpress by HANDLEY C. G. MOULE, D.D. (LORD BISHOP OF DURHAM).

Mr. Copping's 24 Original Coloured Pictures are printed folio (12¼ in. by 16¾ in.), and the volume will be artistically bound in white cloth, full gilt, 16s. net. (To be issued in November.)

A year ago the Religious Tract Society published a folio volume, Scenes in the Life of Our Lord, in which 24 coloured pictures by Mr. Harold Copping were accompanied by devotional and descriptive letterpress from the pen of Dr. Handley Moule, Bishop of Durham. The marked success of that volume has prepared the way for a companion work, dealing with outstanding personages and incidents in the Old Testament, particularly such as foreshadow the New Testament message. The drawings embody some results of Mr. Copping's visit to the East in 1905. His conception of the incident or personage depicted is often as striking in its independence and originality as it is rich in its spiritual suggestiveness, whilst the details of landscape, clothing, and surroundings are the results of careful study on the spot.

Of the Bishop of Durham's short chapters it is unnecessary to speak at length. The author's aim is to present the Old Testament lessons in their relation to the work of Our Lord, and each chapter will be found to have its message to the soul.

As in the case of the companion volume—the production of which has been so warmly commended by the Press—the utmost care has been taken to secure accuracy in the colour-printing. This has been under Mr. Copping's personal supervision. The pictures are mounted on stout artistic paper, the surface of each picture measuring 10 in. by 6⅝ in. The comments by the Bishop of Durham are set in a clear, bold type, and printed on stout paper.

A REMARKABLE WORK ON UGANDA.

THE BAGANDA AT HOME

By C. W. HATTERSLEY, Author of "Uganda by Pen and Camera," &c. With a Map and 80 Plates containing 100 Pictures of Life and Work in Uganda, taken from Photographs. Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 5s. net.

The Scotsman says: "One of the most valuable features of the book is the fine series of illustrative pictures of Baganda life and customs.

NEW CHEAPER EDITION.

GRIFFITH JOHN: THE STORY OF FIFTY YEARS IN CHINA

By the Rev. R. WARDLAW THOMPSON, D.D. With Maps and 16 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

"A fascinating and inspiring volume."—British Weekly.

"No one can read this story without being inwardly refreshed. The mere adventure side of it is stirring to a degree. It reveals a Pauline daring and endurance."—Christian World.

NEW CHEAPER EDITION.

CREATURES OF THE SEA: BEING THE LIFE STORIES OF SOME SEA-BIRDS, BEASTS, AND FISHES.

By FRANK T. BULLEN, F.R.G.S. With 40 Full-page Illustrations by THEO. CARRERAS. Large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

"Mr. Ruskin would certainly have rejoiced in Mr. Bullen's delightful collection of marine life-histories, informed as they are with knowledge, and illuminated by the creative imagination of the poet."—Spectator.

GENESIS: A DEVOTIONAL COMMENTARY

By the Rev. W. H. GRIFFITH THOMAS, D.D., Principal of Wycliffe Hall, Oxford. In Three Volumes, 6s. per set (sold separately, 2s. per volume).

"It will prove suggestive to Bible students as expounding this part of Scripture in a spirit noticeably distinct from that in which is usually approached by modern theologians of the critical sort."—Scotsman.

"We have tested this book from a teacher's standpoint, and found it to be a mine of suggestion."—Schoolmaster.

SIR JOHN FIELD, K.C.B., SOLDIER AND EVANGELIST

A brief memoir by one of his sons, CLAUDE FIELD. With Map, Collotype Portrait, and 16 Full-page Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 5s. net.

This biography deals with the public career and private life of a Christian soldier, who was in his later days intimately associated with religious work at home. The romantic side of Christian work is abundantly illustrated in this record of one man's faithful testimony for his Master.

NEW CHEAPER EDITION.

SKETCHES OF JEWISH SOCIAL LIFE IN THE DAYS OF CHRIST

By Rev. Dr. EDERSHEIM, Author of "The Temple: Its Ministry and Services," &c. Large crown 8vo, cloth, 2s.

"Edersheim left the Synagogue for the Church, but he did not thereupon lose all sympathy with his former brothers-in-faith."—Jewish Chronicle.

"It may be especially recommended to Sunday school teachers who wish to realise the social background of the New Testament narrative."—Christian World.

NEW CHEAPER EDITION.

AMONG THE MONGOLS

By JAMES GILMOUR. With 33 Illustrations. New Cheaper Edition. Just Ready. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 1s. 6d.

"No one who begins this book will leave it till the narrative ends, or doubt for an instant that he has been enchained by something separate and distinct in literature, something almost uncanny in the way it has gripped him, and made him see for ever a scene he never expected to see."—Spectator.

NEW EDITION, WITH 18 COLOURED PLATES.

FAIRY TALES FROM FAR JAPAN

Translated from the Japanese by SUSAN BALLARD. With a Prefatory Note by ISABELLA L. BISHOP. 16 Coloured Plates and numerous Illustrations in Black-and-White from Japanese Originals. Small crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 2s. 6d.

BISHOP HANNINGTON; AND THE STORY OF THE UGANDA MISSION

By W. GRINTON BERRY, M.A. With Map, Portrait, and Coloured Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 1s. 6d.

"A striking and sympathetic account of a great and good man."—Morning Leader.

"It tells the romantic story within a moderate space."—Spectator.

ALFRED SAKER: THE PIONEER OF THE CAMEROONS

By his daughter, E. M. SAKER. With Portrait, Map, and Coloured Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 1s. 6d.

FOXE'S BOOK OF MARTYRS

New Popular Edition. Prepared by W. GRINTON BERRY, M.A. With Portrait of Foxe, and 8 other Pictures, Illustrated. 2s.

"The book is a precious treasure, a mine of delightful and strenuous English."—Liverpool Post.

"Mr. Berry has improved the arrangement and eliminated repetitions, without affecting the charm of the original."—Aberdeen Press.

THE BOY'S OWN NATURE BOOK

With an Introduction by the Hon. Sir JOHN COCKBURN, K.C.M.G., M.D. (late Prime Minister of South Australia), and Appendices descriptive of the Coloured Plates. With two folded Coloured Plates, a Coloured Frontispiece, and 64 Plates, containing over 150 Pictures reproduced from Photographs taken direct from Nature by the Rev. S. N. SEDGWICK, M.A. Large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, Coloured Medallion on cover, 3s. 6d.

THE BOY'S OWN ANNUAL

832 pp., with 12 Coloured or Tinted Plates and Hundreds of other Pictures. Handsome cloth gilt, 8s.

THE GIRL'S OWN ANNUAL

832 pp., with 12 Coloured or Tinted Plates and Hundreds of other Illustrations. Handsome cloth gilt, 8s.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME ANNUAL

1,040 pp., with 17 Coloured or Tinted Plates, and over 500 other Illustrations. Handsome cloth gilt, 7s. 6d.

THE RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY, 4, BOUVERIE STREET, E.C.

T. FISHER UNWIN. —— T. FISHER UNWIN.

HISTORY.

A Literary History of the English People Vol. III. From the Renaissance to the Civil War II.
By J. J. JUSSERAND. With a Photogravure Frontispiece. Demy 8vo, cloth, 12s. 6d. net.

A Literary History of Russia.
By Professor A. BRUCKNER of Berlin. Edited by ELLIS H. MINNS, M.A. Translated by H. HAVELOCK, M.A. With Photogravure Frontispiece. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net. (Library of Literary History.)

The Literary History of the Adelphi & its Neighbourhood.
By AUSTIN BRERETON. With a new Introduction, a Photogravure Frontispiece, and 26 other Full-page Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d. net.

New Light on Ancient Egypt.
By G. MASPERO, Director-General of the Service of Antiquities in Egypt. Translated by ELIZABETH LEE. Illustrated. Medium 8vo, cloth, 12s. 6d. net.

The History of Co-operation.
By GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE. Illustrated. Popular Edition in one volume. Large crown 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

BIOGRAPHY.

Seven Splendid Sinners.
By W. R. H. TROWBRIDGE, Author of "Court Beauties of Old Whitehall," &c. With a Photogravure Frontispiece and other Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth, 15s. net.

The Sisters of Napoleon.
Edited from the French of JOSEPH TURQUAN by W. R. H. TROWBRIDGE. Illustrated. Demy 8vo, cloth, 15s. net.

A Royal Quartette.
By Mrs. BEARNE, Author of "A Leader of Society at Napoleon's Court," &c. Fully Illustrated. Large crown 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d. net.

Concerning Lafcadio Hearn.
By G. M. GOULD, M.D. With 5 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth, 8s. 6d. net.

The Nun-Ensign.
Translated from the Original Spanish with an Introduction and Notes by JAMES FITZMAURICE-KELLY. Also "La Monja Alferez," a play in the Original Spanish by D. JUAN PEREZ DE MONTALBAN. With Illustrations by DANIEL VIERGE. Large crown 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

Spencer Perceval.
A Biography. By PHILIP TREHERNE. With Portraits. 5s. net.

Joseph Skipsey.
A Memoir. By the Rt. Hon. ROBERT SPENCE WATSON. With 3 Portraits. 2s. 6d. net.

CHILDREN'S BOOKS.

The House of Arden.
By E. NESBIT. Illustrated. Large crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

The Phœnix and the Carpet.
By E. NESBIT. Illustrated. New Edition. Large crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

Five Little Peppers and How They Grew.
By MARGARET SIDNEY. Illustrated. 6s.

Tales from Spencer.
By R. W. GRACE. With 12 Illustrations, 5s.

Six Girls.
By FANNY BELLE IRVING. With 8 Illustrations, 3s. 6d.

Æsop's Fables for Little People.
Told by Mrs. ARTHUR BROOKFIELD. Pictured by HENRY J. FORD. 1s.

TRAVEL AND DESCRIPTION.

The Scenery of Sherwood Forest.
With some Account of the Eminent Families once Resident there, and an Essay on Robin Hood. By JOSEPH RODGERS. With Illustrations of the magnificent trees and Characteristic Scenery, from Drawings by the Author, and with Portraits in Photogravure. Super royal 8vo, cloth, 21s. net.

My Climbs in the Alps and Caucasus.
By A. F. MUMMERY. With Photogravure, Coloured and Half-tone Illustrations by JOSEPH PENNELL and others. New Edition with Introductions by Mrs. MUMMERY and J. A. HOBSON. Super royal 8vo, cloth, 21s. net.

The Evolution of Modern Germany.
By W. HARBUTT DAWSON. Demy 8vo, cloth, 21s. net.

A Handbook of the Philippines.
By HAMILTON M. WRIGHT. With 3 Maps and 150 Illustrations. 8s. 6d. net.

The Confession of a Beachcomber.
Scenes and Incidents in the Career of an Unprofessional Beachcomber in Tropical Queensland. By E. J. BANFIELD. With a Map and 48 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth, 15s. net.

Cults, Customs and Superstitions of India.
Being a Revised and Enlarged Edition of "Indian Life, Religious and Social." By J. CAMPBELL OMAN, D.Lit., M.R.A.S. Illustrated. Medium 8vo, cloth, 14s. net.

By Desert Ways to Baghdad.
By LOUISA JEBB (Mrs. WILKINS). With a Map and many Illustrations from Photographs taken by the Author. Demy 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d. net.

Mountaineering in the Land of the Midnight Sun.
By Mrs. AUBREY LE BLOND (Mrs. MAIN). With many Illustrations and a Map. Demy 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d. net.

Days Spent on a Doge's Farm.
By MARGARET SYMONDS (Mrs. VAUGHAN). With a Photogravure Frontispiece and many other Illustrations from Sketches and Photographs. Revised Edition, with a New Preface. Demy 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d. net.

Ethnographic Notes in Southern India.
By EDGAR THURSTON. With 40 Plates. 7s. 6d. net.

In the Land of the Blue Gown.
By Mrs. ARCHIBALD LITTLE. Popular Edition. With 32 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

The Bridle Roads of Spain (Las Alforjas).
By GEORGE JOHN CAYLEY. New Edition. With an Introduction by MARTIN HUME, M.A., and Recollections of the Author by Lady RITCHIE and Mrs. COBDEN SICKERT, and a Photogravure Frontispiece. Large crown 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

The Real Japan.
By Sir HENRY NORMAN, M.P. Illustrated. Fifth Impression. 7s. 6d. net.

Along the Labrador Coast.
By CHARLES WENDELL TOWNSEND, M.D. With a Map and 40 Illustrations. 5s. net.

NATURAL HISTORY AND SCIENCE.

In My Lady's Garden.
By Mrs. RICHMOND (late Garden Editor of The Queen). With 2 Coloured Illustrations by BEATRICE PARSONS, and 52 other Plates. Demy 8vo, cloth, 12s. 6d. net.

Pain: Its Causation and Diagnostic Significance in Internal Diseases.
By Dr. RUDOLF SCHMIDT. Translated and Edited by KARL M. VOGEL, M.D., and HANS ZINSSER, A.M., M.D. Demy 8vo, cloth, 12s. 6d. net.

Mysterious Psychic Forces.
By CAMILLE FLAMMARION. 8s. 6d. net.

Psychical Research and the Resurrection.
By JAMES H. HYSLOP, Ph.D. 5s. net.

RELIGION AND PHILOSOPHY.

The Philosophy of Friedrich Nietzsche.
By HENRY L. MENCKEN. 7s. 6d. net.

Nietzsche: His Life and Work.
By M. A. MUGGE, Ph.D. 10s. 6d. net.

Modernism. The Jowett Lectures, 1908.
By PAUL SABATIER. With a Preface and Notes, and the full text of the Bull "Pieni l'Animo," the Decree "Lamentabili," and the Encyclical "Pascendi Dominici Gregis." Translated by C. A. MILES. Crown 8vo, cloth, 5s. net.

Thursday Mornings at the City Temple.
By the Rev. R. J. CAMPBELL, M.A. With Photogravure Frontispiece, 5s. net.

The Faith of a Modern Protestant.
By Professor W. BOUSSET. Translated by F. B. LOW. 2s. 6d. net.

A History of the Holy Eucharist in Great Britain.
By T. E. BRIDGETT, C.S.S.R. Edited with Notes by HERBERT THURSTON. 21s. net.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The Working of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906.
By V. R. ARONSON. Demy 8vo, 15s. net.

The Hohenzollern Empire.
A Political Essay. By the Hon. EDWARD CADOGAN. Demy 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d. net.

Who's Who in Germany (1909).
(Wer 1st's.) Edited by H. A. C. LUGENER. 12s. 6d. net.

Shakespeare Studied in Three Plays.
By the Hon. A. S. G. CANNING. Demy 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

F. C. G.'s Froissart, 1903-1906.
Told and Pictured by Sir F. CARRUTHERS GOULD. Fcap. 4to, cloth, 2s. 6d. net.

The Complete Plays of Robert Greene.
Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by THOMAS H. DICKINSON. Cloth, 3s. 6d. Thin Paper Edition, cloth, 2s. 6d. net; leather, 3s. 6d. net. (The Mermaid Series.)

UNWIN'S "CHATS" SERIES.

Practical Handbooks for Collectors.

Chats on Old Miniatures.
By J. J. FOSTER, F.S.A. Copiously illustrated with examples from celebrated collections. With a Coloured Frontispiece. Large crown 8vo, cloth, 5s. net. Also a Large Paper Edition. With 8 additional Illustrations in Collotype. 10s. 6d. net.

Chats on Old Lace and Needlework.
By Mrs. LOWES. With a Coloured Frontispiece and about 70 other Illustrations. Large crown 8vo, cloth, 5s. net.

Chats on Oriental China.
By J. F. BLACKER. With a Coloured Frontispiece and about 70 other Illustrations. Large crown 8vo, cloth, 5s. net.

Please write for a copy of Mr. Unwin's New Announcement List. Free on Application.

T. FISHER UNWIN. —— T. FISHER UNWIN.

"THE NATION," with which is incorporated "The Speaker," printed for the Proprietors by the NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY LIMITED, Whitefriars House, London, E.C., and Published by THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY LIMITED, at the Offices, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C. Registered at the General Post Office as a Newspaper.—SATURDAY, OCTOBER 10, 1908.

The Nation

Vol. IV., No. 3.] SATURDAY, OCTOBER 17, 1908. [Price 6d.
Postage: U.K. ½d. Abroad, 1d.

READING ROOMS INSTITUTE

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
DIARY OF THE WEEK ...	101
POLITICS AND AFFAIRS:—
The Task of the Government	104
The Balkan Problem ...	105
South African Unity ...	106
Labor in Partnership ...	107
LIFE AND LETTERS:—
A Defender of the Faith	109
Graphomania ...	110
The City Crowd...	111
The Alien Fox ...	112
PRESENT-DAY PROBLEMS:—
The India of To-day. By Sir William Wedderburn	113
ART:—
Corot ...	114
LETTERS FROM ABROAD:—
South Africa: The Problem of the Native Area. By South African ...	116
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:—
Militant and Constitutional Action: a Contrast. By Margaret Llewelyn Davies	117
Bad Harvests and Unemployment. By F. U. Laycock and F. Williams ...	118
The Newcastle Election. By an Elector ...	118
Venezuela and Holland. By A. Aldana, Consul of Venezuela ...	118
The Future of the Police. By J. Fletcher Little ...	119
Green, and other, Heavens. By John Higgins ...	119
"Grammatical." By Percy Braby ...	120
The Publican's Life. By F. W. Lockwood ...	120
Two Lays. By Puzzled	120
POETRY:—
October. By R. C. K. Ensor	120
THE WORLD OF BOOKS	121
Books to be Read ...	121
REVIEWS:—
By the Waters of Babylon	122
The Shifty Dumouriez	123
The Philosophy of Politics	123
A Novelist and Another	124
BOOKS IN BRIEF:—
Roman Life and Manners	126
The Poetry of the Gospel	126
A Novel Reader's Guide	128
THE WEEK IN THE CITY	128

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

Sir Edward Grey has, happily, been able to come to an agreement with M. Isvolsky as to the preliminaries of a settlement in the Near East, and an official statement of the result of their discussion was issued on Thursday. It is agreed that a Conference is necessary, but its scope is to be carefully defined. It is to discuss "compensation," and this is to mean compensation to Turkey, not to other Powers at the expense of Turkey. What form this compensation can take, however, is not hinted, though there is a reference to the desirability of strengthening the present régime as the best safeguard of peace. The "reasonable wishes" of the smaller States—i.e., of Servia and Montenegro—are, it is "hoped," to be met—but not at the expense of Turkey. This, we imagine, could only be realised by some rectification of the Bosnian frontier at the expense of Austria. The question of the Straits will not be submitted to the Conference, nor be treated as a matter for "compensation." This is an important point gained, not so much for British diplomacy as for the general prospects of a disinterested discussion.

* * *

The most uncertain element in the situation at present is the attitude of Bulgaria. The well-informed Sofia correspondent of the "Manchester Guardian" says the Bulgarian Government will not pay a farthing compensation, and will precipitate a conflict rather than submit to European dictation; while the Bulgarian Agent in Paris says that though his country has not yet issued an ultimatum to Turkey, it must get immediate recognition. One need not credit all the stories of warlike preparations in Macedonia, but there are, obviously, influential persons in Bulgaria who think that she has more to gain from a conflict precipitated before Turkey can mobilise than from a Conference which might prove abortive and would give Turkey time to gather her forces. The bellicose ebullitions in Servia have died down, though the Crown Princes of Servia and Montenegro and the Parliaments of these two States have been exchanging fiery telegrams. The Turks maintain their calm, but there have been incipient attempts at reactionary propaganda, and a boycott of Austrian wares is being preached and practised. Most unfortunately for the prospect of order and good relations between Moslem and Christian, a case of lynching occurred in Constantinople on Wednesday. The police were overpowered by the mob and a Greek was killed. The police are blamed for hesitation, and their commanding officer has been arrested.

* * *

Theatrical methods of advertising a cause, by creating disorder or obstructing public business, are becoming so common that they must soon defeat themselves. During the week Mr. Frank Smith has succeeded in compelling the adjournment of the London County Council in the supposed interests of the unemployed, and on Thursday Mr. Grayson, in the same cause, secured his own ejection from the House of Commons. On Tuesday the militant suffragists and the unemployed provided between them a holiday for the London crowd and an extremely busy and trying day for the police. Handbills had been issued by the Women's Social and Political Union calling upon men and women to join in an attempt to "rush" the House at half-past seven that evening, and a number of sympathisers and large crowds of sightseers were gathered along all the streets leading to the Houses of Parliament in consequence. The organised attempt to invade the House from Caxton Hall ended in a complete fiasco. On the other hand, a woman, who secured admission to the Lobby by the courtesy of a private member, succeeded in making a dash up the floor of the House and hurling her formula at the benches. What precisely is gained by these tactics it is difficult to see. The Women's Social and Political Union do not explain what would happen next if they did succeed in entering the House in a body.

* * *

The tactics of the militant section of suffragists have withdrawn attention from the far more serious movement in which all the important Suffragist Societies except theirs have joined. A letter, signed by Mrs. Fawcett, by Mrs. Despard, on behalf of the Women's Freedom League, by Mrs. Bury, on behalf of the Women's Co-operative Guild, and by other democratic organisations and representative bodies of women, has been addressed to Mr. Asquith, welcoming his announcement of willingness to accept an amendment giving the vote to women on democratic lines in a coming Reform Bill. They ask that the Bill should be introduced next Session, that the Government should undertake definite responsibility for the clauses affecting women, and give some guarantee of maintaining it against possible rejection by the Lords. They also ask for some indication as to the qualification on which Mr. Asquith would base the franchise. The importance of this letter is that it indicates the willingness of the Societies concerned to abandon the narrow principle advocated by the Women's Social and Political Union of suffrage on the same terms for women and men, and to consider ways and means of making women's enfranchisement a thoroughly democratic measure. This, indeed, is the only condition upon which a Liberal Government can take any action at all.

* * *

THE delegates for the National Convention for the closer union of South Africa met at Durban on Monday, and were welcomed in a suitable speech by the Governor of Natal. Messages of goodwill were read both from the King and from the Imperial Government, the latter justly remarking that it was a source of satisfaction to Ministers that the Convention had been rendered possible. Nothing, in fact, could be a more favorable commentary on the success, so far as it has gone, of the policy of self-government. The discussions of the Convention have been conducted in private. We deal in another column with some of the principal problems which it has to face.

* * *

THE "Morning Post" on Monday gave prominence to a constructive Unionist programme which is at least of interest as indicating the line on which the younger Protectionists are seeking to reconcile their policy with one of social progress. Tariff Reform is, of course, the pivot upon which everything turns. There is to be a general tariff on all imports, unless it can be shown that the inconvenience of levying the duty would outweigh its advantages, or that the duty would restrict production or "handicap the competition of important industries in oversea markets." Being interpreted, this means the taxation of food and manufactured goods, with a hope of escape for raw materials. The tariff is to be lowered at the discretion of the Government of the day with a view to securing reciprocity. But diplomacy is to be fettered with the provision that imperial preference is always to be maintained. For the rest, the House of Lords is to reform itself, old age pensions are to be developed into infirmity pensions on a contributory basis, the English consumer is to pay Ireland for maintaining the Union by buying Irish butter and meat at an advanced rate, and, instead of small holdings under public ownership, attempts are to be made to establish a peasant proprietary. With regard to national defence, education, and licensing, the remarks made are such as the intelligent reader will easily construct from his inner consciousness. On the whole, the programme hardly seems to us to come up to the standard which the "Morning Post" has set for itself in its editorial policy in relation to concrete questions of practical politics.

* * *

THE situation in Persia is going from bad to worse. On Thursday of last week the Nationalists in Tabriz delivered a general attack upon Ain-ed-Dowlah, the Royalist commander. They inflicted heavy losses upon him, and are now in possesion of the whole city. Ain-ed-Dowlah's situation is precarious, but a force of 300 Cossacks, with two quick-firing guns, has been sent to him from Teheran under the command of Col. Uchakoff, a Russian officer and Col. Liakhoff's right-hand man. This activity of a Russian officer against the stronghold of the Constitutional Party is the latest and one of the most scandalous interventions on the part of Russia; it clinches the argument that the Shah cannot be brought to his senses by the two Powers until the Russian officers in his service are withdrawn. When movements of this character are possible it is not surprising that Anglo-Russian pressure upon the Shah is a complete failure. The diplomats in Teheran are at loggerheads, and the plain truth must be faced that, so far as Persia is concerned, the Anglo-Russian agreement is, and will remain, a dead letter until the Russian Foreign Office inspires its agents with discipline and loyalty.

* * *

THE Presidential candidates are deluging the States with speeches, and Mr. Bryan has even surpassed his own record by making thirty-two in a single day. With the election only a fortnight off, the prophets are isssuing "tips" garnished with plausible detail. There are in all 483 electoral votes, so that the victor must get 242 at least. Mr. Roosevelt, in characteristic fashion, credits Mr. Taft with 306 certain. Other prophets are less positive. Two New York pro-Taft papers think that Mr. Taft is already certain of 188 votes, and Mr. Bryan of 166, and though they credit Mr. Taft with most of the doubtful votes they are obviously far from confident of the issue. Much will depend upon New York, and both parties will concentrate on that State during the last week of the election. One may still say that if it is not anybody's election, it is venturesome to prefer one candidate to the other, and the predictions of the partisans are diplomatic guesses.

* * *

THE House of Commons, on re-assembling, settled down at once to work upon the Children's Bill, and, while the public at large has been thinking mainly about the crisis in the Near East, or the problem of saving unemployed men from starvation, the discussions—through the ironies of a time-table—have centred round the question of cigarette-smoking, and the medical treatment of children under five. The Bill undoubtedly is an important measure which will do much for the health, moral and physical, of the rising generation, while it reflects the growing sense of responsibility of the parent to the State. Cigarette-smoking by boys is also undoubtedly an evil which requires to be checked, though some doubt has been felt as to the appropriateness of using the criminal law in such a matter, and the more drastic clauses have been wisely amended or withdrawn.

* * *

THE resignations of Lord Tweedmouth and Lord Ripon—whose long and consistent career has won the grateful respect of every Liberal—have necessitated several Ministerial changes. Lord Crewe takes the Privy Seal, in addition to his present office, and Lord Wolverhampton becomes Lord President. These are changes not materially affecting the composition or influence of the Government, but Lord Fitzmaurice, who has accepted the Duchy of Lancaster, and a seat in the Cabinet, will reinforce the Liberalism of the Administration at points at which it has now and then shown weakness. His promotion leaves the Under-Secretaryship for Foreign Affairs vacant, and it is highly desirable that the office should be filled by someone who, like Mr. G. P. Gooch or Mr. Masterman, thoroughly understands the attitude of the party both to the question of the Near East and to the general problem of international peace.

* * *

THERE is something like a marshalling of Conservative opinion in Germany against the policy of an ever-expanding navy. Some weeks ago the "Kreuzzeitung," the organ of the Junkers, strongly protested against the inflated naval Budget. A week ago, Baron von Gamp, one of the Conservative leaders, issued a memorandum on the national finances, urging that the naval estimates should not be further increased; and this week the "Kreuz-zeitung" returns to the attack. It denounces the agitation of the Navy League and the Press as partly inspired by the personal interests of the manufacturers of armaments and wholly based on a false appreciation of "the distinctly restricted value and aim of the German Fleet," and it declares that the Navy League has driven England into the arms of France. The "National Zeitung," the organ of the lukewarm Liberals, takes the same line, and one may infer that both the squirearchy and the big industrialists are inclining to the view that the time is ripe to call a halt to naval expansion and to improve the relations between England and Germany. It would be superfluous to emphasise the grave impolicy at this juncture of checking this current of sentiment by the publication on our part of a naval Budget of provocative magnitude.

* * *

Some important changes have been made in the Licensing Bill. On Wednesday Mr. Leif Jones moved and carried an amendment reducing the area within which Local Option may be exercised. Its effect is to substitute the parish or urban area for the licensing district. In London the area would, as Mr. Harcourt explained, be the ward of the metropolitan borough. Local Option on this scale will raise boundary difficulties, but is more likely to secure practical acceptance than it would be in larger areas. On Thursday Mr. Asquith tabulated his new proposals for the future of Local Option, which lay down definitely that on the termination of his reduction period a two-thirds majority will be required. In the debate on Thursday Mr. Asquith made a crisp statement of the case for a time limit, and Mr. Balfour, in his reply, showed, perhaps unconsciously, how completely his own Act of 1904 was conceived in the interests of the Trade, and for its defence against the magistrates, who were merely exercising for the public good what the case of Sharpe v. Wakefield had proved to be the law of the land.

* * *

The dispute in the cotton trade has entered upon a new phase during the week. The spinners and the card-room workers have come to an understanding with one another, and, moreover, are seeking to negotiate with the employers through the General Federation of Trade Unions. They offer to accept an immediate reduction of five per cent. on the re-opening of the mills in November, or earlier, upon condition that the wages question should be reconsidered within three months from the date of resuming work. It is understood that the employers will not accept these terms, on the ground that they do not contain a settlement but would leave the wages question open. The next step would seem to be to lay down some principle upon which the adjustment of wages three months hence should take place. It might depend, for example, on what they call in the trade the "margin" at that time. The probability is that a settlement will be arrived at as soon as both parties are convinced that stocks are sufficiently reduced and that there is an active market for yarn.

* * *

Notwithstanding the continuance of the cotton dispute and the undoubted prevalence of unemployment in many centres, the immediate outlook for trade seems, if anything, slightly more hopeful. The Board of Trade figures for September were the least unfavorable of the last five months. Exports, indeed, continue to decline, but the drop is less than it had been at any time since last March, while imports, for the first time in the year, show a considerable increase, and it is to imports, particularly of food and raw material, that, outside the tariff controversy, people look first when they want to judge the course of trade. Figures of oversea trade should be read in conjunction with the movements of the index number of prices published by "The Economist." At the end of last month the index number, having steadily declined from 2,594 in the middle of 1907 to 2,168 in August of this year, showed a recovery to 2,200. This is not much, but it may be the straw which shows which way the wind is blowing.

* * *

The Ministerial crisis in Denmark, precipitated by M. Alberti's swindling, has been patched up after four weeks by M. Neergard, who has, at length, managed to form a stop-gap Ministry. The new Cabinet is a coalition Ministry, and it includes four members of the last Cabinet. While the new members are inexperienced in politics, the old members are tainted by their association with Alberti, whom they defended before his confession. M. Neergard was, however, compelled to retain them, because the party to which they belong is the strongest group in Parliament, while his own immediate following is infinitesimal. Nevertheless public opinion is very hot against the step. Some indication of public feeling has just been given by the election of a deputy to succeed Alberti. The candidate whom Alberti decisively defeated on the last occasion has been returned. M. Neergard's Ministry is not likely to last long.

* * *

Sir Henry Drummond Wolff, whose death was announced on Monday, was a man of considerable and versatile abilities reflected in a distinguished and varied career. He played an important part both in the support and in the execution of Lord Beaconsfield's Eastern policy, but he is probably remembered now mainly for his connection with the Fourth Party, of which he might claim to be, in a sense, the founder. The little band of brilliant men whom he brought together—Lord Randolph Churchill, Mr. Arthur Balfour, and Sir John Gorst—not only revived the fortunes of Conservatism after the crash of 1880, but gave a new turn to the whole development of Conservative politics in England, and, in virtue of his connection with the movement, Sir Henry Drummond Wolff may be said to have a place of his own in history.

* * *

From many sides comes evidence that opinion is ripening in favor of a limitation of speed as at least one step towards the solution of the motor difficulty. In the City a Committee has met, under the presidency of the Lord Mayor, with the object of securing legislation to deal with "noisy and dangerous motor traffic." At the inquest on the victim of the Barnes accident, the jury, while exonerating the driver of the motor omnibus, added a rider that, "considering the increase in the number of accidents caused by motor cars driving within twelve miles of Charing Cross, the speed of motor vehicles should be reduced to twelve miles an hour." The Parish Council of Haslemere having before them a resolution in favor of a speed limit within the town, the Chairman pointed out that they would have to go to the County Council for powers, and the County Council in its turn would have to go to the Local Government Board. Remarking that "at the rate the Local Government Board were now working, it would be about fifteen years before they got through the present number of applications," he suggested, as an amendment to their resolution, one "urging the County Council to apply to the Local Government Board for a general ten miles an hour limit for all towns and populous places." This was unanimously adopted. The speed limit is probably the first step, though behind lies the question how it is to be enforced.

Politics and Affairs.

THE TASK OF THE GOVERNMENT.

Amid the alarums and excursions of unemployed demonstrators and suffragist agitators, Parliament has settled down to solid work. It has met not an hour too soon. On all sides grave problems confront the Government. They have, we fully believe, both the spirit and the ability to deal with them, but the actual conditions of time accentuate the difficulties, already grave enough, of the social and industrial position on the one hand, and the political situation on the other. The legislative programme is a heavy one. It threatens to become congested, and the experience of 1906 is in danger of being repeated. It will require all the resolution and all the tactical skill of the leaders to avert a legislative block at the very close of the autumn, of which the House of Lords will take full advantage. Nor has the Government the same freshness of youthful vigor, nor the same unimpaired confidence in public support, which with a little timely resolution would have surmounted the crisis two years ago, and have made everything plain sailing for future legislative work for the Liberal Party. We do not, indeed, lay too much stress on such losses as have been experienced at the by-elections. It is certain that while grave controversies are pending, while proposals are before the people which alarm powerful interests, the Government which puts them forward stands to lose. The danger to the Liberal Party is rather that these controversies may be allowed to drag on, that the sore may be kept open, and that the Government may, as it were, waste at both ends, losing credit with its friends for failure to give effect to their desires, while at the same time incurring the desperate hostility of all the interests that they have threatened. If the Government is to maintain itself with the country, the licensing and the education controversies have to be brought to a close. We may be sure that the masterly tactician who dictates the action of the House of Lords is fully alive to this weakness of his opponents and to the advantages to be gained by delaying a decision, and, having in view Mr. Balfour's astuteness and the control which he exercises over the Peers, we may well doubt whether the authority of the Bishops or their own public spirit will suffice to secure for the Licensing Bill a fair discussion in their assembly.

The Bill will go through the Commons without difficulty. If its advocates are wise they will lighten it by dispensing with every detail that is not essential to its main purpose. We certainly think that they have strengthened and improved it by accepting Mr. Leif Jones' amendment for narrowing the area of local veto. The power to keep the public-house away from one's own immediate neighborhood is a right which appeals to the ordinary citizen, quite apart from his zeal for Temperance as a cause. He sees it more distinctly as a means of securing himself against a possible nuisance, and he is both more likely to exercise the power when the Bill becomes law and to acquiesce in the granting of the same power to others, when he considers it from this point of view, than when he looks at it as a measure for making the nation more temperate. On this side, then, the programme of the Government is tolerably clear. They have to lighten the ship of temperance and keep everything trim and taut, at the same time pressing forward her cause with unswerving determination. The sooner she reaches the rapids of the Upper Chamber the better it will be for her favorable passage through them. The Government must not be rushed by the near approach of Christmas, as they were in the crisis of the Education Bill. They must leave the Lords time for full discussion, and, what is still more to the point, they must secure for the House of Commons full leisure to decide what action to take in reply to the decision of the Peers, whatever that may be. This, at least, they can feel: that, should the Peers reject the second reading, they have a resource which, in the case of education, was not available to them. They can deal with the financial side of the problem in next year's Budget, and they can convince the brewers that their immediate interests lie rather in the acceptance of this Bill than in forcing the immediate and separate treatment of the monopoly value of licensed premises. Indeed, if the opponents of the Bill are made betimes to realise the full nature of this alternative we fancy that their opposition will be somewhat relaxed.

Unfortunately, while the House of Commons is legislating on Licensing, and inwardly ruminating on the possibilities of Educational peace, other problems have arisen in the country to exercise the popular mind. It is ill arguing with starving men, and as long as there is in every great town a body of men and women who can neither find work nor food, the problems of unemployment must have an urgency which no other can command. We do not take a very pessimistic view of the immediate future of trade. Here and there, as we note in another column, there seem to be welcome evidences of a possible revival, but we are certain that the problem is sufficiently serious both to absorb the interest of the public and to render effective action on the part of the Government a matter of immediate necessity. As we pointed out last week, it is much to be desired that a question of this kind should be handled in all due caution and deliberation, but to secure these conditions it is necessary to deal with it before the crisis arises. In fact, as soon as the immediate needs of the present autumn are catered for, Ministers will, we trust, make it their business to think out a systematic scheme, whether on lines of insurance or of the provision of some form of national work which could be expanded and contracted in correspondence with the fluctuations of trade. They have to devise a permanent machinery whereby some security may be given to the honest and industrious workman against the danger of falling out of the ranks of industry into the abyss of pauperism and dependence. But for the moment we have to deal as well as we can with men who are actually destitute. We have to use the machinery of the Unemployed Workmen's Act. We have to consider how to make it most effective and what minimum of legislation may be required to amend it. We urged last week that the immediate problem is as much administrative as legislative. Initiative on the part of the Local Government Board is the first step required. We recognise that Mr. Burns has accorded support to those municipalities which have applied to him, but we would urge that beyond this he should do something to stimulate those Distress Committees which hesitate from an insufficient understanding of their responsibility, or of their powers, to make effective provision for the unemployed. But, further, their action is at present cramped by the limiting conditions of the existing Act, which it would be well to remove. At present no rate can be levied for the direct payment of wages, and municipalities have to trust to private philanthropy and to getting what they can from the £200,000 grant. It would be easy to amend the Act by allowing a limited rate for direct expenditure on public works set on foot with a view to relief, and it would be fair, seeing that the question of unemployment is in reality a national one, for the central Government to meet the expenditure of the ratepayers with a grant of like amount. Mr. Burns, in his speech at Tynemouth, tells us that no legislation involving the right to work is contemplated in the present session, but a proposal of this kind would be very far from committing Parliament to the principle implied in Mr. P. W. Wilson's Bill. We do not say that it is a fundamental or permanent solution of the problem. But we do urge that it follows the line along which recent legislation has moved, and that the moment of crisis is not the time for striking out a new line. We gather from Mr. Asquith's replies to questions on the subject last Wednesday that the Government have the problem under their consideration, and we trust that, when he is able next week to announce their decision, we shall find that it at least does not fall short of these very moderate changes.

THE BALKAN PROBLEM.

It seemed, when Austria carried out her violent but elaborate manœuvre of ten days ago, as though the respect for treaties and the idea of European solidarity had suffered by her material success at least as severely as the Liberal movement in Turkey. Germany, Italy, and Russia, each in its own degree appeared in the character of an accomplice, and even in France official opinion was less emphatic and less unanimous in its condemnation than among ourselves. There was even a stage at which the "Temps" suggested that France might consent to condone the action of Austria, if Austria in her turn would support France at the next Moroccan Conference. For a moment Baron von Aerenthal's cynicism had dazzled and captivated the diplomatic mind, disposed as it is in all countries and among all peoples to accept the accomplished fact, and to regard European questions from the narrow standpoint of national interest. No one would go to war to prevent or avenge the annexation of Bosnia—why, then, hesitate to accept it with a good grace, if in the process something could be snatched from a helpless State in the name of "compensation"? From the shame of such an acquiescence Europe has been saved by the directness and manliness of Sir Edward Grey's attitude. Already he has succeeded in what is perhaps the larger part of his task. He has rallied the public opinion of Europe. The Russian and the Italian Press have in the end come to the English standpoint. The unlucky suggestion of the "Temps" has not been repeated, and even the German official Press has been at pains to explain that, if the German Government refrains from public protest, it is not because it approved of or consented to the Austrian coup de main, but simply and solely because Austria is an ally. Sir Edward Grey will succeed, we believe, in checking the general scramble for loot, which the action of Austria and Bulgaria so nearly precipitated; he may even go further by obliging these two States to make some substantial pecuniary compensation to Turkey for their treaty-breaking. But the moral gain of his firm stand is no less important from the European standpoint. He has shown that there is somewhere in the rear even of so highly bureaucratic a Government as that of Russia a reserve force of generous public opinion on which a disinterested Minister who adopts the standpoint of a "good European" may rely even in times of excitement and crisis. If only one Power will boldly maintain this attitude, it may hope to rally the popular forces against a diplomacy which in secret bargains away the rights of peoples. His success is a vindication of democracy as a real force even in foreign affairs.

The mischief which Austria's action threatened to the Young Turkish movement was its gravest and most obvious aspect. The events of the past week in Belgrade have reminded us that the Turks are very far from being the only race which has the right to complain. Half a century ago, in the days when Palmerston and Louis Napoleon used to talk of settling the future of peoples by the method of the plébiscite, no reminder would have been necessary to suggest that the Bosnians themselves had in this affair the first right to be consulted. There may be two opinions as to the value to them of thirty years of Austrian rule. We have met English tourists who were profoundly impressed by the roads, the railways, the clean streets, and the good hotels which they saw. That impression was usually deepened by the pains which the Austrian officials had taken to bring them into contact with nominated Bosnian mayors and notables of the "loyalist" faction. But the opinion of the five English observers known to us, who spoke Servian and were therefore able to converse with the peasantry, was emphatically and unanimously hostile to Austrian rule. The Austrians have developed Bosnia; they have not developed the Bosnians. Even now the "constitution" which they propose gives them no place in the Reichsrath, and foists upon them the archaic and plutocratic system of class suffrage, which Austria has itself discarded. So little was liberty of thought respected, that von Kallay's first act was to place his own "History of the Serbs" on the index. The ancient feud between Catholics, Orthodox, and Mohammedans has been sedulously exploited, and the guiding principle of the administration has been to crush the consciousness of Servian nationality. It is impossible to admire the somewhat neurotic protests of the Servians of Servia against an act which finally destroys their last hope of becoming something more than an isolated and land-locked enclave, existing on sufferance on the edges of the Austrian Empire. Their dynastic misfortunes and their lack of constructive ability, have combined to make them a nearly negligible factor in the Near East. But no nominally free people is in reality in a more pitiable case. They see themselves cut off from the sea, and isolated from the majority of their race-fellows. For want of a port they are at the mercy of the Austrian politicians and capitalists who hold the railroads which are their only outlets to the world. And, now, the very boon which Austria throws as a "compensation" to Turkey, the withdrawal of her garrisons from Novi-Bazar, threatens to embroil them with the Turks, since it is now a Turkish instead of an Austrian army which will divide them from their brethren in Montenegro, and cut them off from the old trade routes which lead to the Adriatic. They are too weak to better their own case, nor can the Powers aid them without despoiling others. King Milan's old idea of voluntarily entering the Austrian Empire, and there forming a third monarchy, co-equal with Hungary and Austria, is, perhaps, with all its obnoxious associations, the one hope for the restoration of a united Servian nation.

Sir Edward Grey's strategy, which aims at confining the programme of the proposed Congress, if it meets at all, to the bare questions of Bosnia and Bulgaria, is probably the wisest which could be adopted in the difficult circumstances of this crisis. Within these limits the less scrupulous Powers may at least be restrained from securing "compensations" for themselves, and may even be persuaded to exact from Austria and Bulgaria certain pecuniary compensations to Turkey. Any attempt to achieve more—to annul the capitulations, for example, in Turkey's favor, would probably find little support. Even France has declared herself resolutely against their modification. The time has not yet come for recognising the competence of Turkish courts to try Europeans, but even now there are some aspects of these invidious privileges which might with advantage be considered. It is intolerable that Greeks and Levantines, who compete as industrialists and merchants with Turkish subjects, should be favored by a complete immunity from direct taxation. Moreover, the recent epidemic of strikes is a warning that, despite the fact that Turkey is, and will always be, an agricultural country, a Turkish Parliament may find before long that the capitulations prevent it from assuring industrial peace by forbidding it to legislate for workmen who are employed by foreign capitalists. But such questions as these require more leisure and serenity for their solution than can be commanded amid the suspicions of intrigue and the rumors of war which make the diplomatic atmosphere of to-day.

THE SOUTH AFRICAN CONVENTION.

The gathering of delegates from the South African States at Durban to consider the question of closer union is the first formal step in a long-deferred movement. It comes neither as a fruit of war nor of intrigue. On the contrary, war and intrigue have long delayed the operation of natural, political, and economic forces making for consolidation. Thirty years ago Lord Carnarvon endeavoured to force a premature federation by secret machinations, followed by the armed coercion of the two Boer States. The slowly healing sore left by this violence was once more reopened by the Jameson raid, while the Imperialist triumvirate, Mr. Chamberlain, Lord Milner, and Mr. Rhodes, by their wrecking policy of a few years later, delayed for at least another decade the peaceful evolution of government in South Africa. For, though it is doubtless true that the sense of South African nationality has been aroused by the tragic events of the close of last century to a fuller consciousness, the difficulties of a satisfactory settlement of racial and State differences have been considerably enhanced. Though the present stage of the movement for closer union shows a most pleasing harmony of feeling and of policy among British and Dutch leaders, it would be foolish to feign that a few years would suffice to wipe out all memories of the past, while the heavy financial embarrassments in which the coast colonies are entangled, the normal aftermath of war, must increase the practical obstacles in the way of a satisfactory scheme of union. The present moment, however, is not one suited for dwelling upon difficulties, but rather for congratulating the statesmen of the colonies upon having educated in their country so general a feeling in favor of union. For it is no secret that the initiative has been taken by the vigorous leaders of public opinion, especially in the Transvaal and Cape Colony, and that if the movement is carried to a successful issue, the result will be attributable to the intellectual and political authority which such trusted men as Messrs. Merriman, Malan, Botha, Smuts, and Fischer wield among the peoples of their respective States.

At the outset discussion must turn chiefly upon the nature of the new bond, whether it shall be a thoroughgoing union with a single supreme legislative power, or a federal government in which some measure of independence, greater or less, shall be reserved for the several States. It is generally understood that in Cape Colony, the Transvaal, and the Orange River Colony, most active politicians of both white races favor fusion rather than federation. To this view not only General Botha and Mr. Smuts but Sir George Farrar, not only Messrs. Merriman and Malan but Dr. Jameson and Mr. Smart, are understood to be committed. The fact that neither natural, racial, nor economic differences of any moment divide these States from one another, while their artificial severance has been a constant source of trouble in the past, makes powerfully for amalgamation. Natal alone, with her mountain frontier, her more tropical climate, her British supremacy, and her particularist native policy, prefers a narrower scheme of federation. Outside Natal the strongest opposition to union appears to proceed from the back-veld Boers in the Transvaal, the anti-Dutch colonists in the Eastern Province, and from one or two powerful but eccentric statesmen, such as Mr. Hofmeyer and Mr. W. P. Schreiner. If, as seems likely, the delegates from the Transvaal and Cape Colony set their faces determinedly towards union, it will be very difficult for any of the other States to say them nay. The Orange River Colony must, in any case, cast her lot in with the Transvaal, and these inland States can, in the last resort, compel the others to accede to their terms by crippling their traffic and their markets. Natal may make some show of holding back in splendid isolation, but the first straight hint of according equal competition to Delagoa Bay must force her to her knees. In fact, the ruinous condition to which Natal by her reckless misgovernment has brought her finance, makes her the least capable among all the Colonies of imposing terms. The Transvaal, from her geographical position and her rich mineral resources, is certainly able to exercise a predominant power in the Convention: if she is prepared to enter into union with weaker and poorer neighbours, she will be entitled to urge that she shall have a voice in the management of their affairs commensurate with the financial and commercial advantages which her co-operation secures for them. Though, therefore, it is far too early to prophesy the shape which the new Constitution will take, we feel tolerably sure that it will be closer than that of either of the other two great Colonial groups. The recent experience of Australia serves to indicate the many grave difficulties to which even the most carefully concerted scheme of federation among fairly homogeneous States is likely to give rise, and though the closer federal system of the Canadian Dominion has worked tolerably well, the friction between the State and Federal Governments has been not inconsiderable, while their rivalry in pressing claims upon the federal exchequer has been a growing source of political corruption.

But, though, on general political grounds, the case for unification as against federation appears very strong, vested interests, local pride, and to some degree differing standards and ideals of government,. will probably present obstacles to an easy settlement upon this basis. One issue—to our mind of supreme importance—is likely to cause trouble, viz., the agreement upon any common policy regarding the government of the natives, who form the vast majority of British subjects in South Africa. It is understood that Mr. Schreiner prefers federation to unification upon the ground that he fears that a unified government will involve a degradation from the more liberal native policy in Cape Colony. Now, if unification necessarily involves complete uniformity of franchise and of native treatment over the entire country, we sympathise with his alarm. But though it is probably true that a unified or a federal constitution, providing throughout South Africa the equal civil and political rights accorded in Cape Colony, would be rejected by the peoples of the other States, it by no means follows that the more backward policy of the newer colonies must be forced upon the Cape. If neither the Transvaal nor the Orange River Colony, nor even Natal, with her spurious native franchise, is prepared straightway to adopt the principle to which Mr. Rhodes gave his assent, "equal rights for all civilised men south of the Zambesi," there can be no sufficient reason for requiring the colony which has successfully applied this principle to abandon it. We do not believe that the people of Cape Colony will consent to such abandonment, or even to such a derogation from the existing native rights as the substitution of the New Zealand Maori franchise for that which is enjoyed at present. Though the final settlement of this great issue of genuine self-government must rest with the white peoples of the Colonies, we cannot refrain from expressing a most earnest hope that they will come to recognise that a union or federation, in which the vast majority of the population are kept in permanent political servitude on grounds of race or color, can never expect to rank upon a level with genuine self-governing nationalities. It may very likely be the case that the Durban Convention will prefer to leave the solution of this question of the native franchise for the mature consideration of the central government itself, so as to avoid endangering the acceptance of a constitution by proposals too liberal for the northern peoples or too retrograde for Cape Colony. But the Convention, in the course of its deliberations, can hardly avoid considering the future position of Basutoland and Bechuanaland. These are imperial wards, and if a South African Union should ask that the future government of these countries be entrusted to her, the Imperial Government will be not merely entitled but compelled to take under her survey the general policy of the South African Government in its treatment of natives. For it is one thing to admit that no federal or central government would have been guilty of anything like the recent operations of Natal against the Zulus, it is quite another to feel confident that the integrity of Basutoland would be maintained against the clamorous demands of traders and prospectors. In considering any draft constitution which, as the result of the proceedings now begun at Durban, may ultimately come to the Imperial Government for its assent, the latter will doubtless bear in mind the vital difference between South Africa and the other two colonial nationalities, in which there are no great unrepresented races.

LABOR IN PARTNERSHIP.

Many employers have come to recognise that the ordinary business structure is essentially unsatisfactory as regards the relations between capital and labor, and many experiments are afoot for securing better harmony and more security in the co-operation of employer and employed. It is not unnatural that out of the stress and confusion in the shipbuilding industry of the North-East Coast some such peace proposal should emerge as that to which Sir Christopher Furness has given utterance. Setting aside as quite impracticable his first proposition to the effect that the trade-unionists should purchase and conduct the business, and confining our attention to his second and more detailed scheme for securing community of interest between capital and labor, we find ourselves confronted with very difficult issues of economic policy. Stated briefly, the scheme is this. Employees shall become owners of special guaranteed four per cent shares in the shipbuilding company, paying for them by deductions of five per cent. from their weekly earnings. After an agreed dividend on the ordinary shares, to be determined by the directors, probably at five per cent., has been provided out of profits, together with a proper allowance for depreciation, development and reserve, any residue of profit is to be divided as bonus upon shares, the employees' shares and the ordinary shares being treated on an equality. Employees' shares do not carry any right of electing directors, and the full existing management and finance are reserved for the representatives of ordinary capital, but general amity is to be secured by a Works Council, composed of an equal number of representatives of the firm and of the men, trade union officials being eligible to sit upon this body, which is to be a Court of Reference and Conciliation.

The scheme differs from most schemes of co-partnership and of profit-sharing in several respects. In the first place, it does not pretend to bring labor into co-operation with capital for purposes of management, as is the case with Sir G. Livesey's experiment in the South Metropolitan Gas Company, where men's shares carry the right of electing members of the directorate. There is to be no movement towards the ideal of a compact self-governing democratic business in which the workers own the capital and control the business. In his interesting address in proposing the scheme, Sir Christopher Furness made it quite clear that the ability of business management was a third factor with the supreme control of which there must be no interference. Though experience in productive co-operation powerfully attests the accuracy of this judgment, it must be clearly understood that it involves pro tanto an incompleteness in the proposed harmony between capital and labor. For full access to accounts, and a proportionate voice in determining the allocation of sums for reserve and development, seem almost essential to preserve the confidence of the employee-shareholders.

As for the bonus or share of profits, it differs in form, though hardly in substance, from the usual profit-sharing business, in which, after fixed provision is made for interest, an agreed share of any surplus is paid as a lump sum to the worker in the shape of a percentage on his earnings. If all the ship-workers were shareholders in the way described, any addition of interest to the agreed four per cent. upon their shares would be in effect a bonus on wages, though nominally ranking as interest. Now the usual difficulty which has wrecked most profit-sharing schemes is this: The workers under the new stimulus of sharing profits have put more energy or care or skill into their work, and so long as they get some fairly substantial bonus they are content. But when lean years come they find the product of their extra energy absorbed in keeping up the ordinary dividend or shares, and they are told that there is nothing to divide. They are dissatisfied, and justly, for they have been induced to give out extra energy and have got nothing for it. The shipbuilders would probably experience the same disappointment if their four per cent. shares, paid for in hard cash by stoppage from their wages, fetched no bonus, and the essentially fluctuating character of their trade would render this contingency far more likely than in a trade like gas-making, where a monopoly of a prime convenience secures the company full business at profitable rates.

But a far wider issue is opened up in such proposals. How far is the general cause of industrial peace subserved by separate arrangements between the capital and the labor in particular businesses, which must result, and are intended to result, in detaching particular groups of workers and of employers from the outside organisation of labor and of capital in their trade?

Recognising the great need of free and various experiment in business enterprise, we should be loth to discourage any serious endeavor to harmonise the interests of capital and labor in any single business, and if shipbuilders deliberately prefer the profitable union with capital in their business to the fuller liberty of trade-unionism which, in fact, if not in principle, they are invited to abandon, they may do well to make this choice. But it should be clearly understood that the acceptance of this policy weakens the efficiency of the organisation of labor on trade lines. Now, although there is no finality in trade-unionism as a method of industrial settlement, and recent experience in the shipbuilding trade and elsewhere shows that much waste and misery is due to ill-considered strikes, it is none the less certain that the effective organisation of the labor and the capital engaged in the several trades has proved most serviceable in minimising quarrels and in furnishing the instrument of peaceful negotiation and conciliation. Any improvement in the relations between capital and labor in a single business which should, by a cross-cleavage, weaken this bond of sympathy and interest between the workers in a business and their fellows working in other businesses, might add nothing to the net harmony of business relations. While, therefore, we admit that there is much that is plausible and something that is genuinely good in such proposals of limited co-partnership, experience has not shown that the industrial incentives they sustain indicates such co-operation as forming an important current in the stream of social evolution. Successful instances of such co-operation have been mostly confined to special cases where the monopolistic character of the business, or the liberal philanthropy of the employer, have assigned to labor a secure and a considerable supplement to wages. But we doubt the efficacy of the application of such methods to highly competitive and fluctuating trades.

One section of Sir Christopher's proposal demands, however, hearty assent, his suggestion of a representative council in which employers and employed shall meet on equal terms for friendly communication on all matters of common interest. Unfounded suspicion and false rumors are responsible for an enormous quantity of misunderstanding and ill-will in the relations between employer and employee. In the old days such troubles might often be healed by the loose informal contact between master and men thrown together in the ordinary course of the day's work. In a huge modern works no such personal contact is possible. Hence the greater need of such a council as Sir Christopher proposes for free intercourse between the management and the workers which might promote friendly intercourse, put each in possession of the mind of the other, and smooth out difficulties in their opening stages.

Life and Letters.

A DEFENDER OF THE FAITH.

It is very difficult for a paradoxist to gain recognition as a thinker, for most readers so much prefer him not to think but merely to continue turning truisms on their back to show the other half-truth. How difficult it is may be proved by committing what may be termed the supreme paradox, where the paradoxist represents himself as the only plain, commonplace man. Mr. G. B. Shaw and Mr. G. K. Chesterton are in this same boat. The world has decided that they are intellectual jesters, and their efforts to wriggle out of the motley garb and don sober broadcloth is naturally taken as an entertaining feat. Mr. Shaw, as evidence of his commonplace humanity, quotes his oculist's testimony to the absolute normality of his vision: but everyone knows what Mr. Shaw thinks of doctors. Mr. Chesterton is more discreet, and gives for his reference of character Mr. Chesterton. Indeed, to what better authority could he appeal?

Yet both Mr. Shaw and Mr. Chesterton are eminently serious persons with large missions to fulfil and important messages for their age. If only they could shake off the cap and bells! Mr. Chesterton realises the tragical (and comical) plight, and in his latest volume, "Orthodoxy" (The Bodley Head), designed to set forth his "philosophy," makes a gallant though unsuccessful attempt to attain a qualifying dulness. Like other philosophers, he writes his signature large over the Universe, and, if Chesterton were Brown or Jones, the trick would be done, and we should have our normal "philosophy" as objective as it could be got. At the outset of his undertaking he represents himself as the normal man in search of the obvious, but the results are so interesting and novel to his readers that they cannot be taken for obvious; while his method of search and discovery marks him off as anything but normal. Thus while everyone will admit that "Orthodoxy" is a profoundly interesting "document," some will hold that it teaches more about Mr. Chesterton than about the constitution of the Universe. We say this entirely without prejudice. For we hold with Mr. Wells that great gain comes to sociology by every man framing his own Utopia to try what it is worth, and that straightforward, informal efforts of fertile minds like Mr. Chesterton's are far more likely to reach and state a sane view of "things in general" than professional philosophers. The pattern of his intellectual and moral needs which Mr. Chesterton fits on to the Universe is a very interesting and in some ways a very comforting one, and his is not the sort of worrying mind that suspects the truth of a view because it is comforting.

When he was a little child his parents told him that yellow flowers called crocuses would come out in the garden in early spring. They did so. Extraordinary things happened, and yet they could be foretold. This gave him confidence in prophesy and miracle, "the combination of something strange with something that is secure." His nurse told him tales in which magicians or fairies sent boys and girls on strange adventures in enchanted lands where spells are laid, the observation or the breach of which bring golden felicity or abject perdition, where the course of Nature may be made and varied according to the purpose of the magician, and yet everything that happens strikes the child's imagination as right and reasonable. The logic of elf-land is consistent with any amount of arbitrary interference with the order of outward happenings, so as to enforce the meaning of the romance. And yet there were real laws in fairyland, mystical conditions which could be kept or broken, and it was essential to the interest and the "sense" of the story that this should be so.

As he grew up, the boy required, for his own larger life and for the life of the Universe, the same sort of reasonable satisfaction which his father's prophecies and their fulfilment, his nurse's tales and their inevitable rightness, gave him in childhood. "Laws," "necessity," "tendency," and all the verbal paraphernalia of mechanical explanation were of no use to him: if laws were not made to be broken, at least it was essential that they should be able to be broken, and necessitarian doctrine robbing life of hazard, sin, glory, caprice, reduced it to dust and ashes. "The only words that ever satisfied me as describing Nature are the terms used in the fairy books, 'charm,' 'spell,' 'enchantment.' They express the arbitrariness of the fact and its mystery." In other words, not only life but Nature must be explained as a romantic drama, with fortuitous events, marvellous coincidences, which the actors seem to improvise as they go along with a glory and a failure that is theirs, but where plot and promptings and suggestive scenery alike are furnished by the great dramatist. The dull grinding out of the inevitable by process of evolution, moving from no origin to no goal, is unmeaning, i.e., fails to explain the actual interest which belongs to life. There must be magic in it, and where there is magic there is the magician, who sets men on romantic quests for the fulfilment of his purposes, assigning them freedom to obey and disobey, but intruding his will as often as he chooses. Without impugning the legitimacy of logic and scientific method, Mr. Chesterton urges that the senses of mystery, security, romance, loyalty to ideals and progress, are left entirely unsatisfied by rationalism, and that the failure of thought to touch these all-important facts is nothing short of intellectual suicide.

Then he proceeds to build up the theological structure and superstructure of his magical palace, claiming to rehearse his own voyage of discovery, as he found in Christianity the only system at once large, liberal, and human enough to satisfy first the major, then the minor, needs of his kosmic romance. It is no timorous piece of apologetics, no endeavour to pour new wine into old bottles, or to liberalise traditional doctrines. Quite the contrary. Mr. Chesterton will not have either "the inner light" of the Friends (which he gravely misrepresents), nor the divine "immanence" of Mr. Campbell; still less will he make concessions to Buddhism and other spiritual religions. The dogmatic mantle of his nurse has fallen on him: he is as cocksure about "the fall," "the Trinity," "free will," salvation, and perdition, as was she of Cinderella's coach and four or the geography of Beanstalk land. It is the old theology he craves, with a Garden of Eden, a Paradise, a Hell, a scheme of redemption expressing the divine purpose of a Holy Company, and the Christian Church to give authoritative interpretation of the Divine Will to an obedient world. In this "romance" of Orthodoxy he perceives "Titanic purposes of faith and revelation," for some of the most remarkable chapters in his book consist in his reconciliation of Christianity with the causes of democracy and of social revolution.

It is not possible here to attempt a critical estimate of what will, at the least, rank as an astonishing achievement, and of what may come to be regarded as an important modern bulwark of the faith. What Mr. Chesterton has shown with incomparable brilliancy is the way in which Christianity has in creed and rites adapted itself to the common needs and aspirations of man. What he neglects to recognise, however, is that the Christian Church, which continually he speaks of as "one," and which he treats as immutable in purpose and ideals, is alike in form and spirit not one but several, while its ideals are not immutable in substance but necessarily reflect and respond to the changing spirtual needs of each generation, degree of education, class, sex, and age. So, too, his treatment of other religions is unsatisfactory and not consistent with his method. Buddhism, for instance, he rejects as intrinsically false and unsatisfying, because it fails to give due emphasis to his special problem and to feed his emotional demands.

The very brilliance of his antithetical reasoning, though it forces attention and even admiration, is apt to raise suspicions which are not without some justification. His procedure is too confident and too complete: every objection he sets up he demolishes in a telling phrase; no opponent has a grain of truth. The stir of the fight is apt to turn the honest reasoner into a sophist, and one piece of superb sophistry runs throughout his handling of "scepticism." Objectors have urged that Christianity lacks the unity of spirit and of purpose that is claimed for her; they urge that it teaches peace and war, submission and persecution, anger and meekness, conservatism and reform. To this Mr. Chesterton replies that "Christianity is a superhuman paradox whereby two opposite passions may blaze beside each other": it is "the survey of one who from some supernatural height beholds some more startling synthesis." Now, this, in plain language, is sheer intellectual bluff: it neither defends nor explains. We cite this because it illustrates, as well as or better than many other passages, the besetting sin of paradoxical assertion as a mode of reasoning, viz., an abuse of the power of suggestion.

But though we cannot accord to Mr. Chesterton the full and final meed of victory for his particular "Orthodoxy" which he so boisterously demands, his antithetical procedure discloses so many important neglected "other halves" of truths, so skilfully pieced together in his pattern of the whole, as to make what Carlyle would have called a real book, or bible, worthy to be set alongside of "Sartor Resartus" as a defence of the faith. It is, indeed, a far more satisfactory bible than Carlyle's, for with equal earnestness and far more genuine humanity, it upholds a much more definite creed.

GRAPHOMANIA.

Writing is to some men like the gallows' mandrake, that shrieks as it is dragged up by the roots. It tortures them till they writhe, and their spirit grows gnarled and knotted into the form of old vinestocks. They agonise and wrestle, they pray to be delivered from the approaching hour. The thought that they must write pervades their waking and sleeping with gloom for weeks beforehand. They loathe the sight of an inkpot, as a mad dog loathes water. Wild horses would not drag them to the desk, hunger would not compel them. They had rather scavenge the streets and prod orange peel and rags with a pointed stick than put pen to paper. Nothing but conscience will drive them to write—nothing but the pitiless and overwhelming force that gives them no peace till they have found utterance in words that are like blood crushed from stones. And when it is over, they are left exhausted, prostrate, and half dead.

How different must be the lot of those who appear to secrete writing as the rose secretes perfume, and the toad venom! They are not torn in pieces as by a legion of cast-out devils. They are not overcome with shuddering horror at the sight of the blank page confronting them. To them the blank page is a sunlit field, which, like a shining river, the stream of ink will presently fertilise with current always gently flowing on. To them the act of writing is the fulfilment of a natural function, as easy as breathing, and almost as unconscious. They are unhappy when (to use the jargon of modern science) they are not "functioning." If for a day or two the action is checked, they feel oppressed, clogged, and uneasy, as when the pores of the skin are choked. Give them their accustomed outlet, and their serenity is at once restored. They become blithe and benign; after inditing the goodly matter of a page they shake off the last sign of distemper: they whistle or sing, like a complacent hen, who cackles when she has satisfactorily fulfilled her function. They can hardly be said to be purged of their perilous stuff, for their stuff is not perilous. It is a secretion, a product, a spider's thread, a sheep's fleece, a crocodile's tear, and as the only real happiness is the exercise of natural powers, they are easily happy on threepence at a stationer's shop.

It is, indeed, one of the great blessings of civilisation that progress has largely increased their opportunities of beatitude. We cannot doubt it was of them that Pope was thinking when, being always peevish in regard to such people himself, he wrote of Martinus Scriblerus that "he lived in those days, when (after Providence had permitted the invention of printing as a scourge for the sins of the learned) paper also became so cheap and printers so numerous, that a deluge of authors covered the land." Before the invention of writing, indeed, the born writer must have suffered an evil time, as he suffers in the Central African forests to this day. But for the last two centuries he has been able to realise himself in most European countries on a comparatively small expenditure, and consequently, since that date, there has been no happier or more contented section of the community than born writers. We had lately occasion to refer to the enviable self-complacency with which Gibbon, on the approach of old age, regarded his past and present life. He gave this reason and that reason for his contentment, and, of course, we must take some account of his genius for history and his undisputed fame. But the real cause of his happiness was that he was born a writer, and fulfilled his function. "Another big book, Mr. Gibbon!" said the Prince of Wales to him once; "always scribble, scribble, scribble!" and the Prince of Wales was not such a fool as might appear. "Heavens!" cried Pope, in an anguish of body and mind—"Heavens! was I born for nothing but to write?" "I don't know about you, but I was," answers the born writer, and smilingly dips his pen.

Almost the only danger to which the happy writer can be exposed in these days of cheap stationery is insanity. Certainly, Max Nordau, or Lombroso, or whoever it was that coined the word "graphomania" was too harsh in applying it indiscriminately. Mr. Dick, for instance, was a born writer. His happiness lay in writing; mere writing was his function, and it must be remembered how artistically careless he was about publication:—

> "There is plenty of string," he said of his kite, "and when it flies high it takes the facts a long way. That's my manner of diffusing them. I don't know where they may come down. It's according to circumstances, and the wind, and so forth: but I take my chance of that."

It is only too probable that Max Nordau would have called Mr. Dick a "graphomaniac." But he was not a maniac in the least. When David asked his aunt if Mr. Dick was at all out of his mind, "Not a morsel," she replied; "if there is anything in the world that Mr. Dick is not, it is that." So we must be on our guard when men of science scatter these question-begging terms. But still, some connection between born writers and insanity has long persisted. "All Bedlam, or Parnassus is let out!" sighed Pope, when the dog-star raged. And again, he tells of him who,—

> "Locked from ink and paper, scrawls
> With desperate charcoal round his darkened walls."

Everyone who has inhabited an asylum knows with what absorbed intensity many of the other inmates cover ream after ream of paper with mere writing, sometimes in tremulous eagerness to catch a post that never goes, but more often for the mere, the almost physical, satisfaction, of putting down the words. In most cases the patients of this class are born writers, who, under the influence of disease, return to the function which has given them natural relief in the past, just as the vacunas of Patagonia, when they feel very ill, congregate to die beside a river where they and their ancestors have been used to relieve their thirst.

Let us, however, turn from this gloomy side of things to share the innocent joys of a happy writer in the open world of sanity and freedom. Mr. Algernon Ashton has made himself a writer's name, unique, if not imperishable. With entire justice, he says:—

> "The curious fact remains that somehow or other I have managed to become the best-known letter-to-the-editor writer now living."

To call the fact curious is but the modesty of genius. Mr. Ashton's fame stands unrivalled. His latest—and oh, that we must say his last!—publication, entitled "More Truth, Wit, and Wisdom" (Chapman & Hall), contains 656 of his letters to the papers, and all of them appeared within the space of two years, one month, and two days (Mr. Ashton insists on accuracy). We honestly believe this to be an unequalled feat. It is like Newton's "Principia" or the Ninth Symphony. No one else has done it. But we are convinced that Mr. Ashton is moved to write by no mere fame. He writes to the papers because he cannot help it—because it is his function, and he pines till it is fulfilled. He talks of this function as a "labor," but it is no such thing. It is his joy, his nature, his self-fulfilment. Touch him where you like, he spouts a letter, just as Canon Rawnsley spouts a sonnet. In many respects the two are similar. No matter what happens—the opening of a reservoir, a spring day, anybody's death or burial—we can always safely count on our letter from Mr. Ashton and our sonnet from Canon Rawnsley. "Don't let the Canon do a sonnet on me!" was an old Cumberland lady's dying prayer, but nothing could save her. Nothing could save anything from an Algernon Ashton letter.

Perhaps the tomb attracts him most. In his table of contents we find eighty-five letters classed as "Sepulchral," and there are forty-three "Monumental," and eighteen "Necrological" besides. For one single subject, probably the churchyards win hands down; and that may account for Mr. Ashton's vehement hatred of cremation, which would interfere with his vested interest in graves. He reminds one of Pope's enemy, Dr. John Friend, who was a graphomaniac of epitaphs, and, being imprisoned in the Tower, composed an immense book on the kindred subject of the History of Medicine. But, indeed, all is fish to Mr. Ashton's net. He boasts that "his own Press communications touch upon the most diverse topics imaginable." As a baby sees everything flat, without distance or perspective, so to Mr. Ashton everything is on a level. He has a flat mind, a Tit-Bit mind. He writes with exactly equal dulness on Blondin's birthday, the Suffragists, the Enfield cedar, the healthiest town, the average age of musicians, the height of Vesuvius, the insanitary influence of beards, the grave of Wagner's father and Bach's last grandson, the majority of a Member of Parliament at the last election but one, the taxation of bachelors, the largest Gothic building, Manuel Garcia's cigarettes, the East Tyrone election, German education, the number of musicians cremated, and Shakespeare (for, of course, he is a Baconian). At the foot of each letter he gives his full name and address. Both are printed 656 times over, and certainly they are quite as important as the letters themselves. Let us take but one example of a letter; the Editor of the "Pall Mall Gazette" was destined to receive it:—

> "Sir,—Query: Why is the House of Lords like our illustrious king? Answer: Because it almost invariably does the right thing."

That is all (but for name and address), and we admit that it is just the kind of thing that wins a peerage.

Here and there we come upon the joke that gentle dulness loves. But the choicest jokes are not Mr. Ashton's own; they are quotations from a funny friend—a certain Mr. Oscar Mount Balthasar, descendant of the Three Kings, as Mr. Ashton informs us, though we hope not from all of them. On one occasion this scion of royalty, sitting next to Mr. Ashton, "drily but facetiously remarked: 'No wonder he's so cool—if he's an ice man!'" Perhaps we should have expected something better from a descendant of the Three Kings, but it is quite up to the level of Mr. Ashton, who himself claims from the Plantagenets.

And now it is all over and done. We confess, it is with a sense of pathos, and the tears of things, that we read the last letter (printed in forty-nine separate newspapers), in which Mr. Ashton bids farewell to editors for ever. "I herewith take my final and irrevocable leave as a correspondent to the newspapers," he writes. He tells us that as a musician he will now endeavor to become a great Englishman. That is no consolation. We have many great Englishmen, but only one supreme letter-to-the-editor writer. His leave-taking eclipses the dulness of nations, and to what future can he himself look forward now? How dreary to feel his occupation gone! As Miss Betsy said of Mr. Dick's Memorial, "It kept him employed." But Mr. Ashton is adamant against our entreaties. Like Prospero, he abjures his magic art, he breaks his staff, and buries it certain fathoms in the earth. Oh, but stop a minute! What a subject for Sepulchral Letter the 86th!

THE CITY CROWD.

"Has there been a row?" asked a journalist on Tuesday last of a section of the crowd at Westminster. "No," was the cheerful reply; "but we still 'ave 'opes." It is a crowd which "still 'as 'opes" that forms the matrix or solid body of these agglomerations of humanity whose doings to-day excite some interest and some perplexity amongst observers of social change. In the midst are the criminal and the enthusiast, those who are openly at war with Society, those who are battered by its complexities and troublous demands, those, again, in whom devotion to some ideal cause burns like a flame at the heart. But these are all encompassed and embedded in the multitude of the unimportant: gathered from nowhere, journeying no whither, swaying and eddying, swept into random groups and aggregations, choking for a moment all the city ways, and in a moment leaving them all silent and deserted; the City Crowd which has seen little that is encouraging at the present, but "has hopes" of something thrilling or wonderful yet to be revealed.

You may see it in the dim morning of every day, struggling from the outskirts of the City into tram cars and trains which are dragging it into its centres of labor: numberless shabby, drab figures, with little white faces, shambling over the bridges or pouring out of the exits of the central railway stations. You may discern in places the very pavements torn apart, and tunnels burrowed in the bowels of the earth, so that the astonished visitor from afar, unacquainted with the secret, beholds a perpetual stream of people emerging from the middle of the street, seemingly manufactured in some laboratory below, all of one pattern, with those also among them which the machine has flawed or shaken or broken. It flows always along the high road of the huge town in the day time, like a liquid unprecipitated or a river, in clear even stream carrying down dust to the sea. But at any moment an unexpected incident, tragic or trivial, may change the liquid from clear to cloudiness, or reveal, like the river suddenly banked in obstruction, the debris and turgid elements which it has hitherto borne along so buoyantly. A motor omnibus stands still, a cab horse collapses, men's voices are raised in altercation, an itinerant agitator demands work for all, or announces the day of judgment. Immediately a knot appears in the texture of the wood, a whirlpool in the water. The multitude of the unimportant gather together, "having hopes." With incredible rapidity appear amongst them the criminal, the loafer, the enthusiast; the stream of busy persons has become transferred in a moment into the City Crowd.

There is a note of menace in it, in the mixed clamor which rises from its humors and angers, like the voice of the sea in gathering storm. There is the evidence of possibilities of violence in its waywardness, its caprice, its always incalculable mettle and temper, forming in the aggregate a kind of personality differing altogether from the personalities of its component atoms. Satisfied, curious, eager only for laughter and emotion, it will cheer the police which is scattering it like chaff and spray, mock openly at those amongst it who have come with set purposes, idle and sprawl on a summer afternoon at Hyde Park or an autumn evening in Parliament Square. But one feels that the smile might turn suddenly and inconsequently into a fierce snarl or sneer, and that panic and wild fury are concealed in its recesses, no less than rejoicing and foolish praise. But more than the menace, the overwhelming impression is one of fatuity; a kind of life grotesque and meaningless. It is in the City crowd, where the traits of individual distinction have become merged in the aggregate, and the impression (from a distance) is of little white blobs of faces borne upon little black twisted or misshapen bodies, that the scorn of the philosopher for the mob, the superhuman for humanity, becomes for the first time intelligible. Separate the drops and particles of it, follow each man homeward through the various ways of the City labyrinth—at the end you will find Humanity in its unchangeable and abiding existence: a tiny suburban home with cottage and garden, a tenement in a cliff of workmen's dwellings, a "child's white face to kiss at night," a "woman's smile by candle light." In each there is, then, resistance, courage, aspiration; a persistence which carries through the daily task with some energy and some enjoyment and not entire discredit at the end. But immediately the mass of individuals has become the aggregate, this note of personal distinction vanishes; Humanity has become the Mob, pitifully ineffective before the organised resistance of police and military, and almost indecently naked of discipline or volition in the comparison; gaping open-mouthed, jeering at devotions which it cannot understand, like some uncouth monster which can be cajoled and flattered into imprisonment or ignoble action; like the Crowd which in all ages has rejoiced one day at the triumph, the next at the Crucifixion, of its King.

Why is it that this writing down of values takes place when mankind is thus collected into aggregations: that the spirit of the mob is so much less reputable than the spirit of its separate components? In part perhaps because the trivial and vacant elements are uppermost amongst a city race whose aspirations and purposes are not associated with organised collective energies and aims. They have gathered for recreation, to be amused: for curiosity, to be surprised: for companionship, in a region where night has its empire, not without its terrors, just beyond the boundaries of their limited experience. The tragedy of common life is dominant, a modern philosopher has declared, not because poverty is the heritage of all but the few, or because existence offers at best a struggle uncertain and austere: but whenever that life is closed in the vision of limited horizons, and moved by no ideal springs. The laborer who cherishes the hope of a renovated society in which all shall be satisfied, the woman who flings herself into prison in the hope that through her sacrifice the freedom of woman will be attained, is a figure to the outward eye, indistinguishable in its darkness and obscurity from the multitude around who jeer and wonder and applaud. But these laborers and women have the secret absent from their fellows which gives their little lives a significance denied to the encompassing crowds; in the sense of consecration to a purpose, a meaning and a goal.

Meantime that spirit abides but in the few; and the Crowd remains, to-day as yesterday, an instrument which the strong man has always used and always despised in the using. The new features of it come from the change that has gathered men from the countryside and the tiny town and hurried them into the streets of an immense city—henceforth always to move in a company, tied as with a chain to their fellows, never to stand silent and alone. In such a transformation there would seem some danger of the normal life of man becoming the life of the Crowd, with features intensified and distorted when collected in tumult or demonstration. We seem to see in the experience of a generation an increasing tendency thus to merge the individual in the mass, more frequent and unfailing response to the demand for agitation which, in fact, is an excuse for absurdity or violence. Man, always seeking to escape from himself, found various channels of egress; in drink, in religious emotion, in political energy. He has now found that he can escape from himself by merely linking up with others like himself to become units in a Crowd. The secret is perhaps most clearly apprehended in America, where the Crowd Consciousness is excited as deliberately as the religious emotion of a revivalist meeting; and after due preparation an aggregate of humanity suddenly breaks into carefully fermented lunacy. So that selected delegates of the political parties—men, as selected, it would seem, of special calculation, intelligence, and prudence—will shout at Denver or Chicago meaningless cacophinations for an hour and a half on end, march round and round the hall playing instruments and singing discordant songs, or suddenly take off their coats or stand on their heads or beat each other with bits of board. It is the experience of the flagellants and pilgrims of medieval times, with hysteria no longer left to chance, but organised as a fine art. In our own "mafficking," in the tearing to pieces of the City Volunteers, in unemployed demonstrations, even in a spectacle so diverting and yet so foreboding as the so-called "siege of St. Stephen's" of last Tuesday, there are traces of similar if less exaggerated emotion: as man, communicating the infection of the Crowd consciousness to his fellow men, suddenly abandons his individual volitions and restraints, and loses himself in the volition of the Crowd. A note of hysteria may seem to be an inevitable accompaniment of a city life so divorced from the earth's ancient sanities as never to appear quite sane: and the future of the city populations, ever "speeded up" by more insistent bustles and noises and nervous explosions, takes upon itself, in its normal activities, something hitherto abnormal to humanity. We shall probably encounter in the future more appeals to the multiplied power of assembly, more determination to find a short cut in lawlessness towards attainment, more passive and active resistance in an attempt at government by violence rather than government by reason. Others, beside the unemployed or the women, will make this visible protest before all men by exhibition of their willingness to face ridicule, discomfort, physical injury, and even martyrdom in their ardour for the triumph of their cause. In a vision across the centuries, with time foreshortened, even material things take upon themselves the quality of motion: and the cities may be seen rising and falling, in growth, in triumph, and decay, like the fire that flares and in a moment fades. In similar vision the streets of those cities are always filled with this tumultuous and curious Crowd: restless, leaderless, astonished at itself and at the world, finding little intelligible either in the universe without or the universe within. Before which assembly in perpetual session there pass the phantom figures of those who appeal for its favor and its judgment: at first to a Crowd contemptuous, then to a Crowd acquiescent and astonished, ultimately to a Crowd applauding: themselves members of it, yet standing always separate and apart: because they alone are working towards an end.

THE ALIEN FOX.

There is a vulpicide in our village. Not till now, within the memory of man, has a man of our country been found so base as to draw trigger against the fox, unless it be true that some time in the late days of the muzzle-loader a certain irate poultryman let off a charge at a calculated ineffective distance "to larn Mr. Thieving Fox not to meddle wi' my hens." The old ideas of rectitude have at length proved too weak to capture the morals of the new man. A semi-townsman, lately immigrant, has got unreasonably tired of seeing his buff Orpingtons carried off to feed the young gladiators, and under the present bright moon he lay and waited for the marauder with his rabbit rifle and destroyed at a shot a day's sport for a thousand men, horses and dogs.

It was, of course, to be expected that even a man who breeds prize poultry and keeps a rifle would have somewhat to say in his own defence of such a parlous deed. If he could have proved that this was a sorry old fox, eaten with mange, and that therefore he shot him, the scowls of the neighbourhood would be changed to smiles, and the hunt secretary might even thank him for his zeal in the cause of sport. He certainly has not so good a defence as that. He says that if the hunt had done its duty by hunting the foxes with reasonable earnestness, he would have stayed his hand, would have allowed his special marauder to run his account until he could have been killed in season by the hounds. He would even make proper allowance for the fact that the hunting of foxes, by increasing the stamina of the survivors, tends to increase their numbers. He would not be so unreasonable as to refuse the further concession that it is allowable now and then to introduce a healthy Scotch or Cumberland dog fox to improve the local breed for sporting purposes. "But," says he, "the varmint I have shot is not only no Blankshire fox. He is no British fox at all, but a Servian or South Austrian, of no known blood, brought in not to improve breed but simply to increase numbers." And the worst of it is, the man has taken expert opinion as to the nationality of his victim, and the expert has borne out his contention. The parish has brought in a verdict of murder with extenuating circumstances.

We would not deny the pleasures of hunting, or the strength of its appeal to the primitive impulses. There is no sport in the world, on the purely physical side, like the gallop across country that is the one thing we hope for when we go to the meet. True that we might get the gallop without the fox, though no horse carries its rider with such spirit as when the hounds are streaming along in front, the horn sounding, and a host of equine competitors thundering alongside. The farmer who would stare, and worse, at a more or less distant neighbor who came jumping his hedges and scattering his seeds on a solitary frolic, is delighted to see hundreds of townsmen, as well as fellow tillers of the soil, smash the hedges down by the yard and set his sheep stampeding, when the fox leads the way. He joins in the hue and cry on the best of his young horses, which, haply, he sells for a good figure as the result of showing its paces before such a discriminating crowd.

The science of fox-hunting has been so fixed for many years that there is no more to be learned and no chance of making mistakes. Hounds have been bred and selected of such nose and of such speed that the fox stopped out of all his cities of refuge has the poorest of chances. We sometimes give him a little law by keeping the hounds a little shorter in the leg than the forces of evolution would have them, but, in the main, the desire of the field for a kill, as well as a run for its money, gains the day. Only by means of strictest preservation can the supply be kept up to the requirements of a first-rate pack hunting three days a week during a winter that rarely locks up the land with frost. From the sparing and protecting of the wild litters to the turning-down of cubs of all manner of races, and the occasional sly introduction of a veritable "bagman" for a particular day's "sport," is a journey composed of many steps none of much apparent significance. But now that the final stage has been reached, many masters are asking themselves whether the sport has not become too ridiculous to last much longer.

There are still plenty of farmers and other stewards of the land who are proud to have a litter of cubs in their fields, and to be able to assure the whips that they can always find a fox by drawing their coverts. But many secretaries get an increasing number of requests to remove superfluous litters to some place where they may be more welcome. If the secretary fails to comply, and some unauthorised person removes the little family in the night, no very pressing hue and cry is likely to be raised. The cub-stealers know where to find some ambitious person, probably living in the district of some other hunt who wants young foxes, and who may not enquire too particularly whence they come. When a country has been swept by mange, or otherwise emptied, we cannot be surprised if the hunt committee itself knows a good deal about the motherless young foxes that are being reared to make their sadly uneducated début before the hounds next winter. Hand-fed, and without the advantage of a four-footed guide to show them the lie of the land, it is scarcely to be expected that they will survive the season and live to perpetuate their amiable kind. Never mind. There will be more young foxes to be had in the spring, if not from the next county, then from Scotland, where the barbarians do not hunt foxes, or from Germany, Austria, Sardinia, and Siberia.

Responsible authorities to whom we have applied have estimated that the trade in foxes runs into thousands a year. Colonel J. S. Talbot, who has turned down many litters, says that as much as ten shillings and a sovereign is paid at times by the man who stands between the catcher and the ultimate customer. The statement refers, we need scarcely say, to none of the Colonel's transactions, but occurs in the confessions of an old fox-stealer with whom he had conversation. If prices like that are obtainable, there would seem to be a considerable market, and we cannot be surprised if foxes arrive from all parts of Europe. It is a pis aller to which fox "preservers" resort with reluctance, or at any rate with a heavy sense of responsibility. Not only are the imported cubs of the year, from whatever race they spring, far inferior, for purposes of sport, to those home born and reared by their own mother. They know nothing of the country in which they are asked to run for their lives, and when the hounds come they can only dodge about from neighboring cover to cover, till they are ingloriously chopped in the wood, or by some happy chance escape without giving the field a gallop. Another, and a serious, count against them is that they are very likely to bring mange into the district, and thus destroy the few healthy wild foxes that there may be. They may contract the unseen seeds of the disease in the hands of the dealers who bring them in boxes from far countries, and have an almost equal further chance of doing so in the artificial life they have to lead as turned-down cubs. There is no mother to look after sanitation by removing them to fresh quarters when the earth gets foul. Nor can the man who has charge of them feed them with the discrimination that a good vixen uses. They do not go short, but the greater danger of over-feeding is theirs, and they must often lack the all important change from fur to feather, or vice versa, that is at times essential to health. The men who first naturalised foxes did so with immense care, and usually with success; but the more the practice grows the greater is the chance of its proving a curse instead of a doubtful blessing. And the greatest danger of all is that the people who stood very well the over-nursing of indigenous foxes will be struck by the extreme illogicality of its later development, and become silent objectors, secret hinderers, even vulpicides.

Present-Day Problems.

THE INDIA OF TO-DAY.*

During the lifetime of the old East India Company, every twenty years, before the renewal of the Charter, there was a searching Parliamentary inquiry into Indian affairs. That was the opportunity to bring abuses to light and to redress grievances; and from these periodical inquiries date the Acts of Parliament which abolished trade monopoly, limited the powers of the Company, and initiated progressive measures for the benefit of the Indian people. But since 1858, when the Crown took over the direct administration of India, these grand inquisitions of the nation have ceased. For the last half-century, therefore, the control of Parliament and the British democracy over Indian affairs has practically been in abeyance; and the administration of India has been a pure bureaucracy, a bureaucracy singularly honest, industrious, and well-meaning, but subject to the vices inseparable from the bureaucratic system—the vices of arrogance, centralisation, secrecy, and suspicion. Under this rigid mechanical system the people of India have for many years remained quiescent. Now at last a change has come, and the reason is not far to seek. During those fifty years three or four generations of educated Indians have passed through our Indian colleges and universities, men of scholastic attainments sufficient to produce senior wranglers at Cambridge, and to head the list in the Civil Service competition. In public affairs, too, they have done excellently well wherever an opportunity has been allowed to them—as judges of the high courts and prime ministers of Indian principalities. These men, nurtured on Western literature, have aspirations for national recognition, for freedom and self government; they see the poverty, the famine, and the pestilence which devastate their country, and they are convinced that these calamities would be mitigated if the people had a voice in their own affairs. Such sentiments are natural and praiseworthy; but they do not fit in with the mechanism of official routine, and consequently the educated class has come into sharp collision with the revolving wheels of the great autocratic machine. There is an American saying that it is an ill thing to back up against a "buzz-saw." The educated class has been undergoing this painful experience, and the result is what the Press in England has agreed to call "Unrest in India." Many think this term euphemistic; but in any case the British democracy wish to know what it really means.

* "The New Spirit of India." By Henry W. Nevinson. Harpers. 10s. 6d. net.

Failing Parliamentary inquiry, a trustworthy and independent Press correspondent has, since the days of the Crimea, been the surest source of information upon which the British democracy can rely as regards British affairs in distant lands. At the time of the great famine we owed to the "Manchester Guardian" Mr. Vaughan Nash's mission to India. And in the present crisis this public-spirited journal has again taken the lead. Accordingly, in October of last year Mr. Nevinson, a very experienced traveller and journalist, arrived in Bombay as the correspondent of the "Manchester Guardian" and other leading organs of public opinion. For the last ten years and more, in regions wild and remote, in South and Central Africa, in Georgia, Macedonia, and the Caucasus, wherever there has been a storm centre, a struggle for freedom, or oppression of the weak by the strong, there has Mr. Nevinson been found, a recording witness of the truth—calm, open-minded, and fearless. Such is the personality chosen as an emissary of King Demos to report on the causes and nature of the unrest in India. The results of his mission are set forth in his book now published, "The New Spirit in India." In it will be found facts and conclusions throwing real light on the subject.

In making his investigations, the author's method was of a direct and practical kind, hearing all sides of the case, official and non-official. He visited the most important political centres, giving special attention to Eastern Bengal and the Panjab, where the unrest took its most acute form; he made the personal acquaintance of the leaders of public opinion, giving in their own words their views of the situation; and he was present at the Sarat Congress last Christmas when differences declared themselves among the reformers. In busy cities, and in famine villages, he had opportunities of observing the social life of the people, and he specially notices the religious movements which have so important a bearing on the national sentiment.

To attempt, in a brief review, to deal with all these multitudinous topics would be like putting Niagara into a pint pot. I can only refer the reader to the book itself, while I select for brief notice two of the leading points in the narrative: (1) the causes which brought about the acute phase of the unrest and (2) possible remedies. As leading up to (1)—the origin of the unrest—Mr. Nevinson gives, in his introduction, a useful synopsis of political events during the ten years preceding his visit to India, taking for a starting-point the arrival of Lord Curzon as Viceroy in 1898. And there can be little doubt that the acute phase of unrest dates from the advent of this masterful personage, riding on the wave of Imperialism which overwhelmed this country, and then spent its mischievous force on the shores of India. Hitherto, Viceroys and Governors, bringing with them the traditions of English public life, had usually acted as a restraining influence on the Indian bureaucracy. But Lord Curzon, as the Avatar of Imperialism and race ascendency, instead of restraining the reactionary activity of officialism, himself led the attack upon all those institutions savoring of freedom, which Indians hold most dear. Curiously enough, Lord Curzon himself seems to be surprised that anyone should think that his policy was the cause of unrest. In his speech in the Lords he said, "We are sometimes told that the unrest in India is due to the oppressive measures of the British Government, and particularly to the reactionary policy of recent years. I have never myself been able to ascertain what the reactionary measures were to which reference was made." For the information he desires he should refer to Mr. Nevinson's synopsis of political events during his viceroyalty. He will then understand that the reactionary policy consisted in attacks upon all those institutions which differentiate our rule from that of Russia; in legislation directed against the popular element in municipalities, against the liberty of the Press, against the independence of the Universities. But, besides legislation, there was the sting of his public speeches: his Budget speech of 1904, in which, in defiance of Queen Victoria's proclamation of 1858, he threatened to exclude qualified Indians from high office; and the singularly inept address in 1905 to the Convocation of the Calcutta University, in which he brought a charge of mendacity against the whole Indian people. On the top of all these grounds of offence came the final catastrophe of the partition of Bengal. Other deep-lying causes, Mr. Nevinson says, were developing general unrest among the people; "but beyond question it was the Partition that directly occasioned the present outbreaks of distrust and hostility." Despair came upon them "when their petitions remained unanswered, their public meetings had no effect, and when the Partition was carried out with despotic indifference to their feelings and interests."

As regards (2) possible remedies, Mr. Nevinson says: "Upon our immediate action will depend the terms under which we must maintain our position in India: whether we are to hold the new spirit fairly on our side, and to co-operate with it for the progress of the country in enlightment and self-government; or whether we are to have our rule confronted by impenetrable resentment, and our best efforts thwarted by indifference or suspicion." Is it to be co-operation or antagonism? Surely common sense suggests that we should try for co-operation before any more of the Sybil's books are burnt. The instalment of reforms now asked for by the Congress Party may briefly be summarised as follows: (1) Admission of qualified Indians to the executive councils of the Viceroy and the provincial governors; (2) enlargement and reform of the legislative councils, so as to make them fairly representative, and invest them with substantial powers of control over administration and finance; (3) wider employment of Indians in the higher branches of the public service; (4) extension of local self-government, municipal and local bodies being made wholly popular in their constitution, and village panchayats being revived for the management of village affairs; and (5) extension of primary education, making it free at once and gradually compulsory. These proposals must commend themselves to practical politicians in this country as a reasonable movement towards giving the people of India a voice in their own affairs. The decision is in the hands of Lord Morley, and will be made known in the course of this autumn session. Looking to his recent utterances and his past record, I feel confident that he will make a genuine advance towards satisfying the reasonable aspirations of "the new spirit" in India.

W. Wedderburn.

Art.

COROT.

No artist has inspired more enthusiasm among English landscape painters than has Camille Corot. No one has exercised a stronger influence on the development of modern landscape in this country. And probably no name rises as readily to the lips of the British connoisseur, real or self-appointed, in this art, as that of the great French master. Yet it is only in respect of his work that we know him: and it is only one phase of that work—the most important one, it is true—that is really recognised outside France. We refer, of course, to his landscapes. With landscape he is so intimately identified that one is apt to forget, if one has ever heard of, the church panels and other decorative work included in the sum of his activity. Still less do we know of the man's personality. Stray extracts from the pages of Robaut's and Silvestre's intimate reminiscences have from time to time found their way into English publications, but the information thus conveyed has been extremely fragmentary; sufficient, one might almost say, to induce one to a wrong estimate of Corot's character rather than to enable one to judge him rightly. In Mr. Everard Meynell's new volume on "Corot and his Friends" (Methuen), we have a praiseworthy attempt to set this matter right, for the benefit of the British public. The book, as the author frankly acknowledges, is based on the French authorities, but Mr. Meynell has been quick to seize the salient points in the mass of material provided by these—salient in so far as they illustrate the character of Corot himself and the social and artistic atmosphere of his circle. There are many delightful glimpses of the Paris where the painter often had his home and the Ville d'Avray which always had his heart; of student life in the French capital and Rome; of romantic figures in the Romantic movement, of contemporary painters of the Barbizon school, Millet, Daubigny, Théodore Rousseau, Diaz, and of the Classicists fighting for their vanishing privileges; of the Salon and salons; of contemporary writers, Gautier, Alfred de Musset, and others; much speculative inquiry besides. Among these moves the figure of Corot himself, fascinating in its simplicity. Corot, although in the company, was hardly of it; he stands always a little aloof. He belongs to no definite school of painting, certainly not to the Barbizon school, though he painted at Barbizon. He was a school unto himself, one that derived its inspiration partly from classic feeling, more from the pure nature spirit that was one of the influences of Romanticism rather than its whole essence. Again, Corot mingled with poets and poet-painters, and this art carries the impress of the poet-painter's sadness, the Romantic's melancholy. But that is not reflected from his life, which he lived with joy at his heart and a song on his lips. His own career knew no tragedy. He never married because he never loved. His mourning was always tempered by the greater joy that he had in "the preoccupation of landscape," as Mr. Meynell happily phrases it. The pain of early struggle was as nought to him compared with that of many of his contemporaries; besides which he had a competence sufficient for more than he ever wanted in material comfort. He is thus a placid figure in the midst of much turmoil—a figure that stands curiously apart from the passion-waking Romantics among whom he dwelt.

"Mon Dieu, Camille, comme tu es commun!" The exclamation was Corot's mother's, and it referred, of course, to the painter's personal appearance, not to his art. The latter, indeed, never provoked any stronger expression than one of good-humored tolerance either from the millinery mother or the hair-dresser father responsible for Corot's introduction to this world. It was the cry of a parent outraged by the discovery that a bourgeois marriage had not produced a little aristocrat to look at, and the plaint it embodies was partly justified by the facts. Corot, the young man, as pictured by himself on the canvas painted, on his parents' insistence, just before his first visit to Rome, certainly looks no Adonis of refinement. The photographs and portraits of him in later life, in spite of a handsomeness in the very strength of the face, suggest more than anything the rough-bred farmer type. And the word-pictures of the man, given in the many memoirs written round his personality—notably those of Théophile Silvestre's "L'Histoire des Artistes Vivants"—confirm the same idea. Corot was endowed with a massive frame and a big red face. In an age when blue blouses were even more the mode in French art circles than they are now, he was vehemently addicted to a blue blouse; and when he discarded this for civilian dress, the creases in his coat and the disorder of his cravat excited remark. The boisterousness of his laugh in his early days once caused him to be turned out of the Louvre. He had the habit, also, of singing to himself in public, and it is related that he even did so on the staircase of the Tuileries, whither he was invited to a Court party; but this, we learn, was expected of him. It is said, too, that he caused his married sister to faint by a loud exclamation of "Ah, the lovely carrots!" on one occasion when a dish of that favorite vegetable of his was placed upon her table. That he could shave himself without a mirror was a fact of which he was perhaps entitled to be proud. But that he shaved himself very incompletely is the authentic testimony of his friend and apologist, Desbarolles. So he was called "commun" by his mother; and one feels that he only just escaped being called vulgar—he who, out of his whole circle of friends, made Morning and Evening the most intimate. His family, Mr. Meynell remarks, did not understand him. Such is the lot of many a genius, and in this case it is less surprising than in many. For Corot was a mass of outward contradictions, which are only half explained by the ruling passion of his life, the love of his art. Even in the latter there are seeming contradictions. Having scant classical knowledge and but a tepid sympathy with the classics as revived in the Renaissance, he peopled his landscapes with living figures from classic mythology. More than that, he imparted to his landscapes the very flavor of the classics. As Mr. Brownell observes elsewhere, the landscapes of the Greeks, had they left any, would have been like Corot's. The contradictions of his life are not less striking. For his charities he earned—from a country curé—the title of the St. Vincent de Paul of painting, and his large-hearted charity towards humanity in general, his horror of giving pain, his tolerance of frailties he did not share, were almost worthy of any saint in the calendar. Yet he was curiously intimate with the caricaturists of his day, who, lashing the vices of society—vices which they often imitated—did so with the relish and wantonly cruel relentlessness of executioners who enjoyed their work. He consorted with Gavarni and Monnier; for Daumier, old and destitute, he provided a last home. One so "pre-occupied with landscape" could hardly have been distraught by the death of his parents at a hale old age. But his filial piety was a byword with his biographers, and he lived with his mother, obeying all her behests, till the day of her passing. And as he never questioned his parents' law, so he never learned to think lightly of the world's judgments, however he might regard the world's offerings with a child-like wonder.

Mr. Meynell writes interestingly of Corot in many, if not all, of his aspects, of his methods, and of his friends. He gives us also entertaining essays on the Salon in the 'thirties, on the "Sylvans and the Satirists," on Corot's preferences in art, on the famous models of the period, and other subjects that are headed by titles suitable to a poetic fancy and slightly whimsical style. The stiffer landmarks of Corot's career are not omitted; we have the facts and dates of his birth, death, parentage, achievements, and honours. Yet the picture of the man is only complete, as a picture by him is complete, that is to say, in the masses that suggest, not in the details that insist; the personality is still without photographic definition, and between the big, red-faced man and ourselves there still seems to hang a veil, like the silver mist that shadows so many of his canvases. Perhaps it is better that the veil should not be lifted—that he should remain, like his pictures, a little impalpable, a little mysterious. Else we might lose something of the charming mystery of his art, as it soared upwards to the very end.

Three weeks before his death he said to Robaut: "You have no idea of the things I could paint now. I see what I have never seen. It seems to me that I could never before have been able to make a sky. That which is before me is much rosier, profounder, more transparent. Ah, if I could show you these immense horizons!"

It was with the eyes of his artistic soul still fixed on those horizons that he died.

Letters from Abroad.

SOUTH AFRICA: THE PROBLEM OF THE NATIVE AREAS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Of the questions to be settled at the Convention now sitting at Durban, the most dangerous is undoubtedly that of the Native Protectorates. The areas at present reserved for natives aggregate, taking in both territories and small locations, about 390,000 square miles, or more than a third of the whole of British South Africa south of the Zambesi. The total native population, of which the greater number live the larger part of their time outside these areas, amounts to a little more than five millions, as against a white population of a little over eleven hundred thousand, inhabiting some 530,000 square miles. We must take into consideration that the native share of the country is less than it looks, since 275,000 square miles of it are contained in Bechuanaland, where the ground is comparatively worthless. It is the disposition of these native areas, the bulk of which lie, at present, under Imperial protection, and are governed by the British House of Commons, which will constitute the crux of the Convention. A large party will ask for the abdication of control by the Imperial authorities in favor of a central South African Government, whenever the latter can be established. A minority, who know what in such a case will happen to the natives, will object, and feeling may be expected to run high, because the majority will be aware that the minority will communicate their knowledge to the Imperial Government. Those who are familiar with South African politics can forecast easily enough what they will have to tell. It will be, in brief, that there exist three native policies in South Africa:—(1) The policy of the smallest group, of whom Mr. Fisher, the Prime Minister of Orangia, and Mr. Wyburgh, M.L.A. of the Transvaal, are outstanding members, who would respect the reserves, while denying political rights to the natives in white areas. (2) The policy of the Cape, which might or might not keep the reserves closed, but which would give the natives political rights on the same terms as the white colonists; and (3) the policy of the great majority, who believe in both breaking down the reserves and denying natives anywhere in South Africa the right either to have a vote or to own fixed property. This, the largest class, would go even further, and bring all natives, with the possible exception of a few of their clergy, under the pass law and the poll tax. The former law includes a curfew act, and forbids any native to travel out of the farm, or the town, or the location in which he happens to reside, unless by the special permission of a white man. If the reserves are handed over on the only terms which will satisfy the great majority of white South Africans, what will ensue will depend, as to its magnitude, on the form which the union of South Africa may take. If the union is federal, the Cape may save those natives who live within her present borders. But if the union takes the form of unification, the Cape policy will disappear from South Africa. No native will be allowed a vote, or to possess a yard of land in his own country. Every native will have to show that he is the servant of some white man, or if he follows a trade, it will have to be in some line or locality in which there is no possibility of his competing with white men. Education of natives will not be suffered to proceed beyond the most elementary stages, and the Government subsidy will be kept so low that even such a rudimentary instruction will be available for barely a hundredth of the colored population. To these consequences may be added that of immediate and universal rebellion on the part of the natives. They have hitherto been kept peaceful within the Cape by the liberal policy of that Colony, and beyond her borders partly by the hope that her policy would one day be extended to them, partly by the quiet enjoyment of their own lands, more or less under their tribal customs and government.

Under a Federal Government it will be possible to hand over the native territories with certain safeguards. Their present inhabitants could be guaranteed by charter the inalienable possession of their lands, not excepting even the case of rebellion. If forfeiture is allowed for rebellion, rebellion will quickly be manufactured. It would be possible to guarantee them further perpetual rights of free trade with the rest of South Africa, and their representation might be conveniently arranged for in the Federal Parliament by giving seats to European delegates in their behalf with a prescribed voting power. White South Africans would not to-day tolerate the presence of native delegates in a European Parliament. But they might agree that the vote for a native State should be, say, one-tenth of the vote for a white State of the same population, provided such vote were exercised by white men. It would be essential that the delegates for the natives States should be the nominees of the Imperial Government, either directly or through the High Commissioner. If the nominations were made by the "Governor in Council," the last persons to be appointed would be men of the stamp of Colonel Stanford, Mr. Sloley, or Sir Godfrey Lagden. Such men, though marked out by a successful record in administration, are too well known for their friendliness to the natives to be acceptable to the average South African. It would be equally important that the magistracy or commissionership of each native territory should derive its appointment from the Governor set up by the Imperial authorities, without any interference on the part of the Federal Government. There would be the greatest danger of rebellion if the natives felt they were liable to be handed over to administrators of Afrikander extraction. It is not that the Afrikanders would necessarily be bad administrators: what we have to consider is the native fear as to what they would be. And another thing to be considered is the danger that a South African Government would feel tempted sooner or later to take the administrative steps which it foresaw would create rebellion. The Europeans in South Africa will not lose their land hunger under a government which is federal instead of unified; they will simply have greater difficulty in gratifying it. At least one other precaution will be necessary. The Imperial Government must bar out in the native charters any compulsory teaching of Dutch. When union takes place the majority vote will probably be Afrikander. General Hertzog (the present Attorney-General of the Orange River Colony) has said that he will agree to no form of union in which the Dutch language does not receive precisely the same treatment as the English. We may expect, therefore, that there will arise a demand that, in all State schools within the Union, Dutch shall be a compulsory subject as well as English. But such a demand, applied to the native territories, would create instant trouble. The natives think it enough to have to learn one foreign language, and they prefer that such language shall be English.

If, instead of federating, the European colonies unify, what should be the policy of England with the native protectorates? Safeguards may be put down on paper, but, the situation being what it is above described, can there be real safeguards for the native protectorates under a Colonial Government? No doubt there will be dissatisfaction among the colonists if England so interprets her stewardship to the natives as to refuse to hand them over. On the other hand, the liberal-minded and conscientious section, a slowly increasing section, will feel and will say that such refusal is entirely just until South African ideas of native government come more into line with British ideas. And, meantime, is refusal calculated to excite more discontent than compliance would be, accompanied by irritating conditions? After all, the saner and more responsible class of South Africans do not want a large native rising on their hands—at any rate not yet. They will recognise that if Great Britain forbids them to annex or otherwise exploit the native territory, she at least protects them against invasion from that quarter. Finally, the Imperial Government have in their hands a powerful lever for bargaining on this subject. The protection of the British Navy is becoming increasingly appreciated in South Africa. If the Imperial Government intimate to the South African colonies that they must forego either the annexation of the native areas or the protection of the Navy, they may grumble, but there is no question what their choice will be.—Yours, &c.,

SOUTH AFRICAN.

Letters to the Editor.

MILITANT AND CONSTITUTIONAL ACTION: A CONTRAST.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Once again during the last fortnight there is striking evidence of the success of "militant" as against constitutional action in gaining public attention for Women's Suffrage. Newspaper writers continue to encourage the revolutionary campaign by columns of reports, large-typed headlines, snapshot pictures, and leading articles; "militant" action alone continues to produce questions in the House of Commons; while there will hardly be a home in the land where the recent doings of the "militant" suffragists will not be discussed.

Contrast the treatment which is accorded to quiet and constitutional action, and its consequent lack of effect. Last week a memorial was sent to Mr. Asquith asking him to give a clear indication of the meaning of voting qualifications for women on "democratic lines," to introduce Women's Suffrage as part of his Reform Bill this session, and to undertake that the Bill should not pass without the Women's Suffrage clauses.

This memorial was most carefully considered by leading organisations of women. It was signed not only by the National Union of Suffrage Societies, and by some of the very oldest suffrage societies dating from 1867, but by the important Union of Lancashire and Cheshire Women's Liberal Associations, by the Forward Suffrage Union (within the Women's Liberal Federation), by a great working-class organisation like the Women's Co-operative Guild with 25,000 members, by women's trade union organisations, by the Women's Labor League, by the University Teachers' Association with 1,800 members, and by individual sympathisers such as Mrs. Broadley Reid, Miss Tuckwell, Miss Margaret McMillan, Miss Julia Dawson, &c.

What attention was given to this memorial?

Mr. Asquith's reply stated that he was not in a position to say anything beyond what he said last May. The Press may almost be said to have ignored it beyond quoting Mr. Asquith's letter. The appeal was stated to come from "various suffrage societies." In the "Times" a four-inch paragraph in small type appeared, with no names. The "Daily News" put in a paragraph of less than three inches, with no names. In the "Manchester Guardian" there was about half a column with a selected list of societies signing. The "Westminster Gazette," after two or three days, condescended to an insignificant notice, with no names, and in the "Morning Leader" no mention at all of the appeal could be found. No leader or editorial comment of any kind appeared anywhere.

Neglect is the arch-enemy that Women's Suffrage has had and will have to fight. It is often now admitted that "militant" action has been useful in calling attention to the cause. But unfortunately there is little to warrant the hope that the time for such help is past. The constitutional work is what gives lasting strength and solidity to the movement, and is absolutely essential to it. But it is easy to disregard when carried on by voteless women. As far as Women's Suffrage is concerned, there is fear of Government programmes being always "full," of women being always asked "for this once" to abandon the suffrage at elections for some more "pressing" question.

Representative government made constitutional agitation the right and proper form of agitation for those who can wage war through the ballot box. And not only have men votes. They have other forces behind them. Trade unions have the weapon of the strike at their back. The unemployed have the powerful help of the Labor Party in the House of Commons and the country. And all oppressed men can, if they will, resort to revolution.

Women alone have no leverage and no "last resource," and it is the neglect to which our position lays us open which drives women to adopt what are in themselves hateful and often ludicrous methods, but which are dignified by the courage and self-sacrifice they entail. It is only too obvious that they serve the purpose of gaining attention, and though we are still told that they alienate support and put back the clock, we can only say that the hour is nearer striking than before the militant agitation began.—Yours, &c.,

MARGARET LLEWELYN DAVIES.

October 14th, 1908.

BAD HARVESTS AND UNEMPLOYMENT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The fallacy which runs all through Mr. Hobson's letter and his previous contribution on this subject is that the quantity and velocity of money is rigidly fixed. He could not otherwise say "If the same amount of money were paid for a short crop as for a normal crop it is agreed that no unemployment need be caused in other industries by a diminution in the demand for their goods." I do not agree to any such thing. It is not that the supposition appears to me absurd (as Mr. Hobson imputes to me) but that the consequence does not follow.

Let us assume a short crop realising at higher prices exactly the sum that the normal crop realises. Mr. Hobson admits some unemployment attributable to bad harvests in the reduction of employment in harvesting, carrying, &c. Surely this unemployment is independent of the price realised by the employer, and the admission disposes of the alleged agreement. The money, by hypothesis, reaches the farmer, but a portion of what should pass on actually gets no further. There is at once unemployment and lack of demand for want of buying power on the part of those thus unemployed.

For all practical purposes there is also a reduction in the quantity of money. This is the whole secret of unemployment—the money does not get round—and the whole question to be fought out is whether the artificial barriers which prevent its getting round should be removed or there should be more artificial contrivances to try and force it round. I say emphatically that these latter are so many more artificial barriers hindering and not helping.

Mr. Hobson thinks otherwise! For his contention is that we suffer from underconsumption and must find means to get more consumed. He is naturally loth to admit that a bad harvest can cause unemployment, although, as we see, he must concede the reduced employment in harvesting, &c. If a bad harvest caused unemployment that he sees would not be underconsumption, but underproduction—less production, in fact, than was hoped for.

He endeavors, however, to overleap the argument by going to the other extreme and suggesting that the evil of bad harvests, if it exists at all, has no limit. It is true that unemployment tends to increase itself by reason of the fact that the unemployed cannot buy the productions of others and thus leave the latter also without employment. But the evil is kept within bounds by a process directly contrary to that which is advocated in these times as the cure for unemployment. The workers one by one, in defiance of all artifices and arguments to the contrary, consent to accept less per unit of exertion in order to meet the conditions of the market and thus bring their prices within those at which demand exists. It is a painful process, but it will always be necessary so long as the present hindrances to production continue. The hindrances must and always will cause the dislocation. And that must be met by bringing down prices within working limits.

Nor is it true, as Mr. Hobson states, that "there is no reason to attribute to these alterations in the ratio of exchange any considerable quantity of unemployment." His "ratio of exchange" refers to goods against goods; but from one commodity to another the alteration must pass through, not only money, but price of labor in various employments and grades of employment. In every case the adjustment is made or is followed by increase or decrease of supply, and necessitates change in quantity of employment. Reductions to meet the market mean dismissals, and that there is not more unemployment is owing to the fact that the community is content to put through its production on a smaller total of money.

All this is opposed to Mr. Hobson's contention that a bad harvest producing a smaller total for agriculture will result in the non-agricultural classes having more, and the lack of employment in one trade being balanced by increased employment in others. Bad harvests result immediately in some unemployment, and that is a wave which propagates itself. The money not getting round is for practical purposes so much the less in quantity. If, on the other hand, there were a surplus of production it would offer more employment, and be the very means of creating more money. No money is so good and sound as that which is created against saleable goods actually going through the market. If the goods are not there the money will have vanished. And the assertion which, in varying terms, Mr. Hobson makes in four of the six paragraphs of his letter that it will exist for expenditure on something else is without foundation in fact—to say nothing of the loss already mentioned from dislocation.

It will be seen how senseless is the clamor for restriction of production in order to improve distribution. The inferior harvest selling for as much money as the normal one may bring the employer more profit because he has saved some cost in harvesting. But immediately the wage-earners suffer, and the wave of depression will reach the employer later. Meantime he finds more competition, but only the competition of those who control land and capital, the owners of which thus get the advantage of the scarcity. Scarcity of production is entirely in favor of the rich, never of the poor. The hope of the latter is in excess of production. But I cannot ask for space to follow this up.

Harvests short of expectations do result in some want of employment. It is not Nature, however, we need most to fear, but the artificially (and almost perpetually) bad harvests which result from untaxed land monopoly; taxes on occupation and production; locking up interest-bearing money in public debt; organised interference with prices; to say nothing of the taxes on exchange to which some would have us return. Nothing seems to me more mischievous than the present-day notion that unemployment is natural and that a Government bureau is necessary to correct the misdoings of Nature. The unnatural and unjust arrangements are responsible for the difficulty of finding profitable work. The unemployed are an effect of which the cause should be sought. It is a desolate and desolating doctrine that a Government should concentrate all its attention on the wreckage. If Governments would mind their own business, and do it with more justice and courage, we should not have to look forward as we now must to the time when they will kindly pick us out of the gutter—into which, despite good intentions towards us, they have first thrown us.—Yours, &c.,

F. U. Laycock.

Sheffield, October 14th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Many supporters of the Government will regret that Parliament should reassemble without any definite plan having been formulated for the national organisation of labor, with a view to minimising the effects of recurring waves of unemployment.

As pointed out in The Nation of the 10th inst., the failure to make effective preparations during prosperous seasons for the inevitable time of slack trade, has once more forced us upon the unprofitable round of temporary palliatives which, in the end, increase the evil they are designed to cure. Do not let us, however, again postpone our efforts for comprehensive reform until, with improvement of trade, interest in the matter once more dwindles.

The most useful plan yet made known by the Government is the training of the Special Reserve during the winter months. Cannot it be arranged that at the end of their training all men so desiring may be placed on some of those national works which have been so long promised? This would to some extent check the flooding of the labor market, besides creating employment for other men of various trades. By extending the same system to men quitting the Army and Navy, the beneficial effects upon the industrial position will be greatly enhanced, whilst the scandal of our national defenders being cast aside will be terminated. Whether the work first undertaken should be shore reclamation, afforestation, or canal improvements, Mr. Asquith, with Mr. Burns and his colleagues in the Cabinet, should surely be able to decide with little delay.

However energetic party leaders may be, it should be remembered that public opinion is the driving power which moves Ministers to action.

If the Liberals of the nation, who in this matter will receive the support of a majority of their opponents, do not immediately enforce upon their representatives the necessity for prompt action, signs are not wanting that the unemployed will take matters into their own hands to a dangerous extent. Registration offices will not fill empty stomachs. To wait for panic measures is to court irreparable disaster.—Yours, &c.,

F. Williams.

64, Brighton Road, Stoke Newington, N.,
October 13th, 1908.

THE NEWCASTLE ELECTION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—While it would be absurd to deny that the education question was before the electors at the General Election, I venture to doubt if it contributed so largely to the success of the Liberal Party as Nonconformist Liberals would have us think. The last election was a revolt more than anything else against Imperialism as it had been displayed in South Africa, and particularly in regard to Chinese labor, and it was also very largely a verdict for Free Trade. In my opinion, the education question had clearly only a very secondary influence in the verdict. Few, for instance, would deny that the great Liberal majority in Lancashire was due to the loyalty of the electors to Free Trade, and was gained not because of, but in spite of, the education question.

And while undoubtedly the Government may be said to have received a sort of mandate to remedy injustice in the schools, it would be difficult to prove that that mandate involved the establishment in the public schools of the country of a Protestant standard of religion for teachers and scholars. Many understood that while the Nonconformist grievance would be put right, it would be done rather in the way of putting all religious faiths on an equality than by imposing upon all a standard of average Protestantism, which, while it may appear a good thing to some, is to others of us not only theologically false, but also anti-social and retrogressive.

The Government seemed to interpret its mandate as if it favored ecclesiastical compulsion rather than freedom and equality to all. And this affection for ecclesiastical coercion has been displayed in other matters than education. The Government acting, it is well understood, under the influence of certain wealthy and titled Protestants, who only joined the Liberal Party on the eve of its success, has in its ecclesiastical patronage exercised a sort of boycott against High Churchmen, and consequently for the most part we have had the spectacle of a Liberal Government appointing, with few exceptions, Tory reactionaries.

The Government's sectarian prejudices have weakened its policy and cooled the enthusiasm of its friends. Nothing can excuse it for devoting its first and most precious session to a Protestant Education Bill. How different might its outlook be to-day had it used its opportunity and put the nation into possession of the land, after which it could have gone on to deal with unemployment and other deep social ills in the confidence that it had laid the foundation sure.—Yours, &c.,

An Elector.

October 14th, 1908.

VENEZUELA AND HOLLAND.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—In my letter published in your issue of the 12th of September last, I inserted the communication by which the Venezuelan Government notified the Minister of Foreign Affairs of Holland that, for the reasons therein given, President Castro had declared M. de Reús, then the Dutch Diplomatic Minister at Caracas, unfit to continue serving as the friendly medium in the relations cultivated by the two Governments, and that, accordingly, his passport was sent in order that he could leave the country. In that letter it was stated that this measure, being imposed by the pressing duty of safeguarding the national decorum, only affected M. de Reús personally, and did not alter, in the least degree, the good intelligence that happily existed between the two countries, and which Venezuela wished to maintain in the highest degree of cordiality through any other medium, who would appreciate this goodwill and would use the appropriate means, as a messenger of friendship, for the attainment of the aspirations of both Governments. The Venezuelan Government hoped that by thus limiting the aggressive conduct of M. de Reús, the Government of Her Majesty the Queen of Holland would give a spontaneous and satisfactory explanation in order to efface any suspicion that the offence given by the said Minister would be consented to by his Government.

Another communication was sent by the Venezuelan Government to the said Foreign Minister, on the 28th of the same month of July, referring to the subsequent incidents that gave M. de Reús' conduct a much graver aspect. These incidents are fully related, but to save space I only give the following résumé:—

The Dutch cruiser "Gelderland" arrived at Puerto Cabello on the 25th of July and at La Guaira on the 26th, without making the usual salute either on arrival or on departure. This omission was made more significant by the same cruiser saluting, with seven cannon shots, the Dutch Consuls at the said ports. However, the Venezuelan authorities did not interfere with M. de Reús, who departed on board of the said cruiser on the 26th enjoying all diplomatic prerogatives. At the same time, on the 25th of the same month, a scandalous attempt was made by the populace of Curazao against the Venezuelan Consul at that island. His residence was attacked, the windows were broken, stones were thrown into the house, and the escutcheon of the Consulate was wrecked. The Consul, finding his family and himself at the mercy of the mob and without due protection on the part of the local authorities, after having received all kinds of insults and even some personal injuries, entrusted the Consulate to the care of the German Consul, and left with his family on board the American steamer "Maracaibo."

This communication ends thus:—

"The gravity of the events mentioned will show Your Excellency the attitude assumed by the colony of Curazao towards the Government of Venezuela, and how such an aggressive attitude endangers the relations of friendship maintained by both countries. So by the offence given by M. de Reús to the Venezuelan Republic and Government, by the omission of saluting the national flag by the cruiser 'Gelderland,' by the attempt against the Venezuelan Consul and family at Curazao, and by the attack on the Venezuelan Consulate at that place, the Government of Venezuela is obliged to declare to the Government of Your Excellency that as long as due satisfaction and reparation are not given for these injuries and grievances, no friendly relations between the two countries can be maintained."

It appears clearly now that this unhappy misunderstanding was caused by the letter addressed from Caracas on the 9th of April last to the Commercial Association "Hou en Trouw," by M. de Reús. In this letter it is stated, amongst other unfounded assertions, that the system of government of the President is to create monopolies and afterwards to annul them under all kinds of artful pretexts, and that while the present Government exist there is no hope of a commercial improvement, because it cannot be expected that the President, after nine years of governing as almost a dictator, will change his home and international policy. M. de Reús was most cordially received by President Castro, who went so far in his desire to show his goodwill towards the new Minister that, although ailing, he anticipated his return to the city only to receive him. Besides, M. de Reús, during his four months' residence at Caracas, was treated with every social distinction and enjoyed every privilege due to his rank. So the disclosure of his disparaging statements naturally produced a bitter disappointment, and under such circumstances it was an obvious duty of President Castro to express the national displeasure by declaring that the author of the furtive letter was not a fit messenger of international goodwill.—Yours, &c.,

A. Aldana,
Consul of Venezuela

Cardiff, October 13th, 1908.

THE FUTURE OF THE POLICE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—The welfare and efficiency of the Metropolitan Police involve other questions than that of the weekly day of rest, although that is of the first importance.

At present, the men join the Force, after about one month's training, at the age of twenty or twenty-one, and after twenty-five years' service they retire from the Force, when they receive a pension of about one guinea a week. On their retirement their places are filled by recruits, who cost the public 30s. a week. The net result of the present policy is that a man aged forty-five or forty-six years, with ripe experience, in the prime of life, is replaced by a raw recruit, and the combined cost equals 51s. a week. The public loses the finished article, and is supplied with the raw material. Why is it that the police resign as soon as they have completed their twenty-five years' "approved service"? The answer is not far to seek. The expectation of life in the case of a healthy man at forty-five is twenty-two years. If he retires from the Force at the end of twenty-five years' service he receives a pension of one guinea a week for life. If he remains in the Force he may lose it for some offence which, in civil life, would be punished by a trifling penalty, whereas a policeman may be deprived of his pension, which means twenty-two times £54 12s., or £1,200, and this without reckoning either simple or compound interest. It is no wonder that the men, like boys at school, count the days until they are released from the Force. The penalty should fit the crime. The present arrangement is as cruel as it is unjust, and requires drastic modification. If the men were secured in the enjoyment of their pension after twenty-five years, they would know that their life's savings were secured for their families, and they would join on for a further period of five or ten years. If they were provided with divisional gymnasia where they could maintain their physical vigor, if they were taught how to preserve their health in all respects, and if workshops were provided where they could keep up their knowledge of any trade with which they were acquainted, they would continue to serve the public for many years in the admirable way in which our trained policemen do at present. The addition of 2s. 6d. a week would raise their pay at the end of twenty-five years to 36s. a week; the difference between this and 51s. a week which the present system involves would provide a sum which would enable the Force to enjoy a weekly day of rest with increased efficiency, and without additional cost to the public.—Yours, &c.,

J. Fletcher Little.

GREEN, AND OTHER, HEAVENS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—I read Mr. Heathfield's letter of the 10th inst. to the children referred to in your number of August 29th. Jack, who is an amusing iconoclast, "flared up" at Mr. Heathfield calling him a "horrid" boy.

"No more horrid than he is himself. His heaven is all wind and texts. I like my puffs with jam in them, and don't believe in dreams."

Charlie (the elder): "You are so jolly full of conceit that you think you could do without God or heaven altogether."

"Oh, God's all right," said Jack. "I fought Smith, minor, after the choir practice, for sneaking; and I asked God (to myself) to let me get one good one on Smith's wind, and I landed him a beauty. Smith went quite green."

Charlie: "You need not brag; your mouth looked like a gash in a pound of liver, and you had fifty lines to do."

JACK: "Ah! the doctor is a brick. He jawed a bit, and then let me off because I told the truth."

NELL: "I think you are both talking 'irrevelent,' as cook said when father swore because the soup was burnt and the lamb raw."

Mr. Heathfield's heaven has no flowers or green things in it. I wish he would tell me how he found that out.—Yours, &c.,

JOHN HIGGINS.

Pylle, Somerset,
October 12th, 1908.

"GRAMMATICALS."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your article on "Grammaticals" in the current issue is most interesting and instructive, but what is the matter with "not averse from a moderate quantity of good, sound, fruity port"?

Your writer does not say wherein lies the alleged error in the sentence. Is it possible he wishes to contend that G. A. Sala should have said "averse to"? It is difficult to believe that your writer can have meant that, seeing that in his very next sentence he points out the error of "different to."

Please explain what is meant and why.—Yours, &c.,

PERCY BRABY.

Dacre House, Arundel Street,
Strand, London, W.C.,
October 12th, 1908.

[My apologies to the shade of Mr. Sala, to whose rescue Mr. Braby so properly comes. I fancied, very carelessly, that I was writing "averse to"—or rather, that Mr. Sala had written it. Even with the proof under my eyes, I read "averse from" as "averse to," and was sorry for Mr. Sala's memory. "Averse from" is, of course, correct.—THE WRITER OF THE ARTICLE.]

THE PUBLICAN'S LIFE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Now that the Licensing Bill is coming on again in a few days for the final fight, may I call attention to a point of view to which I do not remember seeing any prominence given? This is the very precarious nature of the publican's life. When a man obtains a licence, and proceeds to carry on the business of a publican, he has invested his money in a way in which he has a much smaller prospect than in any other, of a prolonged enjoyment of the result. By the law of averages his lease will be a short one, and the length of the lease is always an important element in the value of its purchase. The State, in granting him the licence is, no doubt, in honor bound not to arbitrarily snatch away the licensee's livelihood, but is equally in justice bound to the public to take into account the hazardous nature of his tenure of it.

No doubt the leading temperance organisations have statistics as to the actual prospects of the publican's life, and to what extent it falls short of that of the ordinary citizen. The writer could cite many striking instances in confirmation of this view, but not in statistical form. The fourteen years term seems more than ample from the point of view of equity.—Yours, &c.,

F. W. LOCKWOOD.

September 28th, 1908.

TWO DAYS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—On the first of two days I was one of a "bench of magistrates" who tried a "dock of miners" for cock fighting, Mr. —— presiding. The police evidence was that the birds were much knocked about and covered with blood. The proof was ample, and we had simply to determine the punishment in each case. Mr. —— wished imprisonment without the option of a fine; the majority voted for the alternative, and fine or imprisonment it was. That ended the day's proceedings.

On a following day I was an invited guest at an otter hunt organised by Mr. ——'s keepers. We met on the lawn in the early morning, a merry company, with a preponderance of young ladies. After a walk of over two miles we arrived at the spot where the gamekeeper expected to find the quarry. He, however, drew a blank, and we proceeded down stream. After wading through grass and weeds, waist deep and dripping with dew, for half a mile or more, the dogs gave tongue. Once or twice I got a glimpse of a brown creature rushing from one bit of cover to another, to be again forced into the open. When, sore pressed in the water and under the banks, it tried to break through the circle of laughing and shouting humans who surrounded the pool, one aimed a walking stick at it and hit it over the back. It limped back towards the water, to receive a blow from a young lady's cane as it went down the bank. A dog seized it, but with a cry of pain it snapped back and was free once more. Not for long. Its strength was exhausted, and at intervals it gave short, low moans. It was at last seized by two or three dogs, when it closed its eyes and gave up the fight. Its pads were cut off, and the first given to the lady whose cane had disfigured its nose.

We returned to lunch, and discussed our successful hunt with much gusto.

In the following issue of the local journal the following paragraphs appeared in close proximity:—

"WELL-MERITED PUNISHMENT."

"On —— a group of miners appeared before the local magistrates charged with cock-fighting. The evidence was conclusive, and our only regret is that they were given the option of a fine. Such inhuman brutes ought to be imprisoned with a severe application of the cat."

"SUCCESSFUL OTTER HUNT.

"Last —— Mr. ——'s hounds were out on the —— and had a most exciting day. There was a brilliant company present who afterwards lunched at ——. A large dog otter was killed and gave exceedingly fine sport. It almost baffled the hunters and was game to the last. This is but one of many acts of kindness on the part of Mr. —— in giving a number of our prominent townsmen an opportunity of taking part in manly and exciting sport."

Who were the more inhuman—the miners, or we who had been educated in public schools and universities?—Yours, &c.,

PUZZLED.

October 13th, 1908.

Poetry.

OCTOBER.

ΕΝ ΔΕ ΦΑΕΙ ΚΑΙ ΟΛΕΣΣΟΝ.

THE leaves have an odour of death
As they hang in the sun;
The autumn vapours ascend,
Overclouding their gold:
Not a stir, not a sigh, not a breath,
As they drop one by one;
And we bring our year to an end,
Like a tale that is told.

We are strangers and sojourners here,
O God, before Thee,
As our fathers were; and the light
Of our days is but doubt:
O yet, in the respite of fear,
Deal mercifully,
That we may take note of the night
Before we go out.

R. C. K. ENSOR.

The World of Books.

THURSDAY NIGHT.

FOLLOWING the example of Mr. John Lane, whose English edition of Anatole France is proving a great success, Messrs. Routledge have planned a translation of Sainte-Beuve, and the first volume of the "Causeries du Lundi" will be published shortly. The project is an interesting one and deserves to succeed, for, considering his eminence as a critic, it is remarkable that there is such a fragmentary portion of Sainte-Beuve's work within the reach of English readers, and even what there is has not been very satisfactorily rendered. William Sharp translated a selection from the essays, and the late Miss Katherine Wormeley published four volumes of "Portraits of the Seventeenth Century," and "Portraits of the Eighteenth Century," mostly extracted from the "Portraits Littéraires"—the least characteristic and interesting of Sainte-Beuve's writings. It is to be hoped that Messrs. Routledge's plan will receive enough support to enable them, at the least, to complete the "Causeries du Lundi."

* * *

THOSE wonderful volumes, in all probably the most solid contribution ever made to criticism by a single writer, are the result of twenty years' journalistic effort. In 1849 Sainte-Beuve returned to Paris, after lecturing for a year at the University of Liège, and found himself with plenty of ideas, but without any regular employment. Dr. Véron, who then edited the "Constitutionnel," asked him to contribute a literary essay to that paper each Monday, and Sainte-Beuve accepted willingly. The engagement continued until 1860, and resulted in the fourteen volumes of "Causeries du Lundi.' In 1861 he began again, and the "Nouveaux Lundis," running to thirteen additional volumes, were continued in the "Moniteur" and the "Temps." Sainte-Beuve's relations with his editors were not always happy, as witness his famous duel with Dubois of the "Globe" when the critic insisted on fighting under an open umbrella, "I may be shot," said he, "but I will not be drowned." Although these twenty-eight volumes form little more than half of what Sainte-Beuve left behind him, no one ever complained that he has written too much. On the contrary, most of his readers will agree with Mr. Balfour, who once said that in the whole range of literature there is no more entertaining writer to take up during a spare half-hour than Sainte-Beuve.

* * *

To the number of writers, ranging from Voltaire and Gibbon to Dumas and Mr. Andrew Lang, who have attempted to enlighten the mystery of the Man in the Iron Mask, must now be added the name of Monsignor Barnes, a Roman Catholic dignitary to whom we already owe several volumes dealing with Papal history. Gibbon decided that the famous prisoner was the child of Anne of Austria and Cardinal Mazarin. Mr. Andrew Lang seems to reject this and various other theories, but he offers no new solution. Monsignor Barnes approaches the subject from a fresh standpoint, and after an independent search through the historical records he believes that he has found evidence sufficient to identify the prisoner with a personage who was at once the son of an English king, a member of the Society of Jesus, an agent of the French Government, and a tipster on Newmarket Heath. This curious theory is propounded in a book called "The Man in the Mask: A Study in the Bye-ways of History," which Messrs. Smith, Elder have in the press.

* * *

THE first complete history of the Medici family that has ever been written is promised by Mr. Murray for the present season. The book, which has been written by Colonel G. T. Young, covers more than three centuries, since it traces the progress of the family from the rise of the Medici in 1400 to their end in 1743. The story is an interesting one from many different points of view. The Medici hold a unique position for the influence they exerted so long over the affairs of Europe. Leo X. and Clement VII. were members of the family, and nearly every existing building or work of art in Florence is in some way connected with it. Colonel Young has gathered together much fresh information concerning the artistic, social, and political life of the period, so that the book is likely to have importance as a contribution to history.

* * *

A NEW series of historical biographies, called "Makers of National History," is to be issued by the firm of Sir Isaac Pitman & Sons. The object of the series, which will be under the general editorship of the Rev. W. H. Hutton, is to present biographies of a number of great Englishmen whose part in the making of our national history is at present in danger of being under-estimated. The first four volumes to appear are "Cardinal Beaufort," by the Rev. L. B. Radford; "Castlereagh," by Mr. Arthur Hassall; "Archbishop Parker," by Mr. W. M. Kennedy; and "Francis Atterbury," by Canon Beeching. All four subjects are rather off the beaten track, and the series will be a useful one if, as it promises, it directs attention to neglected aspects of English history.

* * *

AMONG Messrs. Mowbray's autumn books is "Charlotte Mary Yonge," by Mrs. Ethel Romanes, who has been helped in its preparation by many of Miss Yonge's friends. Messrs. Macmillan are issuing a shilling edition of Miss Yonge's novels, but it can hardly be doubted that her vogue has greatly declined. Mr. Herbert Paul described her as the spiritual mother of Mrs. Humphry Ward, and though we are sure both writers would deny the relationship, they are at one in their determination to treat serious subjects with no unbecoming levity. But despite their rather aggressive piety, Miss Yonge's novels make better reading than those who have not read them may be inclined to believe.

* * *

MESSRS. MACMILLAN will issue early in November a new edition of Messrs. Rowntree and Sherwell's work on "The Taxation of the Liquor Trade." The statistics will be brought up to date, and the authors answer some of the chief criticisms passed upon their work when it first appeared two years ago.

* * *

WE have received too late for insertion in last week's supplement a list of autumn announcements from Messrs. Maunsel, of Dublin. It includes an English translation by Mr. T. M. Kettle, M.P., of M. Paul Dubois' "L'Ireland Contemporaine"—an admirable book on Ireland and the Irish problems of the present day, which we reviewed on June 1st, 1907; "When the Dawn has Come," a play by Mr. Thomas MacDonagh that has been well received at the Irish Theatre; a collection of seven short plays by Lady Gregory; and books of verse by Mr. Shane Leslie and Mr. James H. Cousins.

* * *

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

"The Journal of Elizabeth, Lady Holland." Edited by the Earl of Ilchester. (Longmans. 2 vols. 21s. net.)

"Venice." Part III., "The Decadence." By Pompeo Molmenti. Translated by Horatio F. Brown. (Murray. 2 vols. 21s. net.)

"Memorials of Two Sisters: Susanna and Catherine Winkworth." Edited by Margaret J. Shaen. (Longmans. 10s. 6d. net.)

"The Latins in the Levant." By William Miller. (Murray. 21s. net.)

"The Girlhood of Mary, Queen of Scots." By Jane T. Stoddart. (Hodder & Stoughton. 12s. net.)

"Lorenzo the Magnificent." By E. L. S. Horsburgh. (Methuen. 15s. net.)

"Forty Years of Music." By Joseph Bennett. (Methuen 16s. net.)

"Chateau and Country Life in France." By Mary King Waddington. (Smith Elder. 10s. 6d. net.)

"Venetia and Northern Italy." By C. Headlem. (Dent. 7s. 6d. net.)

"Painting in the Far East." By Laurence Binyon. (Arnold. 21s. net.)

"The Mistress Art." By Reginald Blomfield. (Arnold. 5s. net.)

"The Autumn Garden." By Edmund Gosse. (Heinemann. 5s. net.)

"The Spy." By Maxim Gorky. (Duckworth. 6s.)

"Salthaven." By W. W. Jacobs. (Methuen. 6s.)

"Mathieu de Montmorency et Madame de Staël." Par Paul Gautier. (Paris: Plon-Nourrit. 3 fr. 50.)

"Nepomucène Lemercier et ses Correspondants." Par M. Souriau. (Paris: Vuibert et Nony. 3 fr. 50.)

"Das Drama Richard Wagners." Von H. Chamberlain. (Leipzig: Härtel. M. 3.)

Reviews.

BY THE WATERS OF BABYLON.*

THERE is a spirit of exile with which some men are born. Though they may not quit the few fields or streets of their birthplace, they dwell in perpetual banishment, and the yearning for their country is never still. They move about the common world as natives of a land which they have never seen with bodily eyes, but they feel for it the same desire as Ulysses felt when, in the midst of kings' palaces or the enchantments of a lovely witch, he longed always to see the smoke leaping up from Ithaca.

Such people are to be found among ourselves, though, as a rule, like newly-landed Jews, they try to conceal their alien patriotism by imitating the prevailing language and manner, sometimes with success. But in Ireland they have never been uncommon, and are freely recognised. They are often said to be "swept"—possessed by the fairy spirits that are heard in the wind and linger round the Druid stones and unrecorded burial places, always ready to woo away any beautiful youth or girl who may sleep there unawares, and to take their spirit back to its proper home. The Irish have even named this ancestral country of the soul, and given it a shifting place. It is in the West, under the sunset, like all things of longing; for, indeed, if Ireland herself had been set on the German Ocean side of England, with what different feelings her people would have regarded her! And for a name they sometimes call it Tirnanóg, the land of the young, and sometimes Hi Brazil—islands like the Greek Islands of the Blessed, where is the great Achilles. And, as is well known, these islands become visible from time to time at sunset, and then the people of Aran and Achill and the west coast push off their little boats, carrying fire; for if once you could put fire on the islands they would stay and man would live again in his spirit's home:—

> "Where nobody gets old and crafty and wise,
> Where nobody gets old and godly and grave,
> Where nobody gets old and bitter of tongue,
> And where kind tongues bring no captivity."

William Blake dwelt in this, his native country, nearly all his waking life, and he sometimes used for it the symbol of Jerusalem, the city which he would build in England's green and pleasant land. Wordsworth visited it from time to time, like a child going for a joyful holiday to mountains or the sea. Shelley—but his worshippers have made such a fool of Shelley that we dare not speak of him. Mr. Yeats is now the spirit in exile, and in many a poem and drama he has told of that Land of Heart's Desire, the Danaan land to which Niamh on a fairy horse bore the last of the Fenian Knights, the Innisfree of the soul, the Happy Townland which is the world's bane:—

> "The little fox he murmured,
> 'O what of the world's bane?'
> The sun was laughing sweetly,
> The moon plucked at my rein;
> But the little red fox murmured,
> 'O do not pluck at his rein,
> He is riding to the townland,
> That is the world's bane.'"

The sorrow of exile lies upon such spirits, for among the alien bitterness and disgusts of the world they know that their native country is still in existence, if only they could reach it. "If only they who live in the Golden Age could die," says the Celtic Twilight, "we might be happy, for the sad voices would be still." "Far from my heavenly home," even English congregations sing on Sunday evenings before they go back to supper, and while they are singing some of the people feel how bitter a thing it is to sit by the waters of Babylon. But we think that Mr. Yeats himself is far happier than others in having an earthly home as well, to which he can turn the longings of an exile. Just as an Irish poet of Elizabeth's time so sang of the Black Rose, that the most treacherous English spy could not distinguish whether he sang of his lover or his country; and as Mangan sang of Ireland under the similitude of the Dark Rosaleen whose holy delicate white hands should girdle him with steel; so to Mr. Yeats the exile's longing for the spirit's home is at times almost indistinguishably mingled with the symbolic rose of his country—"Red Rose, proud Rose, sad Rose of all my days." It is thus in his invocation "To the Rose upon the Rood of Time," that he calls to the Red Rose to come near:—

> "Come near, that no more blinded by moving fate,
> I find under the boughs of love and hate,
> In all poor foolish things that live a day,
> Eternal Beauty wandering on her way."

In Irish legend and history Mr. Yeats has found the same kind of witchery, the same kind of symbolism for unreal and eternal things, as Rossetti and his attendant poets and painters sought in the legends and history of the Middle Ages. And he has endowed them with a finer vitality, because they belong to him more truly as his national heritage, and are further tinged with the sunset lights of exile and the crimson of indignation. "Know," he says, in the lines at the end of "The Rose":—

> "Know, that I would accounted be,
> True brother of that company,
> Who sang to sweeten Ireland's wrong,
> Ballad and story, rann and song;
>
> * * *
>
> Nor may I less be counted one
> With Davis, Mangan, Ferguson,
> Because to him who ponders well,
> My rhymes more than their meaning tell
> Of the dim wisdoms old and deep,
> That God gives unto man in sleep."

We cannot tell how far Mr. Yeats is right in attempting other themes than the enchantments of the Sidhe and the dim wisdoms old and deep. In his later essays he has told us his task now is to discover how he can make his work mean something to vigorous and simple men. And, again, he says he has turned from his faery lyrics to the drama, "in search for more of manful energy, more of cheerful acceptance of whatever arises out of the logic of events, and for clear outline, instead of those outlines of lyric poetry that are blurred with desire and vain regret." We cannot say. Ultimately, a great artist only works for himself, and he will take his own course. We would only remind him of what he says a wise woman in her trance once told him in symbolic words easy to understand—that his inspiration was from the moon, and that he should always live close to water There is also that saying of his that poetry and romance can only be made by looking into the little, infinite, faltering, eternal flame that one calls oneself. And, again, "when one looks into the darkness there is always something there."

But even a collected edition does not mean the end of a true poet's work, and Mr. Yeats is still in his best years. We do not doubt that many new possibilities and great adventures lie before him—adventures, it may be, in the common world and the daily life that all men live. But, here, in these volumes, at all events, stands the poet Yeats we have known, the master of the magic world, the man who has lived upon "the phantom verge of things," the singer who could sing with the poignancy of a double exile. Here is the most "rapt" of modern poets, possessed also of an exquisite humor not uncommon in fairies, and tinged, as we said, by that deep crimson of indignation which is the inheritance of all Irishmen and of all exiles. Who but the Irish could make such a street ballad as that on their Transvaal Brigade, containing the lines:—

> "Oh, mother of the wounded breast!
> Oh, mother of the tears!
> The sons you loved and trusted best,
> Have grasped their battle spears."

And, as to exiles, let us remember that the Psalm, "Super flumina Babylonis," which begins with such profound tenderness of longing, ends with a supreme cry for vengeance: "O, daughter of Babylon, wasted with misery, happy shall he be that rewardeth thee as thou hast served us. Blessed shall he be that taketh thy children and dasheth them against the stones." But one does not need to be in Babylon to know the wrath and longing of exiles. For there is a spirit of exile with which some men are born, and even in their own native country they do not escape the torment of its savage indignation.

* "W. B. Yeats's Collected Works." Vol. I. and II.; to be completed in 8 volumes. Bullen, Stratford-on-Avon. Chapman & Hall, London. £4 4s. the set.

THE SHIFTY DUMOURIEZ.*

Carlyle's description of Dumouriez, in his "French Revolution," is well known; his insight into human characteristics was superb, and that word "shifty" remains, even to-day, the best description of the victor of Jemappes. There is nothing in this fine volume of more than 500 pages to shake the accuracy of Carlyle's verdict, although our authors permit a thread of apology to run through their otherwise entirely admirable effort to revive the memory of a famous character and a great historic period.

Only one really creditable story—it is not to be found in the book before us—do we know of Dumouriez: it is that, after the battle of Waterloo had been fought and won, he met one of the émigrés in Piccadilly, and that both men burst into tears at the news. No Englishman, however much that he may rejoice at the triumph for his own country, would wish that this story were other than true; but somehow one suspects the tears of Dumouriez. There are no impulses towards honest patriotism in his nature as recorded by his present biographers; and, in fact, the view taken by Robert Burns in well-known lines remains the best criticism of the man to-day:—

"You're welcome to despots, Dumouriez;
You're welcome to despots, Dumouriez;
How does Dampiere do?
Ay, and Bournonville, too?
Why did they not come along with you, Dumouriez?

I will fight France with you, Dumouriez;
I will fight France with you, Dumouriez;
I will fight France with you,
I will take my chance with you;
By my soul, I'll dance with you, Dumouriez.

Then let us fight about, Dumouriez;
Then let us fight about, Dumouriez;
Then let us fight about,
Till freedom's spark is out,
Then we'll be damn'd, no doubt, Dumouriez."

Burns and all on this side of the Channel spelt it "Dumourier," and that name was on every tongue at the time. Our authors suggest that an antagonistic biography by one Pigott was responsible for Burns's view of Dumouriez, but we need only read the friendly estimates of the time to appraise Dumouriez much as Burns and every lover of freedom should. Translations of his Memoirs came out apace in 1794 and 1795. Two of them are before us—one by Fenwick in the former year, one by Moore in the latter. In each case the editor's eulogy is followed by Dumouriez's estimate of his own achievements. Very rhapsodical, very egotistical, and, on the whole, very dull, are these "Memoirs," although occasionally relieved by amusing episodes, as when the Revolutionary Army demurred, in its anxiety for perfect equality, to assigning the title of "Citizen-General" to its leader, instead of merely "Citizen." On the whole, we think Burns had only needed to read Dumouriez's own "Memoirs" to have written of him as he did.

Our authors seem to have been led to write this book because one of them, Mr. Broadley, found among his innumerable treasures of the Revolutionary and Napoleonic periods a manuscript volume containing Dumouriez's plans for saving England from invasion. They have printed this manuscript in the body of their book, but it is its least interesting section, and of merely academic importance to-day. They have wisely enshrined it in a biography of Dumouriez, none the less welcome because it is an apology for that unworthy adventurer. If anyone shares with the editors the opinion that the Dumouriez manuscript is a gem, many more will recognise that the casket is much more valuable than the gem.

We do not complain that the book before us takes the lines of a whole-hearted apology for Dumouriez. That was a sportsmanlike proceeding. We read the apologists of, let us say, Nero and Henry VIII. without conviction, but they have given us books more readable than most historians. The lack of a really judicial attitude has saved our authors from dulness. It is not essential that a great man should be a hero to his valet, but it is all-important that he should be a hero to his biographer. Was Dumouriez a great man? Was he not rather a man of mediocre talents raised by an accident of the moment to a pinnacle from which he speedily fell? That is surely how we may read the story of his early days, when his sword is offered through Europe, freely, indiscriminately; that is how we may interpret his career at the victories of Valmy and Jemappes and during the long exile.

It is not thus that his present biographers think of Dumouriez. They tell us:—

> "They have deemed it an act of tardy justice to portray his services to his country and to England in all their magnitude and versatility; they have also sought carefully to analyse the motives which actuated him at the crisis of his career; and, finally, they have called attention to the generosity and wisdom of his aims alike for France and for humanity at large."

When we turn to the narrative which professes to record these services to France and to humanity we fail to find them, and the claim set forth reduces itself to empty rhetoric. We find a self-seeking, unpatriotic citizen, inspired only by vanity or by mercenary motives. The picture of him, on the return of the Bourbons, "cadging"—there is no other word—for pensions from the Austrian and the French Governments with equal impartiality is not inspiring. We believe that the instinct of our British race, as a whole, when the struggle in which we are engaged is over, is more healthy and chivalrous than that of Dumouriez's apologists. We recall, for example, the enthusiastic reception of one of Napoleon's generals, Marshal Soult, when he appeared in England at Queen Victoria's Coronation, and we are much more proud of this than of our employment of Dumouriez for many years as the betrayer of his country.

After this point of view is emphasised, we have nothing but praise. It is true we would gladly have surrendered the hundred pages devoted to Mr. Broadley's newly-discovered pamphlet had it been replaced by more details of Dumouriez's life. Still, there is a thoroughness about the work as a whole that commands commendation. Well nigh all existing documents and published books upon the subject seem to have been drawn upon; there is a valuable bibliography, an iconography even more precious, and many interesting illustrations. The book must assuredly take its place as a standard work upon one phase of an epoch of inexhaustible interest.

* "Dumouriez and the Defence of England Against Napoleon." By J. Holland Rose, Litt.D., and A. M. Broadley. Lane. 21s. net.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF POLITICS.*

It is plainly not a valid reproach that

> "There was never yet philosopher
> That could endure the toothache patiently,"

—toothache being so plainly irrevelant to the business of life. But there is some force in the reproach that professed philosophers so seldom write philosophically on politics. Hegel and Spencer, to take two opposed types, alike fail to transcend their mere bias; and when they make a special effort to do so, they are apt to get out of sight of the problem. Spinoza succeeds better than Hobbes and Berkeley and Hume; and Kant holds out hopes of higher achievement; but the ideal political philosopher has yet to come. It is therefore with a hopeful interest that one turns to a volume by Professor Seth Pringle-Pattison, entitled "The Philosophical Radicals and other Essays." He has much of the philosophical temper, with abundant philosophical culture; he has the faculty of learning from his predecessors; and he is here dealing with thinkers who, as he remarks, "have passed into the region of history." His main essay, accordingly, is on the whole a thoughtful and instructive survey. Yet he incurs some of the usual demurrers.

Half the trouble in the strifes of philosophy arises out of a loose use of terms; and we find Professor Pringle-Pattison writing thus: "Unadulterated selfishness as the motive, universal benevolence as the end—these are the two fixed poles of Bentham's thought." The word "unadulterated" here is highly misleading, if not strictly meaningless. The accurate term would have been the one commonly used by the Utilitarians—"enlightened." It stood for the proposition that selfishness is modified by the recognition of social reciprocity. A need for disparagement, albeit balanced by a concern for fairness, seems to be the explanation of the Professor's form of phrase; as again of his remark that the philosophical principles of the early Radicals were "in themselves neither very original nor very profound." The same thing might as truly be said of the Golden Rule; but, if anyone should so apply the phrase, Professor Pringle-Pattison's tone to them would not be sympathetic.

* "The Philosophical Radicals, and other Essays, with Chapters reprinted on the Philosophy of Religion in Kant and Hegel." By Professor A. Seth Pringle-Pattison. Blackwood. 6s. net.

Even when he is quite dispassionate, however, the Professor at times oddly misses the philosophical attitude, as when he writes that Macaulay's denunciation of the Utilitarians, though unjust, "is a wholesome reminder of the fate that awaits any extreme party in English politics." Why "English"? Do extreme parties elsewhere contrive to be at once extreme and permanent? The implication is either that the Benthamites, because of their extremeness, were uninfluential, or that their party, on that account, was short-lived. But extremists are fairly often influential. The Tory Party in the early eighteens was extreme, and Cobbett was extreme. And Mr. Pringle-Pattison has cited with apparent assent Mr. Kent's verdict that "the uprising of the Philosophical Radicals was the greatest force of a purely speculative kind that had ever been felt in English politics, and nothing ever did so much to democratise our institutions." He makes no attempt to indicate what, after this generalisation, he means by saying that after 1832 "the Utilitarians were more or less lost in the crowd."

In the terms of the case the extreme, recognised as such, is not as a rule the power-that-is; but no less obviously it often tends to modify the power that is, in which case impermanence is the characteristic alike of the extreme and the popular. The Chartists in their turn were "extreme" relatively to the Benthamites, and they, too, were impermanent as a party; but they set up a movement which continuously modified Liberalism, so that Liberal doctrine in turn meets the "fate" of impermanence which it in turn inflicts on Conservative doctrine. All politics, in fact, is a process of readjustment. Mr. Pringle-Pattison justly says that, thanks largely to Spencer, the idea of evolution has "passed into the fibre of our thinking"; but the charge which he brings against Spencer, of being often at a pre-evolutionary standpoint, is no less justly to be addressed to himself.

At the close of the essay under notice, he sums up that "Philosophical Radicalism was, in short, essentially a negative and critical movement, and its strength departed from it just in proportion as its critical attack was successful." This is very like saying that a general's strength departs from him when he secures peace, or a doctor's when he achieves a cure. If it be meant for disparagement, what political party has ever earned praise? The truth is that Professor Pringle-Pattison too often handles such terms as "constructive" and "negative" and "critical" in a non-philosophical fashion which, if assented to, would cancel any claim to approbation on behalf of his own essays, to every one of which the terms in question would be fatally applicable.

True, he makes one professed stand for a kind of ethical Universalism when he affirms that "the cohesion of the race is secured by organic instincts which reach deep down beneath any such antithesis" as that between Benevolence and Prudence. Quoting as "fine words" a piece of rhetoric of Lord Rosebery's (not visibly related to his lordship's recent platform and Parliamentary eloquence), he goes on to accuse the Utilitarians of being "strangely blind" to the "vast process of unconscious reason" represented by the general deed of man. Here we are well inside the Hegelian void. By Mr. Pringle-Pattison's own showing the Utilitarians were at least part of the process of "unconscious reason," which, according to him and Lord Rosebery, acts on the whole with "pure and splendid purpose," and plainly exhibits "the finger of the Divine." Yet he proceeds thus further with his incongruous censure:—

> "Every abuse they attacked appeared to them due to some 'sinister interest,' which had called it into being originally, and now opposed its removal. A little historical sense might have taught them that in many cases, perhaps in most, what had become an abuse had begun by serving a useful purpose, while its persistence after its usefulness had ceased was often due more to the forces of inertia, and even to a mistaken but intelligible sense of loyalty, than to any definitely sinister interest on the part of individuals or classes."

Here there is only the semblance of a philosophic analysis. The "definitely sinister" is on a par with the "unadulterated" of the passage before cited. It is a reduction of terms to nullity. The Utilitarians saw the nature of abuses and the forces of inertia as such just as clearly as does Mr. Pringle-Pattison, and they explicitly named them. When they used the term "sinister interest," they avowedly had in view normally that stress of self-interest which can recognise no claim of a conflicting interest. They did not accuse anybody of preferring to do what he saw to be wrong. But even if they had, in what respect would they have been more inexcusable, on Mr. Pringle-Pattison's own principles, than the "merely" inert and mistaken people? Is it that men become "definitely sinister" and "strangely blind" only when they apply to the Conservative goose the sauce it had prepared for the Radical gander?

Perhaps the best service Mr. Pringle-Pattison's essay can render is to bring home to typical Conservatives some sense of the strength of their opponents' case without so far disturbing their self-complacency as to provoke them to mere obstinacy. And that is not the highest sort of philosophical praise. It amounts to saying that he is no more in advance of his day than the Philosophical Radicals were of theirs, though he may be—what is less difficult—in advance of them. His critical faculty is better exhibited in his essays on other themes, such as those on Spencer and Martineau; or better still, in his critiques of contemporary philosophical critics; and best of all in the reprints in this volume of his essays on the Hegelian and Kantian philosophies of religion. Even in his better work, indeed, he at times lapses to a lower plane, as when he assumes to dispose of a mass of early Darwinian thinking by calling it "turbid," when he is actually demonstrating the turbidity of the thought which he is by way of treating respectfully. One is at times tempted to adopt his device, and pronounce the verdict of "turbid" on his own performance, which in truth does not attain perfect lucidity. But philosophy is not to be advanced by such a mere retorting of epithets. Our Professor is in truth a meritorious and helpful thinker; and in his critique of "Mr. Kidd on Western Civilisation" he does very faithful and useful "critical" work, with just an occasional sop to Cerberus. The most "negative" judgment that the essay tends to set up is that the vogue of Mr. Kidd's simple sophistries is so large as it is partly because the professors of philosophy before him had so imperfectly risen to their sociological task.

A NOVELIST AND ANOTHER.*

In "Over Bemerton's" we pass quickly from the discovery that the book is not a novel to gratitude to the author that it is something else. It is certainly a tribute to Mr. Lucas that we should be willing to quit all demands for a story, for the interplay of characters and for the development of a situation in return for a sequence of charmingly delicate observations and reflections on life. But so it is. The elderly hero of fifty-five, Mr. Falconer, who comes to lodge over Bemerton's bookshop in Westminster, is obviously a mere alias for the essayist, but, far from feeling any disappointment at this, we shake him by the hand all the more heartily. The truth is that we are captivated from the first page by "Mr. Falconer's" quiet humor, his modesty of tone, and the genuineness of his outlook. He invites us to sit and dine with him at an unassuming table, but everything offered to us, from the salt of his wit to the flavor of his wine, is excellent. The secret, perhaps, of the book's charm lies in the artful variety and contrast of the people and things it discusses. We pass easily from Mrs. Duckie, the retired cook and landlady, whose son, Alf Pinto, is a famous music-hall singer, and earns (Mr. Lucas slyly adds) the income of the President of the Local Government Board, to the Wynne household at Queen Anne's Gate, with the charming Naomi, Drusilla the suffragette, Lionel the county cricketer, Frank the journalist, and the "agreeable, ornamental person," Mr. Dollie Heatcote. In the character of Mr.

* "Over Bemerton's." By E. V. Lucas. Methuen. 6s.
"Halfway House." By Maurice Hewlett. Chapman & Hall.

MR. MURRAY'S NEW BOOKS.

THE LIFE OF HENRY PELHAM, FIFTH DUKE OF NEWCASTLE

Secretary of State for the Colonies, 1852-54 and 1859-64, and Secretary of State for War, 1852-55. By JOHN MARTINEAU, Author of "The Life of Sir Bartle Frere." With Portraits. Demy 8vo., 12s. net.

BALDASSARE CASTIGLIONE,

THE PERFECT COURTIER.
HIS LIFE AND LETTERS.

By JULIA CARTWRIGHT (Mrs. Ady),
Author of "Isabella D'Este," "Madame," &c.
With numerous Portraits and other Illustrations.
Demy 8vo. 2 Vols. 30s. net. [Ready next week.

A MARINER OF ENGLAND.

An Account of the Career of William Richardson, from Cabin Boy in the Merchant Service to Warrant Officer in the Royal Navy (1780 to 1817), told in his own words. Edited by Colonel SPENCER CHILDERS, R.E., C.B. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

FROM RUWENZORI TO THE CONGO.

A Naturalist's Journey Across Africa. By A. F. R. WOLLASTON. With Maps and numerous Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 15s. net.

THE INNER LIFE OF THE UNITED STATES.

By Monsignor Count VAY DE VAYA AND LUSKOD, Author of "Empires and Emperors." Demy 8vo, 12s. net.

THE LATINS IN THE LEVANT:

A History of Frankish Greece (1204-1566). By WILLIAM MILLER. With Maps. Medium 8vo, 21s. net.

COLLECTIVISM.

A Study of some of the leading Social questions of the day. By PAUL LEROY-BEAULIEU, Member of the Institute and Professor of the College of France. Abridged and translated by Sir ARTHUR CLAY, Bart. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

THE COMMERCIAL PRODUCTS OF INDIA.

BEING AN ABRIDGEMENT OF "THE DICTIONARY OF THE ECONOMIC PRODUCTS OF INDIA."

By Sir GEORGE WATT, C.I.E., M.B., LL.D.
Medium 8vo, 16s. net. [Ready next week

NOW COMPLETE. Vol. 3 Just Out.

HISTORY OF VENICE.

ITS INDIVIDUAL GROWTH FROM THE EARLIEST BEGINNINGS TO THE FALL OF THE REPUBLIC.

By POMPEO MOLMENTI.
Translated by HORATIO F. BROWN,
Author of "Life on the Lagoons," &c., &c.
3 Parts (2 Vols. to each Part). Demy 8vo, 21s. net each Part.
PART I.—Venice in the Middle Ages.
PART II.—Venice in the Golden Age.
PART III.—The Decadence of Venice.

"Every page in the book is full of curious knowledge, communicated without the slightest affectation or air of teaching. . . . The erudition is as amazing as ever. . . . The work is a continuous and fascinating narrative, a series of brilliant pictures, which show no trace of studio's toil. It would be impertinent to praise Mr. Horatio Brown's translation. Suffice it to say that he has turned good Italian into graceful English."—The Spectator.

New Novel by the Author of "The Hill," "Brothers," &c.

THE WATERS OF JORDAN.

By HORACE ANNESLEY VACHELL. 6s.

Alfred Ollivant's New Novel.

THE GENTLEMAN.

A Romance of the Sea. By Author of "Owd Bob," "Danny," "Redcoat Captain," &c. 6s.

THE QUARTERLY REVIEW.

No. 417. OCTOBER, 1908. 6s.

1. Agricultural Co-operation. By "Home Counties."
2. The First Earl of Chatham. By C. G. Robertson.
3. Medieval Sport. By W. A. Baillie-Grohman.
4. The Inns of Court. By C. E. A. Bedwell.
5. Vagrants, Beggars and Tramps. By John Cooke.
6. Municipal Trade. By Major Darwin.
7. Some Impressions of South Africa.
8. The Presidential Election in the United States. Professor McLean (Toronto).
9. Our Endangered Sea-Supremacy.
10. The Origin of Tragedy. By Professor Ridgeway.
11. John Delane and Modern Journalism.
12. Compensation and the Licensing Bill.
13. The German Peril. A Rejoinder to Prince Bülow.

JOHN MURRAY, Albemarle Street, W.

MR. EVELEIGH NASH'S NEW BOOKS.

NOW READY. Price 10s. 6d. net.

THE ENGLISH HOUSE

How to Judge its Periods and Styles.

By W. SHAW SPARROW, Author of "Old England," and Compiler of "The British Home of To-Day," etc.

A very interesting book, pointing out the various marked characteristics by which you may judge to what style or period your own or any other house belongs. The book, which is fully illustrated with the finest examples of various styles of English houses, closes with two chapters upon Modern Architects and their Clients. These chapters contain valuable advice to all owners of property who contemplate building houses.

ROUSSEAU

AND THE WOMEN HE LOVED.

By FRANCIS GRIBBLE. Portraits, 15s. net.

Mr. Gibble had access to much fresh material, and his book is by far the most complete biography of Rousseau yet published in any language.

"He has taken the 'Confessions' and torn them to shreds," says the Daily Telegraph.

Two very interesting volumes of French Memoirs.

THE WIFE OF LAFAYETTE

By Mrs. M. CRAWFORD. Illustrated, 15s. net.

"This story of the Marquise de Lafayette is as well done as it could be for the general reader. The character, courage, and fortitude of the 'ardent Adrienne' fit with the best examples of her famous family."—Outlook.

THE King who Never Reigned

By JOSEPH TURQUAN and others. Illustrated 15s. net.

The dramatic story of Louis XVII., told by a Royalist eye-witness, and the Pretender Naundorf, with a striking and able solution of the King's death by the noted French historian, Joseph Turquan.

EVELEIGH NASH'S NEW FICTION

SIX SHILLINGS EACH.

Your attention is called to the following splendid List which contains the New Books of many Popular Authors. Several are exceptionally interesting and from all you may be sure of deriving entertainment. You should especially note that Mr. Morley Roberts's New Novel "DAVID BRAN," will be published next Tuesday.

DAVID BRAN.

By MORLEY ROBERTS, Author of "Rachel Marr."

In this great human story, which has its setting in a small Western fishing village, Mr. MORLEY ROBERTS presents an unconventional view of the position of the UNMARRIED WOMAN. The simple dignity of the style and the strange spell of the narrative, with its wild dramatic climax, should place "DAVID BRAN" among the masterpieces of English fiction.

Order your copy TO-DAY, otherwise you may be kept for weeks on the Waiting List.

THE OTHER MAN'S WIFE	FRANK RICHARDSON
JOHN SILENCE	ALGERNON BLACKWOOD
BY FAITH ALONE	RENE BAZIN
DISCIPLES OF PLATO	F. C. PHILIPS and PERCY FENDALL
THE MAN FROM ROME	M. VAN VORST
THE MAN WHO UNDERSTOOD WOMEN	LEONARD MERRICK
THE HAPPY MEDIUM	CHARLES MARRIOTT
FORGING THE BLADES	BERTRAM MITFORD
THE LONDON PLOT	CARLTON DAWE
STOLEN SWEETS	WILLIAM LE QUEUX
THE CHRIST OF TORO	G. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM

EVELEIGH NASH, Fawside House, King St., Covent Garden, W.C.

Dabney, the editor of "The Balance," the author delivers himself of some shrewdly caustic criticisms of the modern Englishman, "a John Bull more like a Maida Vale Jew." Of journalists Mr. Dabney remarks: "A journalist should not be in the social machine: he should be an observer from without. How can you keep your hands clean if you know everyone? Journalists now eat too much and too well." He is excellent on the Church: "The Church to-day is too much represented by angry casuists in the Commons and anxious fathers of families in the vicarages; while Nonconformity has become largely the preserve of astute and prosperous journalists. One listens in vain for the unworldly voice." A gentler satirical note is sounded in the account of the invalid lady, Miss Gold, of her offer to defray the cost of an illumination in gold letters of Burns' lines on Temptation in a thousand churches. Many clergymen did not answer at all; others refused straightforwardly on their own responsibility; many said that they would like to give permission, but their bishops would not approve. One accepted, and later a hatchment was found hanging over the inscription. Such pieces of social criticism are, however, admirably set off by the geniality, the tenderness, and the sly humor of most of the pages. A delicious figure is Grandmamma Wynne, and at her evergreen anecdotes of meeting Mr. Dickens at a Manchester hotel, and Mr. Thackeray at a conversazione at the Royal Society, we could almost groan in horror with her family, and, with Mr. Dabney, when rescued from grandmamma, take "the expression of a reprieved assassin." Equally good is the interview between Mr. Falconer and the ghost of himself at twenty-one, and quite inimitable is the description of the wedding of Bonnie Birdie Twist and Mr. Alf Pinto, celebrated by bookmakers, publicans, and "the profession." Mr. Lucas, in short, in this "Easy-going Chronicle," shows a perfect mastery of his instrument, and when it pleases him to include passages "lifted" from the pages of other authors, as he does from Giles' "Chinese Biographical Dictionary," his extracts blend as harmoniously with his context as the colors in an Oriental carpet. Indeed, we may predict that Mr. Giles' learned classic will become a household word henceforward. The charming humanity of Mr. Lucas's outlook reaches out hands from Queen Anne's Gate to the mandarins of the Fourth Dynasty.

It is a far cry from "Over Bemerton's" to "Halfway House," the two authors having no quality in common except that of literary skill. One wonders, indeed, in Mr. Hewlett's case, whether his dexterity as a virtuoso is not in excess of his creative originality. Nothing could well be cleverer than his handling of his figures, or more ingenious than his evocation of an atmosphere, and yet would not "Halfway House" make a much stronger appeal if this literary cake were not so cloying, so overladen with candied peel and sugared ornaments? The appeal is, as always, to the sensuous taste of his readers, but fundamentally the brainwork is so acute that one hesitates to say whether, with some remodellings and retrenchments, the novel might not rise into a high class of art. Quite admirable, for example, is the portrait of the humble heroine, Mary Middleton, who is lifted out of her station as village schoolmistress by her marriage with Mr. John Germain, "a gentleman of fifty, head of his family, deputy-lieutenant, and chairman of quarter sessions." Mary is a charming creature, naturally fresh and sweet in her girlish instincts and emotions, and it says not a little for her creator's art that her charm for us survives the fire of nods and winks and amorous innuendo with which most of the characters lovingly hail her relations with her elderly, "frozen" partner. Mr. Germain's infatuation and self-sophistication are also very subtly delineated, and we hear no false notes in the subsequent analysis of his icy despair when he finds he has only a mockery of love to give his young bride. The failure of the novel, such as it is, does not lie assuredly in the relations of these characters or in the exposition of the situation, but rather in the over-picturesqueness and artificiality of the social background. Again, Mr. Hewlett is so exceedingly clever that by his tricks of style he can pass off on us a gallery of minor figures that are semi-fantastic. And it is in the half and halfness of a character such as Senhouse, gentleman gipsy, poet, naturalist, and Bohemian, that the unreality of the romance lies. Mary Middleton belongs to the everyday world, Mr. Germain to Meredithian comedy, and Senhouse to a literary region that, hanging between both, is reminiscent of Borrow's tradition and Stevenson's flavor. Of course, Mr. Hewlett handles Senhouse, who is the real hero, with great dexterity, and since we are in for "romance," why not accept such flights off terra firma as are obligatory in Chapters X. and XI., where Mary follows Senhouse's patteran to the North, and stumbles across his camp on Wastdale? These are quite in the accepted style of English romance since the 'fifties, and as such they shatter the illusion of reality. The patteran business, in Chapters IX. and XVIII., is palpably absurd, but not much more so than are the chapters entitled, "Friendship's Garland" and "Senhouse on the Moral Law," in both of which the conversation is about as true to life as is the conversation in a Shaw play. The trouble with the English novelist is that he is not content to keep to one plane, but he must needs be walking one minute, and flying the next. Mr. Hewlett manages the transition with almost uncanny ease, he groups his figures dexterously in the Meredithian manner, his aristocrats walk and talk with a mannered preciosity that is undeniably picturesque, but the drawback, artistically, is that what is natural and deep in his analysis of feeling clashes with his virtuosity. His real brilliancy is at war with its shadow of cheapness. This is to say that our author has in so marked a degree the defect of his qualities that one hesitates as to whether one should not write—he has all the picturesque qualities of his art over-blown and running to seed.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

The Roman Empire still remains the greatest experiment in the art of government that the world has ever seen, and we cordially welcome the first volume of the translation of Friedlaender's "Roman Life and Manners Under the Early Empire," which has just been published by Messrs. Routledge & Sons. It is issued at the remarkably cheap price of 6s. Friedlaender's "Sittengeschichte Roms" is a standard work which has been well known and highly valued by students for a considerable number of years. It has gone through no less than seven editions in the original German, and each edition shows that the author is determined to keep himself abreast of the most approved results of contemporary scholarship. It is impossible to understand the genius of a nation through its political history alone. Its customs, its manners, the status of women, its religious rites and ideals, its internal structure as a social organism, are of equal, if not of greater, importance. Ordinary histories of Rome bring us face to face with the political and war-like energies of Rome. Friedlaender brings us face to face with the Roman people themselves. It is a fascinating subject, and it is dealt with by this eminent German scholar in a most interesting manner. In this volume he gives us a lucid account of the internal structure of the City of Rome, of its streets, its public places, its places of entertainment, its gardens, its parks, its waterworks. He then proceeds to describe the Imperial Court, the public and private life of the Emperor, the officials by whom he was surrounded, and the ceremonials connected with the Imperial household. The various ranks of Roman society are then passed under review; the Senators, the knights, and the third estate. Ordinary social life, with its interchange of visits, its conversation, its amusements; the position of women and children, marriage customs, slavery, and religious ideas and observances, are all carefully described. The latter part of the volume contains an interesting account of the means of communication between one part of the Empire and the other; the nature and extent of commercial intercourse, and the methods of travel adopted by the Romans in making the grand tour of the Empire. It is a fascinating book to all who take an interest in ancient civilisation, and it is to be hoped that it will secure many readers in its English dress. We are promised the second volume of the translation early in 1909.

* * *

Another interesting German book which has just found a translator is Otto Frommel's charming volume on "The Poetry of the Gospel of Jesus" (David Nutt, 2s. 6d.). It has been translated by Amelia Gurney, and on the whole

MACMILLAN'S LIST.

RAMBLING RECOLLECTIONS.

BY THE LATE

Sir HENRY DRUMMOND WOLFF, G.C.B., G.C.M.G.

With Photogravure and other Illustrations. Two vols., 30s. net.

The Times.—"Few people have lived a more varied life than this veteran diplomatist, politician, and traveller; few have been in contact with so many people of mark, so many diverse interests, or, to employ a vulgar phrase that exactly expresses the situation, have had a finger in so many pies. . . . At every turn the Recollections bring us into contact with people and things that must interest all who care for character and political history. . . . The book, as we have said, well deserves to be read, and it is certain to interest a large public."

Faust.

Freely adapted from Goethe's Dramatic Poem. By STEPHEN PHILLIPS and J. COMYNS CARR. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

De Libris. Prose and Verse.

By AUSTIN DOBSON. With Illustrations by HUGH THOMSON and KATE GREENAWAY. Extra crown 8vo, 5s. net.

The Little City of Hope.

A Christmas Story. By F. MARION CRAWFORD. A New Edition. With Illustrations in Colour by A. S. HARTRICK. 8vo, 5s. net.

The Jungle Book.

By RUDYARD KIPLING. With 16 Illustrations in Colour by MAURICE and EDWARD DETMOLD. 8vo, 5s. net.

An English Holiday with Car and Camera.

By JAMES JOHN HISSEY. With 28 Full-page Illustrations, and a Map. 8vo, 10s. net.

Central Government.

By H. D. TRAILL, D.C.L. New edition, revised and corrected by SIR HENRY CRAIK, K.C.B., M.P. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

Working Lads' Clubs.

By CHARLES E. B. RUSSELL and L. M. RIGBY. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

MACMILLAN & CO. LTD., LONDON.

Buy

The Saturday Westminster

Weekly Issue of "The Westminster Gazette."

Because

it contains all F.C.G.'S Cartoons of the Week.
of its unique page of "Problems and Prizes."
of its Book Reviews and Literary Columns.
of the Variety of General Articles and Short Stories.
it is the only Weekly Magazine-Review of the kind.
it costs but a Penny a Week. By post, 6s. 6d. (Home), and 8s. 8d. (Abroad) per annum.

It

Never Fails to Please & Satisfy

Offices: Tudor House, Tudor St., London, E.C.

100 POINTS FOR FREE TRADE

By L. G. CHIOZZA MONEY, M.P.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

(Reprinted from "The Daily News.")

The publication of 100 POINTS for FREE TRADE day by day during the last few months in "The Daily News" has been followed with the keenest interest. These 100 Points are now issued in convenient pamphlet form (100 Pages). Free Traders all over the country have thus an opportunity of possessing in a handy form the material for an immediate answer to the fallacies of the Tariff Reformer.

100 POINTS FOR FREE TRADE

PRICE ONE PENNY.

The price of this 100-page pamphlet, which is of a handy shape for the pocket, is 1d. for a single copy or 1½d. post free. A comprehensive Index to the entire subject matter makes every item of information contained readily accessible.

We have arranged for special terms to be in force for large orders as follows:—

SPECIAL TERMS FOR QUANTITIES.

(Carriage Paid.)

2 dozen and upwards	-	1d.	each.
200 and upwards	- -	1d.	„	less	2½ per cent.
500 „ „	- -	1d.	„	„	5 „
1,000 „ „	- -	1d.	„	„	10 „

1d. 100 POINTS FOR FREE TRADE. 1d.

Applications to be made to THE MANAGER, Publications Dept., "The Daily News," Bouverie Street, Fleet Street, E.C.

THE EDINBURGH REVIEW.

No. 426. OCTOBER, 1908. 8vo, Price 6s

I. THE FREE TRADE CONGRESS, PROTECTIONIST REACTION AND THE HOP INDUSTRY.
II. GOETHE'S NOVELS.
III. THE SURVEY OF THE BRITISH EMPIRE.
IV. NEW ENGLAND NATURE STUDIES:— THOREAU, BURROUGHS, WHITMAN
V. THE INDUSTRIAL POSITION OF WOMEN.
VI. THE PASTON LETTERS.
VII. TWO FRENCH MEMOIRS.
VIII. EARLY LONDON.
IX. BEAUTY AND EXPRESSION.
X. THE NEW ERA IN TURKEY
XI. LORD MILNER AND CANADIAN PREFERENCE.

LONGMANS, GREEN & CO., 39, Paternoster Row, London.

BOOKS WANTED, 25s. Each Offered.—Brewer's Henry VIII., 2 vols., 1884. Burke's Armoury and Extinct Peerage, 1883. Borrow's Wild Wales, 3 vols., 1862. Eliot's Scenes of Clerical Life, 1st edition, 2 vols., 1858. Jerrold's Men of Character, 3 vols., 1838. Alice in Wonderland, 1865 or 1866. Stevenson's Edinburgh, 1879. Desperate Remedies, 3 vols., 1871. Churchill's Poems, 3 vols., 1844. Symond's Italian Literature, 2 vols., 1881. Swinburne's Atalanta, white cloth, 1865. Lorna Doone, 3 vols., 1869. James's Painters and their Work, 3 vols. Gardiner's History of England, 2 vols., 1863. Jackson's Old Paris, 2 vols., 1878. Freer's Last Decade, 2 vols., 1863. 100,000 books for sale and wanted. Please state wants.—HOLLAND BROS., Book Merchants, 21, John Bright Street, Birmingham.

The Economist.

(ESTABLISHED 1843.)

Weekly Commercial Times, Bankers' Gazette, and Railway Monitor.

A POLITICAL, LITERARY, FINANCIAL AND GENERAL NEWSPAPER.

PRICE 8d. BY POST, 8½d. ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM, £2
COLONIES AND ABROAD, £2 4s.

The established authority on all Financial and Commercial subjects. In addition to a large high-class general circulation, the ECONOMIST is subscribed to by Banking Houses, Chambers of Commerce, Mercantile Firms, and Railway, Insurance, and other Companies throughout the United Kingdom, the Colonies and Abroad; and, as its columns from week to week show, it is the recognised organ for the announcements of some of the most important trades in the Kingdom.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY IN TIME FOR THE MORNING MAILS
Offices: GRANVILLE HOUSE, ARUNDEL STREET, STRAND, W.C., and of all Booksellers and Newsagents.

has been translated very well. It is unfortunate that the reader is confronted on the first page with a misprint which quite obscures the name of one of the most eminent modern interpreters of the Gospels. Until we turned to the original German edition of this little work we were quite at a loss to know who "Zulicher" might be. The original at once showed us that it was none other than Professor Juelicher of Marburg, the famous commentator on the Parables. Van Koetsveld, the Dutch preacher, is turned into von Koetsveld. Blemishes of this kind should have been avoided, as they produce an impression of carelessness which destroys one's sense of security in reading the translation. Attention has been directed in recent years to the imaginative and poetic character of the Gospels, and scholars of all shades of opinion are at one in maintaining that Jesus was not merely a preacher: he was also a poet, and his sayings and parables are full of the poetic spirit, and often of the poetic rhythm. This point of view is set forth by Dr. Frommel in a delightful manner in the successive chapters of his book. Many of the sayings of Jesus are true offshoots from the tree of Hebrew poetry. His antithetical parallelisms are examples of this. Take, for instance, the following sentences: "Many are called—but few are chosen," "God is not a God of the dead—but of the living," "So the first shall be last—and the last first." Space forbids us to enumerate other examples of poetic form and diction, but the reader will be amply rewarded if he turns to the pages of Dr. Frommel for them. This is a little volume which can be cordially recommended.

* * *

A Novel Reader's Guide.—"The Woman and the Sword," by Rupert Lorraine (Unwin, 6s.). This is the hundred guinea prize novel, and is a dashing and vigorous chronicle of battles and imbroglios in the days of Wallenstein.—"The Man Who Lived," by Beryl Tucker (Heinemann, 6s.). A curious study of life in a fast set of people, who pursue pleasure too unrelentingly to enjoy themselves.—"Anthony Cuthbert," by Richard Bagot (Methuen, 6s.). Northumbrian family life, with Italian scenes ingeniously interwoven.—"Miss Esperance and Mr. Wycherley," by L. Allen Harker (Murray, 6s.). A refined tale of Scottish domestic life with a serious flavor.—"The Abbey Mystery," by R. Murray Gilchrist (Ward, Lock, 6s.). An ingenious tale of tragic deaths, hidden papers, and family mystery.—"The London Plot," by Carlton Dawe (Nash, 6s.). An exciting story of Russian revolutionaries and secret societies.

The Week in the City.

The Movement of Leading Stocks

	Price Friday Morning, Oct. 9.	Price Friday Morning, Oct. 16.
Consols 2½ per cent.	84⅜ ...	84⅞
German 3 per cent.	82 ...	82
Russian 5 per cent. 1906	96 ...	98⅜
Bulgarian '92	99 ...	100½
Turkish Unified	88 ...	90⅜
Grand Trunk 1st Pref.	103 ...	103
Grand Trunk Ord.	20 ...	20⅝
Canadian-Pacific...	178⅜ ...	180⅛
Rand Mines	6½ ...	6 21/32
Cons. Goldfields	4 1/16 ...	4 1/16

Last Saturday the Stock Exchange began to recover from the cold fit which followed on Bulgarian and Austrian action in the Balkans, and on Monday and Tuesday prices in the markets most affected regained a substantial part of their losses. In fact, the improvement was so marked that it was thought safe to issue a Chinese loan, and the issue was quite favorably received, though there is a good deal to be said against investments in China until things there have become a little clearer. The Chinese have not yet carried reforms so far that they can be safely trusted by Europeans with the expenditure of money for railroad and other purposes. There was a pause on Wednesday, but the advance has held, as prices in the above table show. There is still anxiety, but on Thursday the City was hopeful that a settlement would be reached in the Balkans without war.

Trade Prospects.

A slight revival of trade seems now to be actually taking place. In the West Riding the woollen trade is more active, and shipbuilding is certainly better. The outlook is brightened by the prospect of an early settlement of the cotton dispute in Lancashire, where the card-room operators have at last been brought into line. The rise in the index number last month suggested that demand is once more catching up supply, and the same thing is indicated by the Board of Trade returns, which were the most favorable for some months. From the United States and Canada also reports of trade are more encouraging than for a long time past. Still one must be careful not to exaggerate or expect too much, especially until affairs in the Near East look better. I gather that at the great meeting of bankers in Denver, the general belief was that the trade recovery would be a very slow one, even if Taft were returned. Unemployment is still rife, and the failures for the first nine months of 1908 in the United States have been more than twice as heavy as in the same period of last year.

The Presidential Election and American Trade.

There is a good deal of doubt about the election, though the best opinion is that Taft will win. There is also a good deal of uncertainty, says the "New York Evening Post," as to the effect on markets. The shrewdest of those who claim that Mr. Taft's success is essential to general prosperity are not inclined to predict more than a temporary spurt in stocks, while many who are eager for his election are frank enough to declare that a victory for Mr. Bryan would not affect the situation unfavorably. As regards the industrial situation, no one whose judgment is highly considered believes that general business would be intrinsically affected one way or the other by the success of either Mr. Taft or Mr. Bryan. The fact is, as an able financial writer in the "Post" points out, neither Taft nor Bryan can conjure away the panic. And it is the more difficult for the United States to recover, because she has already injured trade in other countries. In fact, just now the whole world is poor at one and the same time, a thing that does not often occur. When the United States was entering the depression of 1893, Europe was emerging from her depression occasioned by the Baring troubles of 1890. Again, when the situation collapsed in America in 1903, Europe was well on the road to recovery from the German crash of 1900. To-day, money is so abundant in New York, London, Paris, and Berlin, that complete tranquillity exists in each of these centres, and Paris can set about accumulating a great stock of gold for a big Russian loan without creating a ripple of apprehension anywhere in the world. But all this is but the measure of the world-wide depression of general industry. Money has accumulated in such amounts because it has been withdrawn from mercantile employment, and it has been so withdrawn because there is no use for it there. Both exports and imports have fallen off since January. We are selling the rest of the world less than last year, and the rest of the world is selling us less. In other words, all over the globe the eagerness to sell greatly exceeds the eagerness to buy, a sure indication that the whole world is "hard up."

Lucellum.

TAKE CARE OF YOUR THROAT.

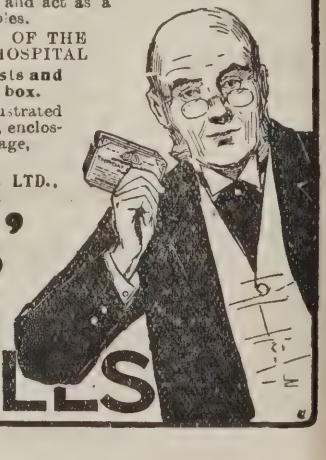
If you suffer from irritation of the Throat, Catarrh, Coughs, Colds, Bronchitis, or other Throat and Chest affections then try these wonderfully efficacious Throat Pastilles. They quickly relieve hoarseness and soreness and act as a safeguard against all Throat troubles.

MADE TO A FORMULA OF THE LIVERPOOL THROAT HOSPITAL

Can be obtained at all Chemists and Stores at 1s. and 4s. 6d. per box.

Write for Free Sample and illustrated brochure of testimonials received, enclosing 1d. stamp to cover postage, to Sole Manufacturers—

EVANS SONS LESCHER & WEBB LTD., Hanover Street, Liverpool.

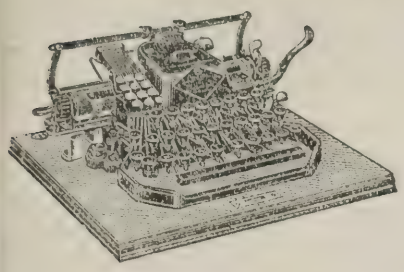


EVANS' ANTISEPTIC THROAT PASTILLES

Ask for "Evans" Pastilles and see that you get them

Beware of the numerous imitations.

BLICKensderfer TO WIT.



In the letters of approval and commendation we are continually receiving, the following points are over and over again insisted on :

CASH PRICES.

No. 8 (as shown), £12 : 12 : 0
No. 7, £10 : 10 : 0
No. 5, £8 : 17 : 0

The unexpected strength revealed in manifolding and stencil-cutting.
The ease with which facility is acquired by the novice.
The visible writing and the interchangeable type.
The clear-cut impression of the characters.
The perfect and permanent alignment.

No one comments on its portability or its low price, because these were well understood points before the machine was purchased, but that does not make them any less important advantages.

Send for List No. 53, containing full details.

BLICKENSDERFER CO. LTD., 9 & 10, CHEAPSIDE, LONDON, E.C.

MAKERS TO H.M. THE KING
Rowntree's
"WARMS & CHEERS"
ELECT COCOA

BIRKBECK BANK
ESTABLISHED 1851.
SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.
2½ per cent. INTEREST
allowed on Deposits repayable on demand.
2 per cent. INTEREST
on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.
All General Banking Business transacted.
ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.
C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

Curio Club
Bargains
Private persons desirous of disposing of antiques at bargain prices will find a ready sale for same at the "London Opinion Curio Club" 107, Regent Street, London, W.

THE
LEADING EGYPTIAN CIGARETTES
Kyriazis'
EGYPTIAN CIGARETTES
CAIRO.
Try them. They are the finest imported, and can be obtained from all High-class Tobacconists, Stores, &c.
Wholesale depot—20, Cheapside, London, E.C.

"PYRENO"
(REGISTERED)
A PERFECT UNDERWEAR.
Should any Garment shrink in the wash it
WILL BE REPLACED.

BOVRIL
helps you to eat and feeds you.

MISCELLANEOUS.

STANSFELD TRUST—SCRUTINEER WANTED to report on all Bills brought before Parliament, wherein men and women are differently dealt with or in which women are specially interested, and of all Bills affecting Children and Education. Salary £50 to £70. Applicants must be women. Qualifications and two references to "Trust," C/o T. B. Browne's Advertising Offices, 163, Queen Victoria Street, London, E.C.

EDUCATIONAL.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE, TAMWORTH.

YOUTHS TRAINED FOR HOME OR COLONIES.

Farm, 1,000 acres. Carpentry, Smith's work. Riding and Shooting taught. Prospectus.

CHANTRY MOUNT SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
BISHOP'S STORTFORD.

Head Mistress Miss ESTHER CASE, M.A., Dublin (Class. Tripos, Camb.
Second Mistress: Miss ESTERBROOK HICKS, B.Sc., London.
A limited number of boarders received.

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.

BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING

Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.

Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.
Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

CO-EDUCATION BY THE SOCIETY OF FRIENDS.

Friends' School, Great Ayton in Cleveland, Yorkshire.

A Boarding School for Boys and Girls (9-16). Modern Education. Preparation for Exams. Unique health record. Ten acres Recreation Grounds, Gymnasium, Swimming Bath, Laboratories, Domestic Science School. 30 Guineas per annum. Apply to the Headmaster for Prospectus, etc.

The Abbey School, Beckenham.

FINE POSITION, SIXTEEN ACRES OF GROUNDS.
TEN MILES FROM LONDON.

Preparation for the best Public Schools. Write for List of Scholarships won last year.

TANGLEWOOD, BARNT GREEN, THE LICKEY HILLS,
Near Birmingham.

BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

On approved Modern Lines. Thorough Education with individual care and character training. Games, gardening, and open air life in lovely country, with bracing air. Good train service on main line. Escorts provided.

Principal - - MISS EBBUTT, M.A.
(Newnham College, Cambridge—Trinity College, Dublin.)

LINCOLNSHIRE COAST.

ESSENDON GIRLS' SCHOOL, SKEGNESS.

Headmistress, MISS PAGAN, M.A. Full Staff. L.R.A.M. Swedish Gymnastics. Higher Examinations. Tennis, Hockey, Swimming. Dry sunny climate. Bracing sea air. Exhibitions offered.

SOUTHPORT MODERN SCHOOL.

A First-Class School for Boys. Staff includes B.A., M.Sc., F.C.V., Mus. Bac., etc. Languages, Science, Commercial Subjects, Gymnastics, Swimming, Cadet Company. Prospectus from Secretary.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

SCHOLARSHIP EXAMINATION IN DECEMBER.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors. Enquiries should be addressed to the BURSAR.

CROYDON. Croham Hurst School for Girls.

House built for the purpose in healthy and beautiful situation. Limited number of girls taken. Thorough education on modern lines. Special encouragement given to reading and leisure pursuits, and to interest in current movements.

Hockey, Tennis, &c., &c. Swimming. Riding. Much outdoor life.

Principals { THEODORA E. CLARK. K. M. ELLIS.

EDUCATIONAL.

CRAIGMOUNT, EDINBURGH.

Private Boarding and Day School for Girls.

THE Principals, the Misses Gossip, are assisted by highly-qualified residents, English and Foreign Mistresses and visiting Professors. The aim of the school is a sound education, special attention being given to the study of English Literature, Modern Languages, and Music. The Gymnasium is fitted with Swedish apparatus and the school has its own Swimming Bath. The situation of the school is bracing and very healthy, and the grounds give ample scope for games. Prospectus on application to the Principals.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager,

R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C. Telegrams: "TRIFORM, LONDON." Telephone No. GERRARD 1854.

SCHOOLS IN ENGLAND OR ABROAD

FOR BOYS AND GIRLS.

Messrs. J. and J. PATON having an intimate knowledge of the BEST SCHOOLS and TUTORS in this country and on the Continent, will be pleased to aid parents in their selection by sending (free of charge) prospectuses and full particulars of reliable and highly-recommended establishments. When writing please state the age of pupil, the district preferred, and give some idea of the fees to be paid.—J. and J. PATON, Educational Agents, 143, Cannon-st, London, E.C. Telephone 5,053, Central.

STAMMERING.

The severest cases cured, but only by personal tuition, by one who has cured himself after stammering for 10 years. Adults and boys received in residence or as daily pupils. Particulars and test on application to Mr. A. C. SCHNELLE, 119, Bedford Court Mansions, W.C.

BOOKSELLERS.

A Beautiful Large Emerald Type

10/6 OXFORD TEACHER'S BIBLE for 5/11 POST FREE.

Latest Illustrated Edition. Size 7 x 5-in.

To which are appended Notes analytical, critical, chronological, historical, and geographical, a glossary of antiquities; an abstract of modern discoveries; a dictionary of Scripture proper names; a biblical index concordance; new series of maps; and compendium of Scripture natural history. Handsome Limp Morocco binding, with overlapping edges, round corners, elastic band.

THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE, 53, Paternoster Row.

J. POOLE & CO., 104, Charing Cross Road, LONDON.

School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific, and Students'

BOOKSELLERS.

NEW AND SECOND-HAND.

All enquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered.

Catalogue No. 361. 148 Pages.

GLAISHER'S 1909 GENERAL CATALOGUE OF SELECTED PUBLISHERS' REMAINDERS.

Now Ready. Reduced Prices. Immense Variety.

WILLIAM GLAISHER, LTD.,
Remainder and Discount Booksellers,
265, HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON.

406 pages, 8vo, cloth, 2s. post free.

HEAVEN AND HELL:

Things Heard and Seen.

By EMANUEL SWEDENBORG.

JOHN GREENLEAF WHITTIER wrote:—"There is one grand and beautiful idea underlying all Swedenborg's revelations or speculations about the future life. His remarkably suggestive books are becoming familiar to the reading and reflecting portion of the community."

LONDON: SWEDENBORG SOCIETY, 1, Bloomsbury St.

THE INDEX TO VOLUMES I. & II. OF THE NATION

May be had free on application to the Manager.

TOURS.

£6 6s. LUCERNE TOUR.

Nine days. Short Sea Route. No extras for Conductor or Gratuities.

HENRY S. LUNN, M.D.

5, Endsleigh Gardens, N.W. 25, Cannon Street, E.C.
4, Charing Cross, S.W. 84, Piccadilly, W.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout, Bathrooms on every Floor, Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard and Smoking Rooms. Heated throughout.

Fireproof Floors. Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 6/0.

Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hote, Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London." Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.

HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplace. "The English Home."

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.

THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and Subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, THE NATION, and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following booksellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—W. H. Smith & Son, Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—Gordon and Gotch.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions are received.

Scale of Charges for Advertisements.

	FULL PAGE.	½ PAGE.	¼ PAGE.
Back Page, or Page facing matter ...	£10 0 0	£5 0 0	£2 10 0
Other Pages ...	8 0 0	4 0 0	2 0 0

Hotels, Hydros, and Educational

13 Insertions ... ... 8d. per line.
52 „ ... ... 6d. „

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LONDON.

WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. Wild, C.C., Man. Direc. 30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

BLACKPOOL.

67, ALEXANDRA ROAD. Board and Residence. 5s. per day

PROSPECT HOUSE BOARDING ESTAB., 33, Central Par., facing Sea, Central for Amusements. South Aspect. Tel. 575 Manageress.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.

IDEAL RESIDENCE.

Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.

THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate

SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30s. week

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.

BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport

BRIGHTON.

THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston

BUXTON.

ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.

THE TORS PRIVATE HOTEL (en pension). Tel. 199. Mrs. F. Sara

DARTMOOR DOUSLAND, Nr. YELVERTON.

BARONS' PRIVATE HOTEL. Close to Moors. J. Wonnacott. Prop.

DEAL.

BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson

EASTBOURNE.

CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Grdns. 5/- day

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day

EDINBURGH.

ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading Hotel

FARNWORTH (Station) Nr. BOLTON.

RAWSON ARMS HOTEL. Theatrical Accommodation

GREAT YARMOUTH.

HILLS MARINE VIEW BOARDING HOUSE.

MELTON LODGE RESIDENTIAL MANSION. Facing sea. 10/- per day

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.

THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.

RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta course

ILFRACOMBE.

COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea

LANCASTER.

BOAR'S HEAD HOTEL. Wm. McIntosh

STONEWELL RESTAURANT. T. M. Hey, Proprietor

MARKET HALL RESTAURANT. Prop. J. E. Dowthwaite

LEEDS.

HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station

LIVERPOOL.

COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone: 3032 Royal, 3 wires

LLANELLY.

CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver

MALVERN.

HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & M'g'r.—J. Wilson

MATLOCK.

SMEDLEY'S Hydropathic Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Mnger

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links. (18 holes)

OXFORD (near).

SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, etc. Lecture

PENTRE.

PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles

PORTSMOUTH.

SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director

SOUTHPORT.

KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St., Band and Illuminations. Turkish, Electric, Hydropathic, &c., Baths and Treatment

ROWNTREE'S CAFE, Lord St., Hot Luncheons, Afternoon Teas, Tel. 647

HOTEL CAFE CONTINENTAL, 207, Lord St., French and English Confectioners, Dinners, Teas and Suppers. Parties Catered for

SOUTHSEA.

STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress

SWANAGE.

"CRAIGSIDE," Board Residence. Tel.: 6. Misses Fell

TEIGNMOUTH.

REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner

WHITBY.

WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt

CHATTO & WINDUS'S SECOND AUTUMN LIST.

THE KING'S CLASSICS.

Each volume is adequately Edited by a Specialist upon the subject with which it deals, while the majority of the Titles are not to be found in any other Series. 16mo (6 by 4½ in.), gilt tops, with Frontispiece, red cloth or quarter-bound, antique grey boards, 1s. 6d. net.

NEW VOLUMES NOW READY.

DANIEL'S "DELIA" AND DRAYTON'S "IDEA."

TRANSLATIONS FROM THE ICELANDIC.

SWIFT'S BATTLE OF THE BOOKS.

DANTE'S VITA NUOVA.

GEORGE PETTIE'S "PETITE PALLACE OF PETTIE HIS PLEASURE." (Two Volumes.)

Detailed Prospectus of the Series post free on application.

THE NEW MEDIEVAL LIBRARY.

Each volume contains Photogravure or Woodcut Reproductions of the Illustrations contained in the Works translated. Each volume further contains a Title-Page engraved upon wood, after a notable contemporary example.

NEW VOLUMES NOW READY.

THE BABEES' BOOK: Medieval Manners for the Young.

THE LEGEND OF THE HOLY FINA, Virgin of Santo Geminiano.

Other Volumes in preparation.

Size 6½ by 4¾ in., boards, cloth, 5s. net; whole brown pigskin, antique style, with clasps, 7s. 6d. net.

Size 6½ by 4¾ in., boards, cloth, 5s. net; whole brown pigskin,

THE ART AND LETTERS LIBRARY.

Issued in two forms—viz., the Ordinary Edition, large cr. 8vo, with 8 Four-colour Illustrations and 24 in Half-tone; buckram, gilt tops, 7s. 6d. net. Special Edition on pure rag paper, deckle edges, with 4 additional Four-colour Illustrations and special Coloured Frontispiece; small 4to, whole parcht. gilt top, 15s. net; whole vellum, 20s. net; whole red morocco, 30s. net.

NEW VOLUMES.

STORIES OF THE FLEMISH AND DUTCH ARTISTS [Now Ready.

FROM THE TIME OF THE VAN EYCKS TO THE END OF THE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY. Being stories of the great Dutch and Flemish Artists drawn from Contemporary Records. Collected and arranged by VICTOR REYNOLDS.

STORIES OF THE ENGLISH ARTISTS

FROM VANDYCK TO TURNER. Being stories of the great English Artists, 1600-1851, drawn from Contemporary records. Collected and Arranged by RANDALL DAVIES, Author of "English Society of the XVIIIth Century in Contemporary Art," and CECIL HUNT. [Oct. 22.

THE LITTLE FLOWERS OF S. FRANCIS OF ASSISI. [Now Ready.

Being a New Edition, wholly Revised and in part Augmented, of the Translation by Professor T. W. ARNOLD.

A CHILD'S GARDEN OF VERSES

By ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON. With 12 Full-Page Reproductions of Water-Colours, numerous Illustrations in the Text in Line, designed End-Papers and Title (printed in Gold), and a special Binding Design by MILLICENT SOWERBY. Large crown 8vo, cloth, 5s. net. Also a Special Edition, limited to 1,000 copies, on larger pure rag paper, the Plates mounted, and bound in whole parcht., 10s. 6d. net.

"Mature lovers of 'A Child's Garden of Verses' will be sure to like Miss Sowerby's dainty headpieces, while the full-page plates in colour will as certainly delight younger folk. . . . These plates are perfect embodiments of the delightful poems."
—Burlington Magazine.

THE BARBARIANS OF MOROCCO

By GRAF STERNBERG, Member of the Reichstag, Author of "My Impressions of the Boer War." Translated by ETHEL PECK. With 12 Illustrations after Water-Colours by DOUGLAS FOX PITT, R.I. Large crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. net.

"It is written as the result of careful investigation at the hands of a keen observer. The Count writes of what he has seen, and he has a long sight and a vigorous judgment. . . . All will admit that he writes with obvious sincerity and with unfailing gusto. This is a healthy, wholesome book, stimulating ideas even where it does not command assent."—Daily Telegraph.

THE SHAKESPEARE LIBRARY.

Part I. The Old-Spelling Shakespeare.

In 40 vols. Edited according to the Orthography and Arrangement of the more authentic Quarto and Folio Versions, with brief introductions by F. J. FURNIVALL, M.A., D.Litt. Printed on fine paper, 8¼ by 6 inches, half-bound boards, per volume, 2s. 6d. net. Also a Library Edition of 500 Sets (to be subscribed for in sets only), pure rag paper, half-parcht., gilt top, 5s. net.

NEW VOLUMES NOW READY.

8. THE MERRY WIVES OF WINDSOR.
9. MUCH ADO ABOUT NOTHING.
13. THE WINTER'S TALE.
14. AS YOU LIKE IT.

Part II. The Shakespeare Classics.

General Editor, Prof. I. GOLLANCZ, D.Litt.

A Series of Reprints embodying the Originals or Direct Sources of Shakespeare's Plays. Quarter-bound, antique grey boards, 2s. 6d. net. Whole gold brown velvet Persian, 4s. net. Also a Library Edition of 500 Sets (to be subscribed for in sets only), half-parcht., gilt top, 5s. net.

NEW VOLUMES NOW READY.

9. THE SOURCES AND ANALOGUES OF "A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM."
Edited by FRANK SIDGWICK.

Part III. The Lamb Shakespeare for the Young.

Based on MARY and CHARLES LAMB'S TALES FROM SHAKESPEARE. An attempt to insert skilfully within the setting of prose those scenes and passages from the play with which the young reader should quite early become acquainted. Editor, Prof. I. GOLLANCZ. Each volume will be illustrated, and a further feature will be made of Songs from the Plays set to the best music arranged for school use. Imperial 16mo (about 7½ by 5½ inches). Cloth gilt, 1s. 6d. net; leather, 2s. 6d. net. Special School Edition, limp linen, 8d. net.

NEW VOLUMES NOW READY.

4. THE MERCHANT OF VENICE.
5. THE WINTER'S TALE.
6. TWELFTH NIGHT. 7. CYMBELINE.

Part IV. Shakespeare's England.

A Series of Volumes illustrative of the Life, Thought, and Literature of England in Shakespeare's Time; also a new and comprehensive Elizabethan Anthology.

THE FIRST FOUR VOLUMES NOW READY.

A detailed Prospectus of the Shakespeare Library will be forwarded post free on application.

NOW READY.

FROM ISLAND TO EMPIRE.

A short History of the expansion of England by force of Arms. By J. S. C. BRIDGE. With an Introduction by Admiral Sir CYPRIAN BRIDGE, G.C.B. With many Maps and Plans. Large crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. net.

THE COLOUR OF PARIS.

By MM. LES ACADEMICIENS GONCOURT, under the general Editorship of M. LUCIEN DESCAVES (Sécrétaire de l'Académie Goncourt). Translated by M. D. FROST. With an Introduction by M. L. BENEDITE (Conservateur de Musée National du Luxembourg), and an Essay by the Artist. Fully Illustrated after Water-Colour and Sepia Drawings by the Japanese Artist, YOSHIO MARKINO. Large fcap. 4to, cloth, gilt top, 20s. net. Also 200 Large-Paper Copies, 42s. net. [Immediately.

AN INLAND VOYAGE.

By ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON. Newly set in special large type, with 12 Full-Page Reproductions after Water-Colours, and 12 Facsimile Drawings, also designed Title, End-Papers, and Maps, and Cover Design by NOEL ROOKE. Extra crown 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net; parcht., 10s. 6d. net. Also 250 Large-Paper copies on pure rag paper, the Plates mounted, and bound in whole parcht., 21s. net. [Shortly.

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

WEEPING CROSS. By HENRY LONGAN STUART.
"A most interesting, vivid, clever, and delightful love-story."
—T.P.'s Weekly.

THE GALLEON OF TORBAY. By E. E. SPEIGHT.
"'The Galleon of Torbay' is worthy of a place beside 'Westward Ho.'"—Glasgow Herald.

SHIPS OF DESIRE. By L. S. GIBSON, Author of "The Freemasons," "Burnt Spices," &c.
"An admirable piece of work, as interesting as it is worthy."
—Daily Telegraph.

JUNIA. By JESSIE HERBERTSON, Author of "The Stigma," "Mortal Men," &c.
"A vivid and fascinating piece of work."—Sheffield Telegraph.

DARK CORNERS. By F. E. PENNY, Author of "The Inevitable Law."
"Distinctly a book to be read this coming winter."—Morning Post.

THE LAND OF SILENT FEET. By ARTHUR O. FISHER, Author of "Withyford."

JOYCE PLEASANTRY. By GEORGE R. SIMS.

London: CHATTO & WINDUS, III, St. Martins Lane, W.C.

"THE NATION," with which is incorporated "The Speaker," printed for the Proprietors by the NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY LIMITED, Whitefriars House, London, E.C., and Published by THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY LIMITED, at the Offices, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C. Registered at the General Post Office as a Newspaper.—SATURDAY, OCTOBER 17, 1908.

The Nation

Vol. IV., No. 4.] SATURDAY, OCTOBER 24, 1908. [Price 6d.
Postage: U.K., ½d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

PAGE
DIARY OF THE WEEK 133
POLITICS AND AFFAIRS:—
The Government and the Unemployed 136
How England can Help Turkey 137
The Progress of the Licensing Bill 138
The Personality of Mr. Burns 139
LIFE AND LETTERS:—
Methods of Melodrama ... 141
Heart of Fire 142
The Jolly World 143
On Nursery Rhymes 144
LETTERS FROM ABROAD:—
The Chances of the Turkish Reformers. By H. W. M. ... 145
PRESENT-DAY PROBLEMS:—
The Underfed Child. By R. A. Bray 146
PUBLISHERS AND THE PRESS 147
COMMUNICATIONS:—
The Working of Old-age Pensions. By the Rev. C. L. Marson 148
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:—
Is Constitutional Government in Turkey Possible? By Edwin Pears 148
The Future of Turkish Women. By Halide Salih 149

PAG
"Bad Harvests and Unemployment." By J. A. Hobson and W. G. W. ... 150
A Suggestion. By J. Marshall Sturge 150
Grammatical. By Grammaticulus and Ellen R. Taylor 150
The Newer Spirit in India. By V. Chattopadhyaya ... 150
The Liberty of the Subject. By George Whale 151
Liberalism and Social Reform By F. N. G. 151
Mr. Asquith's Concession to the Brewers. By J. E. Allen 151
Orthodoxy. By the Rev. S. Henry 151
The Habitual Offenders Bill. By N. Kolp 152
Militant and Constitutional Action. By A. F. P.... ... 152
POETRY:—
A Portrait. By J. Marjoram... 152
THE WORLD OF BOOKS ... 153
Books to be Read 153
REVIEWS:—
The Panmure Papers 154
The Gospel of Agriculture... 156
Memories of the Eighties ... 156
Notes on New Testament Criticism... 160
A Page from the Russian Revolution 162
THE WEEK IN THE CITY ... 164

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

On Wednesday the Prime Minister announced to the House of Commons the Government's temporary proposals for dealing with unemployment. It is stated that the plans finally adhered to represent the opinion of the less advanced members of the Cabinet, supported by Mr. Burns, and that they fall short of a proposal made to the Government by the Labor Party, which included the giving of power to local authorities to raise a penny rate for the payment of wages to unemployed labor. Mr. Asquith's statement was made in very sympathetic language, and a large section of the Liberal Party appeared to approve it. But the Labor Party, while recognising the value of its administrative concessions, declares the scheme to be inadequate, and has practically formulated a resolution of censure. Its attitude is declared to be largely due to its disbelief in Mr. Burns's administration of the Unemployed Act.

* * *

The pith of the Government's proposals is the doubling of the grant to the Central Unemployed Fund, which, with the addition of £150,000, will now stand at £300,000. Out of this fund the Local Government Board will contribute to localities which are constructing works a sum representing the difference between the value of ordinary contract labor and the value of unemployed labor. Mr. Asquith, in answer to Mr. Balfour, estimated that this contribution would range from five to forty per cent. of the cost of the labor. The other Ministerial contributions lie chiefly in the speeding up of departmental work or the organisation of special kinds of winter employment. Thus, 8,000 workers are to be taken on for the Christmas season at the Post Office, the War Office is to provide for 24,000 recruits for Mr. Haldane's new Special Reserve, tenders have been accepted for nine destroyers and five cruisers, and the work is to be set forward by six weeks. Finally, the disqualification of people who have received poor law relief during the past twelve months, or have been helped under the Unemployed Act, is removed. In a concluding sentence Mr. Asquith admitted that these were only "anodynes," and added that he hoped, before Parliament came to an end, to strike an effective blow at the permanent causes of unemployment.

* * *

The Turkish situation has improved on the Bulgarian side, but has again become difficult so far as the proposed Conference and Austro-Turkish relationships are concerned. The Grand Vizier and the Young Turks, pursuing their consistent policy of a Bulgarian rapprochement, are said to have arranged with M. Dimitroff, the Bulgarian delegate, the principle of the purchase of the Oriental Railway, though Bulgaria, according to the well-informed Constantinople correspondent of the "Daily News," declines to pay anything in commutation of the Eastern Roumelian tribute. On the other hand, Austria's separate negotiations for the recognition of her raid on Bosnia and Herzegovina before the meeting of the Conference have failed. Kiamil Pasha insisted that the Conference must meet on the basis of the integrity of the Empire. Germany, which has throughout acted with Austria, while veiling or disclaiming any separate responsibility, supports her ally, and a meeting of the Conference is now doubtful. The Reform Party is clearly anxious about the state of the capital, for they are moving up Anatolian and Macedonian troops in substitution for the worthless Zaptiehs. The news from Armenia is better; that from Kurdistan and Mesopotamia, where the Constitution has been badly received, not quite so assuring.

* * *

On Thursday, Sir Edward Grey, in answer to Captain Faber and Mr. Lynch, admirably defined the policy which he had pursued with so much power, and to which we are glad to see Lord Lansdowne has given unqualified assent. He said that as the Conference primarily affected Turkey, the Government hoped that its first concern would be to safeguard her interests, to secure her compensation, and to strengthen the reforming régime. He indicated clearly that our Government's acceptance of the Conference depended on Turkey's final assent, which had not yet been yielded, of its agenda and programme. In Constantinople, there seems some reluctance to admit accomplished facts, which are not likely to be altered, even though they do not involve the moving of a single Ottoman soldier. This is a natural tendency of a threatened Power. In the bedchamber of the Sultan is a prayer-carpet, adorned with the names of all the chief towns in the Turkish Empire, some of which his own policy has long ago lost to it. An English visitor was asked what he thought of the beautiful adornments of the room. "I think," he said, "that his Majesty wants a new carpet."

* * *

Meanwhile, the Young Turks are pursuing their fixed intention of changing the regiments which guard Yildiz Kiosk, and which, like Louis XVI.'s Swiss Guard, are the only possible engine of reaction, and the Constantinople correspondent of the "Times," who is in the confidence of the Committee, plainly hints that two of the warships have been moved from their moorings in the Golden Horn to the Bosporus, before the Dolma Baghche Palace, and opposite Yildiz, as a measure of warning to Abdul Hamid.—Austria is behaving with her accustomed brutality to the small States that she has wronged, arresting a Montenegrin delegate to Servia at Agram, and roughly prohibiting the export of all arms and munitions from her territory to Servia and Montenegro. This suggestion of vassalage does not improve the hopes of her keeping the peace with these fiery little States. But Bulgaria is showing statesmanship, and though she must qualify her indefensible refusal to commute Turkey's loss of the Eastern Roumelian tribute, she is clearly anxious for a settlement. The language of Prince Ferdinand is most pacific, and if he were more trusted might be held to be almost conclusive of peace between Turkey and her new and powerful neighbor.

* * *

The Licensing Bill has been undergoing a process of re-modelling during the week, the full effects of which cannot very easily be ascertained. Generally the tendency has been to moderate the financial burdens which the measure imposes on the trade. The Prime Minister has proposed that after the expiry of the fourteen years' time limit there shall be a further period of grace for those licence-holders who survive it. During this period the monopoly value of a licence will not be exacted, and there will be no compensation levy. This exemption, however, will be subject to two limitations. Magistrates will be under the Sharpe v. Wakefield terms—that is to say, they will be able to refuse a licence at discretion, according to their view of the needs of the locality. Secondly, local veto may be applied by a two-thirds majority. The concession has not been graciously received, and we argue elsewhere that the Government would be well advised either to excise local veto altogether from their Bill, leaving the future open, or at least to extend the character of the local options, so as to include, for example, experiments in disinterested management. This latter course they have indicated their willingness to adopt.

* * *

The precise character of the options and the general advisability of tying the hands of Parliament and Government fourteen years hence were very hotly debated, and the Government's replies were much less conclusive to their friends than usual. The confusion indeed on the Ministerial benches was somewhat marked. Mr. Leif Jones, the leader of the Alliance Party, favored veto by an absolute majority. Mr. Sherwell and others discouraged the overlaying of the principle of the Bill with the hotly contested issue of local veto. Mr. Keir Hardie, as a Socialist, spoke for municipal management, and the existence of a Liberal minority favorable to the Bill but fearful of the renewal of the old controversies which hang round this hot corner of the temperance question was very perceptible. Another change in the measure which is clearly to the good is the extension of the clauses regarding monopoly values to "off" as well as "on" licences. Finally, the House of Commons debated with some heat the clause which sets up a somewhat complicated system of local options for Wales and Monmouth, under which a bare majority is to act in some contingencies, and a two-thirds majority in others.

* * *

On Monday the Clemenceau Government suffered its first loss, and the blow came from an unexpected quarter. M. Delcassé delivered a fierce attack on the Cabinet in connection with the report on the blowing up of the Jéna. The Chamber refused to dismiss the whole Cabinet, but M. Thompson, the Naval Minister, was censured, and forced to resign. M. Delcassé, of course, finds the Government's Morocco policy not strenuous enough, and there is evidently a considerable section of the Conservative parties which think M. Clemenceau has already educated Parliament up to a reactionary Government. One slight indication of this spirit is the attempt made by M. Biétry, the leader of the organised strike-breakers, to revive the Dreyfus case. The situation is curious, because the danger to the Clemenceau Cabinet was expected to come from the Left, not from the Right, since at its congress at Dijon just before the Session opened, the Radical Party pronounced for a policy of advanced social reform, and for the restoration of the bloc, which is M. Clemenceau's pet abomination. Evidently M. Clemenceau's Government has a troubled prospect.

* * *

Our Paris correspondent writes: The Socialist Congress at Toulouse, which came to an end on Sunday, will probably prove to be a turning-point in the career of the French Socialist Party. Since M. Jaurès, in obedience to a resolution carried by a single vote at the Amsterdam Congress, abandoned the policy which had made the Socialist Party one of the most important factors in French politics, the party has been losing ground as a political force. Unification converted two natural groups, representing two different tendencies, into half-a-dozen warring factions. Further discredit was brought on the party by the fierce conflict between the Jaurésistes and the Guesdistes at last year's Congress. The fact that the Jaurésistes then owed their victory to the support of a small section really Anarchist in tendency compromised the Socialist cause and gave a handle to social reaction, which has been used with effect, as the recent municipal elections demonstrated.

* * *

The Toulouse Congress marks a return to a saner policy and the achievement of a real unity. A long resolution—or, rather, manifesto—carried with one dissentient, affirms the necessity of continued Parliamentary action, while admitting the legitimacy of such methods as insurrection or a general strike, should circumstances make them necessary and possible. But speakers of every school condemned not only the repressive measures of M. Clemenceau, but also the criminal folly of those who have sent workmen to be killed by inciting them to unprepared and futile movements. Another healthy symptom was the refusal of the Congress local organisations to confirm the sentences of excommunication passed on M. Breton and other members. Toulouse means that the Socialist Party separates itself from the Hervéiste remnant, and from the little knot of Anarchists to whom an absurd system of representation has given the control of the Confédération Générale du Travail, and accepts the olive branch held out by the recent Radical Congress at Dijon. M. Jaurès' marvellous speech of five hours on Saturday was a return to the old Jaurès of the days of the Combes Ministry. There can be no reconstitution of the bloc tel quel, for the old bloc contained elements which cannot blend permanently with Socialism. But there may be in the near future a new social reform bloc supporting a Ministry of which the chief may quite conceivably be M. Aristide Briand.

* * *

The Russian Budget for 1909 has been submitted to the Duma Committee. The classification of revenue and expenditure as extraordinary and ordinary makes it difficult to see things as they are; but a deficit of £15,200,000 is admitted, to which must, no doubt, be added at least a share of the floating debt of £32,000,000. The revenue estimates are liberal, but expenditure has gone up at a much greater pace. The deficit of 1909 is to be met by a loan, and no disguise is now made of the fact that a foreign loan of £50,000,000 is in preparation, part of which will go to consolidate the floating debt. The Government admits that the State cannot continue to live by borrowing at a time when one quarter of its revenue is devoted to the debt service, and it will suggest new taxes on income, land, and tobacco, though it evidently has no hope of avoiding a deficit in this way; it, therefore, makes a somewhat pathetic appeal for economy. The disorder in Russia's finances is even less near its end than the disorder in her social life. Two slight steps towards social peace are registered in the abolition of the strictest form of martial law in Poland and in the collapse of the strike agitation among the students.

* * *

The Shah's troops have abandoned the siege of Tabriz, their commander, Ain-ed-Dowleh, has thrown up the sponge, and nobody else is anxious to try where he has failed. Even the Cossacks do not want to leave Teheran, and everything points to despair in the heart of the Shah and his imminent collapse. Just at this moment the official Russian News Agency and the "Novoe Vremya," whose relations with the Russian Foreign Office are notorious, have begun to agitate for armed intervention by Russia and the sending of an expedition to Tabriz "to restore order." Coming at the moment when the Shah seems on the point of being compelled to yield to the will of his people, this proposal gives the very worst impression of Russian good faith in Persia. It is some satisfaction that a section of the Russian Press denounces it, and we trust that the Russian Government will show that it has no thought of committing so gross an outrage on international decency. The best proof it could give of its sincerity would be to recall its officers in the Shah's service. Such a step would precipitate a settlement, and it is a measure long overdue.

* * *

The vacant places in the Government have been filled up by transferring Mr. McKinnon Wood from the Under-Secretaryship of the Board of Education to the Under-Secretaryship of Foreign Affairs, and by appointing Mr. Charles Trevelyan to succeed Mr. McKinnon Wood. Mr. Trevelyan is sure to do well as a Minister, for he has ability and unbounded interest in political work. The choice of office for Mr. McKinnon Wood is a surprise. He is a very able man, with an experience both of political leadership and of the highly skilled administrative work of which the London County Council is the centre. But, unless he is meant to stimulate and direct the very necessary work of strengthening the commercial side of the diplomatic service, it seems strange to set a municipal statesman to work in the very different line of foreign politics.

The Canadian elections take place on Monday. Imperialism has not been breathed as an issue unless the vigorous campaign of the cotton and woollen manufacturers against "the unpatriotic British preference," as their trade journal calls it, evidences the Imperialist spirit. On all questions of principle there has been no perceptible line of cleavage between Government and Opposition, and the Opposition have concentrated their artillery against the corrupt administration of the Government. Some of the Opposition guns are spiked, not only because their own record in office was bad, but because they have shared in the loss under the Liberal régime; very ugly charges, for instance, are being made against one of their foremost leaders. Nevertheless the tide is rather against the Liberals, who have been in office for twelve years. The Conservatives claim to be sweeping Ontario, and making a great breach in Quebec. Sir Wilfred Laurier, however, has the overwhelming majority of 66 in a House of 214 members, and impartial observers do not think it likely to be cut down by much more than half. Probably the North West and British Columbia will decide the issue.

* * *

France and Spain have sent their second joint Note to the Powers with regard to the recognition of Mulai Hafid. The bald official summary does not permit much in the way of criticism, but the emphasis seems to be strong on Morocco's financial obligations, real and asserted. Judging from an interview which a French journalist has had with Mulai Hafid, the Sultan is determined not to allow any European Power to acquire political control over his territory, and will need much careful and diplomatic handling if his profound distrust of France is to be diminished. He is fully conscious of the strength of his position, which is becoming more firm every week. The latest of his enemies to be attacked is the Pretender, El Roghi. That chief's own followers are turning against him, and the Riff tribes are gathering to put the territory he rules under the sway of Mulai Hafid, who promises to exercise a wider and more powerful authority over Morocco than any of his predecessors for generations. El Roghi, even when conquered, will, however, leave his legacy of difficulties behind, for he has given many extensive concessions to Spanish financiers, which will have to come under review.

* * *

Charles Eliot Norton, the American scholar, died on Wednesday at Cambridge, Massachusetts, aged eighty-one. He represented the last living link at once with the classical society of American writers of the middle nineteenth century—Emerson, Lowell, Longfellow, Holmes—and with their great English companionship. The intimate friend of Ruskin and Carlyle, Professor Norton's life, full and wonderfully varied as it was, may be said to have been divided between association with great minds, the cultivation of his own wide powers of scholarship and reflection, and the teaching and inspiring of the young through his Professorship at Harvard. On his pupils he left an impression as enduring as that which his larger friendships left behind them. Ruskin appears always to have leant heavily upon him, Carlyle to have influenced his mind most powerfully. His own chief contribution to literature lay in his studies and translations of Dante. His mind was cosmopolitan rather than purely American, and his affection for English letters, and his many close ties with our country, deeply coloured it. But, like Lowell, he was a great American patriot.

Politics and Affairs.

THE GOVERNMENT AND THE UNEMPLOYED.

The proposals outlined by Mr. Asquith on Wednesday for the relief of the present distress were properly described by him as anodynes. They do not profess to be anything but palliating measures, which the want of foresight universal in our political life drives us to substitute for any far-reaching attempt to cut at the roots of the evil. Such an attempt, however, we shall witness, no doubt, next Session. For the moment we have to consider the value of the Government programme as a measure for meeting the acute distress of the present season. The essence of these proposals lies in the increase of the Government grant from £150,000 to £300,000, and the relaxation of the rules by which the Local Government Board had hindered its efficient application. The larger figures which Mr. Asquith set forth do not appear to us to have so intimate a bearing upon the problem. At any rate their effect is not readily measurable. The Admirality, for example, is accelerating naval works to the amount of some £2,500,000. They are, that is to say, placing contracts to that amount some six weeks earlier than they would have placed them but for the present slackness of trade. We are not much in love with the plan of making the existence of unemployment a reason for increasing or accelerating expenditure on naval and military objects. But in any case it is clear that it is but the merest fraction of the figure given that will contribute in any way to the relief of the present distress. Nor can we quite understand why Mr. Asquith, in his desire to give the House a thoroughly lucid statement of his policy, should have thought it relevant to introduce the number of extra hands which are always taken on by the Post Office towards Christmas time. He did not tell us that the Post Office contemplated any special addition to the number this year, and it would seem that the effect of mentioning such a figure could only be to diffuse an ill-founded sense of security as to the immediate future. Nor do we take Mr. Haldane's Special Reserve too seriously. It will not meet the worst cases—those of heads of families—and we are not at all sure, considering the conditions of service, that it will not tend to remove men from the regular ranks of industry and aggravate the problem for a future season.

There remain the loans raised by municipalities for public works. Here, again, the figures on a first reading look large. Loans to the amount of some £1,500,000, we are told, have been raised with the consent of the Local Government Board for works "in which the employment of the unemployed in the locality was declared to be the object of the application." If a million and a half were about to be spent in wages among the unemployed we should hear little more of the crisis. But, of course, this expenditure has only an indirect relation to the receipts of those whom we all desire to benefit. How much of it actually goes to the unemployed no one can say. There is, however, an available measure of the amount which the public is actually asked to spend in relief. The plan on which these loans are administered is that, so far as possible, local bodies use the labor of the unemployed in the work, that an estimate is made of the excess in the cost of the work due to this cause, and the difference is made up by the Local Government Board out of the Parliamentary grant. How great the difference is Mr. Asquith could not say: it might be five, it might be forty per cent. of the total. But whatever it is in any given locality, it will come out of the sum placed in the hands of the Local Government Board. That is to say, unless this grant is enlarged, it is not to exceed £300,000. When all the millions have been analysed that figure remains, not, indeed, as the total sum that may go to the unemployed in wages through the year, but as the maximum which they are to cost the public. The nation, then, is not in danger of being over-burdened with the cost of the Government's proposal.

In several quarters it has been proposed that, apart from the aid given by the Government, municipalities should have the power to raise a penny rate, not, as now, for purposes of machinery or the hire of land alone, but for direct expenditure on relief works. Mr. Asquith rejects this proposal on several grounds. He urges that it would not be used, but that, of course, is a point on which the municipalities themselves could best judge, and surely it is one on which London, Liverpool, and Manchester are capable of judging. If they did not levy the rate, no harm would be done. He urged, also, that the total amount which a penny rate would produce was small. It would come to £370,000 if levied in all the distressed districts, including London. This sum may be small for the purpose, but it exceeds by £70,000 the national grant which he proposes to make. He argued, lastly, that much more money would be made available by loan, and here the millions come into play again. But these millions, be it remembered, have ultimately to be paid for out of the rates, and the real question is this: is it better to levy a rate, and pay out of income for what are frankly admitted to be relief works, so that the bulk of the expenditure will go to the unemployed, or is it better to borrow for works which are not admitted to be relief works, and some fraction of which will go to the unemployed? We should have thought there were merits in the plan of paying as you go, and of knowing what precisely you are spending on the specific object of relief. In any case, it would seem desirable to give municipalities the option of choosing between the two policies, and to set them free to go their own way, without being subject in every instance to the control of the Local Government Board. Manchester is well able to initiate and control a policy of local relief for its unemployed.

Be this as it may, the positive benefits of Mr. Asquith's plan, when analysed out, resolve themselves into two. The grant is increased by one half, and the conditions of its administration are rendered more elastic. The receipt of poor relief, or of previous aid under the Act in two successive winters, is no longer to disqualify a man for further assistance. There remains Mr. Asquith's promise that more aid will be forthcoming, if necessary, and this, we fear, we must consider the best part of his speech. We have, unfortunately, little doubt of the necessity, and we fear that the moment when the friends of the unemployed will have to ask for more will come only too soon.

HOW ENGLAND CAN HELP TURKEY.

It is the worst penalty for the weakness of the past, that a Turkey in process of transformation is compelled to face an enemy beyond her frontiers, as well as an enemy at home. The internal reaction has already begun to set problems to the reformers. A trivial incident in a Constantinople slum serves to show that the garrison of Yildiz Palace retains the loose discipline and the fanatical instincts in which Abdul Hamid had trained it. In Armenia, though the fraternisation between the Liberal Turks and the Christians has been complete and sincere, the Kurdish tribesmen can still be used to carry out murders. In North Albania, which is about as far behind the South, as the Highlands of Scotland were behind the Lowlands in 1745, there are also signs of a return to intolerance. These sparse symptoms of reaction are important, because it was the Kurds, the North Albanians, and the Yildiz garrison which were in the past the pillars of the Hamidian régime. Whether by accident, or as the result of an underground intrigue, the shocks which the foreign enemies of the new order have dealt it from abroad, have already begun to produce their inevitable after-effects at home. It is on this unstable equilibrium in Turkey itself that the Austrians and their seconds are experimenting. The fate of Bosnia, the status of Bulgaria, the future of Crete—these are merely pawns in the larger game which the Great Powers are playing, to check or to further the Turkish renaissance. A reactionary Turkey would be once more the destined prey of German and Austrian expansion; a free Turkey will be an insuperable barrier to the Drang nach Osten. The attitude of some of the Powers in this duel for the soul of the Turkish people is sufficiently clear. England, with France in the second line, has been the enthusiastic friend of the new movement. Austria and Germany are as decidedly on the other side. It is in the attitude of Russia that the clue to the future lies, and on Sir Edward Grey's ability to keep Russia loyally within the Liberal camp, that the success of our efforts to assist the Young Turks may ultimately depend.

The traditional attitude of the Russian governing class is, unquestionably, as hostile to Turkey as that of our own is friendly. The antagonism rests not upon a resentment of all the atrocities and oppressions of the past, but upon a long memory of incessant wars, upon an almost physical prejudice, half racial and half religious, and upon a reading of destiny, which, for more than a century, has taught Russians to look for their own aggrandisement to the collapse of a Turkey in decay. It was the simple consequence of this attitude, that, from the time of General Ignatieff to the Mürzsteg programme of yesterday, Russian policy has always opposed any symptom or suggestion of reforms which might save and regenerate Turkey. During the first days of the revolution, M. Tsinovieff, the Ambassador in Constantinople, publicly expressed his hostility to the new movement, and a semi-official Havas telegram from St. Petersburg even spoke of Russian proposals to suppress the Young Turkish revolt. This early phase of instinctive dislike was followed by apparent acquiescence, but M. Isvolsky, at the time of his meetings with Baron von Aerenthal and Signor Tittoni, was, apparently, prepared to join in the Austrian policy of provocation and dismemberment. Two influences have drawn him into the opposite camp. Sir Edward Grey, with French backing, has induced him to postpone his schemes of "compensation," and to join the ranks—as it is naïvely put—of the "disinterested" Powers. There is some reason to consider this sudden conversion sincere. For M. Isvolsky had hardly struck his bargain with Baron von Aerenthal when a revolt against his policy declared itself in the Russian Press. The spoliation of Turkey, as Austria had designed it, involved also a disloyalty to the Slavs of Bosnia and Servia, which popular sentiment in Russia very properly regarded with indignation. While that complication lasts, Russia cannot make common cause with the German Powers. The result, for the moment, has been to consolidate the triple entente of England, Russia, and France. But it would be a mistake to suppose that either public or official opinion in Russia shares the disinterested and sympathetic attitude of England towards the Young Turkey movement. Russian public opinion is rather anti-Austrian than pro-Turkish, and it is so because it is Pan-Slavist. The Russian Court, while it patronises the Black Hundreds, can hardly admire the Young Turks, nor the bureaucracy desire to aid Parliamentarism abroad, while it "thanks God," as the Finance Minister put it, "that there is no Parliament in Russia."

Sir Edward Grey's task is at the best one of the utmost delicacy. Doubtful as we are of the policy of an intimate rapprochement with Russia, we cannot refrain from congratulating him on his success in detaching Russian diplomacy from the Austrian intrigue. The worst disaster of all for Turkey would have been the conclusion of a bargain between the three Empires, to despoil and ruin her. Their co-operation would have neutralised French sympathies, and a group so powerful might have used all the Balkan States as its tools. To secure the goodwill of Russia, even temporarily, for the Turkish renaissance, is an achievement which is worth some sacrifice—provided it does not involve a sacrifice of the very principle at stake. But emphatically it would not be worth the price which Russia originally demanded. We have no selfish interest in confining the Russian Fleet within the Black Sea—the "Potemkin" and her mutinous or obsolete consorts can never be a danger to our naval position in the Mediterranean. But to allow Russian vessels to pass the Straits, without also demanding the entry for ourselves, would be to subject the Turkish capital undefended to the constant menace of coercion. If Russian vessels could terrorise Constantinople unchecked, much as the fleets of all the Powers used in the old days to descend on Mytilene, Turkey would be independent only in name. To consent to such a "concession" as this would be to hand over the Turkish people, tied and bound, to their traditional enemy. It is essential to prevent the accession of Russia to the hostile Austrian group. But the suggestion that England and Russia proposed to act in strict concert in Turkey as they have done in Persia, might ruin our influence and invite the very disasters which we dread. The problem for Sir Edward Grey is how, if possible, to secure the co-operation or neutrality of Russia in Turkey, without allowing her an opening to repeat her Persian exploits.

There are several obvious ways in which we can assist the Young Turkey movement in its double work of construction and defence. Any concession which adds to the real independence of Turkey must increase the prestige of her Liberals, and though it is too soon to abolish the Capitulations, it is feasible to assist her to regain the liberty to control her foreign trade, to modify her tariffs, and to tax resident foreigners. She will need financial assistance, if the more friendly Powers will join us, in a loan, and the aid of expert administrators. But for our part, we should be prepared to go further than this. Until she is secured against the intrigues of neighbours who covet each a fragment of her territory, she must either ruin herself in armaments or buy the alliance of some interested Power. The boon which would most certainly assure the success of her Reform movement would be a limited guarantee from a circle of Powers, while she maintains her constitution, of her independence and territorial integrity. We recently gave to Spain, a less deserving and interesting client, such a guarantee, in concert with France. The North Sea Agreement furnishes another parallel. But whatever model were followed, and whatever degree of sanction or assent were afterwards sought from other Empires, it is for the Liberal Powers to make the guarantee a reality. A guarantee from England and France, with Russia assenting, would be a security for the Liberal régime. A guarantee from all the Powers would have no unity of principle behind it, and it would mean no more than the Treaty of Berlin. The choice of the means is a matter for careful enquiry and negotiation. But on the end—the use of all our influence and all our prestige to secure the triumph of Turkish Liberalism—English opinion is unanimous and decided. In no country in the world is Liberalism fighting for so large a stake. There is involved not only the peace of Eastern Europe, and the happiness of oppressed races, but the destiny of the East, and the future of the millions who profess the Mohammedan faith. The success of the Turks carries with it the regeneration not of their race alone, but of every Moslem people which realises that the Caliph has become a limited and constitutional sovereign. The Young Turks have shaken the passive Oriental acceptance of despotism, and challenged the secular tradition which declared that Asiatics are "naturally slaves." For a Liberalism, conscious of the play of world forces, to forward the success of such a movement would be worth sacrifices and efforts; its failure would complicate our tasks in two Continents. Sir Edward Grey has done well; he should be given every encouragement to pursue the work he so bravely and opportunely began.

THE PROGRESS OF THE LICENSING BILL.

The debate on the Licensing Bill in Committee is proceeding as satisfactorily as the system of closure by compartments without any machinery for the selection of amendments for discussion will permit. Ministers have considerably strengthened the claim of their measure to the title of a comprehensive scheme of licensing reform by applying the time limit to off licences. Mr. Harcourt on Tuesday afternoon said that he believed it was universally admitted that off licences have no monopoly value now. It would be interesting to know by what process he has arrived at such a belief. Beer off licences have had a steadily increasing monopoly value since the legislation of 1880 and 1882 first gave Justices effective power to prevent their creation. Wine and spirit off licences have obtained a monopoly value through the Licensing Act of 1902, which gave a similar power with regard to new licences, but gave statutory protection to existing licence holders. Off licences now number over 25,000, and ten million pounds is not an excessive estimate of their monopoly value. They are passing year by year into the hands of brewers, and if they had been left outside the scope of the time limit, as was originally proposed, all the energies of the trade restricted by the Bill would have been devoted to stimulating the sale of liquor on and from off licensed premises. Mr. Balfour said in the earlier part of the Session that the question of off licences was the touchstone of the Government's sincerity. Ministers have answered to the test, and already the Opposition, who allowed the amendment to pass without challenge, are asking for an opportunity of discussing it.

In their dealing with the question of Local Option, the Government have not shown themselves to equal advantage. We pointed out the day after the Bill was introduced that its clear effect, which could never have been intended, was to give to a bare majority in any licensing district the power to prohibit the issue of any licences, new or old. The trade have used this provision against the Government at every bye-election, and yet it is only since the House reassembled that a majority of two-thirds has been substituted for a bare majority. Moreover, the amendment making the alteration has been put in such a form as to raise a protest from two of the ablest supporters of the Bill—Sir Thomas Whittaker and Mr. Sherwell. It was, in our opinion, unnecessarily enlarging the area of controversy with opponents, and terminating the truce that has hitherto happily prevailed among different sections of temperance reformers, to attempt to interfere with the discretion of a future Parliament by any directing provisions as to the exercise of local control at the end of the time limit. But if any such direction were given, it should not have been one which appeared, by simply mentioning prohibition and reduction of licences, to indicate these as the only forms local option might take. Those who have studied most exhaustively and scientifically the licensing systems of this and other countries have been most profoundly impressed by the futility of leaving the conduct of a trade admittedly capable, if unregulated, of working untold harm to the Commonwealth, in the hands of those whose only interest in it is that of financial gain. It was a mistake to discourage those who hope to find an opportunity, when the close of the time limit gives a free hand to the State, of showing a more excellent way. We are glad to see that since Tuesday night's debate the Government have altered their position in this respect. The Prime Minister on Thursday gave Mr. J. A. Bright most satisfactory assurance that on the report stage of the Bill all the various possible methods of local control will be given an equal chance.

The cardinal provision of the Bill, that of the recovery of public control over licences after a time limit, has emerged scatheless from the ordeal of discussion in Committee. In defending it, the Prime Minister showed to the best advantage those powers of lucid statement and argumentative challenge in which he has no rival in the House of Commons. The attack of the Opposition on this, the vital part of the Bill, was surprisingly feeble. Mr. Balfour, supple in wrist as he is, had to admit once more, to the chagrin of some of his followers, that there is no necessary injustice in a time limit, though, of course, he reiterated his contention that it is unjust when coupled with a levy for compensation purposes. But even with this qualification the admission surrenders the whole case against the principle of a time limit. If the provision of a sinking fund, and the payment of the compensation charge, constitute too heavy a burden on the trade, it is simply a question of cash. The maximum yield of the compensation charge under the Balfour Act is a little more than a million and a quarter per annum. The extension of the time limit by seven years would reduce the annual amount necessary to be accumulated to replace licence values on its termination by over two millions a year. If, therefore, the fourteen years' time limit would be just were there no compensation charge, a twenty-one years' time limit would be not merely just but generous. We are glad that the Prime Minister has intimated his willingness to make some concession on the question of the time limit when the Bill reaches the report stage. We greatly dislike the precise method which he has adumbrated—that of giving licences which survive the reduction period a seven years' freedom from monopoly value and compensation charges, subject nominally, at any rate, to the possibility of extinction under local veto or magisterial discretion. On this point we shall take an opportunity of enlarging next week.

But some extension of the time limit is, we think, both sound policy and good strategy. No doubt soundly financed companies could, without difficulty, make the sinking fund provision which a fourteen years' time limit would render necessary. But to thousands of shareholders in the numerous weak and badly financed companies the Bill, if enacted without amendment, would mean serious loss. Many of them have been foolish and have no claim in justice for greater consideration than the original proposals of the Government would have given them. But it is sound statesmanship, when making a change in the policy of the State, to minimise, so far as is consistent with the realisation of the ends sought by that change, the financial loss which it brings to individuals. To those earnest advocates of the Bill who count such an argument as this of little weight, we would point out that the offer of a concession on this point has already, by general consent, increased the chances, for some time past believed to be very slight, of securing it a second reading in the House of Lords.

To achieve such a result Ministers are justified in sacrificing everything but the essentials of their measure. To its carrying they have devoted, and rightly devoted, the greater part of the most important and critical Session of the present Parliament. For it they have braved, and rightly braved, the loss of several bye-elections, and at all events a temporary loss of popularity with the electorate. If they fail to carry it, no Government for the next ten, nay, perhaps for the next twenty years, will attempt so comprehensive and far-reaching an effort to deal with the licensing question. The alternative policy of the taxation of licences may be financially worse for the trade, and is fiscally and scientifically justifiable enough, but it gives no such promise of fundamental temperance reform as does the present Bill. And the measure of the sacrifices its authors have made for it is the measure of their responsibility to see that nothing is wanting on their part in foresight, in strategy, and, if need be, in willingness to compromise on non-essentials, to secure its passage into law.

THE PERSONALITY OF MR. BURNS.

The restricted character of the Government's programme of temporary relief for the unemployed must, we suppose, be attributed to Mr. Burns, and will be regarded as the victory of a view of unemployment which the President of the Local Government Board holds in common with the bulk of Conservative and middle-class opinion in England and with a section of the Liberal Party. There is, indeed, a certain irony in Mr. Burns's association with it. The President of the Local Government Board came into public life as the leader of the most turbulent demonstration of unemployed people that London has ever known, and he has not formally disavowed the Socialist views on which his brilliant early career as an agitator was built. Mr. Burns did something more than climb the parapet of the building in Downing-street where he recently held sway. He was one of the founders of the New Unionism, that is to say, of the force in trade unionism which, though not confined to unskilled labor, brought in a body of new recruits, and strongly emphasised both the political side of the trade union movement and its Socialistic tendencies. Mr. Burns, therefore, was brought into the business of Government by the same kind of flow in ideas and the same tendencies in workmen's politics as those which gave responsibility to men like M. Briand and M. Millerand. He has been the first manual workman asked to join a British Cabinet; he has been the first Socialist called on to shape the practical policy of one of the historic English parties. The fact that his admission to Cabinet rank coincided with the formation of a Parliamentary Labor Party, of great numerical strength, of thoroughly representative character, formed, in the main, on the lines of his own action as an independent personality, added weight to his position, and gave him a great, and one would have thought, an unmistakable, message to maintain touch between the two divisions of the progressive forces. It is, we suppose, no secret that Mr. Burns has been unable to keep this contact, and that if the Government and the Labor Party are in disagreement on the problem of unemployment, where they might well have come to an understanding, the President of the Local Government Board bears his share of responsibility for that decision. We are by no means quarrelling with all that Mr. Burns has said and done on unemployment. He was, in our opinion, wise in resisting the Bill of last year. His sense of the danger of dislocating the regular labor market, and of weakening the character of individual workers by drawing them into a slatternly, half-dependence on badly-organised relief works, is creditable to his instinct as a skilled workman, and to his feeling of loyalty to his class.

Where we have been unable to follow Mr. Burns is in the almost purely negative character of his attitude both to unemployment and to the general mission of the Labor Party in Parliamentary politics. We should have thought that Mr. Burns and the Labor Party would have regarded each other as natural allies. His language has sometimes suggested that he looks at them as deadly enemies, corruptors of the intelligence and morale of the British workman. We should have said that his special business in the Government was to see that Liberalism and Labor marched as far together as their principles and tactics allowed, and that both were kept in being as necessary elements in the opposition to reaction and Protection. Mr. Burns has not accepted the rôle which his earlier career seemed to mark out for him. He has, indeed, ignored it. He has developed into a good, stiff administrator of a conservative type, scrupulously honest, heavy-handed, and rightly so, in his dealings with public offenders. He has interested and amused the public, for striking personalities are rare, and Mr. Burns is not only a political artist of distinction, but he stands for a type of British statesmen whom only light-minded men would treat with disrespect. He has been faultless in his discharge of the ceremonial dignities of his office. He has, indeed, failed in none of the points where his more malicious critics, and they, we are sure, are few, predicted failure. It appears to us, therefore, the more regrettable that so acceptable a public servant should seem to decline or to despair of the task he was set to undertake. Therein lies a source of danger to the Government and the Liberal Party, and an obstacle to a highly honorable and even brilliant career. Mr. Burns, with his intimate knowledge of the workman's life, might have been an invaluable element during the years when, under Conservative leadership, an attempt, even a blundering and ill-advised attempt, was being made to find ways out of the besetting trouble of unemployment. It was not possible to arrive at once at the solution. But there were many avenues of tentative, explorative work. Mr. Burns has checked some extravagances in the conduct of labor colonies, and as good action may be negative as well as positive, we shall not disparage it. But by language and by deeds he has also, we think, discouraged experiment when, above all things, the social reformer desired to see such experience carefully and thoughtfully tested, even at the cost of some unremunerative work. He has spoken with favor of afforestation, a sound, and, so far as we know, a widely accredited remedy for unemployment. But he has done little to promote it. He might, we think, have given greater freedom to the municipalities, and we see no point, and no real contact with the spirit of Liberalism, in the refusal to allow them to devote rates to the payment of wages to the unemployed. He has been quite right to stop positive, well-ascertained cases of lax administration, and to see to it that the moral of such failures sank into the public mind. But he has sometimes spoken as if unemployment were a moral disease of the British workman, instead of a regular and invariable incident in the course of modern industry. Under his rule his Department, which for many years has worked in the fetters that an able but narrow administrator devised for the cramping of English local government, has fallen short of the generally high level of activity which this Government has set up. Mr. Burns's office, to the surprise of Liberals, has been the most conservative office in the Government.

The line of extreme caution we have indicated is perfectly natural in Mr. Burns, and entirely honest. But it would be idle to pretend that while he pursues it he gives the country and the Government the kind of advising and propelling force that the late Prime Minister hoped to find in him. He may reply to us, with much force, that he prefers to be himself, and to that our only rejoinder can be that politicians, no more than other men, can live to themselves alone, and that those who most admire an original and highly interesting character, raised by its own worth to a position of singular eminence, must desire to see it employed in the service which made Mr. Burns a great public man.

Life and Letters.

METHODS OF MELODRAMA.

SOMEWHERE in the pale-green back files of an esteemed contemporary is to be found a picture with the immortal initials of F. C. G., wherein may be seen John Bull, once the sedate, bedizened with peacocks' feathers and dancing a dance both wild and weird. In the background, if the files of our own memory serve us well, may be seen foreign faces agape with astonishment, and beneath is some such legend as this: "What, he too can make a fool of himself!" It was the Mafficking time, when London surprised itself and the world by showing how silly it could be if it tried. Men held it to be a temporary insanity, but it was an insanity which displaced a habit, shook a tradition, and lowered a pride. Down to the Mafficking time John Bull was wont to thank God that he was not as other men are, noisy, emotional, excitable, theatrical, or even as these Frenchmen; that he was not accessible to sentimental appeals, nor moved by words, or by anything but the most matter of fact considerations, not given to outward shows, nor amenable to mob rule. He hated a scene, and those who made scenes. If he suffered he grinned and bore it. If his children suffered he expected them to bear it till the moment for action came, and then to rise suddenly and strike swiftly, to say little and do much. We have changed all that. In these days of newspaper sensation we have discovered that the way to succeed is not to reason, but if we may coin a verb of which the times have need, to unreason, not to talk sense, but nonsense, not to organise and marshal real forces, but to display sham forces, not to act but to advertise. It is the age of the advertiser, and who cares what is behind an advertisement? The greater the fraud the greater the cleverness in making it appear real. If your army are men in buckram, all the smarter of you to pass them off for real soldiers. If your jewels are tinsel, the greater your audacity in winning admiration for them as genuine. We admire your audacity, we laugh at your cleverness, and, far from being angered at your deceit, we thank you cordially for the laugh.

People with a cause have caught the trick. They have learnt that the first of all objects is to arrest attention. Study in all things notoriety. Make people talk about you. If you cannot do it otherwise, do it by standing on your head in the Strand. Then they must turn round and stare. By standing on your head you may relieve the unemployed, who might starve for anything argument, statistics, appeals to justice, sympathy, pity can do. Do not appeal to other people's heads, but stand on your own and tickle their fancy for the absurd. This man, they will say, has hit on a new method of advertising. He is one of us. He is up-to-date. Let us find out what he wants and give it him quickly lest he should begin to bore us with reasons. Here are a score of men sitting down in Trafalgar Square. Why sit in Trafalgar Square? It is hard and draughty. It is absurd to sit in Trafalgar Square. But that is precisely why you should sit there if you want to get anything done. You sit there to prove that tens of thousands of people ought to have work found for them, and it is the kind of proof that the public appreciates. Being a slender, fragile woman you hurl yourself against a serried rank of well-fed constables. You do that to prove that you have moral force on your side, and that you are right. It is the kind of proof that the public appreciates.

It is the temper of the public that decides how it shall be addressed. It is the "great sophist" that corrupts writers, speakers, agitators, organisers, imposing on them the need for rhetoric, for fallacies, for melodrama, for antics. If we try to put the blame on the agitators, could they not reply that they tried reasonable methods and failed? "We piped unto you," they might say to the great unheeding mass, "and ye have not danced." Still more truly, "We mourned unto you and ye have not wept." The great world goes on its way, a vast unheeding machine, grinding out its daily tale of work and pleasure, of wealth for one, and livelihood for another, and misery for a third. What shall stop it for one moment, and force it to give heed to the cry of injustice or suffering? It is too vast to be human, too complex to understand itself. Democracy, men thought in old days, was to give every one a voice. True, the majority would always have its own way, and individuals might sometimes find themselves roughly over-ridden. But at least they would have a voice. The very smallest minority would at least be able to speak for itself. And speak it can. But how is it to make its voice heard in all the clamour? The cry of the causes goes up like the confusion of the battle roar from all sides. John Bull, not wishing to be unkind or unjust, is at first ready to listen. But soon the din is too great for him and the clamour too confusing. There are too many claimants on his grace; they all want different things, and they will not give one another time to speak. Dimly he realises that each grievance raises complex and different problems, which he thinks he would like to investigate. But before he has fairly settled down to his books, another claimant from the other end of the world jogs his elbow. The end of it is that, on his side, John Bull is inclined to condemn all reformers as a nuisance, and to shut his ears to all grievances, in order to escape sheer mental distraction and imbecility. On the other side, the reformers and the grievances become clamorous. Each sees that its own sole chance of getting attention is to drown the noise of all the rest. It lets reason, dignity, truth, go by the board, and guides itself by the example of the importunate widow. Not by argument, not by its merits, is the cause to prevail, but by the capacity of its exponents to make themselves objectionable. They will make it more uncomfortable for John Bull to be deaf than to listen; or they will divert him by antics and absurdities. All is fair in agitation and advertisement. The one supreme object is to catch the eye and ear—never mind how staring the colours employed, or how raucous the sound.

The fault, then, is not wholly with those who use theatrical methods. It is public stupidity, public slowness, public indifference to the things that affect the national welfare, public susceptibility to absurdities that tickle the fancy, that discourage reasonable and stimulate ridiculous methods of propaganda. But ought we not, in justice to both sides, to admit another element as well? Suppose the methods not merely theatrical, suppose that the collisions with the police, in which most of them are designed to end, involve some physical discomfort for the performers, may we not say that, unconsciously perhaps, society is asking and they are giving something more than a mere dramatic display? May we say that the modern test of a cause is a mitigated form of the ordeal by suffering which throughout civilised history has been the test of all causes? There is an impulse, not wholly irrational, to gauge the cause by the sincerity of its advocates, and the sincerity of its advocates by the measure of their will to endure on its behalf. For a Russian revolution this test is a tremendous reality. For us it has become something like a formula or a show, and it is often hard to say, in an individual case, whether the joys of notoriety outweigh, or are outweighed by, the discomforts of a modern martyrdom, with newspaper paragraphs and photographs of the victims in the most picturesque circumstances all complete. At any rate, to be just, we must admit the more serious blent with the purely theatrical element partly redeeming it. But when the best is said, the growth of this method of appeal is not one of the signs on which the enthusiast for democracy, if such a one survives, would care to dwell. John Bull in old days was, perhaps, a bit too solid. He was a dull old gentleman at times, and his respectability was overdone. But, at least, he was not silly, and his dislike of ostentation, of melodrama, had in it something which commanded the respect of a world which his starchiness irritated. At least he got through his work and built up a reputation for his power of reconciling free and full discussion with the efficient conduct of affairs. This reputation, we fear, is dwindling, and must dwindle. Discussion cannot go on in a bawling crowd, nor affairs be conducted efficiently by a performing troupe.

HEART OF FIRE.

"See me there," wrote Augustine on the book of his confessions, "and praise me not more than I deserve; there believe not others about me, but myself; there mark me, and see what I was in myself, by myself; and if aught in me pleases thee, then praise with me, Whom, and not myself, I wished to be praised for me." Lord Acton included this life history amongst the three greatest formative books of the world; historically it would be difficult to dispute his verdict. This sumptuous edition, "The Confessions of St. Augustine" (Seely & Co.), comes but in the intermediate stages of the book, whose life is numbered not by years, but by centuries; which will live as long as the human heart is curious about the past, or in any ways troubled and inspired by longing to know the meaning of the world. It is the solid ground as much as the effort beyond the horizon which has given this work an earthly mortality. Visitors to Pompeii are familiar with a sudden thrill of wonder—expected beforehand, discounted, and yet at the moment dominant—at the intimate revelation of the life of an age. It is excited not by the temples, the aqueducts, the civilisation which has changed, but by the civilisation which remains. A rope is flung across the unfathomable abyss of time; and beyond is man and his hopes and desires, scarcely distinguishable from yesterday. It is the coins and rings, the inscriptions to children and dumb animals, the injunctions to vote upon the walls, the corn and fruit and flowers still unfaded, which reveal the little detail of a little span of days. And the same impression is created by these confessions. Set amid a theology of mystical splendour, encompassed by invocations and passionate prayers, with a background of heaven and hell casting dim lights and shadows over the trodden world, here is a life discovered, unchanged, across the gulf of a thousand years. It is a scene, at the first, of tranquillity and enjoyment, a settled order. The child grows in the school, accepts Latin but hates Greek, bursts out with the hot spirit of manhood into the riotous pleasures of the senses; repents, sins, repents again; at once in loving and loathing of his offences. The very "accidents" are abiding; fear at lungs giving way with a pain in the chest, adventure during the "vintage vacation," a book found in a cottage, a child crying in a garden, whose crying changed the history of the world. Monica, when young, gets into trouble for licking the wine from her fingers; later, she is troubled by whispering servants; Nebridius and Alypius share with Augustine, professor of rhetoric, the determination to pursue wisdom, wherever it may lead them. The human element is never absent in this, the greatest of the mystics; with others, Carlyle, Teresa, Catherine, adventures into the abysmal depths of personality, abyssus humanæ conscientiæ, never check or minimise the profound realisation of human affections. The comparison is closest with Carlyle. "'Twas the Most High God that made mothers," cried the modern mystic, "and the affection of children's hearts." "Thou createdst her," is the cry from another age, "nor did her father and mother know what a one should come from them." With Carlyle, he had wept at the death of a friend; "finding my heart utterly darkened, and whatever I beheld was death." "Mine eyes sought him everywhere, but he was not granted them: and I hated all places, for that they had not him: nor could they now tell me 'he is coming,' as when he was alive." With Carlyle, he can confess, "I found my repose in bitterness." With Carlyle, also, he can find, in the supreme anguish of sorrow, the insufficiency of tears. "My mother wept," is the confession of "Sartor," "but in my heart there lay a whole lake of tears, pent up in silent desolation." "I closed her eyes," said Augustine, "and there flowed withal a mighty sorrow into my heart, which was overflowing into tears; mine eyes at the same time drank up their fountain wholly dry; and woe was me in such a strife." Later, "behold the corpse was carried to the burial; we went and returned without tears." Only after an attempt at bathing—"having heard," he quaintly explains, "that the bath drives sorrow from the mind, I found my sleep not a little softened"; and "I gave way to the tears which I before restrained, to overflow as much as they desired; reposing my heart upon them."

It is human life set in a great atmosphere, and the human spirit embarking on great adventures and explorations, compared to which the journeys across the visible globe appear but as a very little thing. In other writings Augustine is the master of a precise theology: here he is of the fellowship of all who embark on hazardous enterprises in the kingdom of the soul. We are far, in this atmosphere, from the contempt of the ascetic for earthly beauty. Rather a certain wonder is always present with him at the abiding loveliness of the world. He freely confesses "an attractiveness in beautiful bodies, in gold and silver, and all things." "Worldly honor hath also its glory, and the power of overcoming and of mastery: whence springs also," he declares (it is a personal experience) "the thirst of revenge." "Things beautiful"—he clings to this assertion—"they, out of Thee, and out of the Soul, were not unless they were from Thee." He sees no temptation of the devil—as so many of his predecessors and most of his followers—in the glory of earth, and sea, and sky. Beauty is transient, but it is real—to be rejoiced in and approved. "They rise, and set; and by rising, they begin, as it were, to be; they grow, that they may be perfected; and perfected they wax old and wither; and all grow not old, but all wither." In that great tenth book in which, with a kind of ecstacy, he raises his paean of rejoicing to Life and the Maker of it, he finds all these transitory things united in an exultant hymn of praise. "I asked the earth, and it answered me 'I am not He,' and whatsoever are in it confessed the same. I asked the sea and the deeps and the living, creeping things, and they answered, 'We are not thy God, seek above us.' I asked the moving air, and the whole air with its inhabitants answered, 'Anaximenes was deceived, I am not God.' I asked the heavens, sun, moon and stars, 'Nor' (say they) 'are we the God whom thou seekest.' And I replied unto all the things which encompassed the doors of my flesh, 'Ye have told me of my God, that ye are not He; tell me something of Him.' And they cried out with a loud voice, 'He made us.'"

"The doors of my flesh." Yes, but there was a key to these also, and a door flung open: revealing a ladder set up to heaven and angels ascending and descending. On a quiet day, Augustine and Monica are looking out from a window at Ostia, over the pleasant garden, and discoursing on "the presence of the Truth which Thou art, of what sort the eternal life of the saints was to be." They suddenly penetrate this closed door, as others have passed through it, in all ages and of all regions, into the mystical land beyond. It is a voyage into the great Quiet, which lies behind and untroubled by the noises of the world. The sister souls "did by degrees pass through all things bodily, even the very heavens, whence sun and moon and stars shine upon the earth": outward, into the life whence all life springs—the life to which all life shall one day return. "If to any the tumult of the flesh were hushed, hushed the images of earth, and waters and air, hushed also the poles of heaven—yea! the very soul be hushed to herself, and by not thinking on self, surmount self—hushed all dreams and imaginary revelations, every tongue and every sign"; then—"could this be continued on"—what glory might be revealed in the exaltation of a Quiet which earth's noises have hidden! "Life might be for ever like that one moment of understanding which now we sigh after: were not this, enter unto thy Master's joys." And when shall that be? "When we shall all be risen again, though we shall not all be changed."

The revealing visions come and go; meantime here are the earth and her disquietudes, making little for peace. "The tumult of the flesh" is beating within: without, the Roman civilisation is flickering towards its death; amid the influx of an invader upon an age which has forgotten the old elemental terrors and thought that comfort was the attainment of man's earthly ambitions. The Confessions of Augustine are set in the light of conflagrations and the glare of burning cities: with the world falling to pieces, everything that seemed secure and permanent crashing to the ground. He had found causes distracting to meditation, while peace remained, in a lizard catching flies, a spider entangling them, rushing into her nets. Later he is to find more obvious disturbers of the life which humanity desired and destroyed. Yet through all he could transfer his interests to a sure haven and appeal beyond the revolution of the moon and sun. In these confessions he is occupied with the robbing of a pear tree at Hippo or the satisfaction of a beggar in Milan: occupied also with the question what God did before He created Heaven and Earth, the mystery of time, with past and future alike unreal, the mystery of memory, the object and end of human desire. The ecstacy is sometimes a visible passion, operative through the clamor of the senses. "Thou wert with me," he cries, "but I was not with Thee. Things held me far from Thee, which unless they were in Thee, were not at all. Thou calledst and shoutedst, and burstedst my deafness. Thou flashedst, shonest, and scatteredst my blindness. Thou breathedst odours, and I drew in breath and panted for Thee. I tasted and hunger and thirst. Thou touchedst me; and I burned for Thy peace." But sometimes the note is quiet, as of a sunset: praying for that "Sabaoth's Sight" which has been the goal of longing on so many rough voyages. To the God who is "Unchangeable yet all changing, never new, never old, always working, never at rest," he will cry for rest at the last: "O Lord God, give peace unto us, for thou hast given us all things: the peace of rest, the peace of the Sabbath, which hath no evening."

THE JOLLY WORLD.

Here comes the finest laughter ever laughed! It comes with an entrancing whiff of roast pig, and a splash of red wine on its cheek, and in its hand a never-ending bun. And, see! the man who leads it in, riding upon a monstrous frog, is the imaginative scholar, joint deity of sensitive intellectuals at the old Court Theatre, exquisite translator, for whom Euripides had been waiting twenty centuries. To the joy of an England that knows and cares nothing about Oxford's academics, Mr. Gilbert Murray has this week entered upon the Professorship of Greek, and into those fastidious walls he leads this figure of immortal laughter, with a whiff of garlic round it, and the old red earth sticking to its leggings. The scene is one that Aristophanes himself might have laughed over; but Oxford hardly shivers, remembering how even laughter grows decent with antiquity.

It is the "Frogs" (George Allen) that Mr. Gilbert Murray brings with him to the Professorship, prompted, one might have supposed, by their fitness for the marsh of Christ Church meadows under autumnal rains. But the British frog, even in cultured Oxford, never reaches the sweet variety of the Greek frog's voice. It can say "Brekekekex," but it cannot say "Co-ax, co-ax!" So there must be some other reason, and, perhaps, we find it in the name of Euripides printed at the top of each left-hand page. Is, then, the book only done as a bit of criticism—just to bring in that poetic contest in hell, where the verses of one poet are weighed in lump against another's upon a critical balance that goes up and down like a grocer's scales? If that is so, Oxford can look forward to a fine time over the "Women on Law-and-Order Day," which ought to follow. But it will be a pity if the service of this most creative of translators to the cause of laughter is to stop there. How pleasant to see again in his splendid versions the Jingo warriors, with their flaunting plumes and cheese rinds, the police court trial of the dog that stole the cheddar, the philosopher swinging in his balloon to abstract his thoughts from common earth, the peasant astride the dung-beetle knocking at the gate of heaven to ask if peace is there, the flights of birds chattering in their happy realm, the priest consecrating offerings into a little bag! And look! here come the women in revolt—Suffragettes, every woman of them—rushing the House in men's clothes, holding debates by lamplight, speaking from the Speaker's chair, boasting their Conservatism, voting for Socialism, enacting glorious revolutions, thundering the eloquence of common sense, denouncing silly war, clamorous for peace, inventors of the omnipotent boycott, beautiful and terrible as an army with banners!

And then we may enter into a sunlit land—the jolly world of man's eternal childhood, where the sky drops fatness and earth pours out her kindly fruits. There life is an immortality of cakes and wine. There pork chops frizzle on the grid, hares turn upon the spit, neat girls are boiling soup, the cuttle-fish fries in the onion that it loves, and eels are quiet at last, embedded in beetroot. It is the Feast of Pitchers, and the wine that spouted so mysteriously from berries springing out of stony ground and twisted stem now oozes in purple through the jars. Out of doors a light wind blows across the sunshine, the figs are bursting with ripeness, the olives are turning dark, the corn stands red and heavy under passing clouds, and from the little woods and lakes come the pleasant notes of doves and partridges and quails and snipe and plovers and thrushes and finches and wheatears and widgeons and wild-duck and all things nice. There the sunburnt husbandman goes in and out, happy in his honorable toil and muddy clouts. His friends gather round him for enjoyment, solid, sensible, and silent; unless there is a bit of a wedding on, and then, naturally, a man gives tongue. His wife spreads the table, a jolly creature, too, humoring the masculine pride, winning her will, shrewd in the ways of things, and alluring as a wine-cup. That was the good old stock from which sprang the bulldog breed of Trafalgar and Waterloo! Ah, in those old days our countrymen were men, indeed—big chested, broad shouldered, clear skinned, long of arm, and short of tongue—not like our modern degenerates, all tongue and a long vote!

But where are the boys of the grand old times:—

> "Good six-footers, solid of limb,
> Well-born, well-bred, not ready to fly from obeying their country's call,
> Nor, in latter-day fashion, to loiter and lie, and keep their consciences small;
> Their life was in shafts of ash and of elm, in bright plumes fluttering wide,
> In lance and greaves and corslet and helm, and hearts of sevenfold hide!"

Yes, and there were writers in those good old days—great writers whose swords were mightier than their pens, whose words were half-battles—fine, sounding, long battles beside, with no weak-kneed lucidity about them. But now our youth has fallen into a green-sickness, a melancholy wasting. It worships Clouds instead of the friendly gods. It meditates pessimism and listens to what suicides say. Not one of them has the heart to drown in a butt of Malmsey, or roast a whole ox when the river is frozen over. But they nibble nuts like white mice, they talk of spinach chops, they dare not eat cheese for fear of hurting the mites, they suck a charcoal lozenge after meals, wash it all down with foaming goblets of hot water, and calculate the value of their "body-building sustenance" in terms of calorics.

And then the way they talk! They'd argue the hind leg off a dog to prove white is black and our only general a funk. They are always asking tiresome question, too, and they show no respect for the hoary head and the Front Benches. And as to women! You might think the dear little god of love had died last year to hear them prate about their superwomen and termagant shrews and the crazy cats they stick on the stage and call their heroines! How has this sickly venom dribbled into our race? Does it come of free education or of cheap tea? Oh, before it is too late, let us purge from our system its corrupting kakogenics:—

"Dull, theoretical,
Faddist and doctrinaire,
Abstract, economist,
Ibsenish, Pragmatist,
Jaegerite-woolly-clad,
Cabbage-and-water-fed,
Stewed-in-George-Bernard-sauce,
Fabian rot!"

Let us burn the Thinking Shop of Socrates and all these other Sophists, journalists, essayists, latter-day dramatists, and follow our Master far beyond the low hills of Oxford to that dear Cloud-Cuckoo-Land, that never was on earth or sea, where Falstaff jests for ever beside his sack, and the Abbey of Thelema is always gay with gallant men and ladies no less gallant. There we will make Aristophanes our president of the Anti-Puritan League, and take our oath to observe the Thelemite rule of "Do what thou wilt," because, as its founder said, "men that are free, well-born, well-bred, and conversant in honest companies, have naturally an instinct and spur that prompts them unto virtuous actions."

In that Cloud-Cuckoo-Land, where Bacchus is a jolly god, not maddening the brain or distorting the form of man, we will lie beside the purple juice and think no more of wisdom's charcoal lozenges or of war's mouldy cheese. There we will celebrate the marriage of our President with the fair foreigner, young Oxonia of the West. For the wedding feast we will have pease broth, and red mullet, and some dozens of gammons, and dried neats' tongues, and goose pie with a foundation of black-cocks, and hares, and lambs, and octopus legs in garlic, and dried fruits, and honey-cakes, and sesame puddings, and mince pies, all flavored with a shred of our President's verse. As for drink, the only philosophy we remember is the doctrine of Thales that all things are water, and so we will drink our wines out of fire-buckets. And when the feast is over, we will revel in the hay and dance till midnight on the daisy field with ladies so proper and handsome, so miniard and dainty. For that was the way they had in the good old times, before wisdom and war came to vex the world. That was a way they had in the good old times, which nobody can deny.

So the eternal contest goes on. Here is the jolly world of field and food and fire, in which happiness is poured out like rain and sunshine for all to take their share without robbing a cat. And into the midst of its innocent revelry there stalks intruding that grey and hungry shadow of man's unsatisfied spirit, criticising, questioning, disturbing, and tormented by infinite visions. There it stands, and as we pelt each other with grapes and figs, it keeps murmuring with tiresome persistence of man's unhappiness, and of the greatness from which his unhappiness springs. What an absurdity when it is so easy to be neither unhappy nor great, and there is so short a time for joy before we hear the frogs croaking like passing bells under the keel of old Charon's boat!

ON NURSERY RHYMES.

It is stated in the Press that the United States Education Department has lately recommended that fairy tales should no longer be read in the schools. One can form no guess as to the composition of this earnest band of workers; but by this example we may judge of the deadly nature of their work. Their métier would seem to be the lessening of the joy of the world, the taking from generations yet unborn the capacity for wonder, the power to take a large, unselfish interest in the spectacle of things, the putting them more than ever at the mercy of small private cares. The only imaginative relief from these for the great mass of the people under the fostering care of these educationalists will be found chiefly in the brutalities of the Sunday newspaper, and the worthless "facts" of the American equivalents of "Scraps" and "Answers." One would have thought that glory and loveliness fled away from the modern world fast enough, without being hustled to hasten their flight, and that the type of mind which prefers the contemplation, say, of a motor-car to that of a rainbow, is not in the United States in any need of protection from the deleterious influence of fantasy. But it seems otherwise to the gods of the American educational Olympus.

It looks as though America were taking measures against the danger of producing a poet. Once or twice in a generation a child is born with a generous capacity for detachment, an impersonal delight in the beauty of the world, apart from any private considerations of interest or gain. Then "some evening at an Ionian festival or morning amid the Sabine hills," without effort, without struggle, the sights and sounds of Nature are reflected in lovely words in the clear mirror of the poet's mind.

But if it is the intention to guard against this danger, not only fairy tales in the school, but nursery rhymes in the home, should be banned. A nursery rhyme is the most sane, the most unselfish thing in the world. It calls up some delightful image, a little nut tree with a silver walnut and a golden pear, some romantic adventure, a voyage of the Infanta of Spain, only for the child's delight and liberation from the bondage of unseeing dulness. It brings before its mind the quintessence of some good thing. "The little dog laughed to see such sport." There is the soul of good humor, of sanity, of health in the laughter of the innocently wicked little dog. It is the laughter of pure frolic, without unkindness. To have laughed with the little dog as a child is the best preservative against mirthless laughter in later years—the horse laugh of brutality, the ugly laughter of spite, the acrid laughter of fanaticism. The world of nursery rhymes, the world of "old Mrs. Slipper Slopper," is the world of natural things, of quick, healthy motion, of the joy of living. It is the real world. The world of the Sunday newspapers, "Camberwell's Crime—Mutilated Body found in a Chest," is a fantastic Inferno. The present writer never remembers laughing at anything so much as at "Mrs. Slipper Slopper," unless it were at the "Ballad of Lord Bateman." This last, of course, can hardly be called a nursery rhyme, but one would almost rather have written it than the Divine Comedy.

In nursery rhymes the child is entertained with all the pageant of the world. It walks in fairy gardens, and for it the singing birds sing. All the king's horses and all the king's men pass before it in their glorious array. Craftsmen of all sorts, bakers, confectioners, silversmiths, blacksmiths, are busy for it with all their arts and mysteries, as at the court of an Eastern king. The most delightful pictures in the great picture book of the world are chosen for it, and evoked at will. "Din din, doun," says a Venetian nursery rhyme,

"Tre sorelle in un balcon."

It is a Giorgione or a Titian in five words. One sees the three young sisters, with their golden hair, their hanging strings of pearls, their fans and lace. It is the time of carnations; and on the balustrade over which they lean is a great pot of the superb patrician flowers.

Many rhymes are mothers' excuses for playing with a baby's hands and feet:—

"Shoe the horse and shoe the mare, Let the little foal go bare," can hardly be said without tickling the small naked feet. Again,

"Patty-cake, patty-cake, baker's man,
Bake me a cake as fast as you can—
Pat it and bake it, and mark it with T;
Oh, what a cake for baby and me!"

is accompanied by a play with the hands. The fingers are always counted in repeating

"This little pig went to market,
This little pig stayed at home."

The French begin with the thumb, and say, "This one killed it, this one plucked it, this one cooked it, this one ate it, and this was the sauce," at the last clause drawing the child's little finger round its palm.

Who were the poets, the unknown "makers" of the nursery rhymes, the troubadours, the "finders" of these delightful things? Will there ever be any more? The American Education Department seems to wish to cut off the supply of them in that country. The first requisite of a maker of nursery rhymes would appear to be the joie de vivre. He must be alive and delight in life. The one man living at present in England who might make a nursery rhyme is Mr. Rudyard Kipling. In the opinion of the present writer the snatches of songs scattered here and there about his books are the best of his work:—

"Wheat He gave to rich folk,
Millet to the poor,
Broken scraps to holy men
Who beg from door to door,
Thorn-bush for the camel,
Fodder for the kine,
And mother's heart for sleepy head,
O little son of mine."

This has the note of nursery rhymes. It is not an elaborate description, neither is it a mere enumeration. It is rather a reflection, suffused with joy in what it reflects. "Apple tree with apples on," says the rhyme of the willow pattern plates. It points out to us with delight that most beautiful sight on earth, an old tree loaded with red apples in September. We look, and grey though our world may be, dominated more and more by ethical and philanthropic dulness, the vision is a pledge and token to us of a red glow at the heart of things.

Letters from Abroad.

THE CHANCES OF THE TURKISH REFORMERS.

CONSTANTINOPLE, OCTOBER 15TH.

To an observer of Western politics there is something almost unintelligible in the order with which the Turkish Revolution goes on its way. Here is an attempt to reconcile one of the most copious mixtures of peoples, half-civilised and uncivilised, in the world, holding forms of faith that have mutually repelled and warred on each other for over a thousand years. Here is an old theocracy overturned in an hour, with hardly more fuss than if it were a milk cart in a London suburb. Here is a city almost ungoverned, with only a handful of incompetent police, and no municipal power worth speaking of, with all men free to sell and buy arms, and, in point of fact, with thousands of more or less worthy citizens armed from daily custom, or going home happily in the tram car with the newest type of European revolver in their pockets. No ordinary centre of government exists, save that a half-deposed Sultan, with a popular Grand Vizier at his back, pretends to rule by daily leave of the army and its revolutionary chiefs, with now and then a rude reminder that no reaction will be tolerated, and that that dangerous "Swiss guard" of his must be changed. The Ministry leans on a secret Committee of Public Safety. The Parliament has not yet met, and its elements and centre of stability are quite unknown. Here are wild Kurds and Turkish porters, mere beasts of burdens, haunting the crowded quays and alleys by the thousand. Mushroom newspapers appear without regular censorship, issuing tiny leaflets in the shape of special editions, and read to wayfarers in streets and bazaars, who do not even know the Turkish letters. And all this in Ramazan, the fasting month, when nights of feasting succeed to days of prayer and abstinence, and when the force of a simple, but sensational and highly exclusive, creed is brought vividly home to its myriad believers.

As if these factors of peril were not enough, the foreign situation has suddenly seemed to threaten the disruption of the Empire. If it no longer wears this aspect, Turkey has, in the main, to thank Sir Edward Grey. His firm and generous speech, the evident sympathies of the British people, gave the situation the turn it needed, and enabled the reformers to steady their own minds, slightly to tighten the loose reins of local government, and to trample out the first sparks of the reaction. The Sultan was sternly warned, and took the advice. No one knows better than he the precariousness of his position. Indifference would probably be the main feeling in the Empire should the Padishah share the fate of his brother Murad, and should Rechad Effendi be peaceably girded with the sword of Osman. But, indeed, the Hamidian rule may fairly be credited with some share in the calm of the capital in face of the storms of the last three weeks. Abdul Hamid never attempted to govern his people well; but he taught them to obey. Some few months ago, a couple of the Sultan's Albanian guards, with a grievance, suddenly took it into their heads to "hold up" the outer Galata Bridge, along which roll daily the noisy and very diverting currents of the city's life. One man stationed himself at the Galata end, the other at the Stamboul entrance. Both soldiers wore only their side arms. But their uniforms were recognised, and not a man in the throng dared to arrest them or disarm them. Only to their own officers did they yield.

Now, therefore, that the Sultan's frightfully abused power is gone, and that the army, with its favorite leaders restored from long and often painful exile, is against him, the succeeding authority is treated with something of the same unquestioning docility. But, indeed, the Turkish character lends itself to a quietness of method of singular value to a revolutionary movement whose leaders desire that it should have a bloodless history. The Committee men whom I saw struck me as singularly calm, equable persons, bearing little resemblance to the prevailing Western type of agitator. They are thoroughly cultivated, know our politics well, and have examined all sides of the very complicated problem before them. It was they who turned the people from the rather perilous policy of "watching and besetting" the Austrian shops, and substituted the peaceful boycott of Austrian goods, which has proved to be one of the most formidable weapons that lie at the disposal of an aggrieved nation. As I left Constantinople Austrian trade with Turkey had practically ceased. The people would not buy Austrian goods, the porters refused to touch them, newspapers would not renew their contracts for Austrian paper, the Austrian Lloyd steamers called at Turkish ports—e.g., Trebizond—without booking a single passenger or embarking an ounce of goods. The Committee's handling of the Bulgarian trouble has been equally prudent. They realised at once, after the Bulgarian declaration of independence, that there could be no war, not merely because the Turkish Army, completely disorganised under Hamidian rule, could not have stopped the Bulgarians, even before the ancient walls of Constantinople, but because they had firm hold of the policy of a good understanding with Bulgaria, and were determined not to relinquish it unless events forced their hands. It would have been fatal to leave the Constitution to the mercy of war, which destroyed its predecessor. It would have been equally fatal to sink the grand idea of the Revolution, that of the creation of an Ottoman people, Moslem and Christian, and the development, on lines of political equality, of a true national spirit, enforced by a national army, recruited from all sections of the population, and from both its creeds.

It is here where Young Turkey has scored its great success. It has created a patriotism which never existed under Abdul Hamid. The National flag is everywhere, National badges, adorned with the not very strange device of Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity, are sold by thousands in the streets. National music rends the air far into the night-time, until the dogs take up the wondrous tale, and settle the Giaour's last hopes of repose. It is so like the French Revolution. We are all French, and fraternal, and plant our allegorical trees of liberty, and smile at the thought of that unamiable Louis Seize, the Prisoner of Yildiz, and preach the gospel of Jean Jacques, and all the while drink in this intoxicating atmosphere of the Arabian Nights! The practical question has been how the new basis of national life would accord with the exclusive practice of Islam, and how it would be received by the ruder Moslem peoples—and by the able Christian peoples, the Greeks and the Armenians, who almost monopolise the commercial life of Turkey. Difficulties have arisen on both sides. The Armenians opened both hands to the new movement. The Greeks wavered. Could they abandon or qualify the old Hellenist ideals? Could they identify themselves freely with Ottoman nationality? The early local elections in the districts round Constantinople have caused some heart-burnings. The Armenians were, in some cases, willing to divide representation with the Turks. The Greeks, better organised and more alive to political methods than their old masters, claimed solid votes for their candidates, and have swept the board. The last fracas in Smyrna was, I think, concerned with electioneering trouble between Turks and Greeks. It seems doubtful whether the slow-moving Turkish mind, innocent of the ways of commerce, and used to power but not to work for it, can compete in the political field with its quick-witted rivals.

Here lies the problem, and it is largely one of education. So far as preaching goes, the Young Turkish propaganda has been singularly active. "I preach equality of rights in our mosques," said a member of the Constantinople Committee to me, "and I do the same in the Armenian Churches. I ask Moslem and Christian to leave their separate faiths behind them in mosque or church, and when they go outside to think only of the country and their common citizenship." It is fortunate that the Liberal movement has the Sheikh-ul-Islam at its back. But Moslem opinion is divided, and the two specially perilous questions are the position of women and the new doctrine of political equality with the Christian races. Old residents in Constantinople thought it an astonishing thing to see officers saluting ladies in carriages, and it was notable that the reactionary demonstrations before Yildiz Kiosk made a special point of the reformers' desire to raise the status of Turkish women, i.e., to lift them out of the lonely and stupid life of the harem. The new influences are highly modern, thoroughly utilitarian in spirit, and not a little sceptical, and it is hard to tell how far they will sink into the rude soil which is already resisting them in Kurdistan and Mesopotamia. The new Turks themselves are not without fears. For example, they are specially anxious that the rapprochement with the Christian races should not break down the anti-alcoholism of the old Mohammedan world. Nevertheless the movement goes on, and its promoters are ubiquitous. If a reactionary mollah denounces Liberalism in a mosque he is, if possible, countered by a reformer. In far-away Cæsarea an American resident, writing to a friend in the capital, reports that an anti-Christian demonstration was at once stopped by a Young Turk, an emissary of the central body. The same influence has been successfully employed in Trebizond, and I shall be surprised to hear that it has failed in Armenia. Whether this seed of enlightenment can be sown all over the Turkish Empire and bear fruit, only those who have studied the mixed problem of race and religion which it suggests can say.

But at least one consequence of the new departure for Islam and Turkey is being vigorously pursued. One of the most interesting institutions in Turkey is Robert College, that splendid monument of American philanthropy in the East. The great teaching centre that looks down on the towers from which Mahomet the Conqueror made his spring on Constantinople, has had much to do with the making of Bulgaria. Students from Robert College have gone back to their country to lead its army, to govern its towns, to run its banking and commerce. At one time over ninety per cent. of its graduates were Bulgarians. But now things are changing. The Bulgarian students are falling off, for Bulgaria is now able to conduct her own higher education. But since the Constitution the Turkish students have rapidly increased. Under the Hamidian rule they came stealthily and were often withdrawn, the Sultan himself peremptorily ordering the removal of two of his nephews, one of whom was Prince Sabaheddine, now one of the leaders of Young Turkey. There are now thirty-four Turkish students at Robert College, and the immediate demand of the newcomers is for instruction in the Turkish language and literature, a demand in which some of the Armenians have joined them, declaring that they are Ottomans now. The result is that the college is preparing to develop on the Turkish side, and there is a serious prospect that it may do for the ruling stock in the Empire what it has done for the most powerful of its subject races. At all events Europe has now before it an experiment in which the statesmen of Turkey who believe in liberty, in tolerance, in honest government and humane feeling, are laboring for the reformation of their country. It is not for the Christian world, which has drunk of the same cup and commended it to them, to dash it from their lips.

H. W. M.

Present-Day Problems.

THE UNDERFED CHILD.*

In March last the London County Council appointed special officers to investigate the home circumstances of the children who were receiving meals in twelve selected schools. The results of the enquiry have now been published and put on sale. For the thorough sifting of conflicting evidence and the patient verification of facts as well as for the elaborate classification of the families concerned, this report is unique of its kind, and should be studied by all anxious to gain some clear insight into the problem of the underfed child. Of the two officers who directed the enquiry, the one was for several years a district secretary of a Committee of the Charity Organisation Society, while the other and a majority of the assistants in the enquiry, had worked as volunteers with one or other of the local Committees of that body. It is not possible, therefore, to impugn the competency of the staff concerned with the investigation; and the results, surprising as they are in certain respects, may be received with a confidence which they would not otherwise have deserved. In selecting the schools for the enquiry, an attempt was made to choose schools representative of the various types of districts to be found in London. Two lay among streets where poverty exists isolated, unrelieved, and forlorn, and two where poverty is found crouching at the back doors of wealth and luxury. Three stood in regions where dwell the lower middle class; four were distinguished by the presence of a large amount of casual labor among the parents; while the twelfth is described as situated in a criminal neighborhood.

Teachers and others have often been accused of grossly exaggerating the number of necessitous children, using the word "necessitous" to mean, as defined by the Provision of Meals Act, children "unable by lack of food to take full advantage of the education provided." Some of those, who advocated the investigation, were bold enough to predict that not more than a third of the children fed would be found really to require meals. The contents of this report prove conclusively that this is not the case. In the twelve schools 2,581 children, drawn from 1,218 families, were reported by teachers or by Care Committees as necessitous. At an early stage of the enquiry it was seen that the method of selecting the children left much to be desired. A girl might be receiving meals in one department, while her brother in the Boys' School or her sister in the Infant School were allowed to go hungry. It is rightly assumed in the report that to distinguish between the needs of different members of a family is impossible, and that all the school children of one family must be treated alike. If the children, whose names were not on the "feeding register," but who belonged to the families from whom the necessitous cases were drawn, are included, the number of children in the 1,218 families rises to a total of 3,334. This last figure represents therefore the number of children who, if we assume that the Care Committees made no mistakes, ought to have received meals. It is right to mention that 85 of the children, whose existence was brought by the investigation, were attending schools other than those selected for investigation, and, as it is not stated whether or not they are being fed, this number ought perhaps to be deducted from the 3,334.

* "Report of the Home Circumstances of Necessitous Children in Twelve Selected Schools." P. S. King & Co.

The results of the enquiry showed that of these 3,334 children 2,630 were, in the opinion of the investigators, necessitous, and ought, therefore, to have been fed, while 704 were not considered to require meals. The number who, as already stated, were actually being fed was 2,581. The enquiry thus establishes two conclusions. First, there are a quantity of children who are overlooked by the Care Committees, though belonging to the families from which the necessitous children are drawn. Secondly, if these children be included, the number fed does not differ much from the number who ought to have been fed. It is true that some children were fed who ought not to have been fed; but, on the other hand, some children, who required meals, were neglected.

We can now form an idea of the number of necessitous children in London. During last winter, the highest figure reached by the weekly returns was just short of 50,000. Assuming, as we may do, that the twelve schools were typical, 50,000 may be regarded as the maximum number of really necessitous children in any one week. This estimate is, however, subject to one important qualification. No attempt was made in the enquiry to investigate the circumstances of all the children in the schools; only those families were considered from which children were being fed. If, therefore, there were mistakes in soliciting, amounting to about 21 per cent., and children to this amount wrongly claimed as necessitous, we are justified in supposing that corresponding mistakes were made by the Care Committees in excluding families who ought to have been included in the necessitous list. The figure 50,000 must be regarded as below rather than above the mark. We can then say that in a nominal year, when no unusual distress prevails, the number of necessitous children will rise to a figure of at least 50,000.

The second, and perhaps the most valuable, portion of the report is concerned with an attempt to classify the causes which have led to the existence of distress in the different families. The families are divided into seven classes. Far the largest class is the class which includes "the intemperate and wasteful parents." No less than 44·7 per cent. of the families come into this category. "In practically all these cases," says the report, "one or both of the parents are drunkards." Figures are given for each school; and it is curious, and perhaps significant, to find that the percentage of drunkenness is highest in the two schools situated in "a wealthy district," where only 2 per cent. of the children were being fed, and lowest—little more than half—in the poorest school, where 45 per cent. of the children were receiving meals.

The next largest class, containing 19 per cent. of the families, comprises the casual laborers. No doubt many of the first class would belong here, but they are excluded, and no family is included in more than one class. The casual laborer, or "the under employed," as he is termed in the report, is rightly distinguished from the unemployed. These last are placed in a class by themselves, and amount to 5·7 per cent. of the whole. The smallness of this figure deserves attention.

The class, when the need is due to the illness of the wage-earner, contains 3·9 per cent., and the class, including widows and deserted wives, 5·0 per cent. of the whole. In these five classes all the children are regarded as necessitous; they together comprise 69 per cent. of all the families. It will be seen that respect is paid to the need of the child, and not to the character of the parents.

The sixth class, which contains 16·9 per cent. of the families, includes those whose earnings are regular, or who are in receipt of parish relief. It is here that the investigators are obliged to lay down a "poverty line." The incomes of all families are expressed in terms of a family made up of two adults and four children. Rent, insurance, and the like, are then deducted. If the remainder is less than 15s. a-week, the family is regarded as necessitous. This poverty-standard does not differ materially from the standard adopted by Mr. Rowntree in his investigations in York. In the last class—4·8 per cent. of the families—the parents themselves admitted that meals were not required.

There is much else of interest in the report, but it can only be briefly touched on here. Elaborate tables classify the incomes and the trades of the different families. Other tables demonstrate the extent of the overcrowding. Out of 1,218 families, only 307 can be said to possess adequate accommodation; in the remainder there is overcrowding, varying from three persons to a room up to seven persons—ten cases—and even to eight persons—three cases. In the Appendix appear a number of specimen case papers, indicating the extent of the information. In these brief sketches of individual families will be found woven together something of the tragedy and the comedy of human life.

It is impossible to criticise here all the assumptions, methods, and conclusions of this report, though, like other investigations of this kind, they are all open to criticism, and will undoubtedly receive such, in particular, from those who bring to the study preconceived opinions. But to those who approach the report with open minds, it will prove a document of illuminating interest, challenging the attention and directing the energies of all who see in the health of the children of to-day the hope and the pledge of the future well-being of the State.

R. A. Bray.

Publishers and the Press.

We have received from a firm of publishers the following letter which was sent to them from the offices of the "Daily Mail" accompanied by a dummy sheet of its proposed supplement dealing with Christmas books, and containing a "specimen review." We think it necessary to publish it in the interests of the public and with a view to maintaining the good faith and propriety of work appearing in the form of literary criticism:—

Sir,—On Monday, December 7th, the "Daily Mail" will publish a special and altogether unique supplement under the title of the Daily Mail Story of Christmas Books, &c.

Most people at Christmas time seek for some guidance in the selecting of books, Christmas cards, Christmas numbers, music, calendars, stationery novelties, &c., and no reliable guide has hitherto been obtainable. The publication of a bare list of books, authors, and prices, obviously conveys little information of the style and character of the volume.

The "Daily Mail" Stories will, it is safe to say, be read by people who are anxious to know how to spend their money best in buying Christmas books, &c., for presentation.

No display advertisements will be accepted, but whatever space you desire will be devoted to a well-written and illustrated description of the particular lines you wish to advertise. For instance, if you wish to specially push one particular toy-book, any space you purchase will be devoted to a description of the book's contents, its special features, and the ages of the children for whom it is most suitable. In the accompanying "dummy" you will find a specimen fragment showing you how the "Story of Christmas" will be written.

Our terms for the special supplement are £35 net per column, and I shall be glad if you will give the matter your immediate attention, in order to allow us time to do justice to your productions. This supplement is in addition to the ordinary literary reviews which appear every Saturday.

On hearing from you, our representative will be pleased to give you a call.—Yours, &c.,

(Signed) A. W. Faulkner,
Advertisement Manager

October 20th, 1908.

Communications.

THE WORKING OF OLD AGE PENSIONS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Now that the applications have been made, even before the actual working of the Act is proved, it is possible to hazard a few conjectures upon its general effect. The relief to many brave and struggling old people is immense and cannot be imagined by those whose daily life is not spent in contact with the poor. Perhaps no one was aware how large was the anxious and heroic band of veterans just above the pauper class, or what valorous efforts they have made to keep from dropping into the ranks of the destitute. To these people the Act has come as a surprise, and their delight is pathetic beyond words.

But it is impossible to forget that there are some difficulties and dark shadows about the measure, royally welcome as it is in many directions. The strain upon the public purse has been dwelt upon sufficiently. The inducements to fraud and perjury have also been noticed, and both these are grave difficulties, no doubt, but they are not insuperable. Skilled and patient administration, and a more just distribution of burdens may in time meet both cases. But there are some other points which seem to have escaped notice in the discussion. One of these is this: People in receipt of parish pay are in part supported by their children, if they have any, who are called upon to help their parents. There is no such clause in the Pension scheme. So we shall have Mrs. Brooks, who has been kept from the parish by her sons, pensioned, while her next-door neighbour, Mrs. Snooks, whose sons did less well for her and have been forced to contribute, will come under the Poor Law. Quite rightly, it will be urged, for piety should be rewarded. But gently; the Brooks's sons will withdraw their aid instantly and altogether; and laugh at the Snooks's family. The pension goes directly into the sons' pockets in the one case; and the others will have a fierce sense of injustice. Neither of these effects were contemplated at the time. Then a third old lady, Mrs. Crooks, may have lost her sons, in war or by accident. Through no possible fault of hers she may be on the parish; and she will behold the possibly less estimable Mrs. Brooks drawing a weekly crown from the Post Office, while she is expected to live on half that sum from the relieving officer.

The poor are passionately jealous in these cases. They will forget the good intention of the Act, and only see its one-sidedness. They will be roused to a fury, which will be a surprise to the administrators and legislators, and will seem ungrateful and unreasonable. But every week which passes will increase the volume of public opinion. Here are two systems of relief, the rates and the taxes. They collide. They are wasteful, for one machine will do for both purposes. The new one is unpopular in its working. In fine, the paupers will come in for the pension, the local authorities will be bound to do the work, especially the discrimination part of it, which will soon be a jest and a derision without their aid. Then the scheme will grow beyond all calculation, and the great question will be, once more, the children's contributions. A great many sons resent having to pay one farthing towards an aged parent's bread already. It is a salutary discipline to insist upon that payment; but it must ultimately be dropped in Poor Law cases, or else introduced into Pension cases. To do the first would be demoralising; and when once the Pension scheme is at work, how is so great an alteration to be brought in? It will shatter the whole fabric.

Take the case of a certain old Biddy. She has one son a carpenter, another a plumber, and lives with a son-in-law, who is a miller and childless. She has applied for a pension, which the miller's wife will promptly take from her for her board. Next door lives an aged carter, with two sons, both carters, both married, each with young children. The old carter is on the parish, and the young carters help to keep him. But when they see the carpenter, plumber, and miller released from all filial obligation, their indignation will be severe, and not wholly without bottom. They will revolt by the simple method of refusing to pay. The guardians will summons, will spend a month's doles on extracting a shilling a head from the young carters, and the land will be sore vexed with many such conflicts. Actually, too, it may be noted that the carter was a steady fellow, and was invalided by a kick from a horse, while the old Biddy was never a good mother, made no sacrifices for her sons, and cast them forth on the first opportunity to get their own living. It is no thanks to her that they have done so, fairly successfully. In poor districts all this is known, all is weighed, all is criticised acutely and unsparingly. Let anybody try to administer a coal charity fairly in a village. His ears are belabored with remonstrances. What? You have given Fanny two hundreds and Liza and me but one hundred a-piece! Well, you reply, you and Liza live together, and you each have a son in a good position, and you own your cottage. Fanny has no one at all, and is older than either of you, and pays rent for her house. Will these admissions oil the troubled waves? Not one jot. The old ladies will clamour you down, until you wish all the coal burnt; but, even when it is burnt, they are not purged from the fever of their envy and wrath. They will cast the very few ashes in your teeth. Is the worst anomaly going to pass unnoticed?

The Israelites stoned Adoram, who was over the tribute, when he tried to pacify them, and it is to be feared that similar tragedies await the unhappy administrators of so much joy and so much contention. Their lot is not to be envied, and if they can settle the claims without being laughably beguiled, perhaps they may devise ways of escape from the worse difficulties which await them.—Yours, &c.,

Hambridge, Taunton, October 22nd, 1908. C. L. MARSON.

Letters to the Editor.

IS CONSTITUTIONAL GOVERNMENT IN TURKEY POSSIBLE?

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In your issue of October 10th, Mr. G. F. Abbott quotes me as saying that "Moslem teachers have been proclaiming for some years that this" (namely, that women in popular belief among Turks have no souls) "is a popular error and that woman has a soul."

He then adds, "as a matter of fact, the alleged belief in woman's want of soul has never been a popular error among the Mohammedans." It is a "Christian fiction," "a libel," &c., which Christians, and even Voltaire "have delighted in attaching to Islam." It is a surprise to me that Voltaire should have so delighted. But the existence or non-existence of the popular error is the only question at issue. I could furnish authorities whose opinion coincides with my own. One must suffice. In the late Sir Edward Malet's interesting book, "Shifting Scenes," published in 1901, he mentions (page 67), that he had to remonstrate with the Khedive of Egypt for placing himself in positions of danger during the troubles in Egypt. This, according to the writer, was his reply (the italics are mine):—

"Death does not signify to me personally; our religion prevents us from having any fear of death; but it is different with our women. To them, you know, Life is everything: their existence ends here: they cry and weep and implore me to save them." That is evidence of popular belief from a recent authoritative source.

I have a habit of verifying quotations, and Mr. Abbott's quotation, while quite correct as far as it goes, does not go far enough. I give what the charming Lady Mary Montague says:—

"Our vulgar notion, that they do not own women to have any souls, is a mistake. 'Tis true; they say they are not of so elevated a kind, and, therefore, must not hope to be admitted into the paradise appointed for the men, who are to be entertained by celestial beauties. But there is a place of happiness destined for souls of the inferior order, where all good women are to be in eternal bliss."

In other words, the popular belief in Lady Mary's time, nearly two centuries ago, was that women had souls, but of an "inferior order." For the purpose of illustration, and it was only for such that I mentioned what I believe the popular error to be, I might equally well have written, that the influence of Western ideas tends to get rid of the "popular error" that women have only souls of an inferior order. I preferred, however, to write of what, in my opinion, the popular error is.—Yours, &c.,

EDWIN PEARS.

Prinkipo, October 14th, 1908.

THE FUTURE OF TURKISH WOMEN.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—During the old régime one hardly saw anything in the papers concerning Turkish women. To-day, the greater part of the third month of our revolution, the papers are occupied by discussions, with much heat in them, about our sex. Before the Constitution women were of no importance; they were a neglected quantity, and, like other neglected elements, were supposed to have no right to stand up for themselves. Besides, it was generally supposed that there were few or no women who were able to speak for themselves, but to-day the contrary is proved.

Among the influences that were working during the last thirty years for liberty, the rôle of the Turkish woman was considerable, although indirect. The influence which brought about our revolution was a revolt against the misdoings of the Government, and some of these specially appealed to woman. Barbarous and secret cruelties crushed the life and spilt the best blood of Turkey's children. Constantinople was the most stricken city in the Empire. Eighty thousand were sent away from its gates into exile, misery, chains, and torture—some to death, or even worse. These victims were mostly students, youths, anybody who had an independent spirit or talents, or who was known even to read a page of a foreign newspaper, or was supposed to have done so. There were also many, mostly from the middle class, the sturdy, the honest, the patient middle class of Turks. Now the mental attitude of the mothers and wives of these victims towards the old régime is easy to see. The majority of Turkish women in Constantinople, even among those who hardly understand the meaning of liberty, are for the Constitution, which assures the lives of their children and husbands, which lifts the horrible uncertainty and fear of having an unknown fate hanging over the heads of their beloved.

These women, who see in the Constitution both a remedy and a vengeance for their blood wrongs, will stand by it, will teach their children the love of liberty, as they have been doing for years, and in dying they will leave their hatred of tyranny as a blood inheritance to their sons and daughters. Those women whose beloved ones sleep in the depths of the blue Marmora, dropped to die like dogs; those women whose children have expired in filthy prisons or died in wretchedness and misery; those women whose children have come back crippled, with swollen limbs that have not carried the chains for many years for nothing, with tired souls that no longer can rise with a youthful joy to the nation's great Baïram, with faces that have shrunk and grown old in their prime youth; those women, the mothers and wives of those youths, will they ever forget or forgive? No, never!

Hence the force of the majority of women in Turkey will be spent in maintaining the spirit of liberty alive in Turkey.

The generation of women who have already been the means of propagating large and liberal ideas are an educated minority. They are the fortunate few who were not morally maimed by some of the foolish and unworthy creatures who call themselves governesses. They are women who had by chance fallen into good and honest hands, or had been taught by their fathers or husbands. Naturally this minority understood that the salvation of a nation lies in the proper education of high-minded and patriotic women. They understood that the reason why Anglo-Saxons occupy so lofty a moral position in the world's civilisation is due to their sacred ideas of womanhood and home. These women have worked silently, but knowingly, bringing up liberal-minded sons and patriotic daughters, building honest hearths where real comradeship dwells, where a man is encouraged to go on in serving his country, although that service meant sometimes worse than death.

I learn from Salonika that there were women happy enough to be actually engaged in the first revolutionary movement, and that they helped and worked most courageously to bring about the nation's freedom. A small society of women, including Eminé Sémié Hanoum and Enver Bey's wife, carried papers on their persons, helped the Committee to assemble, and hid the members from the spies. They were valiant; they were great, and their acts will ever be engraved in the grateful memory of the nation. Ignorant, and kept back from all that develops a woman's character, this is the small but direct and valuable contribution of Turkish women to our declaration of Liberty.

Now as to what they are doing or will likely do in future I will add a few words. At present a warm discussion is going on in the Turkish papers on the Turkish woman's position. Some women began to demand, after the revolution, their right to learn and work with their companions in life. There was in this nothing that ought to have hurt or awakened religious prejudice. But a French article appeared, signed by a Turkish woman's name, Féridé, but in reality written by a Jewess, and this caused a storm. The writer declared that she would unveil. This caused deep indignation in the majority of the Turks. As a fact, no reasonable Turkish woman asks to unveil. All that they ask for is a liberal education and a right to accompany their husbands, and to become fit educators of the future generation. What they can do in future will be decided by the kind of instruction they will get.

I am very glad to be able to address English women on behalf of all Turkish women. We are doing our best to place English influence and the English language foremost in our future schools for girls. England has ever stood for right and justice. The Turks will never forget that England indignantly refused the division of Turkey when the Emperor Nicholas proposed it, through Sir H. Seymour, the English Ambassador in St. Petersburg. Turkey will ever remember who helped us through from the treaty of St. Stefano. Not only will Turkey remember these, but we Turkish women will try to make our country great, not in possessions so much as in right and justice. Turkish women desire that the future mothers of Turks shall be strong in peaceful and great in human movements. For such a triumph we must have good schools. The victories of Japan were in the triumph of her learning.

The actual cry of the Turkish woman to more civilised womanhood, specially to England and America, is this: You go and teach the savage, you descend into slums. Come to this land, where the most terrible want, the want of knowledge, exists. Come and help us to disperse the dark clouds of ignorance. We are working ever so hard to get away from the slavery of ignorance. The opening of schools by the English everywhere in Turkey would be welcomed by Turkish mothers. Simple, healthy, human teaching, such as Anglo-Saxons are able to give, is what we want. Give us living examples of your great, serious women. But let the conditions be such that poorer classes may have it within their power to send their children to school. For we ask not for luxury or grand institutions where comfort is found, but for simple teaching. More than for bread and water, more than any other want, we cry for knowledge and healthy Anglo-Saxon influence.—Yours, &c.,

HALIDE SALIH.

Constantinople, October 12th, 1908.

"BAD HARVESTS AND UNEMPLOYMENT."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—When an economist like Mr. Laycock gets into difficulties he usually takes to the "bush," i.e., the money question. I do not propose to follow him any further than the monetary point raised in our original discussion. He is now willing to assume that a short crop may realise at higher prices "exactly the sum that the normal crop realises," but he yet insists that the unemployment which I admit occurs in the trades, raising, harvesting, and carrying grain, will be communicated to other trades through a failure of the usual demand for commodities on the part of those unemployed in the agricultural trades. But if the same sum of money is paid for the crop, some persons connected with the raising, carrying, &c., of this crop must receive more income than before to set off against the loss of income in those who are admitted to be unemployed, and their expenditure of this additional income will create an increased demand in the trades making the goods they buy, equivalent to the decreased demand in the trades injured by the fall-off of demand from the unemployed. No net reduction in demand and employment in other trades than agriculture is shown.

This was my main original contention, and Mr. Laycock fails entirely to meet it.—Yours, &c.,

J. A. Hobson.

October 19th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—May I humbly suggest that the correspondence in your columns under this head has wandered rather far from facts into the realm of abstractions. In the first place, crops do not go into consumption in the condition in which they are harvested, nor for the most part in the country which grows them. Corn is usually packed in bags; a shortage in the world's crop means a bad time for sackmakers and a shortage of cargo for shipowners. Secondly, in this connection it is hardly fair to speak as though harvests referred only to grain destined for consumption as bread. There are minor items, such as the textile fibres, oilseeds and their by-products, barley and hops for the brewer, potatoes and rice, and sugar. A shortage of any of these implies increased cost of some manufactured articles, and a resultant restriction of demand.

Thirdly, it seems not out of place to suggest that most manufactured goods are sold in the first place to meet a speculative and not a real demand. Manchester may not have speculated at all; the production of every mill may have been sold far ahead and business have seemed so easy and lucrative that new mills have sprung up to meet an apparently permanent expansion in the world's consumption. A season of bad crops comes and the mills learn that they have to face an absolute stoppage of demand; heavy stocks are held in India, in China, and elsewhere, and merchants are afraid to buy anything. Good harvests mean more than good trade; they entail a rush and scramble, overproduction and overselling; and until this ceases we shall have the necessary backswing of the pendulum to the other extreme.

A final point which seems to me unfairly handled is the question of profit margin on high prices. My limited experience shows that the higher prices go, the more reluctant the purchasers become to buy without mature consideration, and the more manufacturers are forced to cut profits to secure buyers at all. Far from the total profits being the same on the high-priced small sales and the cheap large sales, I should doubt whether they approach even the same percentage on the turnover. The assumption that the money value of the turnover of harvests is the same whatever the quantity of output appears to have no particular relation to facts.—Yours, &c., W. G. W.

London, October 20th, 1908.

A SUGGESTION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—During the coming winter we should not neglect temporary services of employment, even if they appear to be but small ones. In the time of the seventh Earl of Shaftesbury hundreds of shoeblacks, if not more, were organised in London, sometimes earning as much as six shillings in a day.

These shoeblack brigades appear to have passed away, though there seems some slight revival in London just lately.

In our provincial towns we may walk miles in dirty boots for the want of anyone to clean them, unless we go to an inn or railway station. It may be that people are less in the way of having their shoes cleaned in the streets than they used, but a return to a former habit is worth while to help those who really want work. Cannot shoeblack brigades be organised before winter in every one of our towns?—Yours, &c., J. Marshall Sturge.

Charlbury, October 20th, 1908.

GRAMMATICAL.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—It is always dangerous to lay down the law about matters of language without verifying—indeed, within the limits reached by the New English Dictionary, it is foolhardy. The word "averse" is well within those limits; and if your grammarian's own reading has not told him that "to" is no less correct, and even more usual, than "from," after that word, a reference to the blameless columns of the N.E.D. would have apprised him of that fact. So with "different to"; that is just as right as "alien to." Of course, the "to" in these phrases merely indicates relation; as with the dative in Latin, which is used after verbs compounded with ab.

As to what he calls the "hanging" participle—I should rather call it the "*in*dependent," for it hangs on nothing—that is, no doubt, a Latinism which was all right in an inflected language, but has now become awkward. Still, it was a favorite with the Elizabethans. Sir Francis Walsingham, in particular, hardly ever gets through a letter or dispatch without affording one or more examples of it.

I must not waste more of my time or your space on these matters; but I think I could prove to your grammarian that he has censured some locutions that are as innocent as doves, and spared a good many of the blackest crows that now infest the field of good English.—Yours, &c.,

Grammaticulus.

October 18th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—If Mr. Braby and "The Writer of the Article" will look in "Chambers's Twentieth Century Dictionary" they will find the following:—

"Averse . . . with to; from is, however, still used.—Yours, &c.,

Ellen R. Taylor.

7, The Mount, Malton,
October 18th, 1908.

THE NEWER SPIRIT IN INDIA.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—A few weeks ago you were good enough to allow me a column in your valued journal, and I find, in spite of much self-restraint, that I am compelled to ask you once again for a little space.

The number of books about India and the phenomenon called "the unrest" is growing rapidly—from which, presumably, it may be inferred that there is some kind of demand on the part of the public for correct information. It is, therefore, quite necessary that critics and reviewers should indicate and classify the various points of view from which the subject has been approached. We have, firstly, such masterpieces of perverse bureaucratic mendacity as the books and miscellaneous writings of Sir William Lee-Warner, Mr. J. D. Rees, Sir Henry Craik, Lord Curzon, et hoc genus omne—the kind of stuff that an "Imperialistic" public devours with peculiar avidity. We have, secondly, the whole of the Congress literature, embodying the labors of Sir Henry Cotton, Sir William Wedderburn, Mr. C. J. O'Donnell, the late Mr. William Digby, Mr. Naoroji, Mr. R. C. Dutt, Mr. G. K. Gokhale, and a great many others. And the newest of this latter series is the excellent and thoughtful volume of that fearless veteran, Mr. H. W. Nevinson, which Sir William Wedderburn reviews in your issue of October 17th. Very aptly the title of his book is the "New Spirit in India"—a spirit whose genesis has already been accurately determined. But not a single volume has yet been written about what I may call the newer spirit in India.

Let us be clear about the stages of development. We start with a bureaucracy that grows more and more dissociated from the people, until it culminates in the vagaries of England's greatest Viceroy.

> "O that the present hour would lend
> Another despot of the kind!
> Such chains as his were sure to bind."

This gives rise to the new spirit in India, which asks for more freedom and for self-government of the Colonial type. But now has come the newer spirit in India, which does not think of asking for anything. It has set before itself the task of absolute severance from England, the ideal of absolute freedom, to be attained, if possible, by a peaceful revolution as a result of overwhelming moral and intellectual courage.

In other words, while England declares that there shall continue to be an imperium, the newer spirit declares that there shall be an unqualified libertas, and the new spirit, of which Mr. Nevinson has been writing, has served as a bridge over which the newer spirit may pass to its destination. It is necessary to bear these facts in mind for the sake of correct historical perspective. I have said that not a single book has been written about this newer spirit. But the newer spirit does not even ask for a book. It is seeking to write its own eventful chapters in the pages of history.—Yours, &c.,

V. Chattopadhyaya.

78, Lancaster Road, W.,
October 19th, 1908.

THE LIBERTY OF THE SUBJECT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—I have read the letters of Mr. H. J. B. Montgomery and others in your recent numbers. May I state the views of a plain man who is not a penologist or a prison commissioner, and has not known much of the professional criminal?

1. The first object of imprisonment is to prevent the repetition by the same criminal of like acts.

2. The second object is to deter others.

3. The third is to attempt the reform of the prisoner, if, and so far as, it is consistent with 1 and 2.

There is nothing so cruel in a civilised state as impunity. One quarter of the total prison population seem to be professional criminals. (Nation, p. 18.) If they cannot be cured, it is surely just to detain them. When new, unknown methods shall have cured them, let us, or our descendants, let out the prisoners again.—Yours, &c.,

George Whale.

Reform Club, Pall Mall, S.W.,
October 16th, 1908.

LIBERALISM AND SOCIAL REFORM.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—I am told on all hands that Liberalism is decadent. And this at a time when the "personnel" of the Cabinet is admittedly powerful; its unity unchallenged; its support in the House of Commons loyal and enthusiastic; its programme of social reform practical and inspiring. Yet the results of recent bye-elections show that there is something to be said for the assertion in my opening sentence. Liberal canvassers at Newcastle and elsewhere ascribe the cause of these defeats to the fact that the electorate do not understand the objective of Liberalism in relation to the present economic and industrial system of this country.

The Conservative Party stands plainly for the perpetuation of the present unrestricted system of frenzied competition, their panacea for all human ills being "Tariff Reform and work for all."

At the opposite pole the Socialists range themselves with their idea of the Socialised State, in which land, capital, and personal ability are all nationalised.

Laugh at these doctrinaire schemes as we may, here are two clear and intelligible policies. In face of them, what has Liberalism to offer? To those who are suffering acutely from the widespread poverty and insecurity of employment, concomitant with the concentration of the means of production in the hands of the few, Liberalism seems to offer nothing better than opportunistic legislation, tinkering and time-serving. While to middle-class and rich Liberals, its apparent philandering with Socialistic ideas (equivalent in their minds to confiscation of property, and a monotonous dead level of existence) is a terrifying spectacle.

It follows then that what is needed is a dinning into people's ears of the ultimate Liberal attitude towards social reform, regardless of the danger of tiresome repetition. We oppose to the Conservative idea of unrestricted industrial warfare, and the Socialist conception of the nationalised State, a third ideal—a State, in which the means of production are again equitably distributed, as they have been through the lengthiest and most stable periods of history We recognise the fact that many of the most urgent problems which confront us can only be solved by State-action, and even by a measure of collectivism. Hence there is nothing to prevent those who believe in Socialism as a direction and not as a state—in kinetic as opposed to static Socialism—to support us in our general policy. We lay no claim to be thaumaturgists; for we know that leagues of difficulties lie between us and the attainment of our theoretical aim—difficulties, nevertheless, which our past record and our future programme prove we intend to surmount.

Let us by all means stick to our time-honored motto of "Peace, Retrenchment, and Reform," provided that we use such terms in no perfunctory fashion. Let us show how Liberalism has accomplished the democratisation of the old feudal machinery of politics. Let us expose the fallacies of Protection to our heart's content. But, above all things, let our theory of social betterment—the equitable distribution of the means of production, as opposed to their nationalisation, or their concentration in the hands of the few—sink down deep into the bewildered brain of the British public. Therein, to my mind, lies the way of salvation in this age of street-corner oratory.

Two questions, by way of conclusion. Is the theory, which I have delineated, the official Liberal objective in relation to social reform? And if not, has Liberalism an alternative theory to put forward?—Yours, &c.,

F. N. E.

Bromley, Kent,
October 21st, 1908.

MR. ASQUITH'S CONCESSION TO THE BREWERS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—There must be many persons deeply interested in licensing reform, like myself, to whom Mr. Asquith's concession of twenty-one years' further enjoyment of a State-created monopoly value will come as the last straw. I am almost driven to hope that the Lords will throw out the Licensing Bill, so that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be forced back on his "reserves," i.e., the higher taxation of licences through the Budget.

The Bill now proposes that in 1930 those of us who live long enough to be taxpayers then shall have a sudden increment, or relief from our taxes, to the extent of some £10,000,000 a year from the monopoly value of licences. It is a pleasing prospect, no doubt, even though most of us will be dead first. But why, if it is right that we should get ten millions a year in 1930, should it not be right for us to get a smaller sum now? If Mr. Asquith would clap on the five millions now, abolish the compensation levy, and give a fixed grant of (say) a million a year from the Exchequer for compensation purposes, the "man in the street" would understand it, and see that it was fair. The rest of the Bill could go through without trouble.—Yours, &c.,

J. E. Allen.

1, Mitre Court Buildings,
October 21st, 1908.

"ORTHODOXY."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—It is somewhat of a surprise and disappointment to find Mr. G. K. Chesterton committed to a vulgar, non-paradoxical truth. I refer to his denunciation of suicide as "the ultimate and absolute evil." This is pharisaism with a vengeance. Its very obviousness and simplicity should have condemned it in the author's own eyes. On the same reasoning, celibacy is the unpardonable sin. A fortiori, Death is "the ultimate and absolute evil"; but, thanks to suicides (among other persons, places, and things), the world is no longer of that unnatural opinion. But, then, this is one of those paradoxical beliefs which—as Mr. Chesterton once knew and recognised—are very hard to hold simultaneously.—Yours, &c.,

S. Henry.

St. Anne's-on-Sea,
October 18th, 1908.

THE HABITUAL OFFENDERS BILL.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The objects of the Home Secretary's Bill are two-fold, or should be so:—

(1) The protection of society by the better provision for the prevention of crime.

(2) To provide ways and means for reforming those who, unfortunately, have lapsed into crime time after time, and for helping them on, after their ultimate discharge, in face of the inevitable difficulties which they will always have to contend with. This is already in part provided for by the Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society.

The latter part of the task imposed upon society offers enormous difficulties, and, to be successful, requires a closer study and longer discussions than have been bestowed on this all-important problem hitherto. As this is no party question, it is to be hoped that all parties will unite (as was the case in the Children's Bill) in examining minutely not only the ways and means, but also the machinery proposed to work them, before the measure be passed.

As regards the person branded as "the habitual offender" (after having served the first period of imprisonment and finding himself in the second term of probation), what are the provisions which are to enable him to regain his liberty?

The Home Secretary proposes a committee consisting of:—

(1) Visiting justices.

(2) Prison officials (governor, chaplain, priest, and doctor).

(3) Specially co-opted persons able and fit for the work, whose duty it is to decide whether the person is wishful of leading an honest life, or is fit to do so, in order to concede his or her liberty.

To be able to judge of the character of any man, woman, or child, and still more of their intentions, there will be needed a great amount of knowledge of human nature, of intelligence, and of deep sympathy. But all these qualities are of absolutely no avail if sufficient time, and many opportunities under different conditions to exercise them, be not given. Even then, the great stumbling block will be that all the inquiries perforce will have to be made within the prison walls, in an atmosphere haunted by the natural dread of the presence of the governor, warders, and other prison authorities, be they ever so lenient and humane. Even the influence of the lay element (i.e., the visiting justices and co-opted members) is lessened within the prison walls, as all those who have an insight into the practical working of our ordinary prisons can fully testify.

The Home Secretary does not say for what period the lay members are to fulfil their voluntary duties; and how can they be compelled or induced to perform their labor of love, these duties being voluntary, if they have other calls on their time, which may be of greater importance to them at the moment? The Home Secretary declares that he at present knows a sufficient number of men (ladies are not mentioned, though they are more active and more to be relied upon in these matters, as will be shown later on) to whom he can entrust the onerous task. But if they should fail, will he know others to replace them, and will successive Ministers be able to do so?

Again, how do these new enactments affect the voluntary members?

It is stated that the committee "shall hold meetings at such intervals of not more than six months as may be prescribed"—or, in other words, a minimum of two meetings a year! Surely there is some omission here!

And the visits of the voluntary members to the prisons? Here, too, there seems to be no provision made for the number of times they have to attend gaol for the important work of judging individual cases.

That the difficulties awaiting the lay members are not imaginary is proved by the working of the Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society (founded sixty years ago), and run on a similar system to the proposed new measure.

First we have:—

(1) Voluntary elected members, ready to give their time, and assist prisoners after their discharge.

(2) Visiting justices, elected from the magisterial bench, to serve two years if city, and a number of years if county magistrates. To these must be added lady visitors, elected by the Home Office.

(3) The prison authorities (governor, chaplain, &c.).

Now what has been the result—surely a far different one to that which was expected?

In the first few years a good number of voluntary members were forthcoming, magistrates amongst them. Then, notwithstanding their excellent work, the voluntary members fell away, so that at present there exist but few societies who can boast of having any. The consequence of this is that the work of the Discharged Prisoners' Aid Societies falls on the shoulders of the prison authorities, who, by force of circumstances, are not competent to aid effectively after the prisoners' discharge.

So much for the voluntary members. Now, what has happened in the case of the visiting justices? Their duty is to visit in prison twice a year, and it must be admitted that little useful work can be done with occasional visits like these. But even here, experience of many years has shown that visiting justices (with a few exceptions, of course) have taken even less interest in the matter of prisoners to be discharged than the voluntary members. It is a deplorable fact that nowadays few societies exist who can rely on any assistance from them; in fact, the total ignorance of the existence of the Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society, and the duties of a visiting justice connected with them, is not uncommon.

On the other hand, those few societies who have lady visitors are better off, for statistics have proved that they take their duties seriously by their repeated visits to their charges while in gaol, and regular attendance at the meetings to assist the committee's working. It is to be hoped that lady visitors will be provided for in the Bill.

Now, seeing that visiting justices are so reluctant in performing their easy duties in regard to prisoners awaiting their discharge in an ordinary gaol, where sentences of imprisonment are of short duration (maximum six months), how can it be expected that the vastly more onerous duties (spreading over a number of years) will be more conscientiously undertaken when the new measure becomes law?

One thing is certain, that there must be voluntary aid if we are to carry out the generous spirit of the proposed law, and although the difficulties which stand in the way, as I have endeavoured to show, are great as proved by actual experience, still, these difficulties should not prevent the passage of the measure, as no doubt ways and means will be found to remedy these very important defects.—Yours, &c.,

N. KOLP.

Poetry.

A PORTRAIT.

IN a broad stone-flagged passage, once I saw
A woman lift a platter of white wood,
Whereon jugs, loaves, knives, high-piled dishes stood;
Her eyes, far-seeing counsellors, did draw
Age-old blue wisdom from the skies, while law
Implicit on her forehead seemed to brood;
Her lips were heralds, ever proclaiming good,
For riches, in her hair shone red-gold, raw.

She smiled, with some fair city's welcoming grace
Before whose gleaming turrets night has flown;
Whose loftier parts are Heaven's resting place,
Whose very fabric is Earth-beauty's own;
Earth's plenty teems within her wide embrace,
About her walls Spring's spicy airs are blown.

J. MARJORAM.

The World of Books.

THURSDAY NIGHT.

AMONG Mr. Heinemann's autumn books is an English translation of the "Recollections of Baron de Frénilly, Peer of France." Frénilly's memoirs contain some excellent pictures of French life, both at Paris and in the provinces, during the Revolution, the First Empire, and the Restoration. Their author was a cousin of Madame de Staël, but he had ultra-Royalist sympathies, and some of his best pages are the caustic portraits he gives of the leading figures of the Revolution. He welcomed the Restoration with delight, but he was overwhelmed to discover that Louis XVIII. "was a thorough Liberal and an enemy of the aristocracy." Charles X. made Frénilly a Peer of France, but again his satisfaction was lessened by the fact that seventy-five others were similarly honored. "No doubt," he writes, "in these seventy-six new peerages there were four or five who represented the flower of France, whether by birth, fortune, wisdom, or sane opinions; but even this did not absolve them from the crime of being seventy-six." When Charles X. abdicated, Frénilly left France in disgust, and retired to Gratz to write the "Recollections," which are among the most entertaining memoirs of an age particularly rich in this class of literature.

* * *

ANOTHER book dealing with the France of the Revolution is "The Life of Mirabeau," by Mr. S. G. Tallentyre, which Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co. have almost ready for publication. Mr. Tallentyre, who is the author of a couple of good volumes upon Voltaire and his times, has a great subject in Mirabeau, and one which still has considerable freshness for most English readers. Indeed, with the exception of Carlyle and Morse Stephens, no writer has dealt at all adequately with the complex character of the first statesman of the Revolution. Recent research has unearthed some fresh material, and we may expect from Mr. Tallentyre a capable account of Mirabeau's career.

* * *

IN "An Historical Introduction to the Marprelate Tracts," Mr. W. M. Pierce investigates an interesting by-path of English ecclesiastical history. Martin Marprelate was the name appended to a series of pamphlets written against Episcopacy by a number of Elizabethan Puritans, many of them deprived ministers. They contain choice specimens of theological invective, and severe measures were taken by the Government to suppress them, but without success. The authorship of some of the pamphlets has been determined by Maskell, who wrote a "History of the Martin Marprelate Controversy" from the High Anglican standpoint, but the subject still provides abundant scope for research. Mr. Pierce writes as a Nonconformist, but he endeavours to deal with the theme in a scientific historical spirit. The book will be published by Messrs. Constable.

* * *

THE same publishers have in preparation an English translation of Angelo Neumann's "Reminiscences of Richard Wagner," which, in its German form, we reviewed on July 6th, 1907. It contains many interesting details about the production of Wagner's works, as well as of the general progress of German music during the latter half of the nineteenth century.

* * *

A WORK to be published next week by Messrs. Methuen promises to give us "our true historic perspective in the matter" of the woman question. It is called "Woman Through the Ages," and is the latest result of the indefatigable Dr. Reich's labors. The book begins with a study of pre-Greek women in Assyria, Babylonia, Egypt, and Judæa, and then proceeds to a history of woman in ancient Greece and Rome, in the Middle Ages, during the Renaissance, and in modern times. Many details concerning the dress, amusements, education, and social position of women are quoted from original sources; but Dr. Reich's main object has been "to give the general, underlying principles as clearly as possible." The book is sure to be welcomed by those who enjoyed hearing Dr. Reich expound Platonism, but it is doubtful whether the stalwarts of the Woman's Social and Political Union will be equally satisfied.

* * *

PROBABLY few readers of to-day know even the name of Eaton Stannard Barrett, one of whose volumes, "Woman and Other Poems," ran into three editions within a few years of its publication towards the beginning of last century. His political satires, "All the Talents" and "The Comet," were also very popular, though it is not now easy to see for what reason. Professor Raleigh, however, seems to think that Barrett's mock romance, "The Heroine," may still find readers, since he is preparing an edition for "The Oxford Library of Prose and Poetry." That excellent series has already given us a number of exceedingly useful reprints. We shall be interested in seeing how Barrett's work will be received.

* * *

DR. SPENCE WATSON has written a memoir of Joseph Skipsey, the miner poet, who was for several years the keeper of Shakespeare's house at Stratford-on-Avon. Skipsey was a working miner until he reached middle life, and some of his poems from "The Collier Lad" and "Carols from the Coal Fields," inspired by his labor in the mines, have been said to be not unworthy of Blake. The memoir may, possibly, add something to our knowledge of the Pre-Raphaelite group, for Skipsey was a friend of Rossetti, Burne-Jones, and others who took a leading part in the movement. It will be published by Mr. Fisher Unwin.

* * *

A FUND has been started for the purpose of establishing a memorial to the late Professor Churton Collins. The memorial will take the form of a scholarship or prize for Greek or English literature, the details of which will be settled by a committee of the subscribers. Subscriptions will be received by Mrs. Arthur Boutwood, Bledlow, Bucks. We understand that Mr. Sidney Lee is likely to succeed Professor Collins as Professor of English literature at Birmingham. Mr. Lee's "Life of William Shakespeare" has just reached a sixth edition. It was first published in 1898.

* * *

"SEVENTEENTH CENTURY MEN OF LATITUDE" is the attractive title of a volume of studies by an American critic, Mr. E. A. George, which Mr. Fisher Unwin will issue immediately. The essays treat of John Hales, Chillingworth, Whichcote, John Smith, Henry More, Jeremy Taylor, Sir Thomas Browne, and Richard Baxter. Most of the ground traversed by Mr. George has already been covered in Principal Tulloch's two excellent volumes on "Rational Theology in England in the Seventeenth Century." Mr. George has, however, treated his subject in a more popular style than Principal Tulloch did, and he also makes large use of quotation, many of the extracts being from books not nowadays easily accessible or at any rate not often read.

* * *

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

"The Panmure Papers." Being a Selection from the Correspondence of Fox Maule, Second Baron Panmure, afterwards Eleventh Earl of Dalhousie. Edited by Sir George Douglas and Sir George Dalhousie Ramsay. (Hodder & Stoughton, 2 vols., 24s. net.)

"The Life of James McNeil Whistler." By E. R. and J. Pennell. (Heinemann, 2 vols., 36s. net.)

"Family Letters of Christina Rossetti." Edited by W. M. Rossetti. (Brown, Langham, 15s. net.)

"The Women Bonapartes." By H. Noel Williams. (Methuen, 2 vols., 24s. net.)

"Napoleon and his Fellow Travellers." Edited by Clement Shorter. (Cassell, 12s. net.)

"De Libris: Prose and Verse." By Austin Dobson. (Macmillan, 5s. net.)

"Russian Essays and Stories." By Maurice Baring. (Methuen, 5s. net.)

"Piccadilly to Pall Mall." By Ralph Nevill and C. E. Jerningham. (Duckworth, 12s. 6d. net.)

"The English House." By W. Shaw Sparrow. (Nash, 10s. 6d. net.)

"Egypt and Its Monuments." By Robert Hichens. Illustrated by Jules Guérin. (Hodder & Stoughton, 20s. net.)

"The War in the Air." By H. G. Wells. (Bell, 6s.)

"A Poor Man's House." By Stephen Reynolds. (Lane, 6s.)

"A Prince of Dreams." By F. A. Steel. (Heinemann, 6s.)

"L'Ile des Pengouins." Par Anatole France. (Paris: Calmann-Lévy, 3fr. 50.)

"Récits des Temps révolutionnaires." D'Après des Documents inédits. Par Ernest Daudet. (Paris: Hachett, 3fr. 50.)

Reviews.

THE PANMURE PAPERS.*

If it cannot be said that Lord Panmure, to give him the title by which he is known, was a particularly interesting or an unusually important personage, it cannot be denied that he filled for a time a position of fascinating interest, and commanding importance. He was Secretary of State for War during the second and more critical half of the Crimean campaign. When he succeeded the Duke of Newcastle in February, 1855, the office of Secretary at War was abolished, and he was the first Minister who had entire control of the Department, including its finances. When Lord Palmerston formed his first Government after the defeat of Lord Aberdeen's Administration in the House of Commons, the only post he had at once to fill besides his own was Newcastle's. But it was, of course, by far the most vital to the prosecution of the campaign, which then absorbed the interest of the public and excluded all other matters from their view. Not until Palmerston yielded to the House of Commons by assenting to the appointment of Roebuck's Committee did Mr. Gladstone, Sir James Graham, and Sidney Herbert follow Aberdeen and Newcastle into retirement.

Lord Panmure was a Whig placeman, who had been crowded out of Lord Aberdeen's Cabinet by the Peelites, and had previously been Secretary at War under Lord John Russell. He became a Free Trader when Lord John regarded Free Trade as a dangerous heresy; and when Erastianism in the shape of lay patronage sundered the Church of Scotland, he joined Dr. Chalmers in the Free Church, described by a critical farmer as a "groand poletical engine." There seems, however, no reason to doubt that Lord Panmure's motives were conscientious, or that his convictions were sincere. He was a Scottish Whig of the purest water, to whom religion and politics were different sides of the same thing. Having been in his youth a soldier, he understood the military details of his business, and he was an indefatigable worker.

These volumes do not purport to be a biography. They consist almost entirely of letters written to Lord Panmure, or by Lord Panmure himself. Many are from Queen Victoria, and only a few of these have appeared in Her Majesty's published correspondence. They display the late Queen's microscopic interest in details, and also her deep concern for the welfare of the army at the siege of Sebastopol. Nothing connected with public business was too large or too small for her, or for Prince Albert. Lord Panmure's own task was to redeem the credit of the War Office, which had suffered under the Duke of Newcastle, and to bring the war to the speediest end compatible with its ostensible objects. He had the great advantage of profiting by the Duke's failures, and of completing efforts which his predecessor had begun. He had nothing to do with Inkerman, or Balaclava, or with the delay after the battle of the Alma, which made possible the fortification of Sebastopol. Most of what Lord Panmure did the Duke of Newcastle would probably have done. But public opinion demanded a scapegoat. The defects of the British army, and especially of the hospitals, had been exposed by William Howard Russell, the famous correspondent of the "Times." The House of Commons had assumed responsibility for the conduct of the campaign, and Lord Palmerston was emphatically the Minister of the House.

It appears, however, from this correspondence that Lord Panmure has been, in one respect, wholly misrepresented. His official despatches to Lord Raglan, who commanded the expedition till his death, were harsh and censorious. His private letters, on the other hand, now for the first time published, are friendly, familiar, sometimes even jocular, and in no case did he contravene Lord Raglan's wishes. The despatches were written for the House of Commons, and were approved by the Queen. But no action was taken upon them. Even Lord Raglan's staff, which was to be "reformed, and that radically," remained just as the General constituted it, and every precaution was taken against wounding his susceptibilities or hurting his pride. Palmerston was continually pressing to have "incapables," as he called them, removed. Panmure stood between him and Raglan, taking all the blame, defending himself in the House of Lords, and receiving with imperturbably good temper all Lord Raglan's complaints of interference from home. Politics he regarded as a game, and he seems to have been continually impressed with a belief that Lord Derby, who had refused office when Lord Aberdeen resigned, would come in before the end of the war. He was tormented by gout, and would gladly have given way to Lord Ellenborough, whom he designated as his own successor. But he was blessed with a thick skin, and perhaps consoled by the reflection that the Prime Minister had taken office as an inevitable man. The mere substitution of Palmerston for Aberdeen had brought the public to believe the best, instead of the worst, about all military and Ministerial arrangements. Lord Panmure himself was no optimist. He sincerely condoled with Lord Raglan upon the difficulty and danger of assaulting Sebastopol. He criticised the French with a freedom and candour that could scarcely have been surpassed. To Lord Raglan himself he was always, in his private letters, considerate and kind, endeavouring to make careful provision for his relief from unnecessary correspondence. Kinglake asserts roundly that Lord Panmure "took his marching orders from the sheets of the 'Times.'" In his familiar correspondence he refers to that journal, and to newspapers generally, with exuberant contempt.

But the editors of these volumes do not, we think, refute Kingslake by stating the fact that Lord Panmure did not become acquainted with Mr. Delane until he had ceased to be Secretary for War. For the picturesque historian does not allege anything clandestine or behind the scenes. On the contrary, he says that the Minister did what the newspaper told him to do. It is obvious that the charge contradicted is quite a different thing from the charge made. Lord Panmure held the opinions of the man in the street, which were also the opinions of Lord Palmerston. The Duke of Newcastle, whether he was right or wrong, thought for himself, and adopted a tone of academic propriety. Unequal to a trying emergency, he had valuable qualities for a constitutional Minister in ordinary times. Lord Panmure had no accomplishments, and was no scholar. But he was active, energetic, and determined, doing the day's work in the day, and troubling himself very little with ulterior considerations. Lord Aberdeen always thought the Russian war a gigantic blunder, and never forgave himself for having been dragged into it. Lord Panmure was not in office when the war broke out, and the ethical aspect of the struggle did not concern him. He does not seem to have asked the reason why more anxiously than Lord Cardigan at Balaclava. He had, however, as we have seen, strength enough to hold out against Palmerston in the business of his own department, and, though he did not underrate difficulties, he did not shrink from encountering them. There is not in this book any evidence that he possessed remarkable talent, or brilliant ability of any kind. He wrote colloquially, and adopted any suggestion made to him, if it were at all feasible, and promised any hope of improvement. After Lord Raglan's death he had to prop up General Simpson, who distrusted himself without being trusted by others, and to make elaborate preparations for superseding him, whenever he resigned, by Sir William Codrington, whose own capacity was called in question, not without reason, by competent critics. But he carried into all tasks the same spirit of simple, dogged determination which marked his course through life. When the Duke of Cambridge returned from the Crimea, Lord Panmure advised him not to return, and at once apprised Lord Raglan of the fact. In discussing the Duke's claim to succeed General Simpson, Lord Panmure wrote, "Your Majesty will, I trust, forgive me when I state that, admitting all His Royal Highness's hereditary courage, he (sic) thought he might fail in self-control in situations where the safety of the Army might depend on coolness and self-possession." Nevertheless, when Lord Hardinge resigned the command of the Army in 1856, the Cabinet selected the Duke of Cambridge to succeed him, and Lord Panmure at once offered

* "The Panmure Papers: Being a Selection from the Correspondence of Fox Maule, Second Baron Panmure, afterwards Eleventh Earl of Dalhousie, K.T., G.C.B. Edited by Sir George Douglas, Bart., M.A., and Sir George Dalhousie Ramsay, C.B., late of the War Office. With a supplementary chapter by the late Rev. Principal Rainy, D.D. Hodder & Stoughton. 2 Vols. 24s. net.

£200 PRIZES

Best Children's Story.
Best Short Stories for Adults.
Best Reviews of "The Bible Handbook."
Best Essays on "The Reunion of the Churches."
Best Essays on Roman Catholic Doctrine.
Best Criticism of the November SUNDAY AT HOME.
Best Open Air Addresses.
Best Coloured Copy of a Picture in the November SUNDAY AT HOME.

For Rules and all other particulars see the "SUNDAY AT HOME" for November. Ready TO-DAY. 6d.

Every Christian Family should have a copy of

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

FOR NOVEMBER.

It is the FIRST PART of a NEW VOLUME, and is on Sale at all Newsagents and Railway Bookstalls TO-DAY.

All those who desire the circulation of bright, wholesome reading for the "old-fashioned" Sabbath should buy and recommend this Magazine.

SAVE THE SABBATH IN YOUR HOUSEHOLD by employing its members with interesting, informing, elevating literature.

Try the NOVEMBER "SUNDAY AT HOME," and see if it does not fulfil these requirements.

It contains 30 ATTRACTIVE ITEMS for 6d.

including the opening of

S. R. Crockett's New Story

Published by
THE RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY, LONDON, E.C.

Part I. now Ready

THE NATIONAL GALLERY

100 PLATES IN COLOUR

CHOSEN TO REPRESENT AS FAR AS POSSIBLE THE WHOLE RANGE OF ART OF EVERY COUNTRY AND SCHOOL

GENERAL EDITOR
T. LEMAN HARE

JOINT AUTHORS
PAUL G. KONODY
MAURICE W. BROCKWELL
F. W. LIPPMANN

THE TEXT (500 pp.) The text will be found stimulating and informative in a high degree, and will embody the latest deductions of the leading art critics, British and foreign.

THE PLATES. It is certain that no picture can be rightly understood from a black and white reproduction. No pains have been spared therefore to secure as accurate and delicate a reproduction as possible of the wealth and glory of the original colour. The size of the page ($11\frac{1}{8} \times 8\frac{1}{8}$) gives room for large reproductions, and these are in every case attached to a cartridge paper mount.

AN EDITION DE LUXE AT A POPULAR PRICE.

COMPLETE IN 17 PARTS AT 1/- NET. EACH PART CONTAINS 6 LARGE COLOURED PLATES.

LONDON: T. C. & E. C. JACK
16 HENRIETTA ST., W.C., & EDINBURGH
ALL BOOKSELLERS AND BOOKSTALLS.

him the position in a letter which much gratified the Duke. There were many reasons against this appointment, which was a great obstruction to Army reform. There were, doubtless, some reasons in its favor, such as the avoidance of personal jealousy where merit did not decide. But the Panmure Papers contain no argument one way or the other, positive or negative, good or bad. There is, however, little use in criticising a book for what it does not express. The value of these papers is incidental, personal, and miscellaneous, not serious, connected, and political. It is certainly strange to read that the great Marquess of Dalhousie, Lord Panmure's cousin, whom he ultimately succeeded in the earldom, and who, by the way, is here miscalled "Earl," at least in the Index, did not, on June 7th, 1857, "feel any alarm at the state of affairs" in India, which he "looked upon as exaggerated." It is, however, quite conceivable that, if Lord Dalhousie had been himself in India, the Mutiny might have been more speedily crushed. About the same time Lord Panmure himself wrote to Lord Clarendon, the Foreign Secretary: "I am not disposed to take a gloomy view of anything, but I confess the letters from Canning and Elphinstone, Haines and Grant, all stagger me." Prince Albert, however, found time to write, on the 19th of June: "The pins attached to the Victoria Cross, as in the specimen you submitted, will answer very well. The Queen has tried them, and found them to do so." Queen Victoria wrote ten days later, with her peculiar, yet quite genuine, humor: "The Queen thinks that the persons decorated with the Victoria Cross might very properly be allowed to bear some distinctive mark after their name (sic). The warrant instituting the decoration does not style it 'an order,' but merely a 'naval and military decoration,' and a distinction; nor is it, properly speaking, an order, being not constituted. V.C. would not do. K.G. means a Knight of the Garter; C.B. a Companion of the Bath; M.P. a Member of Parliament; M.D. a Doctor of Medicine, &c., in all cases designating a person. No one could be called a Victoria Cross. V.C., moreover, means Vice-Chancellor at present; D.V.C., decorated with the Victoria Cross, or B.V.C., Bearer of the Victoria Cross, might do. The Queen thinks the last the best."

It does not require much sagacity to perceive that the whole of this letter is Prince Albert's, except the one delightful sentence, "No one could be called a Victoria Cross." Both the Queen and the Prince were as much taken up with the Indian Mutiny as they had been with the Crimean War. But their passion for detail was invincible, and the Queen's sense of humor was not shared by her husband. Neither of them shared the flippancy of Lord Palmerston, who wrote: "The capture of Delhi, followed, as I trust it will be, by the relief of Lucknow, will give a new character to the contest. It will now resemble a widespread tiger-hunt." It adds not a little to the attraction of this book that the subjects are various, and that little traits of character are constantly appearing, such as Lord Panmure's beginning of a letter to the illustrious Florence Nightingale, "Dear Miss N."

THE GOSPEL OF AGRICULTURE.*

Nothing has been slower in Great Britain, not merely by comparison with some Utopian ideal but by comparison with nearly any other country, than the progress in agriculture during the past fifty or sixty years. On thousands of farms probably, no new idea has been put in force during the whole of that time. The same crops are grown, in the same way, and in the same wise rotation. Seeds have slightly improved, thanks entirely to the seedsman, who would have improved them still more if he had received any encouragement from the farmer. The most noticeable advance is in the comparatively unimportant respect of machinery, whereby crops are more economically harvested, and, to a very slight degree, seed is more economically sown. Our own improvement in this respect came to an end some twenty years ago, when the ring of greater manufacturers of agricultural machinery stopped the annual prizes that till then had been given by the Royal Agricultural Society. It was not convenient for them to spend large sums on improved models and still less agreeable to find the prizes won sometimes by a comparatively unknown firm. At about the same time the Canadians took up the system that we were discarding, and have since gradually taken from our manufacturers a large part of their foreign trade. But it needs no Protection to "save" our farmers from Canadian and American machinery. Their own conservatism is ample guarantee for that.

As we have said, improved ploughs and harrows and drills are, comparatively speaking, a small matter, though on that head much could be adduced to show how important they are. Of more serious moment is the tide of scientific and practical knowledge that has transformed agriculture in other countries and left our own in an almost complete backwash. For an instance, we need go no further than the new and laborious boom that Mr. Stead is endeavouring to make in Professor Bottomley's bacteria inoculation for leguminous crops. For many years the German, the United States, and, no doubt, other governments have cultivated and actively distributed these preparations. Thanks to them and a wise policy of encouragement, some of the most hopeless land in the States has been made the most productive under Alfalfa, which, in this country, is still caviare to the multitude under the name of Lucerne. It is not Mr. Stead but Lord Carrington as President of the Board of Agriculture who ought to be extending the knowledge of the latest discoveries in agriculture by every means at the disposal of a well organised government. The Canadian Government has experimental stations scattered through the Dominion where hundreds of varieties of grain are tried every year; its well-paid agents scour the world for all kinds of things, from timber trees to grasses, that offer any likelihood of repaying acclimatisation; and it is entirely at the disposal of the farmers so far as its information or advice and the supply of sample seeds and fertilisers are concerned.

Our own Board of Agriculture is not sparing of the material at its disposal. No enquiries are turned away. The farmer who asks for the name and remedy for some disease or pest that is new to him receives prompt attention, especially as such enquiries are rather rarely made. But the most apathetic and unenterprising body of farmers in the world needs more than that. The method of their salvation must be thrust into their letterboxes and shouted into their ears, before agriculture will see that definite revival that the continued greatness of our land demands. If the rural post-offices had been only half as much used for this purpose as they have been for the recruiting of soldiers and sailors, the Army and Navy would not be the last to benefit though far greater national advantage would have been the result.

Mr. Will Ogilvie's new book of the open life sets down in prose form but in the spirit of poetry many indelible pictures of Australian and other life—the camp fire "in the weird silence of the brooding Bush"; the progress of vast flocks through the pains and perils of drought to the shearing sheds; the adventures of the river road when the floods come down and cover miles of plain without turning back the intrepid mail-coach driver from his course. But there is nothing quite so illustrative of the energy of the newer lands as the contrast drawn between British and American farming, the story of the irrigated terraces of Colorado and a brief glimpse the author gives of one of the State colleges at work in spreading the light won by laboratory and seed-plot research.

The Gospel Train is now famous throughout the corn States of America. It is simply one of the many means taken by the authorities to bring home to a willing people the newest agricultural facts. It is just a lecture-room on rails, and, once thought of, has become as inevitable a piece of machinery as the platform upon rails by which a candidate for the Presidency manages to meet face to face an astonishing proportion of the ninety millions of people whose suffrages he asks for. The thousand-mile tour is arranged, the times of stopping notified at the stations that are to be honored, and when the train arrives the place is thronged with farmers anxious to hear the latest word on culture or seed selection and witness the most striking results of laboratory experiment.

The difficulty of reaching the English farming constituency is not the immense geographical problem that has been successfully worked out in America. It is that of

* "My Life in the Open." Unwin. 5s.

Book Value.

A subscription to Mudie's Library is equal to hundreds of pounds spent on books. That statement is proved by the following figures, which are taken from last year's records. They show the value received under ordinary conditions by four subscribers.

Amount of Subscription Paid.	Number of Books actually Borrowed.	Total Value of Books Borrowed.
£1 1 0 per ann.—½d. a day	361	£108 6 0
£2 2 0 ,,	727	£218 2 0
£3 3 0 ,,	490	£149 14 6
£4 4 0 ,,	525	£128 9 6

Write for Prospectus of Revised Terms and Catalogue of Books at Reduced Prices to

Mudie's Select Library,

30 to 34, NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.
48, QUEEN VICTORIA STREET, E.C. 241, BROMPTON ROAD, S.W.

FIRST NUMBER NOW READY.

Price 1s. net.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

. A Monthly Magazine .

THE ORGAN OF PATRIOTIC ENDEAVOUR.

THE FIRST NUMBER CONTAINS:

"First Principles," Sir George Goldie. "The Land Fronts of our Naval Basis," Hilaire Belloc, M.P. "The Territorial Army and Employers of Labour," The Lord Mayor of London. "A Foreign Chronique," by "An Old Hand," etc. "Cromwell's Army," by George Hutchinson. With many Articles bearing on Current Military Topics and the Progress of the Territorial Army Scheme.

HUGH REES, Ltd., 119, Pall Mall,

And at all Bookshops and Bookstalls.

AT ALL LIBRARIES AND BOOKSHOPS

A NEW LONG NOVEL BY

MISS MARY JOHNSTON

ENTITLED

LEWIS RAND

With Four Illustrations in Colour by F. C. YOHN.

460 pages. Crown 8vo. 6s.

"'Lewis Rand' is worthy of its predecessors."—Manchester Guardian.

MAYA. By P. LAURENCE OLIPHANT, Author of "The Little Red Fish."

THE BORDERLAND. By ROBERT HALIFAX, Author of "The Drums of Fate."

"A slum story of considerable vividness and power."—Pall Mall Gazette.

THE LEAVEN OF LOVE. By CLARA LOUISE BURNHAM, Author of "Jewel," "The Opened Shutters." With a Frontispiece in Colour.

DESIRE. By UNA L. SILBERRAD, Author of "The Good Comrade."

"Sets up a fine romantic standard of life which should not be missed."—Morning Post.

PRINCESS DEHRA. By JOHN REED SCOTT, Author of "Beatrix of Clare."

THE TRAIL OF THE LONESOME PINE. By JOHN FOX, Jun., Author of "The Little Shepherd of Kingdom Come."

6s. each.

THE LIFE OF TOLSTOY: First Fifty Years.
By AYLMER MAUDE. Demy 8vo. Illustrated. Second edition in the press. 10s. 6d. net.

"Mr. Maude brings this portent before us until we seem to see and hear him; and he has done it without flattery and exaggeration."—Pall Mall Gazette.

PETER MOOR'S JOURNEY TO SOUTH-WEST AFRICA. A realistic account of one of Germany's little Wars. By GUSTAV FRENSSEN, Author of "Jörn Uhl." Crown 8vo. 4s. 6d. net.

"A book for Jingoists to ponder over."—Glasgow Herald.

THE PRINCESSE DE LAMBALLE: A Biography.
By B. C. HARDY. Illustrated. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.

"A carefully prepared and well-written biography of an interesting woman."—Daily Telegraph.

NADIR SHAH. By SIR H. MORTIMER DURAND. Demy 8vo. Illustrated. 10s. 6d. net.

The theme of this volume concerns one of Persia's national heroes.

FIRST AND LAST THINGS. By H. G. WELLS. Crown 8vo. 4s. 6d. net. [Shortly.

Sets forth a corrected, revised, and final version of his personal religion and his social creed. "First and Last Things" knits together what he most surely believes, and is bound to take a prominent place among his books.

A SHORT HISTORY OF ENGRAVING AND ETCHING FOR COLLECTORS AND STUDENTS.
With Full Bibliography, Classified Lists, and Index of Engravers. By A. M. HIND, of the Department of Prints and Drawings, British Museum. 8vo. Fully Illustrated. 18s. net.

"A substantial book packed with information and learning."—Times.

THE WORKS OF BERNARD SHAW.

A List of Mr. Shaw's Works will be sent post free to any address.

Book Lovers should also secure a Copy of our Complete Autumn Announcements.

ARCHIBALD CONSTABLE & CO. LTD.
10, ORANGE STREET, LEICESTER SQUARE, W.C.

getting the audience into any sort of lecture hall and making it believe in the value of "flower-pot experiment" and "new-fangled ideas." The obstacle, however, has never been seriously attacked and is, we believe, considerably exaggerated. There is an enlightened, or at the very least, credulous, farmer here and there in every county, and when by what looks like necromancy he raises a sixty bushel crop of horse-beans on a field that has never before produced forty, the fact becomes notorious and the experiment calls for imitation. That is slowly going on, thanks often to returned emigrants from more enlightened countries who bring back the "new" ideas with them. But before we have learnt these there will be other new ones and we are losing our old supremacy in agriculture much faster than we are ever likely to lose our supremacy in ships. There is more work for an Agriculture League than the Navy League can dream of. If this important factor in national excellence is to flourish, we must have our own public means of acquiring and spreading knowledge.

The Government has called into being by its Small Holdings Act a new class of agriculturists numbering thousands of men with open minds and a desire to know all that is known about those methods that have spelt success for small culture in most of the countries of the world. There is now an audience that will listen and that even demands instruction. The making known of the provisions of the Act itself has been left to a small band of Liberal M.P.'s who within their means have well acquitted themselves of their task. None the less the work of spreading agricultural knowledge cannot be left with safety to private individuals, however enthusiastic. There is, we know, much legislative work still to be done before agriculture is wholly freed from its shackles. But it is certain that in a great and possibly vital number of cases the difference between failure and success on the new small holdings can be determined by a spreading of the gospel of agriculture as it is known to the best instructed among us.

MEMORIES OF THE 'EIGHTIES.*

The reminiscence which collects stories of a past age is of value if the stories are something beyond desultory anecdote. They are welcome if they contain things which amuse. They are of more value if they help to throw light on history or yield some sense of the changing aspect of the world. They are of most value if they possess significance in the light which they may throw upon the character of the men who were of importance at the time. Mrs. Cornwallis West can rightly claim, for these diverting and vivacious pages, inclusion in all these three classes. The remembrance is of the last thirty years of the nineteenth century, and most of the prominent persons of that perplexing age enter the scene, if for a moment only. One of the dominant impressions, after the book is closed, is of the remoteness of that time, separated though it be by less than a decade from the life of to-day. The political war-cries have changed, the parties have regrouped themselves, the old statesmen have vanished from the scene: enthusiasms which then were unheard of now occupy the attention of all men's minds: enthusiasms which then swept the world upon tides and currents of emotion now lie stagnant and deserted. Lady Randolph Churchill saw the ruin of Paris in 1870 and the South African war (in a hospital ship) thirty years later. For six delirious years she was at the centre of one of the most intoxicating political adventures the British Parliament has ever seen. She entered the world of literature as editor of an expensive magazine: she was personally acquainted with the men who made history while history was being "made" with unusual rapidity. From a rich store of reminiscence she has wisely selected anecdotes and descriptions which are nearly all fresh and diverting and full of revelations in personal character.

Amongst stories "of significance" there is a characteristic one (not new) of Disraeli saying to Lord Randolph when offered more wine, in "flowery and exaggerated language," "My dear Randolph, I have supped your excellent champagne, I have drunk your good claret, I have tasted your delicious port, I will have no more." "This greatly amused me," adds the narrator, "as, having sat next to him at dinner, I had particularly noticed that he drank nothing but a little weak brandy-and-water." Gladstone appears under another guise. "On one occasion," says Lady Randolph, "I had been at the House hearing Randolph making a fiery attack on him, which he answered with equal heat and indignation. The hour was late, and Randolph and I had just time to rush home and dress to dine at Spencer House. The first person I met as I went in was Mr. Gladstone, who at once came up and said, 'I hope Lord Randolph is not too tired after his magnificent effort.'" "Any Hindu who dies at Benares," wrote the author of the "magnificent effort" in cheery accents from India, "and whose ashes are thrown into the Ganges, goes right bang up to Heaven without stopping, no matter how great a rascal he may have been. I think the G.O.M. ought to come here: it is his best chance."

Here is Bismarck, troubled by the evidence of exuberant waste of life in worm and fly. He "said he loved Nature, but that the amount of life he saw awed him, and it took a good deal of faith to believe that an 'All Seeing Eye' could notice every living atom when one realised what that meant. 'Have you ever sat on the grass and examined it closely? There is enough life in one square yard to appal you.'" Cecil Rhodes, on the other hand, is learning—with difficulty—how to play. "I am learning the mysteries of Bridge," he writes, "and even with shilling points am only thirty shillings to the bad. I quite see that it is an assured income to a thinking player." "I have been treated with great urbanity," he adds, "in spite of some mistakes, such as revoking, &c." Who would not be "urbane" to an Empire builder and millionaire under such trying circumstances? The stories of the Franco-German war are worth recording. Napoleon III. was under no delusion as to the chaos of opinion just before the catastrophe. "How can you expect my Government to get on?" he asked. "The Empress is a Legitimist: Morny is an Orleanist: Prince Napoleon is a Republican: I am a Socialist—only Persigny is an Imperialist, and he is mad." In the height of the extravagant festivity, when all the horizon seemed cloudless, there were those who knew what tremendous events were in preparation. After a good Twelfth Night Party, Count Hatzfeldt, then Secretary to the German Embassy in Paris, remarked, "I never saw their Majesties in better spirits than they were last night; and God knows where they will be next year at this time." The remarkable defence advanced for one of the chief performers in the tragedy might almost be extended to all. Lady Randolph was present at the trial of Bazaine at Versailles. He "sat impassive, even while Maître Lachaud, his advocate, making a curious defence, at one moment pointed with a dramatic gesture to the accused, exclaiming, "Mais regardez-le donc! Ce n'est pas un traitre, c'est un imbécile."

The astonishing story of Lord Randolph Churchill's political suicide has been well told in former publications. He did not even tell his wife, Mr. Winston Churchill asserted in the biography of his father. Here is that wife's record of an incident which still remains in part inexplicable and altogether tragic. She had been arranging details of a coming reception at the Foreign Office.

> "The night before his resignation we went to the play with Sir Henry Wolff. Questioning Randolph as to the list of guests for the party, I remember being puzzled at his saying: 'Oh! I shouldn't worry about it if I were you; it probably will never take place.' I could get no explanation of his meaning, and shortly after the first act he left us ostensibly to go to the club, but in reality to go to the 'Times' office and give them the letter he had written at Windsor Castle three nights before. In it he resigned all he had worked for for years, and, if he had but known it, signed his political death-warrant. When I came down to breakfast, the fatal paper in my hand, I found him calm and smiling. 'Quite a surprise for you,' he said. He went into no explanation, and I felt too utterly crushed and miserable to ask for any, or even to remonstrate. Mr. Moore (the permanent Under-Secretary at the Treasury), who was devoted to Randolph, rushed in, pale and anxious, and, with a faltering voice, said to me, 'He has thrown himself from the top of the ladder, and will never reach it again!' Alas! he proved too true a prophet."

Agreeable incidents are multiplied in these pleasant pages:

* "The Reminiscences of Lady Randolph Churchill." By Mrs. George Cornwallis West. Arnold. 15s. net.

A NOVEL FOUR-IN-HAND

MR. JOHN LANE has pleasure in introducing to the public a Four-in-hand of First Novels by Four New Authors:—

ARTHUR'S	By A. Neil Lyons.	6s.
THE LOST CABIN MINE	By Frederick Niven	6s.
A POOR MAN'S HOUSE	By Stephen Reynolds.	6s.
THE GREEN DOMINO	By Anthony Dyllington.	6s.

[Oct. 28.

ROMANCE OF A COFFEE STALL

I "Very pretty comedy," is the verdict on ARTHUR'S of the critic in the Times. "It is not only a very entertaining and amusing work, but a very kindly and tolerant work also. At the back of it is understanding, and love of life, and that most admirable frame of mind for an artist, the live-and-let-live temperament. . . . Incidentally the work is a mirror of a phase of the low London life of to-day, as true as certain of Hogarth's transcripts in the eighteenth century, and far more tender."

"Personally," says Punch, "I have always fought shy of coffee-stalls. . . . Happily Mr. A. NEIL LYONS is made of sterner stuff—he seems to get right at the heart of things; and I confess to a real admiration for this philosopher of the coffee-stall."

"Arthur and his cronies will live among the Londoners of fiction beside the bargees of Mr. Jacobs and the inmates of 'No. 5, John Street.'"—Daily Chronicle.

A STORY OF ADVENTURE

II All over the West, from Alaska to Sonora, the old prospectors have heard, in one form or another, the myth of THE LOST CABIN MINE. Sometimes one is told that it is in one place, sometimes in another; again one is told that it is in Wyoming. Out of this—truth or fable—Mr. NIVEN has woven a romance that carries on the traditions of Defoe and Stevenson. The story is one of those that are read by all, young and old; and (unless we are very greatly mistaken) it will take its place among the open-air romances of our language.

NOVEL NOT FICTION

III A POOR MAN'S HOUSE is not a novel. The only side on which it borders upon the imaginative is in its synthetic side, the side from which history may be classed as imaginative. The author records his experiences as an inmate of "a poor man's house," as a fellow-worker with the "poor man," in this instance a Devon fisherman, and anticipates one type of criticism by this statement: "I have felt something of the pinch and hardship of the life, as well as enjoyed its picturesqueness. . . . I have worked on the boats sometimes fifteen hours a day, not as an amateur, but for hard and—what is more to the point—badly-needed coin." The reader to whom the MS. was first sent wrote: "Mr. STEPHEN REYNOLDS has produced a book to which it would be difficult to find any adequate parallel. A POOR MAN'S HOUSE ought to make him famous at one bound."

A COMEDY OF HIGH LIFE

IV THE GREEN DOMINO inevitably suggests Marvell's "green thought in a green shade." Mr. DYLLINGTON has gained the Harland manner—most facile and most felicitous of means for the telling of a summer's tale. And yet there is nothing unreal in the story for all its gracious trifling, there is just the requisite touch of pathos to lend a deeper colour to the scene, and a vivid human interest to a faëry tale of modern English life. One can only hint at a story too exquisitely elusive for analytical detail, and recall in a parallel train of thought Mr. Le Gallienne's inability to translate a wild rose.

Just Published—A Standard Work on Cinque-Cento Art.

MEMOIRS OF THE DUKES OF URBINO

Illustrating the Arms, Art, and Literature of Italy from 1440 to 1630. By JAMES DENNISTOUN of Dennistoun. A New Edition. By EDWARD HUTTON. With upwards of 200 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 3 vols., 42s. net.

This, the chief authority upon the Duchy of Urbino, has long been out of print. Mr. Hutton has left the text intact, but added a large number of Notes, Comments, and References. Besides these notes the book acquires a new value on account of the mass of illustrations which it now contains.

One of the most important and remarkable books in the whole range of NAPOLEONIC literature.

DUMOURIEZ AND THE DEFENCE OF ENGLAND AGAINST NAPOLEON.

By J. HOLLAND ROSE, Litt.D., Author of "The Life of Napoleon," &c., and A. M. BROADLEY, Joint Author of "Napoleon and the Invasion of England," Demy 8vo. With numerous Portraits, Maps, and Facsimiles. 21s. net.

Guardian.—"It is impossible to do more than attempt an indication of the varied and significant contents of this fascinating volume, which should appeal alike to all Englishmen and all Frenchmen."

Nation.—"The book must assuredly take its place as a standard work upon one phase of an epoch of inexhaustible interest."

Almost the whole of the contents of this volume are new. The MS. of the great French strategic expert's plan for the Defence of England cost Pitt not less than £20,000.

NAPOLEON AND THE ARCHDUKE CHARLES.

A History of the Franco-Austrian Campaign in the valley of the Danube in 1809. By F. LORAINE PETRE, Author of "Napoleon's Campaign in Poland," "Napoleon's Conquest of Prussia," &c. With 8 Illustrations and 5 Sheets of Maps and Plans. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net. [Just out.

ORTHODOXY.

By G. K. CHESTERTON. Uniform with "Heretics." Crown 8vo, 5s net.

Times.—"By a caprice of the Creator, which Aristotle and Mr. Chesterton have overlooked, there is always a little band of men afflicted with craving for truth. . . . The passion for truth will never break Mr. Chesterton's rest, and that is well....Mr. Chesterton's Rabelaisian orthodoxy."

Daily News.—"Mr. Chesterton's masterpiece."

KASHMIR; LAND OF STREAMS AND SOLITUDES.

By P. PIRIE. With 25 Full-page plates in colours, and upwards of 100 other Illustrations, by H. R. PIRIE. Crown 4to, 21s. net.

This book is the result of three years' wandering on the outposts of civilisation, where author and artist proceeded by special permission of the Government of India, thus being enabled to penetrate far into the wilds, especially along the Gilgit road, where, as a rule, none but a sportsman or an officer on duty penetrates.

TWO DIANAS IN ALASKA.

By AGNES HERBERT and a SHIKARI. With numerous Illustrations reproduced from Photographs. Uniform with "Two Dianas in Somaliland." Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

BIRDS OF THE PLAINS.

By DOUGLAS DEWAR, Author of "Bombay Ducks." With numerous Illustrations, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

This is a number of vivid pen-pictures of Indian birds written in breezy language, to appeal to the general reader as well as to the naturalist.

HOLLY, YEW, AND BOX.

With Notes on other Evergreens. By W. DALLIMORE and THOMAS MOORE. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

OUR DAILY BREAD.

A Tale of low life in Berlin. By CLARA VIEBIG, Author of "Absolution." Crown 8vo, 6s.

JOHN LANE, The Bodley Head, LONDON and NEW YORK.

incidents of the life of the "eighteen eighties." Lord Randolph excites his father to fury by having Mr. Chamberlain to dinner—"a man who was a Socialist, or not far from one: who was reported to have refused to drink the Queen's health when Mayor of Birmingham, &c." "How," he asked, "could the influence of such a man be anything but pernicious?" Here are the "fourth party" in riotous spirits scandalising those who thought politics a serious affair by interpreting them as a splendid game. "Sometimes to hear Sir Henry Drummond Wolff and Randolph discussing the situation," is the protest, "the uninitiated might have thought the subject was a game of chess." Lady Randolph pilgrimages with two of them to the Monday Pops amid the mockery of her friends at her "weird companions": "one solemn with beard and eyeglass, the other æsthetic with long hair and huge spats." So appeared in such exhilarating days Sir John Gorst and Mr. Arthur Balfour. Lady Randolph proves singularly effective in telegraphic repartee. A New York millionaire, asked for a subscription to the War Hospital Ship, replies, "I have no knowledge of the scheme." "I cabled back, 'Read the papers'; but this, alas! did not untie his purse-strings." More successful was the treatment of Mr. Bernard Shaw. Invited to lunch, "Certainly not," he wires. "What have I done to provoke such an attack on my well-known habit?" "Know nothing of your habits," is the comforting reply. "Hope they are not as bad as your manners."

The whole scene is set—in the early chapters—in a society still possessing inherited simplicities: with wealth accumulated, but not yet, as in the later stages, gambled in "South Africans" or wasted in war or wild personal extravagance. The "strict observance of the English Sunday" filled the young visitor from Paris with amazement. There was no Queen's Hall "to while away a wet afternoon": "the fashion of going to the country for the week end was not known: motors had not yet commenced their deplorable developments. In London 'a lady never travelled alone without taking her maid with her in the railway carriage': the American woman had not yet arrived, and was still 'looked upon as a strange and abnormal creature, with habits and manners something between a Red Indian and a Gaiety Girl.'" It was not till well on in the 'eighties that people began to give dinner parties on Sundays, "and at the beginning" very few had out their carriages. Thirty years ago practically no restaurants existed in London, and dinner anywhere but in a private house was thought quite "emancipated." Nothing is more impressive in this volume than the evidence of the hurrying pace at which to-day the world is being rushed into newer conditions of being—some undesirable, most untried.

NOTES ON NEW TESTAMENT CRITICISM.*

This volume represents the penultimate section of Dr. Abbott's long, exhaustive "Diatessarica," and the author is to be congratulated upon having brought his arduous task, with its wealth of minutiae and width of speculation, so near to its completion. The appeal of the entire series, he observes, is based on its character as a collection of "facts carefully ascertained, fully and impartially stated, and so indexed and arranged as to be readibly accessible." Their value, in this light, is undoubted, for high scholarship and indefatigable patience have enabled Dr. Abbott to collect materials from Origen, Epictetus, the papyri, the Targums, and the early fathers, which make all serious students of the new Testament his debtors. But this book, like its predecessors, cannot be summed up adequately as a collection of data. It is not content to be objective. Fancy, as well as fact, lies over its pages, i.e., fancy in the sense of the imagination correlating linguistic data, penetrating the crust of language, and striving to reconstruct the inner processes of thought and feeling which threw up the varied strata of the literary evidence in question. It is in this direction that we cannot always follow the learned author. We take some of his torches gratefully, but not in order to accompany him on his out-of-the-way routes. One underlying axiom of his work, for example, seems to be the assumption that when Jesus or any of the New Testament writers employed a phrase from the Old Testament, the speaker or author in question had the context in mind, and consciously allowed it to determine, or at least affect his later use of the term. To the Western scholar, with the texts before him, this is not an unnatural inference. But surely it fails to do justice to the freedom and spontaneous variety of actual life. Consecrated and familiar language is repeatedly used by people who are quite oblivious of its context, and who take it on their lips to express the unpremeditated feelings and hopes of their own lives. They "cast the 'language' old into another mould." Men and women are not so "bookish" as the modern scholar is apt to presuppose; when they build their houses, they are not painfully conscious of the quarries whence the stones came. Great original personalities, especially, must be credited with a sweep of creative genius which renders it an unfruitful and irrelevant task to explain the minutiae of their language out of the earlier literature of their race or age. Dr. Abbott scarcely seems to allow enough weight to this consideration. Occasionally he strays out of sight of it altogether. Thus, after pointing out, for example, that the only use of "Son of Man" in the Pentateuch occurs in the song of Balaam, which declares that God cannot repent because He is not "Son of Man," the author adds: "And how could Jesus fail to have it [i.e., this passage] in His mind, whether He accepted it, as from Scripture, or rejected it, as from Balaam?" This assumption is far from obvious; Jesus, for all his love of the Scriptures, was not a scribe. But it is only one instance of a principle which too often in Dr. Abbott's deft, delicate hands, is allowed to work up his real facts into an unreal product; the historical imagination, in the very exuberance of its own subtlety and ingenuity, melts into fancy, which is a very different thing.

The first part of the book contains explanatory notes bearing on "Silanus the Christian," but of great technical use and independent interest. The two larger notes, which make up the second part, discuss the term "Son of Man" and "The Self-Manifestation of Jesus." A comprehensive index enables the reader to find his way about in the heterogeneous stores of learning scattered through these studies. As he does so, he lights upon a number of suggestions tucked away in small print. Thus he discovers that incidentally Dr. Abbott defends the Domitianic date of the Apocalpse, though he rejects the modern hypothesis that John, the son of Zebedee, died an early death by martyrdom. His exegesis of Rev. xiv. 4 explains the phrase "not defiled with women" as a reference to the purity of worship which withstood the seduction of Rome the Harlot. But this is surely improbable. Had any such idea been in the writer's mind, the singular would have been used, not the plural. Ascetic celibacy is plainly the meaning of the description. Again, in the notes on Rev. i. 1, Dr. Abbott has vexed his soul in vain. The "angel" of Jesus here is simply the angelus interpres, a conventional figure of Jewish apocalyptic, and it is superfluous to connect it with the Paraclete. The most valuable sections in the book are perhaps those devoted to the exegesis of the Apocalypse of John. On the other hand, the closing notes on the connection between the story of the stater in the fish's mouth and the restitution of Peter (in John xxi.) seem quite off the level of probability. "As the poems of Israel influenced the chronicles of Israel, so—it can hardly be doubted—the poetry of the first generation of Galilean and Jewish believers must have left its impress on subsequent prose narratives of the life of Christ throughout the Roman Empire." This may be granted in the abstract. The story of the cursing of the fig-tree may be an instance of the literalising of a metaphor or a parable. But Dr. Abbott's curious and ingenious arguments fail to make it psychologically probable that John, in the last chapter of his gospel, was working consciously upon Matthew's narrative as allegorical, and that, in so doing, he was right. There may be a case for this verdict. Only it would require to be stated more cogently, with less appeal to precarious inferences from language and hypothetical symbolism.

* "Notes on New Testament Criticism." By Edwin A. Abbott. A. & C. Black. Price 7s. 6d. net.

BOOK BARGAINS.—Garnier's English Landed Interest, 2 vols., 6s. 6d. (published 21s.) Cruikshank's 400 Humorous Illustrations, 4s. 6d. (published 16s.) Pepy's Diary, 4 vols., 15s. (published 30s.) Fennimore's Cooper's novels, 32 vols., 42s. Thackeray's complete works, 26 vols., 45s. (cost £4 12s.). Chaffer's Pottery and Porcelain, 28s. 6d. (cost 42s.). Art of Extempore Speaking, 2s. 6d. 100,000 books for sale and exchange. Menpe's World's Children, 8s. 6d. (cost 20s. net). Wood's Complete Natural History, 5 vols., 2,000 illustrations, 27s. 6d. (cost £2 12s. 6d.). Harmsworth's Encyclopædia, 8 vols., 25s. Please state wants. Catalogues free.—HOLLAND BROS., Book Merchants, 21, John Bright Street, Birmingham.

TYPEWRITING.

TYPEWRITING. — Typewriting of every description high-class work. Author's MSS. 10d. per thousand words prompt, accurate. E. C. PEARCE, 30, College Road, Reading.

Buy

The Saturday Westminster

Weekly Issue of "The Westminster Gazette."

Because

it contains all F.C.G.'S Cartoons of the Week.
of its unique page of "Problems and Prizes."
of its Book Reviews and Literary Columns.
of the Variety of General Articles and Short Stories.
it is the only Weekly Magazine-Review of the kind.
It costs but a Penny a Week. By post, 6s. 6d. (Home), and 8s. 8d. (Abroad) per annum.

It

Never Fails to Please & Satisfy

Offices: Tudor House, Tudor St., London, E.C.

BOOKSELLERS.

THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE,
53, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C.,

CATALOGUES POST FREE.

Have the Largest Selection of Bibles, Prayer Books, and Church Services. Publishers of "The Marked Bible," Lectern Less on Book," "Priest's Pocket Bible," "Daily Service Book," &c.

CASH DISCOUNT, 3D. IN 1S.

☛ Thousands of Bibles, etc., at HALF-PRICE.

Catalogue No. 361. 148 Pages.
GLAISHER'S 1909 GENERAL CATALOGUE OF SELECTED PUBLISHERS' REMAINDERS.
Now Ready. Reduced Prices. Immense Variety.
WILLIAM GLAISHER, LTD.,
Remainder and Discount Booksellers,
265, HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON.

The Economist.

(ESTABLISHED 1843.)

Weekly Commercial Times, Bankers' Gazette, and Railway Monitor.

A POLITICAL, LITERARY, FINANCIAL AND GENERAL NEWSPAPER.

PRICE 8d. BY POST, 8½d. ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM, £2 COLONIES AND ABROAD, £2 4s.

The established authority on all Financial and Commercial subjects. In addition to a large high-class general circulation, the ECONOMIST is subscribed to by Banking Houses, Chambers of Commerce, Mercantile Firms, and Railway, Insurance, and other Companies throughout the United Kingdom, the Colonies and Abroad; and, as its columns from week to week show, it is the recognised organ for the announcements of some of the most important trades in the Kingdom.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY IN TIME FOR THE MORNING MAILS

Offices: GRANVILLE HOUSE, ARUNDEL STREET, STRAND, W.C., and of all Booksellers and Newsagents.

Rowntree's Elect Cocoa

MAKERS TO H.M. THE KING

"WARMS AND CHEERS." A favourite beverage with those who appreciate a pure Cocoa.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.
SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C

2½ per cent. INTEREST
allowed on Deposits repayable on demand.

2 per cent. INTEREST
on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.
All General Banking Business transacted.
ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.
C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

BOVRIL

helps you to eat and feeds you.

HIGHEST QUALITY
TURKISH TOWELS
AND SIMILAR GOODS.
SOFT AND ABSORBENT.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWEL.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH SHEET.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH MAT.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH GOWN.

THE "OSMAN" Turkish Goods enumerated here are an absolute necessity in every household. They are a luxury, but not expensive, and can be obtained at prices within reach of every one. Be sure to buy the "Osman" brand and avoid imitations.

MADE BY
BARLOW & JONES, LIMITED, MANCHESTER;
And Sold by all High-class Drapers and Upholsterers.

A PAGE FROM THE RUSSIAN REVOLUTION.*

In "The Spy" Gorky presents us with a pendant to "Comrades," his picture of revolutionary propaganda amongst the Russian democracy. Both books will live in history, and both should be studied by Englishmen to understand the Autocracy's repressive methods, and certain phases of the struggle for Constitutionalism which three years ago resulted in the creation of the halt, maimed, and one-eyed Duma, a mock Parliament without power, but still a Parliament.

The student of Russian literature is struck in most Russian authors by their mournful or cynical recognition of the brutalities of life and the cowardice of human nature. To one school of writers these vices, brutality and weakness, are innate in the soul of their people, to another they are the product of centuries of autocratic oppression, misrule, and national stagnation. Probably both schools are right. The nation's history is a product of its character, and its character of its history. Whether it be Ivan the Terrible and his blood-stained strelitsi, or Nicholas II. and his "patriotic" Black Hundreds, we know that the tyranny of brute force breeds alternately cowardice and revolt in a nation. The charge that has always lain against the Russian Autocracy, whether against Nicholas I. with his "order reigns in Warsaw," or against Nicholas II. with his "order reigns in Teheran," is that as the great foe of popular liberties and self-government, at home and abroad, it has always played the part of the "samodour" or domestic bully. The spirited element in the nation which has shown fight of any kind against this great gendarmerie has always held the sympathies of Europe, for Europe understood only too well the brutality of the police methods by which the mild "moderate Liberals," the students, professors, and refined women engaged in the campaign for social reform and popular education, were turned into "terrorists." It is written in the pages of George Kennan's "Siberia and the Exile System," the cowardliness of this gendarmerie. And the later tactics of the Russian police, of the notorious "third section," and the decorated generals, in their creation, yesterday, of the "Black Hundreds," are the subject of Gorky's last novel.

The hero of the book, which in the Russian edition is entitled "The Superfluous Man," is Yevsey Klimkov, a peasant orphan, a nervous, timid, and puny boy, who is adopted by the blacksmith, Uncle Piotr. Yevsey, both at home and at school, early finds it the best plan to make no resistance, but to take in silence all the beatings of Aunt Agafya, and the bullyings of her son, Yashka, because resistance only enrages his persecutors the more. The dreamy child is afraid of the sombre landscape round him, of the drunken muzhiks, the scolding women, the quarrels and fights among the neighbours, he is afraid also of the blacksmith's tales of the devils and God. And he notices that everybody is seeking for mastery over somebody else, and goes in constant fear, himself, of his superiors, and of life. "The whole of life was filled with terror, and terror sundered the people one from another." But when a fire threatens to burn down the whole village, all the people unite in friendliness and help, and, after putting it out, each sees that his neighbour is a good fellow, and Yevsey wonders why the peasants should not unite and drop their life of malice and discord and hatred. Uncle Piotr, who is a philosopher and typifies the fatalistic attitude of the Russian peasant to the evils of life, after narrating one day how he was beaten by the officials for lodging a complaint with the governor, and kept in prison for three months, gives Yevsey his rule of life: do whatever is assigned to you, keep yourself to yourself, and beware of bold men. Time passes, and Yevsey is taken by Uncle Piotr to the neighbouring town, and is handed over to his new master, the old bookseller, Matvey Matveyevich, who is secretly in the pay of the Police Bureau. The shop, in fact, is a trap for students and political suspects, who come there in search of prohibited "political" literature which is supplied to Matvey by the police spy, Lukin. Yevsey notices that his master attracts the attention of some of his customers to the books which Lukin has brought, and that after he has sold them the latter, and obtained their addresses, these customers never reappear, and one day, the boy, on an impulse, warns two customers not to buy such books. Yevsey gathers from a broken conversation he overhears between his old master and his housekeeper, the comely and kind-faced woman, Rayisa, that there is a dark mystery between the two; and later he discovers that Rayisa, when suspected of poisoning a man has been saved from hard labor by the bookseller's interest with the police, and he has forced her to become his mistress. Lukin, the spy, however, has also mysterious relations with Rayisa, and in a scene of sinister force, Dostoievskian in its intensity, the boy witnesses the poisoning of the old bookseller at Lukin's instigation. Rayisa and Yevsey, who know too much about Matvey's death, go to live in Lukin's quarters, and the boy obtains a small post in the local Police Bureau.

The description of Yevsey's life in the police station is very true to life. In Russia the police are recruited from the most doubtful class, men who will stick at no dirty work, and the fact that the Government relies so largely on their activity endows them with arbitrary power. They are not answerable to public opinion, for the average Russian citizen goes in fear of the police, and the only check on their actions is the control of their official superiors. In all countries the police have a tendency to work together in defiance of the public, but nowhere more so than in Russia. But Yevsey finds that the police are keenly envious of the political spies. The clerks in the Bureau speak with admiring fear of the spies' power over people's lives, and of their ability to "fix" a man so that no matter what he does or where he goes he will, inevitably, be landed in prison. This is the ideal of men who are the instruments of despotic power. Even Zarubin, Yevsey's little fellow clerk, observes with satisfaction, "everybody is afraid of us. Let's get into the Department of Safety and become political spies. . . . Then what a life we'll lead." The opportunity for this step in life comes unexpectedly to our timid hero; he has explained to Zarubin his idea that poverty and stupidity are what keep the people back, and that the Czar is rich and the people are poor. Therefore, if the Czar will give his riches to the people, all will be contented. And Zarubin reports Yevsey's treasonable words to his official superiors. Yevsey is arrested, and shut up in a cell for ten days, and, in a fit of cowardly anguish, to save his skin, he reveals that his ideas are not original, but that he has gathered them from the talk of an idealistic old man in the Chancery Department, Kapiton Reüsov. The old clerk is arrested in his turn, and Yevsey, for betraying his friend, is promoted to the Department of Public Safety, and joins the Bureau of the political spies.

In the last two hundred pages of his novel Gorky has drawn with great sharpness the psychology of the police street spies as distinguished from the aristocrats of the profession, the provocators. Yevsey has joined the service in the days of the Japanese war, when everything is in confusion in the official mind, and when the massacre of the people's procession in Petersburg on "Bloody Sunday" has roused all classes to revolt and indignation. The old order seems tumbling to pieces. The spies' usual diversions, drink, women, and cards, fail to appease their growing uneasiness. The frequent harangues of their official superiors, and of the richly-dressed "gentlemen from Petersburg," that they must work more zealously and cleverly, and that "all ways are permissible," only betray that the Bureaucracy is growing weaker and weaker. When the incredible news is spread everywhere that the Czar has granted a Constitution to the nation, the spies are warned that the foreigners, the Liberals, and other enemies of Holy Russia are closing round the throne, and that to counteract their manœuvres a secret society has been organised by the counts and princes and governors submissive to the will of the Czar, the "League of Russian Men," alias the Black Hundreds. The description of the change in the general public's attitude, of the expression of confidence, enthusiasm, and joy on the faces in the streets, in place of their old humble, flat, and cautious look, is admirably done. The people believe that the Constitution is theirs, and free, bold speech is heard wherever crowds gather together. The spies are powerless, the authorities seem to be standing still. But one day the old dread and perplexity, the old

* "The Spy." By Maxim Gorky. Duckworth. 6s.

SMOKED EVERYWHERE BY (NEARLY) EVERYBODY.

No. 4, Shooting.

"THE MIXTURE OF MATCHLESS MERIT."

PLAYER'S "NAVY" MIXTURE

Sold in Two Strengths:
Medium 4½d. per oz.
1/6 per ¼lb. tin.
Mild 5d. per oz.
1/8 per ¼lb. Tin.

JOHN PLAYER & SONS. Nottingham, will forward testing samples post free to applicants mentioning this paper.

The Imperial Tobacco Co. (of Great Britain and Ireland), Ltd.

If you suffer from Liver Complaints

MERIT'S LIVERETS

Prepared, as prescribed by a prominent Physician, from purely vegetable ingredients.

MERIT'S (FAVRINE) Liverets
STRENGTHEN WHILE THEY RELIEVE

MERIT'S LIVERETS

Combine both curative and tonic properties, and are especially compounded to avoid that debilitating effect which the majority of Liver medicines produce. Price 1/1½, of all Chemists or direct from

MERIT & CO.,
66, St. Mary Axe, London, E.C.

will promptly cure you

THE
LEADING EGYPTIAN CIGARETTES

Kyriazis'
EGYPTIAN CIGARETTES
CAIRO.

Try them. They are the finest imported, and can be obtained from all High-class Tobacconists, Stores, &c.

Wholesale depot—20, Cheapside, London, E.C.

TANGYE OIL ENGINE

AUTOMATIC TUBE IGNITION.

NO LAMP EXCEPT FOR STARTING

TANGYES LTD
BIRMINGHAM.

Curio Club Bargains

Private persons desirous of disposing of antiques at bargain prices will find a ready sale for same at the "London Opinion Curio Club" 107, Regent Street, London, W.

To Collectors of China, etc.
Don't throw away anything broken in the home, but buy

"FORTAFIX"

Which is the Strongest Cement in the world, and

Withstands Boiling Water.

White in colour, it mends and repairs anything from a saucepan to a piece of china. It is fire-proof and chemical-proof. Of all Ironmongers, Stationers, Oilmen, Chemists and Stores,

Per 6d. Tube.

or sent post-free through nearest Agent on receipt of 6d. in stamps to

BENJAMIN & GEE,
31, St. Mary Axe, LONDON, E.C.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE DRINK THE

RED WHITE & BLUE

Delicious for Breakfast & after Dinner.

In making, use LESS QUANTITY, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

suspicion and distrust, appear again on the faces in the streets, and people's voices show anger, fear, resentment. Crowds of rowdies and hooligans have suddenly appeared in the streets, waving national flags and carrying portraits of the Czar, and beating respectable citizens. The Constitutional processions are attacked by the hooligans, who are secretly organised by the police and the Department of Safety. It is the triumph of the Black Hundreds. The spies are now armed with revolvers, and mingle with the rioters, shouting, "Down with the Constitution! Hurrah for the Emperor!" People who refuse to take off their hats to the flag are shot down. The people are divided, they are to be shown what liberty is. "Freedom means murder, robbery, and mob violence." Yevsey, who, horror-stricken, assists at one of these street massacres in which a young student, a bold and fearless man, is torn to pieces by the hooligans, cannot stand the strain of this new work that is demanded of him. His mind gives way, and, a prey to fresh fears, he commits suicide. "The Spy," although clearly a work of political propaganda, contains so artistic an analysis of the confused soul of the Russian people in its alternate fits of fear and revolt against its master, the gendarmerie, that it will certainly live in history, along with the bitter satires of Soltykov. It is a mournful page of Russian history that Gorky chronicles for us, but it is relatively bright in comparison with the hopeless outlook of Liberal writers during the gloomy and leaden reigns of Nicholas I. and Alexander III.

A Novel Reader's Guide.—"The Tramping Methodist." By Sheila Kaye-Smith (Bell, 6s.) An excellent first novel, the scene of which is laid in rural Kent and Surrey during the generation that succeeded John Wesley.—"The Sunny Side of the Hill." By Rosa N. Carey (Macmillan, 6s.) A rather insipid story of domestic life.—"Stolen Sweets." By William Le Queux (Nash, 6s.) An unscrupulous adventurer and a simple country girl are the chief characters in this book, which is as full of incident and as unconvincing as its predecessors.—"Joseph: A Dancing Bear." By J. Barnett (Nash, 6s.) A series of humorous episodes in the life of a captive bear, charmingly illustrated by Mr. L. Leslie Brooke.—"Put Yourself in Her Place." By M. C. Leighton (Ward, Lock, 6s.) A melodramatic novel, with a false heir and other similar stage properties. —"The Waters of Jordan." By H. A. Vachell (Murray, 6s.) The co-respondent in a divorce suit retires to the country, determined to purge his fault. He falls in love with the rector's daughter, and the tale pursues its way through various intricacies to a happy ending.

The Week in the City.

The Movement of Leading Stocks.

	Price Friday Morning, Oct. 16.	Price Friday Morning, Oct. 23.
Consols 2½ per cent.	84⅞	... 84¾
German 3 per cent.	82	... 82
Russian 5 per cent. 1906...	98⅜	... 98
Bulgarian 92	100½	... 100½
Turkish United	90⅜	... 89¼
Grand Trunk 1st Pref.	103	... 103
Grand Trunk Ord.	20⅝	... 20⅜
Canadian-Pacific	180⅛	... 180½
Rand Mines	6 31/32	... 6 27/32
Cons. Goldfields	4 15/16	... 4 25/32

The panicky feeling caused by the upheaval in the Near East has passed away, and though the danger of a conflagration cannot be considered altogether removed, the Stock Exchange has regained control of its nerves, and is disturbed only by an occasional tremor when some more than usually alarmist report is put in circulation. The general composure, however, is reflected in the comparison of prices at the head of this column, which contains the securities most intimately concerned in the Balkan statement. The steadiness extends to all the markets, but is accompanied by a decline in the volume of business which is beginning to call forth the old complaint from members of lack of occupation. The lull is ascribed to unwillingness to enter into new commitments while the Eastern imbroglio still remains unsettled, to uneasiness respecting home affairs, owing to the large amount of unemployment, to bad trade, and unsatisfactory railway receipts. Some excitement and disappointment was exhibited upon the announcement of the Mexican railway dividend on Thursday afternoon, and the stocks declined heavily in a very short time.

One symptom of returning confidence in the stock markets is the appearance of several new capital issues. One of these is the offer of £300,000 Four and a Half per cent. Debenture Stock by the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company, well known to ocean travellers as the R. M. S. P. The stock is secured upon the whole of the Company's fine fleet, and other assets, valued together at £3,784,548. At the price of 98½ per cent. it constitutes a sound, well-secured investment.

British Investments in Argentina.

When speaking last week of the world-wide depression, one exception might possibly have been made in the case of the Argentine Republic. No doubt she is affected to some extent by the adverse conditions prevailing in other countries, which would operate, if in no other way, to lessen the demand for her products. There are, however, practically no manufactures in the country, its prosperity depending almost entirely on pastoral and agricultural conditions. These have been for quite a long time past very favorable, the country having enjoyed several good harvests in succession. The crops now ripening promise to create a further record, the total value being estimated at the equivalent of £92,000,000. If this is realised, the Republic will have ample means for meeting her obligations abroad, the railways will be assured of heavy traffic receipts, and will, in their turn, be able to pay good dividends on their ordinary stocks. In fact, the reports recently issued indicate that not only is it possible for the railways to maintain their dividends at the usual rates of 6 to 7 per cent., but to devote large amounts to reserve, and to the improvement of their properties.

The situation presented is in strong contrast to that in existence after the Baring crisis of 1890, when a moratorium was declared on the foreign debt and the provinces and municipalities were defaulting generally. Undeterred by the bitter lessons then taught, the British capitalist has, since the recovery became assured, poured his money into the country like water. It is computed that upwards of £138,000,000 of British capital is invested in Argentine railways alone, and the total amount, including Government and municipal stocks, tramways, and miscellaneous securities, probably approaches £300,000,000. As nearly all the defaults have been compromised, the bulk of this capital is giving a very good return. In fact, it would be difficult to find a group of investments upon which the yield is so high. The railways, at least, seem assured of good dividends for the next year or two, but it can hardly be expected that the present level of prosperity can be maintained. Bad seasons will be experienced and may produce a reaction almost as startling as the advance has been. That, however, is a small misfortune compared with what would happen if the Government of the Republic should be tempted to indulge in warlike adventures, improvident expenditure, or any of the vagaries to which Spanish-American Governments have, unfortunately, been liable in the past. It has been on its trial for a considerable period now, and, it may be hoped, can be trusted to preserve intact the fine fabric of credit which has been erected. But in times of abounding prosperity it is desirable for investors to have in mind the contingencies that may arise, and to require a good percentage on Argentine investments. A portion of the yield should be regarded as an insurance against possible risks.

Lucellum.

The List will close on or before Monday, the 26th October, 1908.

THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY.

(Incorporated by Royal Charter 1839)

Capital issued and fully paid:		Debenture Capital:
Preferred Stock	£600,000	Already Issued	£700,000
Ordinary Stock	900,000	Present Issue	300,000
	£1,500,000		£1,000,000

Issue of £300,000 Four-and-a-half per cent. First Debenture Stock.

This Stock forms the balance of an issue of £1,000,000 like Stock (of which £700,000 has already been issued), which is equal to two-thirds of the present paid-up Capital of the Company. The Company was established by Royal Charter granted in 1839, and the Stock is created under powers conferred on the Company by a subsequent Royal Charter dated 7th March, 1882, and is secured by a Trust Deed in favour of Trustees giving a first charge by way of floating security upon the entire property and assets of the Company. The Trust Deed contains a provision that the Company will not create any general charge upon its property or specifically mortgage any of its ships in priority to this issue. By the Trust Deed the right is reserved to the Company, should it at any time issue any further Capital, of creating and issuing from time to time further Debenture Stock carrying interest at such rate as may be agreed, ranking in all respects pari passu with this stock to an amount equal to two-thirds of the amount of such further Capital for the time being issued and paid up. The Stock is not redeemable for nine years, but after 1st January, 1918, the whole or any part is redeemable at par at the Company's option at any time, on six calendar months' notice to the Stockholders.

ISSUE PRICE £98½ PER CENT. The Instalments are payable as follows:—

£ 5 0s. per cent. on Application,
£20 0s. per cent. on Allotment.
£25 0s. per cent. on 2nd December, 1908.
£25 0s. per cent. on 2nd January, 1909.
£23 10s. per cent. on 2nd February, 1909.

£98 10s.

The Stock will be issued and will be transferable in any amounts not involving fractions of £1.

Interest on the Stock will be payable half-yearly on 1st January and 1st July in each year, the first payment of interest calculated from the dates for payment of the several instalments will be made on the 1st July, 1909.

Payment in full can be made on Allotment, in which case interest on the full amount of Stock allotted will run from the date of payment. Scrip Certificates will be issued as soon as possible after allotment.

Prospectus.

THE COURT OF DIRECTORS OF THE ROYAL STEAM PACKET COMPANY have authorised Messrs. ROBARTS, LUBBOCK & Co. and THE NATIONAL PROVINCIAL BANK OF ENGLAND, Limited, as Bankers of the Company, to receive applications for £300,000 £4½ per cent. First Debenture Stock of the Company.

The Company was established by Royal Charter granted in 1839, and its powers have been extended by subsequent Royal Charters dated 30th August, 1851, 7th March, 1882, and 5th July, 1904. Under the Supplemental Royal Charter of 1904 it is stipulated as a cardinal principle of the Company that it is to be and remain under British control.

During recent years the sphere of the Company's operations has been considerably extended, while great improvements have been introduced into the passenger services with Argentina, Brazil, and the West Indies. The Company is under Contract with His Majesty's Government for the conveyance of Mails to Brazil, Uruguay, Argentina, and the West Indies, Central America, and New York.

The Fleet consists of Forty-eight Steam Vessels, with an approximate aggregate gross registered tonnage of 205,086 tons. There are also Steam Tugs and Launches, and Freehold and Leasehold properties, at home and abroad.

The property of the Company upon which the Debenture Stock constitutes a first floating charge, consisting of the Fleet of Steam Vessels, Premises and Plant at home and abroad, Stocks, Stores, Investments, Book Debts, and cash in hand, stood in the Company's books on 31st December, 1907, at the sum of £3,784,548, inclusive of payments up to that date on account of new Steamer building.

During the present year, the new Twin-Screw Mail Steamer, "ASTURIAS," of 12,002 tons, has been delivered by the builders, Messrs. HARLAND & WOLFF, and placed in the Service, and the two Passenger Steamers "AGADIR" (built 1907) and "ARZILA" (built 1907) have been purchased for the Morocco Trade. The security for the Debenture Stock has therefore been considerably increased, and will be still further enhanced as more new Steamers are constructed.

The amount required to pay the annual interest on the whole £1,000,000 Debenture Stock is £45,000, and the surplus last year, after allowing for this amount, but, before providing for Depreciation, was considerably more than £200,000.

An Official Quotation on the London Stock Exchange will be applied for in due course.

A Brokerage of 5s. per cent. will be paid by the Company in respect of all allotments made to the Public, provided the Application Forms bear a Broker's stamp.

Applications for the Debenture Stock should be made on the Form of Application issued with the Prospectus, and should be forwarded to the Company's Bankers, accompanied by a deposit of 5 per cent. on the amount applied for.

If no allotment is made the deposit will be returned without deduction, and if a partial allotment only is made the surplus deposit will be applied towards the amount payable on allotment.

In case of default in payment of any instalment at its due date, all amounts previously paid and any interest payable thereon will be liable to forfeiture.

Transfers of Stock will be accepted on the ordinary Form, and will be registered at the head office of the Company.

The proceeds of the present issue of Debenture Stock are required for the general purposes of the Company.

A copy of the Royal Charter granted 26th September, 1839, and of the further Royal Charters granted in 1851, 1882 and 1904, and of the Trust Deed for securing the Debenture Stock, and of a letter to the Company from Messrs. Snell & Swaffield, dated 19th October, 1908, agreeing to guarantee the subscription of the present issue, may be seen at the offices of the Company's Solicitors, Messrs. Bristows, Cooke and Carpmael, 1, Copthall Buildings, E.C., on any day while the subscription list remains open, between the hours of 11 a.m. and 4 p.m.

Prospectuses and Forms of Application may be obtained at the offices of the Company, 18 and 57, Moorgate Street, E.C., 32, Cockspur Street, S.W., and at Southampton, Liverpool, Manchester, Birmingham, and Glasgow, or from the Bankers, or from Messrs. Snell & Swaffield, 5, Copthall Buildings, E.C.

Trustees for the Debenture Stock Holders.

THE MARQUESS OF HAMILTON, M.P. — LORD ST. DAVIDS.

Directors.

OWEN PHILIPPS, ESQ., M.P. (Chairman). — CAPTAIN JOHN HENRY JELLICOE.
ALFRED S. WILLIAMS, ESQ. (Deputy Chairman). — WILLIAM C. KENNY, ESQ.
SPENCER HENRY CURTIS, ESQ. — ARTHUR NEVILE LUBBOCK, ESQ.
JAMES HEAD, ESQ. — EDWARD NORTON, ESQ.
SIR JOSEPH SAVORY, BART.

Bankers.

ROBARTS, LUBBOCK & CO., 15, Lombard Street, E.C., and THE NATIONAL PROVINCIAL BANK OF ENGLAND, LTD., 112, Bishopsgate Street, Within, E.C., and Southampton.

Brokers.

SNELL & SWAFFIELD, 5, Copthall Buildings, E.C.

Solicitors.

BRISTOWS, COOKE & CARPMAEL, 1, Copthall Buildings, E.C.

Secretary.

R. L. FORBES, ESQ.

22nd October, 1908.

THIS FORM OF APPLICATION MAY BE USED.

THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY

(INCORPORATED BY ROYAL CHARTER 1839).

Issue of £300,000 4½ per cent. First Debenture Stock.

To THE DIRECTORS OF THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY.

GENTLEMEN,—Having paid your Bankers the sum of £_____ being Five per cent. deposit, I beg to apply for £_____ of the above First Debenture Stock, in accordance with the terms of the Prospectus, dated 22nd October, 1908, and I hereby agree to accept the same, or any less amount that may be allotted to me, and I undertake to pay the balance as specified, and I request that such Debenture Stock may be registered in the Company's books in my name as follows:—

Name in full _____

Address _____

Occupation _____

Usual Signature _____ Date _____ 1908.

This form to be presented to Messrs. ROBARTS, LUBBOCK & CO., OR THE NATIONAL PROVINCIAL BANK OF ENGLAND, Limited.

EDUCATIONAL.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

BOOTHAM SCHOOL, YORK

HEAD MASTER:—ARTHUR ROWNTREE, B.A. (Certificate of Distinction in the Theory, History and Practice of Education, Cantab.)

Preparation for Universities.
Citizenship Course. Leisure Hour Work.

For copies of prospectus, with illustrations of the School Exhibit in the Franco-British Exhibition, apply to the Head Master.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE, TAMWORTH.

YOUTHS TRAINED FOR HOME OR COLONIES.

Farm, 1,000 acres. Carpentry, Smith's work. Riding and Shooting taught. Prospectus.

CHANTRY MOUNT SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
BISHOP'S STORTFORD.

Head Mistress Miss ESTHER CASE, M.A., Dublin (Class. Tripos, Camb. Second Mistress: Miss ESTERBROOK HICKS, B.Sc., London.
A limited number of boarders received.

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.

BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING

Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.

Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.

Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

SCHOLARSHIP EXAMINATION IN DECEMBER.
Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors.
Enquiries should be addressed to the BURSAR.

CO-EDUCATION BY THE SOCIETY OF FRIENDS.

Friends' School, Great Ayton in Cleveland, Yorkshire.

A Boarding School for Boys and Girls (9-16). Modern Education. Preparation for Exams. Unique health record. Ten acres Recreation Grounds, Gymnasium, Swimming Bath, Laboratories, Domestic Science School. 30 Guineas per annum. Apply to the Headmaster for Prospectus, etc.

SOUTHPORT MODERN SCHOOL.

A First-Class School for Boys. Staff includes B.A., M.Sc., F.C.V., Mus. Bac., etc. Languages, Science, Commercial Subjects, Gymnastics, Swimming, Cadet Company. Prospectus from Secretary.

TANGLEWOOD, BARNT GREEN, THE LICKEY HILLS, Near Birmingham.

BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

On approved Modern Lines. Thorough Education with individual care and character training. Games, gardening, and open air life in lovely country, with bracing air. Good train service on main line. Escorts provided.

Principal - - MISS EBBUTT, M.A.

(Newnham College, Cambridge—Trinity College, Dublin.)

LINCOLNSHIRE COAST.

ESSENDON GIRLS' SCHOOL, SKEGNESS.

Headmistress, MISS PAGAN, M.A. Full Staff. L.R.A.M. Swedish Gymnastics. Higher Examinations. Tennis, Hockey, Swimming. Dry sunny climate. Bracing sea air. Exhibitions offered.

EDUCATIONAL.

CRAIGMOUNT, EDINBURGH.

Private Boarding and Day School for Girls.

THE Principals, the Misses Gossip, are assisted by highly-qualified residents, English and Foreign Mistresses and visiting Professors. The aim of the school is a sound education, special attention being given to the study of English Literature, Modern Languages, and Music. The Gymnasium is fitted with Swedish apparatus and the school has its own Swimming Bath. The situation of the school is bracing and very healthy, and the grounds give abundant scope for games. Prospectus on application to the Principals.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager,

R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C. Telegrams: "TRIFORM, LONDON." Telephone No. GERRARD 1854.

SCHOOLS IN ENGLAND OR ABROAD
FOR BOYS AND GIRLS.

Messrs. J. and J. PATON, having an intimate knowledge of the BEST SCHOOLS and TUTORS in this country and on the Continent, will be pleased to aid parents in their selection by sending (free of charge) prospectuses and full particulars of reliable and highly-recommended establishments. When writing please state the age of pupil, the district preferred, and give some idea of the fees to be paid.—J. and J. PATON, Educational Agents, 143, Cannon-st., London. E.C. Telephone 5,053, Central.

STAMMERING.

The severest cases cured, but only by personal tuition, by one who has cured himself after stammering for 10 years. Adults and boys received in residence or as daily pupils. Particulars on application to

Mr. A. C. SCHNELLE, 119, Bedford Court Mansions, W.C.

SECOND IMPRESSION.

Towards a Social Policy

SUGGESTIONS FOR

CONSTRUCTIVE DOMESTIC REFORM.

By Various Writers.

Representing the conclusions of a Committee consisting of Messrs. C. R. BUXTON, H. C. FAIRFAX-CHOLMELEY, J. L. HAMMOND, F. W. HIRST, L. T. HOBHOUSE, J. A. HOBSON, C. F. G. MASTERMAN, M.P., J. H. MORGAN, and VAUGHAN NASH.

"We must all welcome, therefore, such a volume as the Speaker Office has produced under the title of 'Towards a Social Policy.' It is full of hard thinking and solid information, and should be a mine for platform speakers."—DAILY CHRONICLE.

"The book should be in the hand of everyone who loves his country. It is a lucid and comprehensive statement of the causes of the blight that is falling upon the race, and the remedies to be applied."—DAILY NEWS.

"'Towards a Social Policy' decidedly 'gives us to think.' Its authors are doing the Liberal Party a notable service."—WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

"They (the readers) will find within its hundred and twenty odd pages much keen diagnosis of existing evils, much outspoken criticism of the slipshod palliatives with which we have hitherto been content to attempt to meet them, and many bold suggestions—some very bold indeed—as to the direction in which the real remedies are to be found. They may not agree. They cannot fail to be interested."—MORNING LEADER.

Crown 8vo, 1s. net; post free, 1s. 2d.

LONDON: THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY, LIMITED
14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C.

THE INDEX TO VOLUMES I. & II. OF THE NATION

can be had free on application to the Manager. The Index to Volume III. will be ready in a few days.

TOURS.

£6 6s. LUCERNE TOUR.

Nine days. Short Sea Route. No extras for Conductor or Gratuities.

HENRY S. LUNN, M.D.

5, Endsleigh Gardens, N.W. 25, Cannon Street, E.C.
4, Charing Cross, S.W. 84, Piccadilly, W.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout, Bathrooms on every Floor, Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard and Smoking Rooms. Heated throughout.

Fireproof Floors. Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 6/0.

Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hote, Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London." Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.

HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplace. "The English Home."

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.

THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and Subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER THE NATION, and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following book sellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—W. H. Smith & Son, Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—Gordon and Gotch.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions are received.

Scale of Charges for Advertisements.

	FULL PAGE.	½ PAGE.	¼ PAGE.
Back Page, or Page facing matter ...	£10 0 0	£5 0 0	£2 10 0
Other Pages ...	8 0 0	4 0 0	2 0 0

Hotels, Hydros, and Educational

13 Insertions ... ... 8d. per line.
52 „ ... ... 6d. „

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LONDON.

WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. Wild, C.C., Man. Direc. 30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

BLACKPOOL.

67, ALEXANDRA ROAD. Board and Residence. 5s. per day

PROSPECT HOUSE BOARDING ESTAB., 33, Central Par., facing Sea, Central for Amusements. South Aspect. Tel. 575 Manageress.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.

IDEAL RESIDENCE.

Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.

THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL, Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate

SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30s. week

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.

BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport

BRIGHTON.

THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston

BUXTON.

ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.

THE TORS PRIVATE HOTEL (en pension). Tel. 199. Mrs. F. Sara

DARTMOOR DOUSLAND, Nr. YELVERTON.

BARONS' PRIVATE HOTEL. Close to Moors. J. Wonnacott. Prop.

DEAL.

BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson

EASTBOURNE.

CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Grdns. 5/- day

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day

EDINBURGH.

ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading Hotel

FARNWORTH (Station) Nr. BOLTON.

RAWSON ARMS HOTEL. Theatrical Accommodation

GREAT YARMOUTH.

HILLS MARINE VIEW BOARDING HOUSE.

MELTON LODGE RESIDENTIAL MANSION. Facing sea. 10/- per day

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.

THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.

RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta course

ILFRACOMBE.

COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea

LANCASTER.

BOAR'S HEAD HOTEL. Wm. McIntosh

STONEWELL RESTAURANT. T. M. Hay, Proprietor

MARKET HALL RESTAURANT. Prop. J. E. Dowthwaite

LEEDS.

HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station

LIVERPOOL.

COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone: 3032 Royal, 3 wires

LLANELLY.

CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver

MALVERN.

HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & M'g'r.—J. Wilson

MATLOCK.

SMEDLEY'S Hydropathic Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Mnger

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links. (18 holes)

OXFORD (near).

SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny Golf, etc. Lecture

PENTRE.

PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles

PORTSMOUTH.

SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director

SOUTHPORT.

KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St., Band and Illuminations. Turkish, Electric, Hydropathic, &c., Baths and Treatment

ROWNTREE'S CAFE, Lord St., Hot Luncheons, Afternoon Teas, Tel. 647

HOTEL CAFE CONTINENTAL, 207, Lord St., French and English Confectioners, Dinners, Teas and Suppers. Parties Catered for

SOUTHSEA.

STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress

SWANAGE.

"CRAIGSIDE," Board Residence. Tel.: 6. Misses Fell

TEIGNMOUTH.

REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner

WHITBY.

WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt

Messrs. BELL'S ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Ready To-Day. THE SENSATION OF THE YEAR. Cloth, 6s.

THE WAR IN THE AIR.

By H. G. WELLS. With 16 Illustrations by A. C. MICHAEL.

In this striking story Mr. Wells has set himself to show, in the most vivid way, how far the warfare of the future is likely to be revolutionised by the new discoveries in aeronautics. His hero, an everyday suburban Londoner, who is accidentally carried away in a balloon, is plunged by a whimsical fate into a war which involves Great Britain, Germany, America, and Japan, and uses up all the new inventions of flight and battle; and his experiences make up a story of the most absorbing interest.

NEW NOVEL BY MR. W. H. MALLOCK.

Ready November 4th. Cloth, 6s.

AN IMMORTAL SOUL

BY W. H. MALLOCK.

Author of "A Human Document," "The Individualist," &c.

In his new novel Mr. Mallock gives a psychological study of absorbing interest. It deals with the special mental problems arising out of the social conditions of to-day, and shows all those gifts of clear insight and sure characterisation which have won so distinguished a place for its author among the novelists of to-day.

Now Ready. Cloth 6s.

THE TRAMPING METHODIST

By SHEILA KAYE-SMITH.

"It is an uncommon pleasure to meet so promising a first novel as this of Miss Sheila Kaye-Smith. She has contrived to give a wonderfully life-like picture of rural life in Kent and Sussex at the close of the eighteenth century."—Athenæum.

"The title of 'The Tramping Methodist' tells its own tale, but it hardly conveys its charm. The story is told by the Methodist himself, and the narrative is simple, sincere, and at times beautiful. . . . We welcome a new writer of real merit."—Morning Post.

Just Published. THE "PINAFORE" PICTURE BOOK. Crown 4to, 5s. net.

The Story of "H.M.S. Pinafore" told by W. S. GILBERT. With 16 Illustrations in Colour, numerous Black-and-White Drawings, and special Cover and End-papers by ALICE B. WOODWARD.

Also an EDITION DE LUXE, limited to 250 copies, printed on Hand-made Paper, with the plates mounted, 10s. 6d. net.

Imperial 8vo. Richly illustrated. (Uniform with "Pewter Plate.") 25s. net. Ready November 4th.

SHEFFIELD PLATE

In History, Manufacture, and Art.

By HENRY NEWTON VEITCH.

The author of this volume is not only a collector of Sheffield Plate, but has also a thorough practical knowledge of the technical details of its manufacture. He has thus been able to write a full history of the material both from an artistic and a technical point of view.

Just Published. Post 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

ARTS AND CRAFTS OF THE MIDDLE AGES

By JULIA DE WOLF ADDISON.

With 4 Coloured Plates and 70 other Illustrations.

Vol. IV., containing Parts VII. and VIII. Small 4to. Ready Shortly.

THE ITINERARY OF JOHN LELAND

Newly edited from the MSS.

By LUCY TOULMIN SMITH.

This edition will be completed in five volumes, of which Vol. I. (containing Parts I.-III.), price 18s. net, Vol. II. (Parts IV. and V.), price 12s. net, and Vol. III. (the "Itinerary in Wales"), price 10s. 6d. net, are already published.

Now Ready. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

TURKEY AND THE TURKS

An Account of the Lands, the Peoples, and the Institutions of the Ottoman Empire. By W. S. MONROE. With 48 Illustrations.

Ready November. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d.

IN VIKING LAND

An Account of the Lands, the Peoples, and the Institutions of Norway. By W. S. MONROE. Illustrated.

A New Book on Skating.

Ready Shortly. Small 8vo. With many Illustrations. 7s. 6d.

SKATING

By E. F. BENSON.

A book on English combined figure skating, with instantaneous photographs of well-known skaters to illustrate difficult figures taken by MRS. AUBREY LE BLOND.

Demy 8vo. With 123 Illustrations, 10s. 6d. net.

BIOLOGY AND ITS MAKERS

By WILLIAM A. LOCY, Ph.D., Sc.D.

The aim of this volume is to provide an untechnical account of the rise and progress of biology, with especial reference to the Evolution Theory. It brings under one view the broad features of biological progress, and the human interest of the book has been enhanced by the writing of the story around the lives of the men whose work has created the epochs of the history of the science. It contains 123 illustrations, including many portraits of great interest.

BOHN'S LIBRARIES

"The new series of Bohn's Libraries, on which judicious bookbuyers have long learned to keep a careful eye."—Athenæum.

WRITE FOR DETAILED CATALOGUE. NEARLY 800 VOLUMES NOW READY.

Completion of Mr. Templeton Scott's Edition of Swift.

THE PROSE WORKS OF JONATHAN SWIFT

Edited by TEMPLE SCOTT.

With an Introduction by the Right Hon. W. E. H. LECKY, M.P. In 12 Vols. With numerous Portraits and Facsimiles. 5s. each. Vols. I.-XI. ready.

Vol. XII. completing the edition. Bibliography and Full Index, with Essays on the Portraits of Swift and Stella by the Right Hon. Sir FREDERICK FALKINER, K.C., and on the relations between Swift and Stella by the Very Rev. J. H. BERNARD, D.D., Dean of St. Patrick's. With 2 Portraits and a View of Woodpark. [Ready October 29th.

"An adequate edition of Swift—the whole of Swift, and nothing but Swift—has long been one of the pressing needs of students of English Literature. Mr. Temple Scott may well be congratulated on his skill and judgment as a commentator. He has undoubtedly earned the gratitude of all admirers of our greatest satirist, and all students of vigorous, masculine, and exact English."—Athenæum.

2 Vols. 3s. 6d. each.

GOETHE'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY

("Poetry and Truth from my own Life.")

A Revised Translation by M. STEELE-SMITH, Head Lecturer in Modern Languages at Newnham College, Cambridge. With an Introduction and Bibliography by KARL BREUL, Litt.D., Ph.D.

[Now Ready.

In the Press. Ready Shortly.

MORE'S UTOPIA

Robinson's Translation of the "Utopia"; together with Roper's Life of Sir Thomas More and More's Letters to Margaret Roper and others.

Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by GEORGE SAMPSON.

 The Latin Text of the "Utopia" is given in the Appendix.

[In the Press.

London: GEORGE BELL & SONS, York House, Portugal Street, W.C.

"THE NATION," with which is incorporated "The Speaker," printed for the Proprietors by the NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY LIMITED, Whitefriars House, London, E.C., and Published by THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY LIMITED, at the Offices, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C. Registered at the General Post Office as a Newspaper.—SATURDAY, OCTOBER 24, 1908.

The Nation

Vol. IV., No. 5.] SATURDAY, OCTOBER 31, 1908. [Price 6d.
Postage: U.K., ½d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS

	PAGE
DIARY OF THE WEEK ...	169
POLITICS AND AFFAIRS:—
The Kaiser's Appeal ...	172
The Right to Work ...	173
A Victory and a Defeat ...	174
The Extension of the Time Limit	175
The Hope of an Educational Concordat	177
LIFE AND LETTERS:—
The Instability of the World	178
The Character of the Russian People	179
The Religion of the Spirit ...	180
Salmon in the Thames ...	181
ART:—
The Secret of Whistler. By Sidney Low	182
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:—
Remedies for Unemployment. By Sir George McCrae, M.P., and the Rev. J. Frome Wilkinson	184
Bad Harvests and Unemployment. By F. U. Laycock	185
Mrs. Fawcett and Women's Suffrage. By Mrs. Fawcett	185
The Turkish View of Women. By G. F. Abbott	185
Small Holdings. By Montague Fordham	186
Grammatical. By the Writer of the Article and D. N. Samson	186
"The Gospel of Agriculture." By John Higgins	187
Punishment and Mr. Gladstone's Bill. By M. A. ...	187
POETRY:—
Rencontre. By H. H. Bashford	187
THE WORLD OF BOOKS ...	188
Books to be Read	188
REVIEWS:—
The Mistress of Holland House	189
A French Gulliver	190
Home Life in Italy	190
The Historian of the United States	191
Popular Fiction	192
A Manual of Free Trade ...	194
BOOKS IN BRIEF:—
Evolution in Italian Art ...	196
Illustrated Bible Dictionary	196
Marie Madeleine, Countess de La Fayette	197
Cults, Customs and Superstitions of India	198
Napoleon and the Archduke Charles	198
At Large	198
Bishop Percy's Reliques ...	198
Peter Paul Rubens	198
F. C. G.'s Froissart, 1903-1906	198
A Novel Reader's Guide ...	200
THE WEEK IN THE CITY ...	200

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

The Kaiser has made a characteristic and, we believe, thoroughly sincere statement to the "Daily Telegraph" through the mouth of an unnamed diplomatist, wrongly said to be Sir Frank Lascelles. The pith of the statement lies in the Emperor's words that "it is one of my dearest wishes to live on the best of terms with England. Have I," he asks, "ever been false to my word? Falsehood and prevarication are alien to my nature." In spite of these feelings and his continual expression of them, the Kaiser complains, we confess with some truth, that England insists on regarding him as its "arch enemy." He admitted the hostility of a portion of the German press and people. Of his own friendship he volunteered two substantial proofs. The first was that he refused to receive the Boer delegates, and thus brought their tour to an end, the second that he declined the invitation of the Governments of France and Russia to join with them in calling on us to put an end to the Boer war. Evidence of this, said the Kaiser, existed in the Windsor archives. His final act of goodwill was when, in concert with his Generals, he drew up a plan of campaign for the British Army and sent it to England, the plan being almost identical with that adopted by Lord Roberts.

* * *

The specific statements in this characteristic "document" have been hotly repudiated in Paris, at the instance, no doubt, of M. Delcassé, the Minister who was approached in the matter of the anti-English "combine" by M. Muravieff. The Delcassé rejoinder specifically admits three attempts at intervention in South African affairs. The first was made, he maintains, by Baron Marschall von Bieberstein, now German Ambassador at Constantinople, in 1896, after the Jameson Raid, and was an invitation to France to join in guaranteeing the independence and integrity of the South African Republic. This proffer France refused. In 1899 M. Muravieff asked France whether she would join in a specific intervention with a view to ending the war. M. Delcassé declined, but in the following year agreed, stipulating, however, only for friendly interference. The Kaiser was next approached, and he, after wisely suggesting that such policy involved grave consequences, asked for a guarantee of the status quo in Europe. This France declined, and the negotiations came to an end. The German Press is bitterly censorious of the Kaiser's communiqué, especially of the statement that he devised an anti-Boer campaign while all Germany was passionately pro-Boer.

* * *

A somewhat serious turn has been given to the suffragist agitation. Mrs. Pankhurst, Miss Christabel Pankhurst, and Mrs. Drummond, who were charged at Bow Street with inciting the public by means of a handbill, to "rush" the House of Commons, have been bound over in various sums to keep the peace, with alternatives of three months' and ten weeks' imprisonment. The defendants, in pursuit of their policy, have gone to prison, and we are sorry to see that they are treated as second-class misdemeanants. Their brilliant defence aimed at proving that their action was political, and in this, we think, it completely succeeded. Unfortunately, under the Prison Act of 1898, the magistrate appears to have freedom to treat prisoners as first or second-class misdemeanants. In any case, it is doubtful whether the Government were wise in instituting such a prosecution, or the Home Secretary in declining to counsel the magistrates, as he certainly could counsel them, to imprison these ladies without degrading them. It is tactlessness such as this which gives bitterness to agitations. The charge of inciting to violence is a wide one, and, with a hard winter and two turbulent agitations in full swing, a Liberal Ministry may be presented with the odious task of sending to prison some of the chief figures amongst the Suffragists and the extreme Labor men. Some discretion is, we think, necessary if such a contingency is to be avoided.

* * *

Meanwhile, the violent suffragist tactics have had what we suppose their leaders regard as a success. On Wednesday, two young women, one an Australian, having gained admittance to the Ladies' Gallery by misleading statements, began to address the House in the midst of the debate on the Licensing Bill, and, when the attendants tried to remove them, chained themselves to the grille. A sympathetic man also made a demonstration in the Strangers' Gallery, while a second batch of women made a disturbance in St. Stephen's Hall. The result has been a temporary closing both of the Ladies' and of the Strangers' Galleries. The Prime Minister was also rudely interrupted while opening a bazaar at the Union Chapel, Highbury. The fact that these breaches of order are committed by agitators who only propose to enfranchise a very small section of propertied persons, and that these ladies have expressed complete contempt for measures like the Licensing Bill, is obviously estranging the Liberal Party from Women's Suffrage, while it attracts Conservative support. The "Times" maintains its opposition to Women's Suffrage, but the "Daily Telegraph" has pronounced, with some emphasis, in favor of the limited Bill which Mrs. Fawcett and Mrs. Pankhurst unite in proposing.

* * *

THE debate on the Government's policy over the relief of the unemployed was not satisfactory from any point of view. Many supporters of the Government justified their action not so much by what has actually been done as by the hope that something very different will be done next year. On the other hand, the Labor Party, in opposing the Government, had no clear policy to suggest, and were not united among themselves. The proposal of a local rate was the only measure that could for the time being emancipate municipalities from the control of the Local Government Board, and the necessity of this emancipation was shown by Mr. Henderson's uncontradicted statement that out of fifty-eight applications of the smaller localities for the formation of Distress Committees, the Local Government Board had given permission in fourteen cases only. The kind of difficulty that results is illustrated by a resolution passed by the Bournemouth Town Council, declaring that the action of the Local Government Board makes an amendment of the Unemployed Workmen's Act imperative. On the other hand, Mr. Burns held the trump card of the economist's objection to the increase of the rates.

* * *

BUT the discussion on the subject has brought out clearly that the saving on the rates is largely illusory. Instead of a simple rate for relief works as such, there is to be much more extensive borrowing from the mixed motive of the relief of the unemployed and the carrying out of useful works. In the end, as was brought out very forcibly at the Manchester Distress Committee on Tuesday, the burden must fall on the ratepayer. Mr. Burns, in his speech of last Saturday, made his position quite clear by formally repudiating relief works, while he also committed himself to the position that by adjusting the times and seasons of municipal and Imperial expenditure—the joint total of which he fixed at £300,000,000 in a year—the number of unemployed could be reduced to two or three per cent. This position is hardly less extravagant on the one side than Mr. Keir Hardie's estimate of the number of the unemployed as over two millions on the other. The most hotly challenged passage in Mr. Burns's speech was that in which he said that the average workman spent about five shillings a week in alcohol. This is a higher figure than Mr. Seebohm Rowntree's researches into working-class expenditure warrant us in accepting. On the whole, Mr. Burns's tone, though combative, was not unsympathetic. His personal position is strong, but we hope he will recognise that the party is not prepared to give him the blank cheque in dealing with unemployment for which he has asked.

* * *

THE entente of France, Russia, and Great Britain in Near Eastern affairs has already had some effect. The representatives of the three Powers have presented a Note to Bulgaria, backed by Germany and Italy, asking her to disband the 75,000 reservists she has called out, and suggesting to her a negotiation with Turkey on the question of compensation for the loss of Eastern Roumelia. If she comes to an arrangement with Turkey the Powers will acknowledge her independence, but not otherwise. This probably supplies the outside pressure for which Bulgaria has almost asked. Her reply has been favorable. She promises to dismiss her reservists and to negotiate with Turkey. On this side peace is almost assured. But the Austro-Servian situation is not improved. Austria still virtually declines a Conference, unless her annexation of Bosnia-Herzegovina is ratified, so that her negotiations with Turkey, which her Press falsely accuse England of discouraging, are at a deadlock. On the other hand, the Slav propaganda in Russia rises rapidly, the Tsar is receiving the Servian envoys, who are presenting a prayer that Russia will veto the annexation, and the fiery Servian princelet, George, is the hero of the hour in St. Petersburg. The dubious Russian attitude naturally keeps Servia and Montenegro restive and defiant.

* * *

THE Canadian elections took place on Monday, and Sir Wilfrid Laurier won a victory of unexpected magnitude. His majority, in a House of 221, stands at about fifty, or only some sixteen less than in the last Parliament. Quebec remained loyal to her chief, and in Ontario, where the Conservatives looked for a clean sweep, they made practically no progress. The new provinces naturally supported the Government, which has done so much for the settlement of the North-West, and Conservative gains in Nova Scotia were offset by losses in New Brunswick. Only in British Columbia did the Opposition make much advance, and there the Asiatic labor question was the dominant issue. The charges of "graft," true though many of them were, did the Liberals little damage, partly because the electorate thought the Conservatives as bad, partly because in a new country corruption is not counted an intolerable blot on an efficient Government. The main pillars of the Liberal Party's strength, apart from its record of development, were the Premier's personal hold on Quebec, and the party's long tenure of office, with control of patronage and concessions. Sir Wilfrid Laurier is now Premier for the fourth time, and he will push on the completion of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway and the construction of the Georgian Bay Canal.

* * *

THE Presidential election takes place on Tuesday, and the last week of the campaign has been trying to look like a "whirlwind finish." Mr. Roosevelt has sent all the Cabinet on the stump, and himself issued a couple of encyclicals, in which he declares, for the thousandth unconvincing time, that the election of Mr. Bryan spells industrial chaos. Meanwhile, Mr. Hearst has published more letters, in which the Attorney-General of Republican Pennsylvania is revealed accepting money from the Standard Oil Trust and killing legislation for it, and the Governor is revealed appointing judges recommended by the Standard Oil for their "familiarity with the great industries of oil and gas"; while the "World" charges the Republican candidate for the Vice-Presidency with trying to get Government timber lands very cheap. Mr. Taft and Mr. Bryan are both doing miracles of campaigning in

New York, but Mr. Bryan's voice and physique are wearing the better. Republican predictions give their man a comfortable majority of 100 electoral votes, but the "Evening Post" says prediction is more than usually futile owing to the fact that great sections of the population have given no clear sign how they intend to vote.

* * *

Since we went to the press last week the House of Commons has spent two days on the clause of the Licensing Bill which fixes the basis of the compensation to be given for licences extinguished during the reduction period. The corresponding clause in the Act of 1904 was, as the Prime Minister pointed out, neither discussed in committee nor on report. The debate has been, on the whole, businesslike and free from heat. The Government's position that the bases of taxation and compensation should be identical has been sustained by substantial majorities, and has not been shaken in argument. The Prime Minister has, however, wisely promised some alteration in the machinery of income-tax assessment in order to accelerate the bringing up of the admittedly inadequate Schedule A valuations to a level which will do justice both to the dispossessed licence holder and to other taxpayers. We doubt whether this result can be satisfactorily attained except by an entirely fresh assessment of the annual value of licences, including those which are not likely to be extinguished, and whose owners therefore have no motive given them by the Bill for bringing up their assessments to a proper level. A promise has been made that, on the report stage, some allowance will be given to extinguished licences for loss of the chance of a further seven years' life at the end of the time limit. By an amendment introduced by the Solicitor-General, the right of a manager who is a licence holder to compensation for loss of employment when the licence goes, has been recognised for the first time in the history of licensing legislation. Another of the Solicitor-General's amendments, slightly extending one standing in the name of Mr. Sherwell, has secured to the licence-holder a minimum of one year's profits as compensation for loss of business or employment.

* * *

In the Lobby, interest has mainly centred on the amendments to be made in the report stage, and on the chances of the measure when it goes to the other Chamber. The view we expressed last week in favor of the dropping of the clause which deals with local option after the end of the time limit, is widely endorsed among the supporters of the Bill, both in Parliament and in the Press. The prohibitionist section of the temperance party are, however, putting considerable pressure on the Government to prevent such a result. We are surprised that they do not see how little chance Local Veto will have of adoption at the polls if it starts its career weighted with the difficulty created by the seven years' optional extension of the time limit, which the Government have expressed their willingness to grant. In another column, we give reasons for the objection we made last week to this proposal, and for preferring a simple extension of the term from fourteen to twenty-one years. The chances of the Bill receiving a second reading in the Lords appear to be better than when Parliament re-assembled. Two or three Unionist peers of character and standing are supporting the Bishops in their efforts to secure this result. But it is as yet too early to say whether they will succeed in shaking the fixed hostility of the great majority of their party.

* * *

The situation in Persia has become very gloomy, and the Russian occupation of Azerbaijan shadowed forth by the Russian Press is imminent. Russian troops are massed on the frontier, but Sir Edward Grey says they have not yet crossed it, and will not unless Russian lives are in danger. The Russian excuse will convince nobody, because so long as there was civil war in Tabriz Russia remained inactive, prepared to intervene with military force only when the Shah was beaten. The people of Tabriz draw the natural conclusion that Russia is fighting the battle of the Shah's despotism, and they have issued an appeal to Europe. The Shah, meanwhile, has let the day fixed for the promulgation of the new electoral law pass with the statement that he is personally drafting one "to suit the needs of the country." The Persians fear the worst as to the meaning of the Anglo-Russian agreement, but Sir Edward Grey will, we hope, recognise the strong ties of sympathy between the Young Persians, whom Russia would destroy, and the Young Turks, whom he supports.

* * *

Sir Eldon Gorst has let himself be interviewed by the Mokattam on the question of constitutional government in Egypt. He declares that the Government had no intention of introducing them and that events in Turkey did not affect the problem of self-government in Egypt. Full Parliamentary government in Egypt was impossible, and the proper course was to develop the existing Organic Law as the people became ripe for wider responsibility. A scheme of extended local government would soon be introduced, and Egyptians would find the best way to secure more power would be to demonstrate their capacity to use these institutions. If this record of Sir Eldon Gorst's remarks be correct, they do not appear to have been very prudent. It is futile to say that the revolution in Turkey has not affected the situation in Egypt, and, if it has not affected the Government's point of view, it would have been better to say nothing.

* * *

The Prussian budget, published last week, is an unpleasant surprise for the taxpayer. Some £10,000,000 more revenue are required, most of this for the increase in the salaries of officials, teachers, and parsons, their long overdue compensation for the high prices caused by Protection. In the current year only £2½ millions of new taxation are to be imposed, unless, as is very probable, the railways produce a large deficit. The proposed new taxes are a graduated increase of the income-tax on incomes above £350, a higher supplementary tax on large incomes, and a tax on the profits of companies public and private. There is naturally a good deal of objection among commercial men to this last proposal, and the feeling of uneasiness is pretty general at the imposition of new State taxes coinciding with the demand for new Imperial taxes. The "Vorwärts" has published the draft of the projected Imperial tax on gas and electricity, a tax which is condemned by ordinary citizens as reactionary and injurious to industry, while the Bavarian Government contemplates it very unfavorably as an obstacle to the electrification of its railways, to which it is committed.

Politics and Affairs.

THE KAISER'S APPEAL.

It is proper, we think, for the British nation to recognise at once the friendliness and the candor of the Kaiser's communication to the "Daily Telegraph," though we are afraid its material value is discounted by its author's confession that the German people does not think with him, and by the very emphatic German endorsement of that hint. No harm to us, but much good, was meant by this obviously sincere and impulsive pronouncement. The Kaiser still clings to the object which lay behind his letter to Lord Tweedmouth, namely, the closing of the Anglo-German quarrel, and the opening instead of an era of warm understanding with the people of whose history and character he is a close and admiring student. We can understand his chagrin that his passion for the sea, which he learned from his English upbringing, and his delight in his Admiralty of the British fleet, should be twisted to his disadvantage, and his continual profession of friendliness for us treated as part of a Machiavellian scheme for putting England off her guard. No man of his character and habits of speech could at once cherish such plans and use such language. Nor do we in the least degree question the general truth of his assertions about the South African War. We doubt whether he would ever have joined a coalition against this country. We are not sure, indeed, that he did not go somewhat beyond the etiquette of the situation when he informed Queen Victoria that there was a chance of European pressure for the purpose of ending the South African War. There can be no doubt of the attempt to form such a combination. The communiqué which M. Delcassé, we imagine, has made, or caused to be made, to the "Times" and the "Daily Chronicle," does not deny it. According to the Delcassé version, Russia made two approaches to France, in 1899 and 1900, in favor of intervention to stop the war. The first was declined, the second was accepted, coupled with the stipulation that the interference should have a friendly aspect and intention. Germany was then sounded, and the Kaiser's reply was to demand a general adherence of Europe to the Treaty of Frankfort before entering on a course of diplomacy which might well have ended in war. The negotiations closed there, and the Kaiser may well have thought himself at liberty to inform England of a design which he did not originate and did not accept. Even if he had done less—or more—we could hardly have blamed him. No one who has lifted a corner of the diplomatic curtain is unaware of the perils which the African adventure heaped upon our head, and of the long period during which it ensured the enfeeblement, even the effacement, of British power in Europe. But let no Englishman accuse anybody but the domestic statesmen who brought it about. It was foreseen by the opponents of the war, and it was urged by them as a reason for bringing it to a conclusion at the earliest period consistent with the attainment of satisfactory peace. If it be true that our present friends, France and Russia, were foremost in taking advantage of our disabilities, and our present opponent, Germany, intervened to save us from humiliating pressure, that is no reason for a retrospective quarrel with those Powers, though it may be a cause for modifying the senseless view of Germany as an insatiable anti-English power, always "on the pounce" to humble and damage us. The mistaken nation, like the erring individual, made its great miscalculation, moral and material, and had to pay for it.

But though Englishmen may welcome the Kaiser's disclosure that Germany did not, in fact, play an unfriendly part to us during the Boer war, and that he gave proof of his friendliness by refusing to receive the Boer delegates at the time when almost the entire democratic opinion of Europe and of Germany favored their cause, his statement to the "Telegraph" will not, we are afraid, close the anti-German campaign in this country, or entirely remove the causes of difference between England and Germany. Why not? The answer is, we think, two-fold. Setting aside the sheer unreason of the Anglo-German polemic, there remain some substantial causes of disagreement. The first is the differing methods and aims of German and English policy in Europe and the Near East. The second is Germany's apparent claim of equi-pollency between her navy and our own. On the first point, we cannot but hope that the success of the Turkish Liberal revolution will pave the way to a measure of co-operation between the two Powers. Any such co-operation was impossible so long as Germany worked both from headquarters and through the medium of her powerful representative at Constantinople, solely through Abdul Hamid and his creatures, while England's influence with the Turkish Government had disappeared. These conditions are vitally changed. The rule of the Palace is over, and with the advent of honesty and Liberalism to power, England, through no act or conscious movement of her own, has regained her old force in Turkish councils, and will, we believe, use it disinterestedly for the country's good. If Germany will recognise this new situation, we see no reason why she and England should not work together for the regeneration of Turkey, and why such enterprises as the Baghdad Railway should not be undertaken jointly by the two Powers. The second question, that of the German effort towards the construction of a fleet approaching the British Navy in strength, is more difficult. It does not arise in any crucial form for two years to come. But German statesmen cannot fail to remember that while, in fact, the Kaiser speaks of the danger of the Far East, and of the desirability of common action there by the German and British fleets, a yearly addition of three or four "Dreadnoughts" or "Invincibles" to the German Navy produces an enormous pressure on our Admiralty to build every year five or six such units. This is the practical equation of German and British shipbuilding. The Kaiser only follows the accepted thesis of our naval writers when he puts forward the creation of a strong navy as the natural complement and safeguard of an extending sea-commerce and a Colonial Empire. But such a theory of sea-Power must have some reference to the character and extent of the material interests which each country seeks to protect. Germany is not an island, in almost exclusive reliance on naval defence; she has only about one-tenth of our sea-board; her mercantile marine is not comparable to ours; our Colonial Empire completely overshadows hers in size, in importance and wealth, and in its dispersal through all the quarters of the world. Events in the East have not added to the world's sense of security, or its dependence on moral obligations, and the Kaiser, if he desires to understand British opinion and to realise how strongly its best elements desire peace with Germany, must also reflect how much his own naval and foreign policy may strengthen or weaken their hands.

THE RIGHT TO WORK.

THERE will be no real progress in the great national debate on Unemployment so long as politicians of the two great parties in the State continue to boggle at the claim of "the right to work." Let us, therefore, at once examine that claim and decide upon it. The right to subsistence, with or without work, is explicitly asserted in our Poor Law policy. It is admitted as a duty of every civilised State to see that none of its members starve. Since no one denies that the operation of our industrial system is such that men who are both willing and able to work for wages in private employment are unable, from no fault of their own, to get it, it is the evident interest of Society, through its instrument the State, to help them to obtain such work in preference to maintaining them in idleness. This plain public interest constitutes an obligation of the State to find such work, if it can. Corresponding to this obligation, there arises a "right to work."

We can recognise no loophole of escape from the logic and the justice of this argument, save one, viz., the inability of the State to fulfil this obligation. If it can be shown that the State, from financial or other weakness, is inherently incapable of bringing about such increase of employment in bad times as will suffice to meet the case of the genuinely unemployed, the duty and the "right to work" together lapse. Is this the case of those who repudiate "the right to work"? The able speaker who seconded the resolution in the House of Commons this week "could not see how a right could be said to rest in an individual to demand from society the provision of something which society was not organised to provide." And it is undeniable that society is not yet organised adequately for such provision. But if society is able so to organise itself as to make provision, ought it not to do so? This meaning of "the right to work" is not a revolutionary claim. It is simply an intelligent advance upon the ineffectual policy of the Poor Law, a sounder, saner safeguard against the social waste due to the defective working of the industrial system.

The importance of this clear acceptance of a sound "theoretical" position is that when it is once agreed that there is an obligation in the State to find employment for the unemployed, if it can, we are driven to facing the question, "Can it?" To this practical issue the debate in the House of Commons this week furnished no sure or quite intelligible answer. The Prime Minister has clearly intimated that his immediate proposals are merely palliatives. But, at a time when there is reason to suppose that some ten per cent. of the manual workers of the country are unable to get work, it is essential to scrutinise more closely their efficacy. If we found it possible to ascribe to a mere adjustment of State and municipal undertakings anything like the importance which Mr. Burns in his sanguine way assigned, the major part of the problem would be solved. But giving due weight to the magnitude of public expenditure, amounting in all to nearly £300,000,000 per annum, we cannot believe that more than a few millions at the outside can be anticipated or postponed so as to level up employment, without detriment to the public interests. That the 9½ per cent. of skilled unemployment which exists at present could by such means be cut down to the two per cent. which is the normal figure in good times, may at once be rejected. At the same time, a more thoughtful planning of new public works, so as to utilise the best labor available in slack times, is a genuine contribution towards remedial treatment. Still more might be done along these lines, if private employers could be stimulated to co-operation with this public policy.

But it is idle to pretend that the utmost care in adjustments of this sort will meet, in any large degree, the magnitude of unemployment in decaying or changing trades, or in periods of general depression. No one who fairly faces the facts can deny that, at any rate until the deeper and slow-working remedies have matured, public industries and temporary relief works upon a considerable scale must be adopted to meet the emergency. Any refusal or slowness in promoting these schemes will only lead to a demoralising debauch of indiscriminate charity, in which the maximum of harm and the minimum of assistance to the genuinely unemployed will accrue. Bearing this in mind, we are unable to understand the reluctance which Mr. Burns displays to sanction the establishment of Relief Committtees under the 1905 Act. If Mr. Henderson's statement be correct, that recently the application of no fewer than forty-eight municipalities to be permitted to establish such Committees has been refused, it is no wonder that Mr. Burns should seem confident that the £300,000 now available for assisting such Committees in their work will amply suffice, not, indeed, for the relief of the unemployed, but for the demands made on their behalf. No one seriously pretends that relief works are anything else than a disagreeable, a dangerous, and an expensive expedient. But they form a quite evident necessity of the situation, and it is right to think out more clearly than has yet been done the best safeguards against their abuse.

There are, we venture to think, certain sound principles which stand out sharply. When Exchequer loans are given to municipalities or other public bodies to assist them in undertaking works which either would not have been undertaken this winter, or might not have been undertaken at all, there should be no inducement given to prefer unemployed labor to labor obtainable in the ordinary way. It is always desirable that better labor should be preferred to worse, both in the interests of the work and of the workers. If useful public works thus undertaken do not absorb the out-of-works, they will at least prevent some more efficient men from drifting down to unemployment, while ordinary relief works which make no pretence to be works of public utility must be financed in order to supply the need. One other point in the policy of relief works requires attention. If the right to such work is to be accorded, it must be accompanied by conditions of pay and employment which render such relief markedly less desirable than ordinary outside employment. The criticism that to pay standard rates of wages for unemployed relief would be a premium on unemployment, which would create fresh unemployment as fast as it filled it up, is absolutely and obviously valid, and the demoralisation which preceded the present Poor Law is a decisive historical witness to that fact. How to make such relief pay consistent with the other requirement that the efficiency of the worker and his family shall be maintained is perhaps the most difficult crux in the whole policy. In some cases it might be met by maintaining the worker and making payment to his family, in other cases by substituting payments in kind for cash. But by these or other devices the undesirability of employment on relief works must be brought into line with the demands of humanity.

One point in conclusion we would reinforce. The more closely the problem of skilled unemployment, especially in times of depression, is approached, the more evident it becomes that national or local relief works are unsuitable. What is needed here is an extension of the principle of public insurance upon a trade basis with such inducements as can be contrived to stimulate regularity of production and constancy of employment. The new Census of Production ought to assist us in the better demarcation of industries. It ought to be possible to impose upon each of the more organised and settled trades a certain obligation to maintain its labor so as to prevent it from throwing burdens on the public by reckless or exaggerated fluctuations. Elasticity in expansion and contraction within limits is essential to industry. But an insurance policy which threw upon each trade the cost of keeping a waiting margin of workers, instead of throwing this expense upon the public or on other trades, would be a piece of sound social construction. The State might well afford to lend it financial assistance where the burden seemed excessive.

A VICTORY AND A DEFEAT.

The return of Sir Wilfrid Laurier's Government to office after a most strenuous campaign by a slightly diminished majority, is a remarkable testimony to the personal ascendancy of one of the most accomplished politicians of our time. It is a great achievement, after twelve years of continuous power, to be entrusted with a new term of rule by a democratic vote composed of such a variety of changing factors as that presented by new Canada. But it is nothing more. To speak of it as a Liberal victory is to utter an unmeaning—we had almost said a dishonoring—phrase. When in 1896, after twenty years of wandering in the wilderness, a Liberal Free Trade party was placed in control of the government of our most important over-sea dominion, British Liberals felt a glow of pride. No such feeling greets the tidings of this last election, which marks the triumph of no single Liberal principle. During the heated political struggle, which has raged throughout the country from Nova Scotia to Vancouver, no issue of importance affecting the rights or vital interests of the people, political, industrial, religious, or educational, has divided the rival bands of combatants. The main struggle has been of a peculiarly sordid character, in which Sir W. Laurier has appealed to great material enterprise, present or prospective, as an effective answer to the charges of political corruption freely brought against almost every department of his administration. Although these charges, the gravest of which were made against the Interior Department under the Hon. Clifford Sifton, were for the most part not susceptible of exact proof, it is admitted that the arts of "graft" and "boodling," which were once regarded as the peculiar defects of Republican government, have fastened their poisonous fangs into Canadian politics. Enough has been disclosed before committees and even in law courts to show that the most vulgar modes of bribery have been employed to secure timber limits and other valuable governmental properties. Documentary evidence of validity charges prominent Liberal politicians with direct personal participation in these spoils. The most prevalent method of meeting this attack has been to picture the corruption which prevailed under the Tory rule of Sir J. Macdonald in the early days of the national policy and the founding of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Now it is quite indubitable that the tariff system, which was first firmly fastened on the shoulders of the Canadian people in 1878, was directly responsible for the entrance of corrupt business pressure into politics. The famous "Red Parlour" gatherings, in which the business interests bargained with the statesmen, belong to the ordinary history of Protection. But the very notoriety attending these corrupt proceedings and the full denunciation of them by Canadian Liberals, only served to give more shameful emphasis to the dramatic betrayal of Free Trade and political purity which has constituted the career of the "Liberals" during their twelve years of office.

It is the story of a temptation, a fall, and an unretrieved collapse of principle. In 1896 Sir W. Laurier and his comrades were outspoken and complete Free Traders, denouncing in unmeasured terms the iniquities of the Protective system, and pledging themselves in case of victory to its overthrow. Next year, safe in office, they constructed a tariff not appreciably less protective than its predecessor, accompanied by an imperial preference which masqueraded as a step towards Free Trade. The several changes they have since effected in their tariff have strengthened rather than abated the protective character. The slightness of the preference has been attested by the withdrawal of such portions as were alleged to imperil by British competition the interests of Canadian mills, and by the recent introduction of an intermediate tariff and special trade treaties which have cut down to an almost negligible quantity the advantage which Canada pretended to assign to the Mother Country over foreign competitors in her import trade. This protective system, flanked by a set of governmental bounties for the encouragement of the home steel and other industries, has been the only conspicuous political achievement of a "Liberal" Government in Canada!

The fruits of this protection have been manifest and manifold. Their widespread character was revealed by the investigations of the Trade Commission of three years ago, or would have been revealed had the Government dared to publish a full report of its proceedings. Every vicious form of ring, corner, and trust, with monopoly prices, coercion of labor, tax-dodging and corrupt tampering with elected persons and officials, every evil familiar in Chicago and Philadelphia, were visible in rapid fungus-growth throughout the industrial centres of Canada. Most of these evils were directly traceable to the protective system, and to the policy of government by "pulls" which it implies. We do not suggest that this malady is yet so widespread or so systematic as it has become under the more developed machine-politics of the United States. But Canada is moving rapidly along the same road, and the Liberal Party has shown no more real will or capacity to resist temptation than the Democratic Party in the Republic.

How hardly shall they that have riches! For it is the supreme temptation of material prosperity to which the Liberals of Canada have yielded. In a poor struggling agricultural country such as was Canada in 1896, the Nemesis of high protection must have come quickly. The injurious policy of handing over to a few little groups of manufacturers the power so heavily to tax the farmer and the laborer would have been driven home by the pinch of poverty. But the betrayal of Free Trade by Sir W. Laurier happened to coincide with a sudden new discovery and a swift development of the solid rich resources of the great North-West. During the last ten years an unprecedented and almost unchecked growth of trade, population, transport, and attendant manufacturing and commercial activity, has supervened. Even the contagion of the financial and industrial crisis, which has frozen the enterprise of the United States this last twelve months, has hardly abated the enthusiasm of Canada. Her eyes are so firmly set upon the future that she is little disposed to scrutinise the past for lessons or for warnings. The result of the elections makes it manifest that recriminations of party politicians interest her far less than the great new schemes for the further material development of the country, the completion of the Grand Trunk Railway, and the proposed canal connecting Georgian Bay with Montreal. In British Columbia alone are there signs of trouble near ahead. There the shadow of the Asiatic immigration question has darkened the prospects of the Government, and brings to the front of politics one of those "real" issues which neither smooth words nor public subsidies can settle. But for the present Sir Wilfrid Laurier's Government may continue to glide on without formal shipwreck down the perilous stream of public corruption.

THE EXTENSION OF THE TIME LIMIT.

In commenting last week on the concession as to the length of the Time Limit which Mr. Asquith has announced his willingness to make on the Report stage of the Licensing Bill, we expressed our approval of the principle of the proposed change on grounds both of policy and of tactics. We indicated, however, our strong objection to the method which the Prime Minister adumbrated of lightening the financial burden imposed on the Trade by the Bill. We now wish to state more fully the grounds on which our objection is based. The Bill, as it now stands, proposes to effect, during the fourteen years commencing on April 5th next, a reduction, which may be roughly taken at about one-third, in the number of on-licences. During that period the compensation charge imposed by the Balfour Act is to be maintained without substantial alteration. On-licences extinguished are to receive compensation on the basis of their having an expectation of life equal in length to the unexpired term of the Time Limit. At the end of the reduction period all on-licences, and also, by virtue of Mr. Harcourt's amendment, which has already been adopted, all off-licences are to expire. Any licences, whether on or off, granted after that period are to be new licences. Their grant is to be entirely at the discretion of the Licensing Authorities, subject to the power of the parochial electors of the ward or parish to veto absolutely by a two-thirds majority the issue of on-licences, and to limit their numbers by such majority as may be determined by a future Parliament. Under the provisions of the Balfour Act as to new licences, which will then become applicable, the Licensing Authorities are to be at liberty to impose any conditions as to management, and are, in any case, to insist on an annual payment equal to the monopoly value of the licences. Whatever may be thought of the propriety of the term fixed for the period of grace, it will be seen that the enactment of these provisions would afford an opportunity for each locality to remodel its licensing system in 1923 in accordance with local opinion, and to adopt any expedient for regulating the sale of liquor which the experience of this or other countries might suggest, without any regard either to vested interests or equitable expectations.

For this clear-cut Time Limit, Mr. Asquith now proposes to substitute a more complicated provision. The reduction period is to remain at fourteen years; at the end of it, reduction with compensation is to cease; but all ante-1904 on-licences and all ante-1908 off-licences which may be renewed in 1923 are to have a further term of grace for a period of seven years. These licences are to be a class by themselves; they are to pay no compensation levy, and no charges for monopoly value, but they are to be subject every year to extinction without compensation at the discretion of the Licensing Authorities; and they may also be extinguished during the period if a veto resolution is carried by a two-thirds majority in the ward or parish in which they exist. They may also be extinguished as the result of the passing of a reducing resolution by such majority as a future Parliament may determine.

The first objection which suggests itself with regard to this proposal is the absolute uncertainty of its operation. A licence-holder may enjoy the seven years' extra term, or the life of his licence may come to an untimely end at any Brewster Sessions during that period. If his house is on one side of an electoral boundary line it may disappear without compensation, while his neighbor on the other side of the same street, but in a different ward, may keep his licence for the full seven years. It seems to us that the scheme as amended will fail to achieve one of the principal objects of a Time Limit, namely, that of giving those interested in licensed premises the opportunity of making definite provision, by setting aside an ascertained annual sum out of profits, for the ultimate extinction of the monopoly value of the licence. It is of the essence of a sinking fund that the term of years during which it is to be created should be known at the beginning. But if this proposal is enacted, no owner of a licence will know whether his sinking fund will be required in fourteen years or in twenty-one years or at some intermediate time. We can understand the position of those who consider that no extension of the Time Limit is necessary, but we cannot understand the standpoint of those who think it right, or, at any rate, expedient, to give such an extension, but are not prepared to give the trade to which the concession is offered any definite indication of what is to be the length of it. It is indeed a haphazard method of procedure.

Moreover, if the new proposal of the Government is embarrassing to the Trade on account of its uncertainty, it is, we think, equaly embarrassing to the Licensing Authorities for the same and other reasons. It purports to give the Licensing Justices absolute discretion to refuse any licence at the end of fourteen years, but it will be an invidious task for them to select among well-conducted houses certain licences for extinction without compensation, while, at the same time, giving to others, equally well conducted, a seven years' life, free not only from monopoly value payments, but from the compensation levy imposed by the Balfour Act. It was the impossibility, before 1904, of getting the magistrates to undertake to any considerable extent this difficult and unpleasant task that led Lord Peel and his colleagues to propose a Time Limit and compensation for licences extinguished during its currency. We are now to have the Time Limit, but much of the old difficulty is to remain for at any rate seven years after its expiration. If one could be certain that the difficulty would end with the expiration of the further seven years there would not be so much to be alarmed at from the public point of view. But it seems almost inevitable that the singling out of certain houses for exceptional benefits between 1923 and 1930 would, at the end of that period, put them, in practice, in a privileged position. The expectation of renewal for such licences would acquire a money value which would be the subject of bargain and sale. A house which had escaped both the scheme of compulsory reduction up to 1923 and the chances of veto and magisterial execution between that date and 1930, would be looked upon as having survived because it was the fittest. The free hand for the State which it is sought at the later date to obtain would be fettered. There would be no clear break in the tenure of licences, giving an opportunity for a fresh start under new conditions. New on and off-licences would have been granted in considerable numbers and for varying terms of years up to seven. Some of these would extend beyond 1930. The difficulties of a community which wished to carry out local veto or further reduction of licences, or to adopt municipal or disinterested management, or to put an end to the tied-house system within its borders, would be greatly enhanced. The provision in question would stand in the way of the local optionist, for during the seven years the hardship which the carrying of his proposal would inflict on the trade would greatly reduce its chances of adoption at a poll. Those who, like so many members of the Parliamentary Labor Party, are in favor of municipal or disinterested management would be in the same position, for it will be readily admitted alike by the supporters and by the opponents of these systems that they only offer any substantial hope of success if applied to the whole of the licences in a town or village. The existence of competing houses managed by private traders would be fatal to their prospects from a temperance reformer's point of view.

Another objection to Mr. Asquith's proposal is that it unfairly discriminates financially between licences extinguished during the reduction period and those which survive it. The former are, under the Bill, to be compensated for on the basis of their having a fourteen years' life; those which survive may have a twenty-one years' life, during seven of which they will be free from the compensation charge. Mr. Herbert Samuel has already recognised the impossibility of maintaining such an anomalous discrimination, and has foreshadowed an amendment on the Report stage of the Bill, under which the compensation to be given will be increased by taking into account the possibility of the life of the licence enduring for twenty-one years. How is that possibility to be measured in terms of cash? It is not to be a certainty under the scheme adumbrated, and cannot, therefore, logically be dealt with as such. If it is so dealt with, a licence extinguished in the fourteenth year will be compensated for on the basis of its having seven years to run, while one extinguished in the fifteenth year will get nothing. But whatever may be the compensation given to extinguished licences for the chance of a further seven years' life, it will have to come out of the compensation fund. This, under the Bill, is to be fed by levies spread over fourteen years only. Unless the annual levy is to be raised in amount, in contradiction of the statement made by the Prime Minister on the introduction of the Bill, the greater amount of compensation to be given to extinguished licences on account of their increased expectation of life will decrease the number which can be extinguished during the reduction period, and this to a very considerable extent. If, therefore, the compensation fund is to be kept solvent, the Government's original estimate of the reduction which their scheme will effect will fall far short of realisation in the result. We have little doubt that when Ministers recognise this difficulty they will be driven to adopt the only course which seems open to them, that is, to extend the compensation levy for the further term of seven years, so as to enable the Licensing Commission, under the borrowing powers given them by the Bill, to raise the necessary money on the security of the expectant income of the fund during those seven years. But if this expedient course be adopted, one of the concessions the Government are offering to the Trade vanishes altogether.

The more closely we examine Mr. Asquith's new proposal, the clearer does our conviction become, that it will be uncertain in its incidence, embarrassing in its working, and prejudicial to temperance reform in its results. To any such scheme we greatly prefer a clean extension of the Time Limit from fourteen to twenty-one years. The original proposal was strictly logical, and equal in its operation between one licence-holder and another; and amendment of it should fulfill the same conditions. It is as strong supporters of the Time Limit, and as anxious for its successful working, that we urge the Government, when making a concession to the Trade the principle of which considerations of public policy and of political expediency unite to justify, to make it in such a manner as merely to postpone, and not to impair, the benefits offered to the community by the logical, clear-cut, and certain provisions of their original scheme.

THE HOPE OF AN EDUCATIONAL CONCORDAT.

We are glad to gather from Mr. Runciman that he is "not without hopes" of a settlement of the Education question. This, we suppose, is to come by way of pourparlers between the Government and the heads of the Anglican Church. There appears to be reason for believing that the Primate, on whose natural good temper and diplomatic gifts so much store is justly set, has taken some very definite steps towards peace. It is stated that Dr. Davidson has practically offered the Government to surrender to the public authority the Church schools, some six thousand or so, in the single-school districts. In return the Government and the Liberal Party are to be asked for "compensations." These "compensations," it is said, are to take the form of a right of entry into the existing public schools. In other words, denominational teaching is to be given in addition to Cowper-Templeism by an assistant teacher within school hours. It is clear that if some such proposition has been laid on the table, it approaches, even if it does not touch, the acute point of the religious controversy. The grievance of the Nonconformist parent lies in his restriction to the single school under clerical control, where Church formularies are imposed, and where the atmosphere is more or less strictly Anglican. If this can be removed, the problem of the towns, where the alternative school is usually available, may solve itself. Furthermore, the phrase, "right of entry," may very well be used to cover a practically harmless accommodation of religious differences. No State authority, for example, ought to object to making school buildings free to the Church after school hours, and keeping them lighted and warmed for her religious services. The difficulty arises when it is proposed to weave a special form of religious teaching into the curriculum, and to put upon a section of the State service the duty of providing it. The interests of the Church in such a settlement are obvious. The number of Church schools is decreasing, even under the operation of the Act of 1902. Nothing in the world can stay the tendency of the private and secondary system to give way to the public and general one. Therefore, it is even more to the advantage of the Church to secure a foothold in that part of the educational domain which is growing than to retain her hold on her own territory, on which the tide of modern progress steadily encroaches. The question, then, would seem to be whether the association of the single schools with the national system is worth the partial surrender of the public schools.

Much should, in our opinion, be done for peace, if peace is practicable. On this point it is necessary to speak with some caution. The Primate is at once a diplomatist and a moderate. He is something of a Liberal in the ecclesiastical sense, and, in the later phases of his primacy, he has shown a wider outlook on the future than most of his contemporaries on the episcopal bench. It was not he who rejected the Bill of 1906, and it will not be his fault if the olive-branch of 1908 is fruitless. But we all know that this educational controversy is not governed purely by the spirit of Christian charity or by tolerant views of ecclesiastical statesmanship. In other words, it depends just as much on Mr. Balfour as on Dr. Davidson. If Mr. Balfour thinks that it is necessary to keep the country clergy in being as a Conservative force at the next election, and that they would be affronted by the loss of the single schools, we may be quite sure that on one point or another these negotiations will suffer shipwreck. And, on the other hand, the Nonconformists may consider the concession of the right of entry into the public schools, even if it could be assimilated to the class-room system, to be too grave an invasion of the free and non-sectarian area created by the Act of 1870. They may think, as we have said, that special Church influence over education is likely to decrease, and the unsectarian, or even the secular, principle, resting, as it does, on the power of the national purse and the national will, is bound to increase. If they take this decision, any settlement resembling that which we have indicated will be rejected. But the total failure of the treaty-makers would undoubtedly carry heavy consequences, and we cannot believe that if the rural difficulty is settled, the urban problem is insoluble. The Government must, on the failure of the Conference, revert to their Bill and push it through the House of Commons. The House of Lords will then reject it, and the Government, at the close of the Session, may be faced with the almost total failure of their programme, and with a situation as regards the House of Lords which can no longer be evaded or postponed.

Life and Letters.

THE INSTABILITY OF THE WORLD.

Modern civilisation carries within itself the seeds of its own destruction. That is the contention of one of the most brilliant of its critics who, in a series of imaginative nightmares, has exhibited the easy arrival of the end. Mr. Wells has formerly demanded supernatural machinery to effect his outpouring of calamity and terror. A comet, bearing a strange gas, will make everyone sane: With a sudden gasp of amazement, they will realise the essential insanity of the life which they had hitherto regarded as natural to mankind. Martians, descending from the darkened sky, with irresistible powers of heat ray and poisonous dust, will wipe out humanity as a man will wipe out a wasp's nest. But to-day he returns to the solid ground, and without any assumptions but those of but a slight advance in mechanical invention, exhibits the forces which make towards a cosmic overthrow. The apparatus required is not much more than will undoubtedly be furnished within the next half century. Since "The War in the Air" (George Bell & Sons) was begun, indeed, fact has almost raced past it. The flying machine, heavier than air, which journeys from London to Glasgow, excites (in the novel) a frantic astonishment. The newspapers "foam at the headline," and "are not so much published as carried screaming into the street." But already at Le Mans Mr. Wright with his fifty miles flight has revealed that this particular journey will be certainly accomplished but a few months from to-day. And given effective flying—to be utilised in war not for the transference of men but for coercing a nation into capitulation—the march of events appears to follow a natural chain of sequence. Each nation, armed to the teeth in a world which has scarcely apprehended war—a city-bred people—is to-day restrained from fighting by fear of consequences. Each nation—in this grim forecast—thinking itself secure in the possession of this new invincible weapon, plunges into effort for the overlordship of the world. The German air fleet invades New York. The city "drinking up the wealth of a continent as Rome once drank up the wealth of the Mediterranean, and Babylon the wealth of the East," after a hopeless resistance, capitulates. The poor, neglected in their quarters of squalor, like the poor in Paris in 1870, raise the cry that they are betrayed. Sporadic violence against the invader breaks the truce. The Germans, enraged, determine to make an example which will crush out the need for further effort in a cruelty which is ultimately to prove a kindness. Fire and brimstone rain down from the airships like the fire and brimstone which rained down upon the cities of the plain. At the end New York is a smoking mass of ruins: a cemetery of a million dead. The assumption of terrorism would have been justified had war been operating under the old conditions. Rage and a fury of revenge on such occasions will always transcend cowardice; man, in a kind of madness, will be content to be destroyed, if only he can destroy. It is only when the resistance becomes obviously senseless—when he has no means of hurting his enemy—that he finally accepts the inevitable. But in the new conditions of air fighting such an equilibrium is never attained. There are no frontiers that can be guarded; desperate men, equipping these new craft, can always exact terrible reprisals. In return for New York's destruction, Berlin is smashed to powder by American airships; in return for Berlin, other American cities. Madness and delirium seize the people: the whole world is at war; modern civilisation blows up and vanishes from the world.

With the destructive fury of the war comes the collapse in the whole edifice of credit which maintains the economic efficiency of the industrial system. Men demand gold as in America last autumn, hoarding it in their stockings or burying it in their gardens; the stock of gold becomes exhausted, bonds and shares waste-paper, factories closed, the city populations find neither work nor bread. In peril of imminent destruction from the enemy above, men claw and mow at one another in chaotic struggle in the starving cities, reeling back visibly into the beast. After the fighting comes the famine, after the famine the great pestilence. The organisation of society is broken and fissured: the vast multitude perish, the few that remain, like the survivors of the Roman civilisation after the impact of the barbarian, are found at the end of the tale, in village communities or isolated huts, or encamped in the ruins of once populous towns. Amid the nettle and the ivy the survivors of London wander forlorn through the empty labyrinths: as the survivors encamped in the ruins of Rome in the long twilight which preceded the Middle Age. After the three hundred years of diastole there came "the swift and unexpected systole, like the closing of a fist." "They could not understand it was a systole," writes Mr. Wells. "They could not think of it as anything but a jolt and hitch, a mere oscillatory indication of the swiftness of their progress. Collapse, though it happened all about them, remained incredible. Presently some falling mass smote them down, or the ground opened beneath their feet. They died incredulous." So incredulous indeed died Babylon, Tyre, Rome, refusing each to believe that it was witnessing the end of a world.

How far is this sombre vision a nightmare merely? How far a warning of the things which may come to pass? Mr. Wells requires for his "Götterdämmerung" no fresh influx of barbarian hordes to smash civilisation brutally to pieces: not even the upheaval from below, in the consolidated masses of the poor, which has seemed to so many modern observers a force destined to consume civilisation in fire and blood. He takes merely the undeniable note of the age, that material advance has far transcended moral progress, and that this inequality is full of the elements of danger. Man has wrested secrets from sun and star, equipped himself with apparatus which should make him rival the older gods, stolen, like Prometheus, the fire of heaven to be his servant, and made the earth and the air to obey him. Yet this unparalleled control of dead things has failed to eliminate his silly national jealousies, his little prejudices and selfishnesses, his clumsy determination to make his life a brutal, irrational thing. Mr. Wells outpours his vials of wrath upon the Crowd: the little vacant street-bred people, the "common abundant life," "flowing, in its cheerful, aimless way," towards the Abyss. His hero, one of this Crowd, Mr. Bert Smallways, is one of "the sort of men who had made England and America what they are." "He had lived all his life in narrow streets, and between mean houses he could not look over, and in a narrow circle of ideas from which there was no escape. He thought the whole duty of man was to be smarter than his fellows, get his hands, as he put it, 'on the dibs,' and have a good time." But the author need not have gone to the Crowd for his illustration. No lunacy that flourishes amongst the little but is intensified amongst the great. The German Professors, the conversation of an Oxford College Common Room will exhibit as dangerous a combination of truculence and terror as any gathering of patriots at a public-house bar. The war scare of a halfpenny paper, with its frantic appeals to race prejudice and passion, is revealed in deepening imbecilities in sixpenny magazines which circulate amongst the country clergy, or half-crown reviews which lie upon the table of country houses. Countless millions in Europe and Asia and America, "instead of being born rooted in the soil, were born struggling in a torrent they never clearly understood. All the faiths of their fathers had been taken by surprise, and startled into the strangest forms and reactions." Everywhere in the early twentieth century this observer finds "a sort of heated, irascible stupidity"; everywhere "congested nations in inconvenient areas, stopping the exchange of population and produce with each other, annoying each other with tariffs and every possible commercial vexation, and threatening each other with navies and armies that grow every year more portentous."

After a time, says a great writer, the earth grows sick of her children, like exhausted ground that will bear fruit no more. It is impossible that society could "blow up" with such rapidity as is here pictured; the process is, in any case, foreshortened. But any student who has followed the history of Rome's destruction—the gradual disintegration of a society exceedingly complex and rational—will never conceal from himself the possibility of similar vast changes in the world of to-morrow. The process is always incredible to those who think that they represent the last word of progress, that mankind henceforth has but to settle down and be comfortable in a world where tranquility is secure. Dr. Dill has described such a life under the Roman peace, with the municipalities competing in magnificence of building, all the arts of life secure, the farmhouse (in one picture) with the peacocks in the garden under the sunlight, and every accompanying element of enjoyment and repose. The only sorrow which disturbed such an age was the sometimes transient regret that all the great things had been accomplished; that humanity, in a completely rational society, had nothing to contemplate in the future but a repetition of the present—an endless end of the world. A few generations later that farmhouse lies deserted, the cities are crumbling into ruin, society itself has fallen to pieces, terror, and with terror child-like superstition and ferocity, have achieved dominance. Night has resumed her ancient Empire. What guarantee does the present offer against the repetition of a similar catastrophe? Civilisation possesses weapons adequate to protection against forces without. It has no protection against forces within. One of the passing figures in Mr. Wells's vision of desolation mourns over the vanishing of all the bright hopes of a transfigured world. "The sense of fine beginnings! It was all a sham. There were no beginnings. We're just ants in ant-hill circles, in a world that doesn't matter: that goes on and rambles into nothingness. New York—New York doesn't even strike me as horrible. New York was nothing but an ant-hill kicked to pieces by a fool."

This prophet is at least justified in one contention: that the future, whether in orderly progress or with sudden or gradual retrogression, will be astonished at the "hallucination of security" in which to-day society reposes, forgetting seemingly that but a thin crust separates it from the central elemental fires, or that the heart of the earth is a flame. There are forces of resistance to disintegration and decay, even amongst this shabby crowd which appears to the indignant observer but an aggregation of aimless, impossible lives. Mr. Wells in earlier work has shown us the humanity and romantic ardor of Mr. Hoopdriver and the resolute hope of Mr. Lewisham, even if in later effort he can see little but the fatuous ineptitude of Mr. "Art" Kipps or the ineffective blunderings of Mr. Bert Smallways. It is with no panic fear, certainly with no acquiescence and despair, that the reformer of to-day will contemplate the possible future of a society beyond measure complex, baffling and uncertain in its energies and aims. But the warning always useful, but now more than ever desirable, can never be too strongly emphasised: that with the vertical division between nation and nation armed to the teeth, and the horizontal division between rich and poor which has become a cosmopolitan fissure, the future of progress is still doubtful and precarious. Humanity—at best—appears to-day but as a shipwrecked crew which has taken refuge on a narrow ledge of rock, beaten by wind and wave; which cannot tell how many, if any at all, will survive when the long night gives place to morning. The wise man will still go softly all his days; working always for greater economic equality on the one hand, for understanding between estranged peoples on the other; apprehending always how slight an effort of stupidity or violence could strike a death blow to society as at present constituted, and elevate the forces of destruction triumphant over the ruins of a world.

THE CHARACTER OF THE RUSSIAN PEOPLE.

There is something poignant in the very smell of Russia. To cross her frontiers from industrious, well-arranged Germany, where health and happiness are laid down in the Imperial regulations—to enter the mouth of the Neva from the Swedish doll's-house and toy farmyard, is like going into a prison. Hopelessness is written over the gate, and as you pass through the corridors and cells of the country, there rises the sense of forgotten suffering, of human tears, and immemorial wrong. On every side the vast landscape stretches out, flat and indistinctive. You feel that, in whichever direction you may go, there will be no change in that scene for hundreds and hundreds of miles—nothing but that expanse of land, flat to the horizon—an expanse where a river bank becomes a cliff, and a rise of a hundred feet an event in a day's journey. Here and there the surface is marked with strips of thin cultivation. You see the draggled huts of a village, unknown and unvisited as a Central African kraal, and in spring or autumn the shaggy peasants are wading about in the mud, and in wintertime in the snow. Or it is a small town, and from the middle of its hang-dog streets rises the big white-washed church, with a roof of pale green iron plates, a blue or brazen dome, and at the top the Russian cross, having a bar for the Crucified's Feet, with one end higher than the other, because the Russian Christ was lame.

So to the traveller the scene goes on—a succession of plains and wastes, and unvaried forests and God-forsaken villages, and poverty-stricken towns and muddy people, green with famine, or spitting out the husks of sunflower seeds, their only luxury but drink—until the monotony of its depression is almost unendurable, and one would say of the whole country that melancholy had marked it for her own. Yet there is no land, not even Italy, to which the thoughts of exiles turn with greater longing. "It is all very well," said the Russian lady who refused to die after seeing Naples; "it is all very pretty, but it is not Siberia!"

Perhaps it is near daybreak in midwinter, and the sledge is struggling eastward under transparent darkness. It emerges from the streets of an ancient town into the open country, like a boat clearing the harbour, and every minute the east grows paler, and the snow whiter, till, at the first ray of sun, for mile after mile, the lines of hardly perceptible ridges suddenly glow with crimson, and, as the sun moves westward, low-down above the horizon, all the world, except the brown and blue forest, turns to shining silver. Or it is spring, and the birch woods are alive with young leaves, though the freshness and the smell of half-melted snow are still upon the air. Or it is June, when night is white, and the whole land for a thousand miles is sweet with the smell of the hay, and as one stands under hardly visible stars and listens to the silence of night's little sounds, the spirit of Russia becomes a thing that can be felt—as palpably felt as the Egyptian darkness. Or, passing down the stream of the Volga, you may tie up for the night and come upon a scene like this in Yaroslav:—

> "I went ashore, and walked about the streets of the quiet city; a sleepy town, with trees and grass everywhere (the trees very dark in the twilight); the houses low, two-storeyed, and all painted white, with pale green roofs as white as ghosts in the dusk, ornamented with pilasters and eighteenth-century and Empire arches and arcades. Every now and then one came across a church, with the remains of the sunset making the gilt minarets glisten. The whole was a symphony in dark green, white, and lilac (the sky was lilac by now). The shops were all shut; the houses shuttered, the passers-by few. The grass grew thick in the cobble-stones."

The picture is from Mr. Maurice Baring's new book of sketches—"Russian Essays and Stories" (Methuen)—not so substantial and thoughtful a work as his "Year in Russia," but distinguished by the same fascination and sensitive personality. There are few English people who can grasp, as he does, the double nature of the Russian scene and the Russian spirit. This description of Yaroslav, for instance—how pathetic in its remote quietude and dying lights! But the present writer remembers, and probably Mr. Baring remembers, how different was the look of Yaroslav only three years ago, when those grassy streets were thronged with black crowds of men and women yelling in triumph for liberty, chanting the Russian "Marseillaise," hailing the downfall of tyranny and capital, while officials and employers cowered in their cellars, or slunk away in three-horsed sledges by night, galloping for their lives to far-off Moscow, the very railways and posts being in the hands of revolution.

A double-natured land—a double-natured people, as Mr. Baring has well perceived. Many who hear the name of Russia think first of the gaol, the torture-chamber, and the execution yard. That is the land where the despot is hanging the noblest of his subjects by a hundred a month, and massacres are carried out to time like business transactions. That is the land where the greatest of living writers calls to the Government to put the hang-rope round his old neck because he can endure the horror of the executions no longer. That is the land where the finest intellects of the country, men and women alike, are sent in long trains with grated windows to rot in unknown deserts; where peasants, men and women alike, are strapped barebacked on benches and flogged without mercy, because they cannot pay the interest on French and English loans; where boys and girls and famous men are sunk into the oblivion of prison for months and years without trial. Young men and young girls will there destroy the agents of tyranny with less apparent emotion than we feel in drowning kittens, risking every pain and dishonor that man or woman can suffer. On both sides the contest is carried on with a violence that varies chiefly according to the power of inflicting it. It is a land, also, where "Tsar Hunger" reigns—a fitting home for Gorky's desperate wanderers, and the poignant sorrows of Andréeff. Peasants in the lust of thrift or passion will there contrive the obscure abominations of the "Powers of Darkness." As Mr. Baring tells, they will strangle a mother's only baby on pretence that it is Antichrist. They will form themselves into monstrous sects, whose orgies of blood cannot be described. Brides will let bridegrooms find them hanged above the bed. Men by thousands will so despair of life that they take vows never to reproduce it. Peasants will light a fire under a horse's belly or gouge out an eye to make it draw a cart from the mud. "It is enough," said the dying Basároff, first of Nihilists, when Anna came at last to see him; "it is enough—now darkness." The darkness, without that satisfaction, might seem the natural character and end of all Russian life.

Yet there is no race in the world so merciful, so full of pity, none in which the simplest and deepest feelings of mankind play so powerful and unaffected a part. If we should choose the one characteristic that more than any other distinguishes the Russian people, it would be pity. Here and there in Europe one may find pity, too. Schopenhauer, in his philosophy of sorrow, counted pity the chief of virtues. Thomas Hardy, from the inner knowledge of sorrow, watches the course of mankind with the Spirit of the Pities. But in Russia, filled so full with man's sorrow, the pity is unconscious and universal. It is as natural a part of the race as its hair, and all possess it, perhaps even the Tsar. To a Russian the most savage criminals being taken to gaol are "the unfortunate." No beggar is ever refused in Russia; from the hungriest, and even from the richest, door he is never turned away empty. "Why should the rooks die? They have a right to live," cried the villagers to a shooting party, and nearly killed the sportsmen. In his last book Mr. Baring told of peasants incited to the destruction of their master's house and the plunder of his goods, and how they replied, "He is rich and would suffer if he became poor. We are used to poverty and must have pity on those who are not used to it."

This peculiar sympathy pervades the whole of Russian life. It is as though every man and woman were indeed brother and sister, or, at least, some near relation, without the dulness of relationship. We suppose that in no country is equality so quietly accepted as a matter of course—not the mere equality of possessions, which could not make much difference, but the sense of equality in a common manhood. It is quite true that the educated people are very highly educated—that, as Mr. Baring also notices, their ideal of "culture" is something far beyond the range of our public-school and country-house people, and that in art and literature and music Russia is now leading the world with yearly increasing influence. But, none the less, there is no great gulf fixed between the educated Russian and the peasant's mind. Of what other peasantry in the world could it be said that their favorite reading is a prose translation of "Paradise Lost," because "a sweetness comes to you with it," as Mr. Baring told us in his "Year in Russia"? And both in the simple wisdom of their conversation, in their sad music, and the sudden tempest of joy in their dances, the Russian uneducated people seem to live, as it were, from a deeper level than others reach.

To live in common peril is of itself the surest equaliser. Whether the danger be poverty, famine, war, imprisonment, or execution, does not much matter. There is no true comradeship and no true testing of a man without danger, and it is, perhaps, in the school of danger and misery that the Russian people have learnt their characteristic pity for the miserable. It is in the school of danger that the educated Russians have learnt the politeness of equality, and a freedom of social intercourse that English society has no conception of. Thus out of the eater cometh forth meat, and in the land of despotism alone is liberty to be found. "You talk a great deal about freedom," said the eighteenth-century Frenchman to a lady; "but where have you found it?" "Only in the Bastille," she replied.

THE RELIGION OF THE SPIRIT.

In the second of his communications to the Christian Society at Corinth, St. Paul laid a marked emphasis upon the statement that he is not a servant of the letter but of the spirit; and one of the most convincing proofs that the Christian religion is a religion of the spirit and not of the letter, is the fact that the Founder of it left no written documents of any kind behind him. As far as we can gather from the fragmentary records of His life that have come down to us in the literature of the New Testament, He never wrote a single line or committed a single syllable to manuscript in the whole course of his public activities. That Jesus Christ was acquainted with the art of writing we have every reason to believe. In the narrative, in St. John's Gospel, of the woman taken in adultery, it is expressly stated that "He stooped down and with His finger wrote on the ground." It is true that this narrative is not found in the best Greek manuscripts, nor in many of the old translations of the fourth gospel. The earliest of the Church fathers make no mention of it, and it is certainly not written in the Johannine style or spirit. Whence the passage comes from, whether it formed part of a lost apocryphal gospel, or whether it originally belonged to the gospel of St. Mark, cannot, in the present state of scholarship, be ascertained. But, in all probability, it was part of the primitive Christian tradition which ultimately found a resting place in St. John: although the text, as it has come down to us, is somewhat uncertain, there is every reason to believe that it is an old and genuine source, and a correct record of the fact that Jesus was skilled in the art of writing.

According to an old ecclesiastical tradition, dating back to the fourth century and probably based upon the above-mentioned incident, the Founder of the Christian Faith entered into a correspondence with a certain Syrian Prince named Abgarus of Edessa. As Naaman the Syrian had in far-off times appealed to Elisha, so this Syrian Prince now appealed to the Physician of the diseased, the paralytic, and the lame to come and heal him of his sickness: at the same time offering him a humble but friendly shelter in his capital from the persecution of the Jews. He received an answer in the spirit of the Johannine gospel, in which the Christ is made to say that He has not time to come to him, but that, after the accomplishment of His work on earth, and when He has returned to the Father, He will send him one of His disciples. Like a great deal of the apocryphal literature which sprang up in the early Christian centuries, this correspondence is written with the double purpose of edifying the believer and confirming him in the faith. It is one of the many beautiful products of the pious imagination, and has no claim to be regarded as an actual historic fact. Setting aside this ancient tradition as a blossom of the religious imagination, and accepting as historical the narrative in St. John as to the writing on the ground, we may take it that it was no part of Christ's purpose to announce His message to mankind except through the life He lived and the death He died. He committed nothing to writing because He did not want to live in the hearts of His followers through the exact letter of what He said but through the spirit which manifested itself in His whole demeanour and personality. It was in this sense that St. Paul understood Christianity. The letters of this remarkable man are the earliest and most voluminous accounts we have of the Christian movement in its early days. These accounts contain a certain amount of ephemeral and controversial matter, which belong rather to the historical than to the permanent elements of the Christian Faith. But, apart from this, it is probable that no one has more fully caught the spirit and temper of his Master than St. Paul; and his letters, taken all in all, are a supreme embodiment of almost all that is best in the Christian attitude of mind. Nevertheless, if we go through the whole Pauline literature, we shall find that only about four direct quotations are made from the sayings of Christ. These sayings, although not committed to writing in the form in which we have them now, were current in the primitive Christian communities. Most of them were no doubt known to St. Paul. And the reason why he hardly ever refers to them is that he considered himself to be a minister of the spirit and not of the letter. It was not the words but the spirit of the Christian religion which were all in all to him. In Christianity as well as in Judaism, his fundamental conviction was that the letter kills: it is the spirit only which gives life. In his mind, Christianity was not a religion which demanded service to the letter; its essence was not to be found in any outward standards, however sacred, but in an inward attitude and temper —in a spirit and not a code.

This must also have been the central conception of the four evangelists. We have only to look at the sovereign freedom with which the synoptic writers and, above all, the fourth evangelist handle their materials to be convinced that their aim was to reproduce the spirit rather than the letter of the original Christian message. This is most emphatically the case with St. John. In this gospel the Bearer of this message is made to express it in the words of John. John discards the letter of the synoptic evangelists, and translates its spirit into a language of his own. Even the first three evangelists, although they largely agree in general outlines, exhibit so many differences in detail and arrangement that we can only account for these differences on the ground that they, too, considered themselves as servants of the spirit rather than the letter. A familiar example of this attitude of mind is the treatment of the Lord's Prayer by the four evangelists. It is not alluded to at all in St. Mark and St. John, although it is one of those utterances which must have made the deepest impression upon the primitive adherents of the new religion; and where it is recorded in St. Matthew and St. Luke it is recorded in two different forms. Many other examples of a similar kind might be taken from the gospels to show how indifferent the earliest Christian societies were to the mere form in which their faith was expressed so long as they retained the spirit of it. In this respect they were following in the footsteps of their great Exemplar: He was so indifferent to the letter that He never committed any of His utterances to writing at all.

In all these matters it must be admitted that the Christian of to-day has much to learn from his ancestors in the Faith. He is too much of a literalist; he is too much attached to mere verbal texts and expressions; he is too anxious to confine the supreme object of Christian reverence within the restricted limits of isolated texts and ecclesiastical formularies. One of the most hopeful signs of the reform movement in Islam, as represented by the Young Turks, is the effort which it is making to rescue Mohammedanism from the letter of the Koran. If this movement ultimately succeeds, and Mohammedanism becomes a religion of the spirit, a great future may yet be before the peoples of the East. Islam has, before now, surpassed the Christian populations in the production of character and in the march of civilisation. Its decay in recent centuries is, to some extent, owing to the slavish literalism with which it interpreted its sacred books. Should this method of interpretation come to an end (and there are many signs of it all over the Mohammedan world), and should Mohammedanism eventually re-emerge as a purified religion of the spirit, it is possible that the rise of the Mohammedan peoples may be as sudden and startling as the recent transformation of the Japanese. The future is with those peoples who most fully realise that the past is an inheritance to be used, not a burden to be borne.

SALMON IN THE THAMES.

Years ago when we fished in a shallow, muddy stream many times smaller and little more accessible than the Thames, we used to be startled each evening at about the same time by a tremendous splash. Or sometimes we were so fortunate as to see the cause, a long, silver fish hurling itself out to fall in again almost broadside. It was Salmo the leaper, a ten pound grilse that had wandered into that lone backwater whose other inhabitants were only a school of bleak and an occasional chub. All who have made acquaintance with the salmon in fresh water, whether as more or less ineffectual anglers or as constrained observers, will hope that the best possible construction can be placed on the reported capture of a six pound grilse last week at Kingston. No one can love the Thames so much that he would not love it more if it were once more the home of the king of all British fishes.

The operation of casting bread upon the water must have been a lucrative financial investment by comparison with the efforts during the past eight years of the Thames Salmon Association. Since 1901 the hatchery at Dedham has annually produced numbers of fry, which have been turned into the river to a probable total of eight hundred thousand or, it may be, a million smolts. Many of the dangers of the salmon's life have been evaded when the fish has put on its "sea jacket" and is ready for its first wonderful migration. Yet he would be a sanguine spirit who would hope that one in every five hundred that went to the sea would come back in five or six months' time with every ounce turned into a pound. In the summer of 1902 a grilse was taken in the estuary and accorded the honor of a glass case in the British Museum. It may possibly have been a Dedham fish. At any rate, its presence in the river with its head probably up-stream was a heartening sign, and encouraged Mr. Grenfell (now Lord Desborough) and his friends to go on with their work. The fish caught at Kingston and thrown back last week has not been identified with certainty as a salmon. Though its appearance, if it be a virgin salmon, is at the right time of year, according to most of our salmon rivers, it does not coincide with the expectations of the Chairman of the Thames Salmon Association, who recently stated that he expected the first evidence of success to come in the spring. For our part, we should expect to see the autumn grilse first, and our best hope is that the fish caught in Waterworks Reach may be a salmon and may not be alone.

It is certainly time that the courageous work of the Thames Salmon Association should begin to bear fruit. Without the co-operation of the London County Council and the Thames Conservancy Board in dealing with the pollution of the river, no one would have dreamed of attempting the re-establishment of the salmon. For three-fourths of the nineteenth century, the Thames was a river that no self-respecting salmon would take a look at, even from Gravesend. The journey of a smolt to the sea, if not a physical impossibility, would have been an experience well calculated to wipe out all the pleasant memories of the upper Thames. Not even the impulse that makes the fish hurl themselves at an impossible fall till they die would have urged the returning grilse through the filth and poison that sewer and gas-works not long ago poured past Woolwich and Barking. But as one by one the nuisances have been abated, the Thames has flowed in purer flood to the sea. The mud banks have been gradually purged and restored more or less to the consistency of the up-Thames meadows that are their legitimate origin. The County Council steamboats, most inconsiderately removed by the present Moderate majority, did a good work in washing the foreign matter out at a slightly quicker pace than the lap of the tides. In many places, the mud has vanished and revealed the miracle of a clean beach of shingle. Smells have abated, the sparkle of the water has come back, and it is now several years since salmon experts declared that there was no good reason why the fish should not come again to the upper Thames. When roach and dace, out of mere idle curiosity, descend with impunity as far as Greenwich, and smelts wander up from the sea to Teddington, it is not to be expected that the impulsive salmon will fail in time to come up under the prick of the homing instinct.

For years it must be but a small thing. The ova that a pair of salmon may deposit in a quiet upper reach must be reduced by nine hundred and ninety in every thousand before such destructive agencies as trout and eel, swan and coot, water beetle, flood, drought, pike, and the unknown perils of the sea are satisfied. In spite of their rather remarkable fecundity (and our six pound grilse may lay five thousand eggs), the increase of a river population is a slow business. In spite of their known faithfulness to the river that has bred them, many fish have probably been bred by the Thames Salmon Association for the fishermen of other rivers. Most creatures like a crowd at times of migration, and it must need a little courage to leave a large company making for Avon or Tweed and go off alone, or with only one or two companions, to an entirely unfashionable river. Nothing succeeds like success. The salmon escape annihilation by means of an overwhelming plenty of ova and young calculated to glut the ravagers. There is little doubt that the percentage of survivals from ten million eggs is greater than that from a few thousands. We hope that the time will come when eggs are spawned by the million in the Thames, but it is not yet. When it becomes a pastime to watch the salmon negotiating St. Margaret's weir by hundreds in an afternoon, this glory of the Thames will have been safely re-established. We fear that that pleasant sight will not be seen in the lifetime of those courageous gentlemen who are doing their best to make it an actuality for the next generation.

It is after the fishing season opens in February that a run of salmon would be most acceptable as an earnest of sport in future years. According to the old records, May was the month when the salmon of the Thames chose to re-appear in the pink of condition as fighters, and, if the fates would so have it, as the best food that either salt or fresh water can produce. It is then that we may hope, if we are optimists, to see fish of a far more generous growth than the six pound grilse, fish whose efforts as spawners in the autumn will be far better regarded and whose chances of living to spawn again may be far more slender. There are the sea nets to be encountered, and similar and other dangers of an exceedingly long and tortuous estuary; the chance of a long wait below the weir owing to too little water above and below; and a summer amid the nerve-racking disturbances of a river crowded with pleasure craft, and the menace of every angler's lure between Lechlade and Twickenham.

The last danger is the least of them all, and it is probable that five thousand fish must be hatched in any river for every one of the third year that falls to the rod. Nevertheless, we hope that all rods will be stayed till the salmon takes a thorough hold once more in the river of all others that gives every man who wields a rod a reasonably equal chance of indulging in the most exciting kind of angling.

Art.

THE SECRET OF WHISTLER.

The Man and his Art! You sometimes hear the phrase used antithetically, as though one could dissociate the creator from his creation. But the artist and the man are one, for the art is nothing but the highest expression of the personality: an expression, however, of the whole being, not of its accidental non-essential part. The modern undiscriminating appetite for biographical gossip and detail confuses the two things, and a hasty criticism draws superficial deductions from the mixture. Because a poet gets drunk sometimes we must treat all his poetry as though it were steeped in alcohol; because he does not pay his tradesmen we are to detect the bankrupt strain throughout his verse. But the poetry springs from the entire nature of the man, and the drink and debts may have scarcely touched the surface. We may usefully investigate the artist's "attitude towards life," remembering, however, that a person's attitude towards anything, be it deliberate or instinctive, is not the whole of him.

Some thoughts of this kind are suggested by Mr. and Mrs. Pennell's "Life of James McNeill Whistler" (Heinemann), a sumptuous and, on the whole, an adequate biography of one of the great creative workers of our time. It is a book as fairly written as any memoir can be that is informed by the piety of a deep friendship and the enthusiasm of hero-worship. The writers loved Whistler, and they think him the supreme painter and draughtsman of the nineteenth century. But they do not strain their advocacy or weary us with eulogium, preferring to set forth the facts, and leaving them, as the phrase goes, to speak for themselves. So, on the whole, they do with sufficient clearness. They may not establish Whistler on the pedestal where his biographers would wish to set him; but they leave us with a juster estimate than that usually taken in his life-time and since. There are those who persist in regarding him merely as a strident example of the super-self-conscious æsthete, with all the foibles of the species intensified. To Mr. Chesterton, for instance, he is only an aggravated exhibition of "artistic temperament." Whistler, he says may have been a great artist, but he was a very small man. It was not merely that he thought a good deal about himself. What makes his case worse was that "he thought so much about art." He could not forget art; and in so far "he was only a man with the artistic temperament," whereas the really great artist "can dismiss the subject of art," and on due occasion wish it at the bottom of the sea. "Similarly, we should be more inclined to trust a solicitor who did not talk about conveyancing over the nuts and wine. . . . What we really desire of any man conducting any business is that the full force of an ordinary man should be put into that particular study. We do not desire that the full force of that study should be put into an ordinary man"—and so on.

It is ingenious in the paradoxical vein. But the "similarly" gives away the argument. We may or may not object to a solicitor talking shop at the dinner-table: except as a point of manners, there is no reason why we should. A lawyer explaining the law is more likely to be interesting and well-informed than when he is discoursing on literature or philosophy. The man who really cares for his occupation, whose being and nature are wrapped up in it, does not hang it up out of business hours, like his office-coat. The poet, the painter, the writer, the inventor, the statesman, the scholar by no means "dismiss the subject" that interests them when not actually at work upon it. One hears little except politics when Members of Parliament are gathered together. Do not sailors talk of their ships, soldiers of their regiments, schoolmasters of their boys, sportsmen of the birds they have shot (or missed), golfers of the records they might have made? Any man whose life-work is real to him cannot often, except by a conscious effort to conform to the conventions, get himself into the frame of mind of wishing it at the bottom of the sea. Does Mr. Chesterton never talk or think about books except when he is writing them?

As a fact, these volumes show that Whistler was not always "talking about art." He thought about many other subjects, and, in his versatile, sparkling way, he had a wide conversational range. But when he wrote for publication or when he spoke for the public, then, it is true, he did write and speak about nothing else. He gave the reason himself. Art, he said, was the one matter he understood scientifically—the one study in which he possessed technical and systematic knowledge. In everything else he was an amateur; and this butterfly, as people chose to think him, and as he scornfully encouraged them to think him, had a profound, a rooted, a fanatical disbelief in amateurishness. No effectual work, he held, can be accomplished except by the skilled craftsman, the person who understands his material and has learnt the use of his tools. Nothing can compensate for the absence of this understanding and training: not feeling, nor morality, nor general culture, nor the widest possible knowledge of other things. Here was the difference between Whistler and the critics of his day. Tom Taylor once suggested to him that some detail of one of his pictures was, "after all, a question of taste." "It is not a question of taste," replied Whistler, "it is a question of knowledge." One might as well say that it is a question of taste for the engineer whether or not he shall use girders sufficient to withstand the strains they will have to endure. And in art taste is knowledge—the knowledge of the expert based on secure principles as opposed to the shifting uncertainties of the merely intelligent layman.

It is objected to Whistler that he upheld the cult of Art for Art's sake—l'art pour l'art. It was not a phrase, so far as I can discover, that he himself used; on the contrary, its special exponents, the members of the so-called æsthetic school, were the objects of his satire. But it is true that he did pursue art for the sake of art, and expressly and directly for no other purpose whatever. In the view of some critics, that is a deep offence. Art, we are told, ought to have a moral purpose, an ethical, even a religious inspiration. Very likely: so ought engineering, and medicine, and other branches of human effort. But it is not the business of the artist, any more than it is that of the engineer or the doctor, to teach morals directly. His function is to acquire that knowledge of color, proportion, and design which will enable him to produce beautiful objects; just as it is the object of the doctor to learn how to cure sick people, and that of the engineer to make engines and railways. To speak of Art for Art's sake is surely no more unreasonable than to speak of engineering for engineering's sake, or architecture for architecture's sake. A great church may be erected ad majorem Dei gloriam; a fine road or bridge may be designed for the service of man. Nevertheless, cathedrals do not get themselves built by meditation on the glory of God, nor bridges by the love of humanity, but by an instructed acquaintance with the properties of stone and brick, of iron and steel, of weights, stability, and construction. I do not know whether the men who poised the towers of Lincoln on their hill-throne, and those who pointed the windows of Chartres, the men who threaded the arches of Waterloo Bridge, and the men who drew the rampart of Assouan athwart the Nile flood—I do not know whether these or any of them often paused in their work to think out its inner and its ultimate significance. But I do not imagine they did. The genius of the great craftsman, whether he work with metal or clay or words, is, like all genius, mostly unconscious: an emanation from the immanent and universal mind which it is given to him to translate into articulate forms. So it is with the artist, the musician. He attends to his technique, his harmonies, his line, his color. His conscious will is mainly directed to the utmost mastery of his medium and the right economy of his resources. For that purpose were his ten talents given unto him. In that sense he does well to follow Art for Art's sake; and if he does so faithfully, the ethics of the case will take care of themselves.

Such was Whistler's conception of his task. His life was a protest against defective workmanship caused, as he thought, by subservience to popular conventions and uninstructed sentiment. The artist, he held, was a scientific expert who worked by rule and system; and, being an expert, he could only be tested by technical canons, and judged according to the opinion of those who had acquired an adequate knowledge through practice. The ignorant critic, who estimated pictures by the attractiveness of their subject or by the moral lessons they were presumed to convey, was no more entitled to be heard than if he dogmatised on mathematics or astronomy. Ruskin, he said, might possibly make a desirable professor of ethics or of economics; as a professor of art he was trying to teach something he was himself unable to perform. What right had he to criticise the painting of a picture when he could not paint one himself? What had his morals, his history, his philosophy, his rhetoric to do with the matter? It was the amateur, again, opposed to the practitioner. The British public could not and does not understand this attitude. It did and does believe in respectable amateurishness. A nation, which leaves amateurs to manage its politics, amateurs to control its armies, and amateurs to administer its subject provinces, cannot be expected to take its art criticism quite seriously. We are under the impression that the English gentleman with a high character, amiable manners, and some general culture, can dispense with special training, whether he is engaged in managing a public office or in considering a picture. Against this temper, with its loose thinking and slovenly dogmatism, Matthew Arnold protested, as it manifested itself in education, in literature, and in society. Whistler was on the same side as Arnold, within his own sphere. He refused to meddle with what he did not understand. A lady once asked him, as he listened silently to a hot discussion between a Catholic, a Calvinist, and a Neo-Pagan, what religion he believed in. "I, madam?" he answered. "I am an amateur." There was truth as well as wit in the answer. Whistler's religion was the zealous pursuit of his art. There he was a priest, dedicated to the service of the altar; and he laid claim to a power of interpreting the scriptures and delivering the sacred message which the laity could not possess.

Like all rebels, he grew to enjoy the act of revolt so much that he often forgot its purpose. The calculated eccentricities of his personal conduct were, it seems to me, part of his protest against the bourgeois Philistinism of a society whose conventionality was making life as dull and muddy and coarsely colored as its art. There was an impression, I believe, that Whistler was a late example of the artistic Bohemianism which was rampant in Paris when he was a student there with Du Maurier, a survival of that gay, irresponsible order described in "Trilby." But Whistler's irregularities were certainly not the result of a want of self-control. He did not give himself to drink or dissipation or any kind of physical self-indulgence; he set up, indeed, a rather severe standard of personal taste, refinement, and discipline: the demands of his work, which he fulfilled with remorseless fidelity, imposed on him a toilsome asceticism. In the ordinary obligations of life—as son, brother, husband—he was kindly, generous, and affectionate. It is true he was always quarrelling, and he could not, as he bitterly said, afford to keep a friend. That was due not so much to selfishness as to sensitiveness. He was a vain man, with the love of sympathy and the desire for approbation abnormally developed. He wanted to be noticed, admired, appreciated. The neglect and the obloquy he affected to ignore hurt and nettled him. His angry wit, his barbed and stinging satire were the cry of a wounded soul. A greater character would have cared nothing for all this and gone on quietly with his work, to its and his own great gain. Whistler cared so much that he was driven to extravagance and perversion. Because the public would not accept his art he insisted that the public in every period and country was indifferent to all art. "There never was an artistic age," he said; "there never was an artistic people." Art, that taught the Greek the measured rhythm of balanced limb and flowing drapery, that "dipped the Spaniard's brush in light and air": art has her intimacies with the man not with the multitude. Only the few, the elect, can approach the goddess; the others do not matter. Because his popular rivals had vitiated popular taste by sentiment and pictorial anecdote, Whistler declared that painting should be independent not merely of sentiment, but also of morality, of social feeling, of nationality, of the passions, the emotions, the good and evil that make up life. It was not concerned with things as they are which is metaphysics, nor with things as they might be which is idealism or ethics, but only with things as they appear to the educated eye. Portraits, for instance, ought not to be painted "life-size," for no man, he said, is ever seen life-size, except, perhaps, a recruit when he is being measured by the recruiting sergeant.

In the ardour of his protest Whistler went too far, and was in reality false to his own principles. His limitations were not due to the theory of Art for Art but to his own restriction of the theory. He seems really to have been able to conceive the sitter in his studio as a mere combination of certain lines and lights and shades and colors. A man posing for a portrait may be an arrangement in black and brown: but he is also something more—a human being with all the records of failure, success, love, hate, endeavor, and a complex historic and sociological environment, written on his face and form. These are part of the things seen as much as the pattern the legs make in the light and the shadows playing round the head. Rembrandt, Velasquez, Franz Hals, Holbein, saw them; Whistler did not, or, at least, when he saw them as he did in the "Carlyle" and the Portrait of his Mother, it was against his own will and his own conscious plan. The inspiration within him would not always be denied; but he did his best to repress it, and he succeeded so well that, with all his superb technique, his distinction, and his accomplishment, he contrived to miss his place beside the greater masters whom he emulated and admired.

SIDNEY LOW.

Letters to the Editor.

REMEDIES FOR UNEMPLOYMENT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—No one pretends that Monday's debate on unemployment was either soul-filling or satisfactory. There was a decided air of unreality about the whole business.

The Government deserve to be heartily commended for the promptitude with which they have brought forward their schemes for temporary relief. But something more is required, in anticipation of the coming winter.

An amendment of the Unemployed Workmen Act of 1905 is needed so that local authorities may have greater latitude in their efforts to meet local needs.

We too often forget that, however excellent proposals may be in the gross, they have to be worked out in detail. A certain degree of elasticity is necessary to suit the different local conditions.

To ensure more local freedom, and, may I add, more local responsibility, an immediate amendment of the Act of 1905 is absolutely necessary.

The Act permits a local authority and its distress committee to make provisions for the establishment charges and for the purchase of land for relief works; but they may not provide the means for carrying on the schemes.

This is rather a fictitious distinction, which is bound to hamper, if, indeed, it does not sterilise, local action.

The admitted difficulty in many quarters is not so much the getting of money as the provision of suitable work.

I am not unmindful of the economic objections to providing for relief works out of the rates, but we are doing it now in the most uneconomical way.

We are encouraging schemes, and failing to provide the wherewithal to carry them on. Endeavoring to protect a principle by a fine drawn distinction, we are stultifying local action.

An illustration of this comes from Scotland. The Edinburgh Distress Committee have started a farm colony sixteen miles from the city. It is said to be quite a successful experiment. The Town Council has advanced the money for the purchase of the land. But a claim has been made on the town council by the distress committee for repayment of a sum of £4,600 disbursed by them. There is no dispute on the merits. The necessity for the expenditure is not questioned, but the town council is advised that to the extent of £3,700 that expenditure can not be met by them under the provisions of the Act. Of that amount £2,846 is charged against the rates in the committee's accounts, for revenue expenditure on the farm colony. A deadlock has ensued which may seriously affect the operations of the distress committee for the coming winter.

Let us face the facts. From a strictly economic standpoint expenditure of this nature is more easily justified than the premature initiation of loan works on capital account which may take many years for completion.

Then, again, many local authorities have, for years back, in times of necessity, made provision for the unemployed in winter by grants from burgh funds and by putting the unemployed on to ordinary corporation work, in city gardens, and on city streets, adding temporarily to their staff for this purpose.

Is it, therefore, unreasonable to ask that the restrictions on the action of local authorities under the Act of 1905 should be removed so far as the purposes for which expenditure may be made is concerned?

The field of their activity may be enlarged to include provision—with the necessary financial limitations—for the following purposes.

(1) Establishment charges, including expenses in respect of labor exchanges.

(2) Expenses of emigration and removal of the unemployed from one area to another.

(3) Expenses for the acquisition of land.

(4) The expense of working labor colonies, or the provision of other suitable work.

The first three objects are already provided for under the Act of 1905.

With regard to financial checks under the Act, a local authority may contribute to an amount, in any one year, not exceeding the equivalent of the produce of a halfpenny rate This sum may be increased to the extent of the equivalent of a penny rate, with the consent of the Local Government Board. If the Act of 1905 were amended as suggested, the financial provisions might be extended to give power to the local authority to contribute to the extent of a penny rate with any expenditure proposed in excess of this amount to require the sanction of the Local Government Board. The Local Government Board could either sanction the expenditure, as a local charge, or provide the necessary funds from the Government grants.

By this means, with a joint responsibility, we would have beneficial co-operation between the local and central authority. It is well to bear in mind that the local authority best knows the local needs, and that they ought to be made to feel their responsibility in the matter. We ought to link up this chain of responsibility. May I add that grants from the Imperial Exchequer are more inequitable in their incidence, and are likely to be less economical in their results than rate aid, which, after all, emphasises local responsibility, and is the best guarantee for proper expenditure.—Yours, &c.,

GEORGE MCCRAE.

House of Commons,
October 28th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Returning home after a late autumn holiday in which opportunities occurred for talking over the terrible question of unemployment and of also personally seeing a fringe of the labor trouble, I venture to make one or two reflections and suggestions in the hope that they may, perhaps, be of some small benefit. In the first place, it seems impossible to doubt the asserted fact, that in the growing army of the unemployed there is a very real percentage of those persons who do not want work, but who purpose to live on any provision (national or local) which may be made for those who desire work but can neither find it nor get it. The letter narrating "a little incident of unemployment" which Mr. John Murray wrote a few weeks ago to the "Spectator" is only too true. This, it will be remembered, was a case of a lady requiring extra labor in laying out a new garden, and who made application to the Central Bureau in Glasgow for seven laborers, no technical skill required; the pay to be 18s. a week. After some delay four men were sent; of these, two returned at once; the third made use of his return ticket after putting in four days' work; one only stuck to the job, and he had once been a gardener.

It becomes, primarily, a question of separating the wheat from the tares. How is it to be done, so that the genuine out-of-work does not suffer from the presence of the mixed multitude of incapables and wastrels who have joined their ranks, and hang on to their skirts? It has been suggested to me that the method given below, and which has been found helpful for another purpose, might be utilised. So much out of employment springs from the customary ebb and flow of this or that particular trade or calling. An employer, for example, keeps a weekly wage-sheet, and when the works are in full swing employs, say, 500 men; but a slack time comes and he can only find work for 300 of them. The remaining 200 are only struck off the wage-sheet because there is no employment and hence no wages for them, though in some few months' time, perhaps, their services will be required again, or others will have to be called in. The suggestion is, not to strike off their names, but keep them on the sheet, leaving the weekly spaces empty or starred. The men are not discharged, they are still on the books of the firm, but owing to circumstances they are available for employment elsewhere, either temporarily till they are wanted again, or till their names are transferred to the books of some other firm. Let the employer be requested to send in a list of men he can spare to some public authority, so that it may be at the disposal of other employers, of the labor exchange bureau, of this and that public body which employs labor. Then the men requiring work should be the first called upon to give it. There will be no inquiries to be made, as they bear the genuine stamp upon them, having never been deprived of their position as part and parcel of a certain source of employment, though, unfortunately, actual work was, for the time, suspended. To carry such a plan out, it would also be necessary to relax some of the trade union rules and regulations re employment, but in times of pressure, hard and fast custom would naturally and reasonably stand aside. Boards of wages, &c., combinations of masters and men, would gradually take the place of the present constant war between capital and labor, which is so contrary to the spirit of the religion of Christ.

For the incompetent (too frequently so rendered by the curse of drink) and the wastrel, other measures should be taken under the Poor Law; but we must be careful that such did not interfere with the work of the genuine and capable seekers of work. Invalidity could be insured against under a national system. But in all cases there must be the right—the right of justice—that the wheat be dealt with separately from the tares. The public are sympathetic and human hearts are burning to check and destroy the ravages of hunger and want that are threatening our brothers and sisters and the little children, so near the heaven we, some of us, feel at times so far from. But public opinion is surely on the right tack in demanding that justice shall be done to the bonâ-fide workers first. Any sapping of the manly independence by which a man relies on himself, given the opportunity, must inevitably tend to loss of the fine gold of character which is the nation's greatest asset. No mere humanising of the Poor Law will avail; on the contrary, it may cause mischief in its train.—Yours, &c.,

J. FROME WILKINSON.

Barley Rectory, Herts,
October 28th, 1908.

BAD HARVESTS AND UNEMPLOYMENT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—It is not I who have found myself in difficulties in this controversy, and if I have gone into the "bush," it was because it was necessary to follow Mr. Hobson there. Only in the mental confusion of the money question can he maintain the semblance of supporting his views. If anyone fixes his mind on the actual commodities (after the manner of the older economists who fought and won the battle of Free Trade) it is palpable that a diminished yield will not afford as much employment for its handling and development as the more abundant harvest. Mr. Hobson it is who asks us to put our minds on money; and he repeats that if only the scarcity will raise the price so as to make the money total the same there will be no diminution of demand by the agricultural interest. I repeat that he is wrong. For money got in that way will not continue to go round as it should within the circle of the agricultural interest. One section gets the money and does not pass it on. In effect, that is less money; certainly it is less demand; which is the point at issue. To this there are very important corollaries. I am ready to fight the question to a finish, either in the "bush" or in the open, but I fear you will not tolerate the lengthening of this correspondence.—Yours, &c.,

F. U. LAYCOCK.

Sheffield, October 26th, 1908.

MRS. FAWCETT AND WOMEN'S SUFFRAGE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—My attention has only just been called to an amazing misrepresentation which appeared in a letter in the columns of THE NATION of October 17th, to the effect that I and others have abandoned "the narrow principle" of the suffrage for women on the same terms on which it is granted to men. This principle, the abolition of the sex disqualification for the franchise, is, and always has been, considered fundamental by the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies of which I am the President.

In the autumn, at the instance of Miss Llewellyn Davies and Mrs. Vaughan Nash, officers of the Women's Co-operative Guild, I signed a letter for the National Union urging Mr. Asquith to define what he meant by his declaration on women's suffrage to the deputation of Liberal M.P.'s in May, requesting him to embody clauses in his promised Reform Bill dealing with women's suffrage, and not to wait for such clauses to be added by private members. I did not, and do not, recognise in this any abandonment of the principle on which the National Union is founded.—Yours, &c.,

MILLICENT GARRETT FAWCETT.

October 26th, 1908.

THE TURKISH VIEW OF WOMEN.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I should have thought that the difference between a belief that women have no souls at all and a belief that they have souls of an inferior order is too obvious to need elaboration. Had Mr. Edwin Pears attributed to Mohammedans the latter doctrine, I should have had no cause to dissent from him. As it is, he has committed himself to the statement that the ordinary Mohammedan holds the former doctrine—a statement which, I repeat, is wholly erroneous. My contention is that this doctrine has never formed part of the creed of Islam, but that it is a mistake propagated by Christian writers. In proof of my contention I quoted from Lady Mary Wortley Montagu a passage which went quite far enough for my purpose. I am glad that Mr. Pears has found my quotation accurate. The supplementary quotation he gives is, I submit, irrelevant to our discussion. The point at issue between us is whether Islam recognises that women have souls or not, and on this point I beg to reinforce Lady

Montagu's evidence with a citation of another eighteenth century witness—no less an authority than George Sale, "our honest and learned translator" of the Koran, as Gibbon very justly describes him. Sale, in his "Preliminary Discourse" to that translation, emphatically declares:—

"Before we quit this subject it may not be improper to observe the falsehood of a vulgar imputation on the Mohammedans, who are by several writers reported to hold that women have no souls, or, if they have, that they will perish, like those of brute beasts, and will not be rewarded in the next life. But whatever may be the opinion of some ignorant people among them, it is certain that Mohammed had too great a respect for the fair sex to teach such a doctrine."

The Koran, in fact, contains many passages proving that the Prophet was very far from countenancing so ungallant a belief. But it will be noticed that Sale admits the possibility that such a belief may be entertained by "some ignorant people." If Sir Edward Malet, as quoted by Mr. Pears, heard the Khedive of Egypt giving expression to this belief, that would only show that the Khedive was one of those "ignorant people." And in this connection it is interesting to refer to Djevdet Pasha, the well-known Turkish Minister of Justice and author of the "Tarihi-Osmani," who suggests that the curious notion that Mohammedans deny to women the possession of a soul may have been derived from the Nusrayrees of Syria—a population Mohammedan only in appearance, but secretly holding a good many "strange doctrines." If it is so, an Egyptian's opinion on the subject might easily be traced to this unorthodox source.

Now, the evidence of a Turk like Djevdet Pasha on the matter of Turkish belief is, to my mind, worth a whole library of second-hand literature. But Djevdet Pasha does not stand alone. I have before me a recent publication by another Turk ("The Crescent versus the Cross," by Halil Halid. London: Luzac & Co. 1907), and I find in it a lengthy chapter devoted to "the position of Muslim women." To that chapter I refer Mr. Pears and all those who wish to be informed as to the real Turkish attitude towards this interesting question. Here I shall content myself with mentioning only that Halil Halid agrees with me in describing the notion under discussion as "an old fable," and in maintaining that "no Mussulman will ever dispute" that women have souls, or that they are entitled to "the joys of eternal life in the Paradise of Islam."—Yours, &c.,

G. F. Abbott.

Royal Societies Club,
St. James's Street, S.W.,
October 25th, 1908.

SMALL HOLDINGS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—May I again ask permission to call the attention of your readers to conditions created by the mal-administration of the Small Holdings Act, and suggest a course of action? I will take an actual case as my text.

David Nicholls, a Kent laborer, who applied for land under the Act, is about to be evicted from his home. Land belonging to the landlord of his cottage was, to Nicholls' undoing, suggested as suitable, and the man was forthwith served with notice to quit. Magisterial proceedings and a High Court Appeal delayed the matter for three months, thus giving the County Council, and the Board of Agriculture, ample time to provide the applicant with the land he was promised. But both authorities contented themselves with futile negotiations. And now Nicholls' home and life are to be sacrificed. His is a pathetic figure. A decent, reliable, and capable man, he must leave a village in which he has lived for thirty years, the first victim of the Government's policy of delay.

This is not a solitary case. Even in his own district three men, similarly situated, who have had the rashness to apply for land, are oppressed by fear of a similar fate. And ten men, I am told, in the adjoining parish, who have been awaiting this decision have decided not to apply for holdings.

A few weeks past an oldish laborer was describing to me how, at the time of Joseph Arch, the men of these same villages struggled by combination to free themselves from this intolerable servitude. They were beaten, he explained, by the farmers, who picked out their leaders one by one and crushed out their independence. Exactly the same thing is now occurring; something must be done, and that quickly. The men are being forced back, and the hope which sprang up when this Act was passed is quickly dying down.

There is only one way of dealing with this situation: The people must and will combine, but their combinations will fail unless such of us as have understanding, wealth, or energy help in our various ways. For the moment the men's combinations in this district—the land clubs—are holding together, though the railway company has harassed us by preventing their men from giving help.

But our federation—the Land Club Union—definitely wants more money, not only to help Nicholls and others who are likely to be similarly treated, but also to enable us to prepare full reports of the various cases of mal-administration, and to impress these cases upon the Government and the public, through deputations to London and other methods. We want help, too, to strengthen our organisation, which now includes some three hundred working-men, until we can break down the combined opposition and indifference of landlords, farmers, and authorities. I may say that so far as I have been able to ascertain, no land has been obtained in this neighbourhood, nor has any practical step been taken towards providing a single holding. The struggle must be carried on; and—and this is the great point—it wants a far bigger organisation than ours.—Yours, &c.,

Montague Fordham,
Hon. Sec. Land Club Union.

Limpsfield, Surrey,
October 26th, 1908.

GRAMMATICAL.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—If any other reader has derived from the grammar of "Grammaticulus" as much simple fun as I have done, he has not banged sixpence for nothing. It is an exquisite notion that we should perpetuate in the twentieth and succeeding centuries the grammatical pranks of the Elizabethans, whose accidence has to be expounded to us by the learned. I am a touch more familiar than "Grammaticulus" supposes with the definitions and explanations of the dictionaries. My own dictionary, a voluminous and very excellent one, but not impeccable, after stating that the word "averse" includes the idea of "from"—which it most unquestionably does—goes on to favor the use of "averse to." I am "adverse to" this advice. If, however, "averse to," "different to," the participle that has no subject, and the solecisms innumerable of the Elizabethans are styles agreeable to "Grammaticulus," he is plainly welcome to set the teeth of compositors on edge with them in every printing-office in London.—Yours, &c.,

The Writer of the Article.

October 28th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—The writer of the article under the above heading in your issue of the 10th instant, has gibbetted a goodly number of distinguished authors, with proofs in support, for violation of the rule of concord—in other words, for using plural pronouns in relation to singular nouns.

To say nothing of the difficulty of distinguishing in English between singular nouns that convey singularity, and those that convey plurality of idea, there are cases where the use of a pronoun differing in number from the substantive to which it relates, though obviously incorrect from the point of view of grammatical construction, is not only admissible, but soars from grammar into rhetoric, and takes on the dignity and elegance of a figure of speech known as syllepsis.

Possessing, unfortunately, little or no knowledge of English literature, I am unable to quote any examples of syllepsis from English writers, but here is one from Racine:

"Entre le pauvre et vous, vous prendrez Dieu pour juge;
"Vous souvenant, mons fils, que, caché sous ce lin,
"Comme eux vous fûtes pauvre, et comme eux orphelin."

Can any of the incriminated passages quoted by the writer of "Grammaticals" invoke this figure of speech in self-defence?

If there were an English Academy qui faisait autorité in all matters relating to the language, it would, long ere this, have settled the question affecting the preposition by which the word "averse" and its derivatives ought to be followed. The note in Webster appears to have reason on its side, so, until further and brighter light is thrown on the subject, one had better follow Webster, who says:—

"The affection of the mind signified by the word 'averse' being exerted toward the object of dislike, the word should be followed by to."

Kindred terms, for purposes of analogy, are dislike, contrary, repugnant (which are always followed by "to"), and not different, which requires to be followed by "from."

Will the writer of "Grammaticals" kindly say, for the benefit of willing learners, what is the matter with the following sentence which he quotes from Leslie Stephen?—

"The rational and the emotional nature have such intricate relations," &c.

And when he has time, one would be grateful to him for an article on amphibologies. Examples of this blunder abound even in the best English writing, and a collection of them would not only constitute as powerful an indictment against style as false concords do against grammars, but would be vastly more amusing.—Yours, &c.,

D. N. Samson.

74, Grosvenor Road, Highbury, N.
October 27th, 1908.

["Nature" should obviously be "natures."—Ed., Nation.]

"THE GOSPEL OF AGRICULTURE."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Your review last week under this heading includes charges affecting English farmers which, I think,, warrant a word in reply. I am an old practical agriculturist. Among the potent causes of the apathy farmers show in the matter of experimental progress, is the insecurity of tenant right in permanent improvements.

This not only prevents tree planting, draining, and other solid advancements, but checks the enterprise that would try the suggestions of scientific agriculturists. The latter lose much of their influence owing to their want of practical knowledge of what I call "Bread and cheese" farming!

Scientists seldom understand the nature of the difficulties with which a farmer has to contend. They write learnedly and scientifically from the academic point of view; but the touch of nature's precariousness rarely reaches them. They are accurate and informing about ideal farming; but of the crushing disappointments brought about by the action of irregular seasons on the various soils with their differing aspects they know but little. The fitfulness of markets and prices add mental strain to the physical troubles with which all farmers have to contend.

The crowd of importunate bagmen, each with an "infallible" manure, a "marvellous" cake, or a "charming fat-producing" spice, help to produce mistrust in "miracles," however scientific.

Here, in Somerset, during the last fifty years, the whole system of farming has changed. Corn, flax, teazles, &c., have ceased to pay; beef and pork are seriously less profitable, and the whole trade of farming has had to be reconstituted. This has been accomplished by accepting changes, greater than any suggested by such scientific dreams as the nitrification of square miles of stubborn soils (a very different thing from an experiment with a quart of earth in a flower pot), and has been brought about by the energetic study of breeds of cattle and stock of all kinds, the acceptance of exact and scientific methods of cheese and butter making, and entirely modern methods of harvesting, so that the dairy farmers will now stand comparison with those of any other part of the world.—Yours, &c.,

Pylle, Somerset, John Higgins.
October 26th, 1908.

PUNISHMENT AND MR. GLADSTONE'S BILL.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—May I make some remarks on the letters of Mr. Kolp and Mr. Whale which appear in your last issue?

Mr. Whale tells us that the first object of imprisonment is to prevent the repetition by the same criminal of the like acts, the second object is to deter others, and the third object is to attempt the reform of the prisoner so far as can be done consistently with the first and second objects. As regards what the objects of imprisonment ought to be, he is, perhaps, not very far from the truth, but as regards the objects actually pursued, the third might be almost wholly struck out. With regard to Mr. Whale's qualification I may remark that reformation is always consistent with his first object—the prevention of crime by the reformed person. In fact, it is (when it can be effected) the best mode of prevention. But in the case of habitual or professional criminals, we have not hitherto attempted this, and when Mr. Whale writes of professional criminals, "if they cannot be cured, it is surely just to detain them," he forgets that we have not made any effort to cure them—at least if he uses "cure" in the sense of "reform," not "deter."

Hitherto our great object so far as the criminal is concerned has been to deter him from repeating the crime. Reformation has only been tried on a small scale with the younger offenders. The first part of Mr. Gladstone's Bill proposes to extend the present provisions. But the object of the second part of his Bill is simply to render the criminal unable to repeat the offence by keeping him in a place where he cannot offend. This is to be done for the protection of the public. There is no provision in the Bill for "providing ways and means for reforming" habitual offenders; and if we entertained a hope of employing such means effectually, why should we defer the employment of them until a fourth conviction when reformation will have become more difficult than at an earlier stage? What the Bill proposes to do is very different. It seeks to provide for the liberation of a habitual thief who has reformed without the employment of any reformative method. The moral leper is to be periodically examined by the priests and to be liberated when they pronounce him clean, but no curative treatment will at any time be resorted to.

The indefinite sentence aims simply at protecting the public by keeping the prisoner in a place where he cannot offend. If he becomes incapable of offending from age or ill-health he may be set free. As we are going to provide against the prisoner's future depredations by disablement there is no use, so far as he is concerned, in passing a deterrent sentence on him. The object of that sentence—unexplained, I think, by the Home Secretary—can only be to deter others. But while preventive detention does not need any severity—unless what is required to compel the prisoner to perform remunerative labor—I do not find this laid down in the Bill. The prisoner is to be treated in the same manner as if in penal servitude, except in so far as the Home Secretary may think fit from time to time at his own discretion to relax the rules in convict prisons. He is not bound to relax them at all.—Yours, &c.,

October 27th, 1908. M. A.

Poetry.

RENCONTRE.

He spoke of God, the final goal,
He talked, my friend, of God on earth,
Of God within each human soul,
Of spiritual birth;
And through the darkness, as he spoke,
The footsteps of a stranger broke.

We heard his slow uncertain tramp,
We moved aside to give him room,
We saw him slouch beneath the lamp,
Rough hewn against the gloom,
And on his shoulder, as he stepped,
With rosy cheeks an infant slept.

With bitter oaths, that fled the light,
We saw him stumble as he went,
"My friend," I said, "if you are right, Behold God immanent."
"Nay, look," said he, "ere he be gone,
How sure and still the child sleeps on."

H. H. Bashford.

The World of Books.

THURSDAY NIGHT.

MESSRS. BELL are to be congratulated on the completion of their excellent edition of Swift's prose works. The final volume, issued this week, contains a full bibliography of all editions of Swift's writings, whether separate or collected, published before the end of the eighteenth century, an essay on the Portraits of Swift and Stella by the late Sir Frederick Falkiner, and an essay embodying much new information by the Dean of St. Patrick's on the relations between Swift and Stella. Dean Bernard inclines to the view that Swift and Stella had been secretly married by Bishop Ashe in 1716, although it is impossible to bring evidence amounting to a demonstration in support of it. He agrees with Sheridan in thinking the marriage to be a compromise between Swift's wishes and those of Stella. Swift was willing to give her the assurance that he would never marry anyone else, but he was inflexible in his determination that they should live apart, as heretofore, and also that their union should not be acknowledged to the world. We are able to announce that the much-needed edition of Swift's correspondence, the plan of which was interrupted by Mr. C. Litton Falkiner's tragic death in an Alpine accident last summer, will be brought out under the supervision of Mr. Elrington Ball. When this is done we shall at last have a worthy monument of one of the greatest masters of English prose, if, indeed, he is not the very first.

* * *

MR. ALFRED NOYES' coming biography of William Morris in the "English Men of Letters" series deals chiefly with Morris's work as a poet, and contains an interesting parallel between him and Tennyson. In turning to the Middle Ages, says Mr. Noyes, Morris adopted "a convention for himself which will, finally, give him a lower, though not less secure, place than that of Tennyson." Tennyson's strength lies in the fact that he grappled directly with the intellectual problems of his generation, and although we have in some ways outgrown those problems, he "will inevitably be regarded as the broadest and fullest voice of his own century." Morris's method was at once broader and less practical, but he did not take up medievalism in the spirit of a mere æsthete seeking an anodyne or of a scholar composing skilful exercises. "There was no preciosity in his choice of the Middle Ages as his 'form of style.' . . . His work is suffused with the eternal light of that vision of an ultimately reconciled and ransomed world to which Shelley attained and Keats was climbing when he murmured, 'Beauty is truth, truth beauty!'—the vision shadowed forth in sign and symbol by all the prophets of all the ages; the unconquerable and inviolable hope of mankind, that the desert and solitary place shall at last break into singing, and the wilderness blossom as a rose, and sorrow and sighing flee away." These extracts from Mr. Noyes' concluding chapter promise a sympathetic study of a robust figure, whose achievement as a poet has been overlaid by his other activities.

* * *

THERE still remain a number of writers unrepresented in the "English Men of Letters" series who might well be included. Mr. Henry James's biography of Hawthorne shows that "English" does not exclude "American," but Emerson, Longfellow, Whitman, and Oliver Wendell Holmes are all absent. Then William Blake, Smollett, Izaak Walton, George Herbert, Bishop Butler, William Law, White of Selborne, Charlotte Brontë, Newman, Keble, Borrow, John Stuart Mill, and R. L. Stevenson, make up a fairly long list of exclusions. Books on Mrs. Gaskell by Mr. Clement Shorter, on Charles Kingsley by Mr. G. K. Chesterton, and on Ben Jonson by Professor Gregory Smith, have been announced for some time, but do not seem likely to be published in the immediate future.

* * *

A NEW volume of essays by Miss Agnes Repplier will be published next week by Messrs. Gay and Handcock. It is called "A Happy Half-Century," and deals with the period from about 1775 to 1825, an age in which Miss Repplier thinks literary fame was very easily won. Among the books that made their authors famous during this half-century were Glover's dreary epic "Leonidas," Mrs. Chapone's "Letters on the Improvement of the Mind," Darwin's "Botanic Garden," and Mrs. Charlotte Smith's "Emeline," a novel which procured rapid advancement in the Indian service for the author's son. "We sigh," says Miss Repplier, "to think how many ladies became famous against their wills a hundred and fifty years ago, and how hard it is now to raise our aspiring heads." This period, which Miss Repplier calls "the age of the accursed annual," is admirably suited to her good-natured satire and witty and allusive style.

* * *

THE literary supplement of "The New York Times" states that Mr. Egan, the American Minister to Denmark, is at work on a volume of Shakespearian studies that promises to contain some fresh revelations concerning the sources of many episodes in the plays. Mr. Egan was compelled to re-model one of his articles—that on "Danish Influence on Shakespeare"—in consequence of some studies made by Baron Palle de Rosenkrantz into the relations between Shakespeare and two Danish diplomatists in London during the reign of James I.—namely, Rosencrantz and Guildenstern. The pleading of Hermione in "A Winter's Tale" is also declared by Mr. Egan to have been suggested by an English contemporary broadside ballad on the trial of Anne Boleyn.

* * *

IN the preface to "Some Eminent Victorians," a book of recollections to be published next week by Messrs. Duckworth, Mr. J. Comyns Carr describes himself as "still an impenitent Victorian." Neither in art or letters does the more instant appeal of a later day affect him so forcibly as did the heroes of an earlier generation. This is the correct temper for a volume of personal reminiscences, and as the men of whom Mr. Carr writes include Dickens, Tennyson, Browning, John Bright, Dr. Martineau, William Morris, R. L. Stevenson, Rossetti, Watts, Burne-Jones, Millais, Whistler, and Irving, he has good grounds for his praise of the Victorian age. "I am prepared," he says, "to accept lightly enough the criticism that probably awaits me, that the heroes whom I have worshipped are no longer the heroes of to-day."

* * *

THE issue this week of cheap editions of two such books as "The Letters of Queen Victoria" and Lord Morley's "Life of Gladstone" is a notable event in the history of publishing. The former work runs to nearly 1,500 pages, and can be had in three volumes at the very low price of six shillings for all three. "The Life of Gladstone" is slightly larger in bulk, but appears in two volumes at five shillings. Both books are excellently produced, and reflect the greatest credit upon Mr. Murray and the proprietors of the "Daily Chronicle," to whom their publication is due. Possibly this is but the first step towards a general lowering of the price of books, though it would be obviously impossible to expect anything like as great a reduction as has been made in these two instances.

* * *

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

"Baldassare Castiglione, the Perfect Courtier: His Life and Letters, 1478-1529." By Julia Cartwright (Mrs. Ady). Murray, 2 vols, 30s. net.)

"The Life of Henry Pelham, Fifth Duke of Newcastle, 1811-1864." By John Martineau. (Murray, 12s. net.)

"Henry Stuart, Cardinal of York, and His Times." By Alice Shield. (Longmans, 12s. 6d. net.)

"The Russian Conquest of the Caucasus." By John F. Baddeley. (Longmans, 21s. net.)

"Old and Odd Memories." By the Hon. Lionel A. Tollemache. (Arnold, 12s. 6d. net.)

"The Life of Mirabeau." By S. G. Tallentyre. (Smith, Elder, 10s. 6d. net.)

"Woman Through the Ages." By Emil Reich. (Methuen, 2 vols., 21s. net.)

"Lauzun: Courtier and Adventurer. The Life of a Friend of Louis XV." By Mary F. Sanders. (Hutchinson, 2 vols., 24s.)

"A History of English Cathedral Music." By John S. Bumpus. (Laurie, 2 vols., 6s. net each.)

"Eighteen Years in Uganda and East Africa." By Alfred R. Tucker, Bishop of Uganda. (Arnold, 2 vols., 30s.)

"Lewis Rand." By Mary Johnson. (Constable, 6s.)

"The Hermit and the Wild Woman." By Edith Wharton. (Macmillan, 6s.)

"Les Détours du Cœur." Nouvelles. Par Paul Bourget. (Paris: Plon-Nourrit, 3fr. 50.)

Reviews.

THE MISTRESS OF HOLLAND HOUSE.*

The Lady Holland with whom we are familiar from the descriptions of her guests, or, we might say, her victims, is a tyrannical and formidable figure. Ugo Foscolo, who was ready to go to Hell with the master, declared that he would not go to Heaven with the mistress of Holland House. The stories of her overbearing temper fill the records of the time, and many an oppressed celebrity must have been inclined to follow the example of Lord Melbourne, who rose from her table declaring, "I am damned if I will dine with you at all." The two volumes published by Lord Ilchester reveal to us a different Lady Holland. It is true that the writer of this journal can say sharp things and pass bitter judgments, that she has a good deal of confidence in her own opinion, and that that opinion is readily given on questions in which it could not pretend to carry any special authority. But if the Lady Holland we all know sometimes peeps out in the journal, there is almost a submissive and docile tone in these pages, and the essentially affectionate nature of a woman who in later life was more feared than loved continually betrays itself. It must be remembered, of course, that the journal stops short at 1811, and that it includes the unhappy years which Lady Holland spent with a husband who neither received nor deserved a wife's love or respect. If Lord Holland's good nature helped in the end to spoil her, the contrast between the two husbands was well calculated to draw out all the tenderness of her nature.

Lady Holland, the daughter of Richard Vassall of Jamaica, was born in 1771, and married at the age of fifteen to Sir Godfrey Webster, of Battle Abbey, in Sussex. Miss Vassall, who was to come into £7,000 a year at her father's death, was a considerable catch. Her husband was twenty-three years older than she was, and his wife's repugnance to the marriage and her surroundings was not softened by the overshadowing neighbourhood of Sir Godfrey Webster's aunt, with whom she kept up an incessant warfare. She hated Battle and her husband's world of country and sporting interests, and at last managed to get her own way and drag him off into a life as distasteful to him as his own life was to her. From 1791 to 1795, when they separated, she was continually abroad, her husband occasionally leaving her to revisit his home. During this time, Lady Webster, keenly though she enjoyed the excitement of travel and the pleasure of visiting the galleries of Italy, was intensely unhappy over her marriage, and she was haunted by the prospect of her ultimate return to Battle. The rights and wrongs of the domestic quarrel need not concern us. It is enough that the two were absolutely incompatible in temper and interests. Lady Webster constantly refers to Sir Godfrey Webster as "my tormentor." At Florence Lady Webster met Lord Holland. "Lord G. Leveson-Gower and Lord Holland came here the day before yesterday. . . . Lord H. is not in the least handsome; he has, on the contrary, many personal defects, but his pleasingness of manner and liveliness of conversation get over them speedily. . . . We all went to the Cocomero and returned here to supper. Lord H. quite delightful; his gaiety beyond anything I ever knew; full of good stories. He seems bent upon politics, and with his eagerness I think it is lucky he is out of the way of saying foolish, violent things." This entry occurs in February, 1794. Their attachment ripened fast, but it was not till 1797 that Sir Godfrey Webster obtained a divorce, and in the same year the Hollands were married. The compensation that Sir Godfrey Webster took for the loss of his wife does not give an attractive impression. He insisted upon having Lady Holland's fortune during his life, leaving her an allowance of £800 a year. Three years later he shot himself, not afflicted by the loss of his wife, but in despair over his losses at play.

Lady Holland's journal only goes down to 1811, and there are considerable lacunae. Some of them are provoking. We pass, for example, from the summer of 1802 to the summer of 1806. Most of that time the Hollands were abroad, but they returned to England in the spring of 1805, and it would have been interesting to have Lady Holland's comments on the making up of the Whig Government. As it is the journal is only resumed just before the death of Fox. That event is described fully and with feeling. Mrs. Creevey declared in a letter published in the Creevey Papers that when Fox, though very ill, was still in London at the end of July, Lady Holland used to plant herself in one of the rooms and that Fox resolutely refused to see her. The journal does not throw very much light on the relations of Lady Holland and her husband's uncle and hero, though it is pretty evident that she rather liked Fox against her will, and that she judged his wife with the severity with which in many quarters she was judged herself. Lord Minto mentioned that Lady Holland did not admire Mrs. Fox and would willingly indulge herself now and then with a fling at her. "One cannot but regret," she writes in her journal, "that such a man is lost to society, for so may his retirement to St. Anne's be called, and the habits of his life when there. Mrs. Armstead, I understand, possesses still those merits which, when united to the attractions of youth, a degree of beauty and much celebrity, placed her above her competitors for the glory of ruining and seducing the giddy youth of the day. She has mildness and little rapacity, but those negative merits, when bereft of the other advantages, constitute but an insipid resource in solitude." Lord Ilchester very rightly quotes in a footnote the very different opinion given by Lord Holland's sister: "Mrs. Fox's patient fortitude, her gentle piety, endear her to me every minute, and, loving her as I do for his sake, still I must do so for her own, for she deserves it." Lady Holland did not much approve of Fox, but whenever she met him she was charmed by him. "Mr. Fox was extraordinarily pleasant." . . . "Mr. Fox is come here to dine at the Whig Club. . . We sit up very late with him: his conversation is always instructive and amusing. He shuns politics as much as I could wish. Criticism, literature, and observations upon character are his chief topics. It is astonishing what a storehouse of knowledge his mind is of every sort from a fairy tale up to a system of philosophy." The entry closes with a sentence that is diverting enough when we remember that the writer used to order poor Lord Holland to be wheeled out of the room. "He set off early the next morning. Mrs. Armstead disapproves of his absence being extended beyond the time she fixes."

Lady Holland liked Fox's society much better than she liked his opinions. Her Journal shows how very little sympathy she had with the principles that were so dear to her husband. In one of the first passages that mention Lord Holland she writes: "His politics are warm in favor of the Revolution, and his principles are strongly tinctured with democracy. It is the brilliant side, and apparently the honest one; all young men are hit by it at first, but when they see more of the world they cure of their honesty and love of liberty." In 1799 she describes a talk she had with Canning, who began by saying how much satisfaction it had given him to act in concert with Lord Holland on the Slave Trade, and went on, as she thought, to sound her on the possibility of influencing his opinions, "but however I may wish, I did not encourage it, as Lord H. is too firmly attached to the obsolete doctrine of Whiggism to be yet open to persuasion." In the same year she mentions that she had refused to see Mackintosh (before his conversion) on account of his principles, "as she had always dreaded her house becoming a foyer of Jacobinism, and invariably set her face against receiving revolutionists." Writing of Lord Westmoreland, she says "he spoke so brutally of some of the wretched prisoners who had escaped his fury that my heart beat high with indignation, and even I for a moment felt a movement in behalf of a nation I never liked." The protest which was signed by Lord Holland (one of the four dissentients) against the Martial Law Bill for Ireland in 1801, she speaks of with impatience as "a foolish protest," which "made a great deal of noise." Altogether, it is evident that if Lady Holland tyrannised over her husband at table, he preserved his independence elsewhere.

The Journal gives us Lady Holland's opinions of most of the persons whom she met frequently. Grey she describes, in the days when she was still Lady Webster, as a man of violent temper and unbounded ambition. In 1798 she writes: "Grey, Tierney, and Erskine dined here last week. Grey was placid in temper and pleasing in his manner—a contrast to the general state of both, as he is usually irritable and supercilious. His heart is warm and excellent, and those few who do not detest him love him with great affection; but he is universally unpopular from the offensiveness of his behaviour." Canning was a constant visitor, though Lady Holland exclaims, and not unnaturally, at his conduct in 1807. Sheridan she likes when she sees him, in spite of herself. Her description of Lord Lansdowne accords with the general impressions that he seems to have left on his contemporaries. "His character is a monstrous compound of virtues and failings; the world has never done him justice for his ample portion of the former. A simple, well-meaning man once said, 'What a pity 'tis that Mr. Fox has no private character, and Lord L. no public one.'" When he was in Ministry many of the squibs of the day had compared him to the Jesuit, Malagrida. Goldsmith, with his usual simplicity, said to him, "I wonder, my lord, at their comparing you to Malagrida, for he was a very honest man." Of Whitbread, she remarks that everybody dislikes him though everybody respects him; while she records many illustrations of the appetite for place and money that distinguished the Grenvilles. There are, as was to be expected, several good stories. When Gilbert Wakefield was tried for his pamphlet, he made a long speech, in which he named Nero, Tiberius, and Polypheme. Lord Kenyon, in summing up, said an English jury would not be browbeaten, notwithstanding all he said about the Three Roman Emperors. "People are very much occupied with the Divorce Bill. Lord H. has felt a shyness in attending the progress of it in the House of Lords. A bishop, full of the subject, last week began talking to him; he expressed his approbation of its becoming a criminal proceeding, and added, 'And do you not think, my lord, that it would diminish the frequency of the vice if parties were condemned to imprisonment for five years?' Lord H. was, of course, puzzled how to answer." It is safe to assume that that was the only occasion on which Lord Holland was puzzled how to answer a speech in the House of Lords.

* "The Journal of Elizabeth, Lady Holland (1791-1811)." Edited by the Earl of Ilchester. Longmans. Two Vols. 21s. net

A FRENCH GULLIVER.*

The modern world of letters contains, now that Samuel Butler is dead, only one great member of the school of allegorists, and he (need we say?) is Anatole France. M. France derives from more than one of his great predecessors —from Rabelais, from Swift, from Voltaire. Like them, he takes sides in politics, interfering vehemently in the actual processes of government without losing his power of perspective, his view of human character and destiny as a whole. Like them, he is an accuser, and would-be destroyer of society as it exists, is penetrated with a sense of its injustice, pities its victims intensely, but gives his commiseration an indirect and ironical, rather than a rhetorical or poetic, form, and is almost equally sceptical of men's beliefs and of their ultimate resources and power of happiness. Like them, he has immense humor, great recklessness, and not a little coarseness of speech, coupled with delightful shyness and refinement of phrasing, a mastery of many styles and effects. Like them, he is a humanitarian, if not a crusader, even while his writing seems to aim at convincing you that history is mainly a dungheap for fools to scratch over. And like them, though much less conspicuously than Swift, he has the faculty of making the grotesque seem simple and real. But then, as with all great writers, Anatole France is individual. He does not possess Swift's fanaticism for naked reality; a Frenchman and a Parisian, he has a tenderness for the forms and graces of life, the coquetry of women, the vanity and self-deception of men. He could never have drawn mankind as Yahoos, and it is characteristic of him that he should choose to dress them as penguins. His stroke is more delicate than Swift's direct and massive method; and while it is directed by the same motives of pity for the inevitable evils of mankind, and their slender equipment of defence against natural catastrophe and human error, its author is not so well guarded from the idealism that Swift kept sternly at bay.

These qualities go to the making of the phantasy which M. France styles "L'Ile des Pingouins." They have not quite produced a masterpiece. About half-way through his book M. France wearies of his puppets, and throws them aside. Penguin Island becomes frankly France and Paris, and its creator plunges straight into a brilliant polemic, in which the familiar figures of Boulanger, Dreyfus, Esterhazy, Mercier, Zola, Delcassé, mingle in a series of farcical and scandalously amusing satires on French politics, and then disappear, like wraiths, in a sombre Wellsian vision of a coming age. So long as M. France interests himself in the development of his penguins from the moment when "ils sortent de la zoologie pour entrer dans l'histoire et dans la théologie," he is at his best, or nearly at his best. When he drops them the inspiration is intermittent. The burlesque of the Dreyfus case, and the Rabelaisian episode of Madame Cérès, are examples of sheer drollery, with an edge of bitter meaning sharpened by one's knowledge that the author was a valiant soldier in the battle of humanity that the French intellectuals fought and won. But they lack the delicate savor that belongs to the fable of the Penguins. There M. France is happy. On that fancy he can lavish his medieval learning, his classicism, his anti-clericalism, his irreverence, his pity for the sufferings of men, his contempt for their masters, spiritual and temporal. The theme is conceived with audacious mockery. St. Mael, a Cambrian saint of great renown, engaged in missionary work among the islands of Brittany, is driven, by a plausible device of Satan, to the arctic islands inhabited by the Penguins. There, aged and half-blinded by the snow and ice, he mistakes the human attitudes and gestures of the birds, and, thinking them to be men, of an unusually reasonable and pacific type, baptises them. His missionary enterprise has grave results. Reported in Paradise, it arouses "neither joy nor grief, but extreme surprise." A conference of saints, martyrs, and doctors of the Church is called to resolve the question how, as penguins do not possess souls, the regenerative effects of baptism can apply to them. A suggestion to create a new race of semi-mortals, after the type of harpies and centaurs, is unfavorably received by saints with special experiences of these indecisive types, and finally, on the proposition of St. Catherine, it is agreed that the penguins are to have souls, but only little ones.

So the island of the penguins is towed away to Europe, and penguin society is started on its long march to perdition. The Devil institutes clothes as one means of corruption, the division of land as another, the equal taxation of rich and poor as a third. The strong man brutalises the new community, the cunning and the unchaste deceive it. Religion founds itself on one kind of delusion, monarchy on a second kind, and the legend of St. Orberose coarsely masks the author's ironical attack on medieval religion and the entire fabric of Catholic faith. Penguinism develops, the people "subscribing by their private misery to the public prosperity." Wars begin, and Penguins discover a "natural enemy" in Porpoises, and Porpoises in Penguins. Through centuries of blood and fire, "the unity of the creeds is maintained." "A constant practice of the Church undoubtedly tended to perpetuate this happy communion of the faithful, for every Penguin who thought differently was immediately burned." A further contribution to progress was made by the religious orders, who, by making palimpsests of Greek and Latin manuscripts, preserved "four thousand copies of the Gospel of St. John." Thus M. France, applying his simple Voltarian formula to medieval belief, art, scholarship, takes his readers in a few seven-leagued strides across the Christian ages, and lands humanity in the sceptical period, with capital predominant, democratic politics in the hands of rascals, society concentrated in vast cities, governed by joyless millionaires, "bald at eighteen," and finally laid in ruins by the anarchists. A second time the tide of barbarism rolls over Europe; a second time it slowly recedes; a second time the idiot-tale of the race of Penguins is told; a second time Paris-Babylon is reared. And with that futile enterprise M. France's ironic Muse ceases to concern herself with the tragic absurdity of human life.

* "L'Ile des Pingouins." Par Anatole France. (Paris: Calmann-Lévy, 3fr. 50.)

HOME LIFE IN ITALY.*

The author of this book has thought it her duty to apologise for "presenting her subject in so incomplete and un-

* "Home Life in Italy: Letters from the Apennines." By Lina Duff Gordon (Mrs. Aubrey Waterfield). Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.

systematic a way." We doubt if her readers will consider any apology needed. The most sensible method of treating so wide and indefinite a subject was to describe as vividly and intimately as possible whatever aspect of Italian life she knew best by personal experience. This happened to be the peasant and middle-class life in the district lying between the Apennines and the sea-coast from Spezia to Pisa. The result is a book of great charm and sincerity, which gives a truer and more intelligible idea of the national character than a more ambitious scheme would have done. Mrs. Waterfield evidently feels a discriminating and humorous sympathy with Italian ways of thinking and acting, and this she expresses admirably in a fresh unacademic style, which is quite her own. The value of the book is much enhanced by the photographs, and by Mr. Waterfield's excellent drawings. It is an unexpected pleasure to find an illustrator who, besides being an artist, is also imaginatively in touch with his subject. Each chapter is introduced by a motto, felicitously chosen from Italian folksongs and proverbs. Thus "Dove il diavolo non può mettere la corna, ci mette la coda" heads a fascinating account of "Messer il Diavolo and ancient rites in Modern Italy."

> "Se canto tutto il giorno il pan mi manca, > E se non canto mi manca ogni cosa," is the appropriate motto for an entertaining chapter on the unconventional ways of servants, and the delightfully human relations which a little good-humored tolerance makes possible with them.

> "But there were limits at which even my Italianised mind rebelled. I objected to Mariannina stirring the soup with my silver paper-knife when the wooden spoons could not be found, or giving the chickens their food in our best flower-vase; still more did we cry out when she pulled up our rosemary cuttings to flavor the roast with, and Adelina brushed my skirts with my husband's hair brushes, and, in a fit of economy, aired the clothes before the drawing-room fire. Perhaps their most irritating fault, shared with many Italians, is a habit of putting everything down to Fate. In this old castle they have the additional resource of spirits; if anything is found broken or is tidied away beyond recall, they declare that i spiriti della Fortezza are the culprits, and there the matter is supposed to end. It comes from a certain laziness of mind; they will work themselves to the bone, but conceive it a labor to go two yards out of their way to fetch a poker when a golf club, happening to be at hand, will perform the office equally well."

But Mrs. Waterfield makes us familiar with the humors and domestic history of many other households besides her own. From the poorest peasants of the hill-country to the amiable old bachelor Marchese in his eighteenth century villa, it is surprising what a number of types she is able to describe without caricature, but sympathetically, from within. Perhaps the most interesting section of the book is the chapter on the emigrants to America, and the ten following, which present under many aspects the life of the peasants, their feasts and fairs, their superstitions and fairy folk-lore, their generally lazy and worthless priests and ill-provided village schools, where yet sometimes an intellectual and high-minded teacher may be found.

> "Not a square inch of ground is ever wasted, and the possible return of the soil, calculated to a nicety, is induced to yield up its full promise by incessant and vigilant toil. But these very people, the backbone of Italy, are those who, for the most part, lead a life of suffering and of grinding poverty. The women are withered at forty, the men toil on like so many driven beasts, and pazienza, if any real profit went into the pockets of the toilers. For what is all this thrift and labor? To eat a little bean soup and a hunk of coarse maize bread, and clothe themselves with a cheap flannelette bought from the travelling merciaio, who climbs many a steep hill with his pack. The Italian, so quick with his knife to avenge a small wrong or a supposed insult, is the most patient being in the world in bearing the great ills of life, and they recount their misfortunes with a dignified submission to the inevitable. Only in some parts of Italy, where Socialism is rife, are they beginning to realise their poverty and the possibilities of a different sort of life. When they are fully aroused, one wonders what will happen. At present they take the good and evil in life as part of the great scheme of the world."

The last chapter but one, headed by the motto, "A tavola non s'invecchia," describes in Boccacian fashion "A dinner party at which is related: how an amorous adventure of a notary was made public; how a thief was blessed; and how a vengeance was taken worse than death." The last chapter contains the diary of Cherubina, a young servant girl, from the Etruscan Apennines, written during a visit to England for her relations and friends at home. It is a quaint and delightful instance of that inborn sense of style which even uneducated Italians often possess.

> "I begin again my beloved book, in order to read it when I return to Italy. My dear listeners, on the 3rd of August my good Padrona, knowing that every first Sunday of the month a festival was kept in the Catholic Church, took me to the evening Benediction. But it was nearly two hours' walk, so you can imagine if it was near. Arrived at the church, dear friends, they wanted sixty centimes before they would let us in! We entered. My friends, you ought to have seen my face,—there was a very fat man, with a belly like a cauldron, who showed us into a bench. When I sat down, and looked around and saw the number of people coming in, I began to understand why everyone was made to pay that money, for if all could have come in without paying, the people would have been like the frogs which crowd together in the water in the summer time. Now began the Benediction; to me it had seemed a thousand years waiting to see the customs of the country, but I now saw that they behaved quite naturally, as at San Benedetto and everywhere else. And then began the music with organs. I said to my Padrona, 'They sound like the organs of San Benedetto; can it be true that by chance, and by the grace of God, I am there?'"

And so the book ends, as it ought, on a note of that simple and genuine beauty, which at all times has been the most precious inheritance of the unsophisticated Italian mind.

THE HISTORIAN OF THE UNITED STATES.*

Mr. Bancroft's life covered nearly a century; he witnessed the most important events in his country's history, and in many of them he took a distinguished part. He was American Minister in London 1846-9, in Berlin 1867-74; he was throughout a convinced and consistent democrat, and from this standpoint—to quote Ranke's criticism—he wrote the "History of the United States." For English readers the interest of his life is, perhaps, the picture which the book gives of a past stage of American mind and manners: Bancroft represented a type which it would be difficult to find to-day. He came of a sturdy, independent, and rather hard stock. His father was a Congregationalist minister of that Arminian school which in its recoil from Calvinism approximated to the Unitarian standpoint. The frequently recurring clause in his family prayers: "Give us a teachable temper," represents the atmosphere of the household; it was one in which reserve, application, and self-reliance naturally thrive. The son entered Harvard young, and at eighteen was sent to Europe at the expense of the college to study philology and Oriental languages with a view to entering the ministry. The impression left on him by German University life is worthy of record. Of Göttingen, where he spent 1818-20, he writes with little enthusiasm. "I admire their industry, but they do not love labor; I consider their vast erudition with astonishment, yet it lies as a dead weight on society." He thought better of Berlin. "At Göttingen the whole tendency of the courses is to make the students learned; here the grand aim is to make them think." His own bent was not towards speculation. "Good Christianity is better than bad metaphysics" is his comment on a pretentious sermon; he heard Hegel, but "thought it lost time to listen to his display of unintelligible words."

In 1822 he returned to America. The change was uncongenial; he did not take to Boston, nor Boston to him. He was thought self-assertive and affected; he found Harvard "sickening and wearisome." He preached; the taste of New England judged his sermons artificial; he held a Greek tutorship, and was "the laughing butt of all the College," to quote a contemporary. To divergence of temperament were added differences of political opinion which in a small community, certainly not wanting in self-esteem, led easily to distrust and ill-will. Boston society, then, as now, exclusive, sure of itself, and intolerant of opposition, was Whig or Republican; the parties were separated by a Chinese wall of demarcation; there were no dealings, public or private, between the two. In later years, when he had become a personage, he met a lady of the Whig aristocracy of the city. "I did not find you at home when I called," he said. "No," was the answer; "and you never will." He drifted from ecclesiastical to academic and political life, and served his party indefatigably by speech and pen. In 1837

* "The Life and Letters of George Bancroft." By M. A. de Wolfe Howe. Hodder & Stoughton. Two vols. 16s. net.

he became Collector of the Port at Boston; in 1845 Secretary of the Navy in the Polk administration. He was now embarked on the stormy sea of American politics; but, strong party man as he was all along, partisanship was impossible to his enlightened patriotism; as he had refused to take New England for the country, so he now refused to identify the interests of his party with those of the State. In the Civil War he stood on the Federal side throughout. He saw from the first that the policy of the slave-holding States was one of aggression; that their aim was not only to retain slavery but to extend it.

> "The beginning, the middle, and the end of our troubles, the origin of the disturbances, and the difficulty of their adjustment, lies in the fact that we have four millions of semi-barbarous, semi-civilised men among us, who are unfit for the political franchises of citizens. These men are scattered as slaves along the low country upon the Atlantic, the Gulf of Mexico, and the two banks of the lower Mississippi. Their masters have not virtue enough to set about training them for freedom; and they, the masters, see, or fancy that they see, that freedom will come to the black men at any rate, unless a way should be found for the continual expanse of slavery over new territory. Hence a policy sprang up in the South to add to the country Cuba, which must have been followed by the acquisition of St. Domingo, the northern provinces of Mexico, portions of Central America; and the most imaginative dreamed of introducing the system of forced negro labour along the banks of the Amazon. Their dream was a slave empire surrounding the Gulf of Mexico and the Caribbean Sea."

Bancroft distrusted abstract methods, and would have postponed the question of Abolition. "Slavery will remain, but will cease to reign," he wrote in 1861. But, when the war broke out, he knew that only heroic remedies could end it. "Remove the cause of the rebellion," he urged in 1865; "it is the part of justice; it is the part of peace." And he brushed away the pedantry of constitutional lawyers with the fine saying, "the power to establish slavery everywhere was not contemplated by men who formed a union 'to establish justice and secure the blessings of liberty.'"

As a diplomatist he showed insight and prescience. In 1849, "The affairs of Ireland," he wrote to Polk, "are much worse for them than you can conceive. The result must be in the end enlarged and radical concessions at the expense of the Anglo-Irish Church, and to the repression of the Anglo-Irish landlords; and these concessions will not be made till the crisis becomes more imminent." On trade questions he was in advance of his time and country. "Thiers is a thorough Protectionist, equal to the worst Whig in the worst days of the tariff mania with us"; and again, "Send a tariff man to England, and he must be cured. Here five are employed to do the work of two; because, if not employed, the number supported by the poor rates would be still further increased." He possessed the social gifts common among educated Americans; he was a linguist; his conversational powers were exceptional; he lived on terms of intimacy with the most distinguished men in Europe and in the States. His letters record witty and pointed speeches —the Emperor Alexander's answer to Madame de Staël's compliment, "Your Majesty is the best of constitutions," "I, I am only an accident; the happiness of a nation should have a more enduring guarantee"; and Chateaubriand's comment on Lamartine's "Girondins," "Il dore la guillotine." He could also, on occasion, make them. When the British Ambassador at Berlin had the bad taste to ask him in public why the American representatives appeared at Court "all dressed in black, like so many undertakers," he expressed his surprise that the ambassador of the Queen of England "should have failed to perceive that we could not be more appropriately dressed than we are—at European Courts, where what we represent is the Burial of Monarchy."

As a thinker he was vigorous rather than profound. He found "In Memoriam" gloomy and sceptical; he distrusted Darwinism; he did not care to go below the surface of things. The striking letter to Dr. Allibone (II., 311) in which he connects the Christological problem with the extent of redemption is an exception. "Either the redemption of the human race is very imperfect, and partakes of the imperfections of its own nature; or the redeeming power is the power of an infinity that is free from imperfection. Here you have my creed, and I hope it is yours." He regarded "the Roman clerical party" as a danger to religion and society. "To carry out this system," he wrote after the Vatican Council, "civilisation must go back; the beams of the State must decay from dry-rot; and the eyes of the people must be put out." He survived his return from Berlin for almost a generation; few of his fellow-citizens were so honored and sought after as he was to the end. To him old age was, in words which he was accustomed to quote, "like sitting under the trees of the garden in early winter. The bloom and verdure of summer are gone; but by their departure it becomes easier to see the stars."

POPULAR FICTION.*

On the writing of "A Prince of Dreamers," a novel of the Court life of Akbar, the great Mogul-Emperor, a contemporary of Elizabeth, Mrs. Steel has brought to bear all her brilliant imagination, knowledge, and faculty of picturesque description. The novel may be enjoyed for its high literary quality, for its skilful renderings and adaptations of Oriental verse sprinkled through its pages, and for the vivid and dramatic scenes that are threaded on the string of the exciting plot. But it fails conspicuously if it is intended as an interpretation of Indian life and feeling three centuries ago. The characters, courtiers, statesmen, soldiers, poets, priests, dancing girls, and harlots, are modern Europeans in their outlook and mental attitude, bone of our bone, underneath the disguise of their dress and calling. Not only is the atmosphere modern, but the Oriental manners and tone of feeling seem nearer to Earls' Court than to feudal India. And the three Englishmen, Elizabethan traders, John Newbery, Ralph Fitch, and William Leedes, who come to the great Mogul's Court seeking permission to traffic, appear as ghosts of the past, incongruously at variance with this India of sentimental romance. Mrs. Steel, in fact, does not possess the gift of the historical imagination, and temperamentally she is typical of the mental character of those distinguished Anglo-Indians who have ruled and administered our Indian Empire without power to enter into the soul of the people. Many of the scenes such as Chapter XX., where the debauchee, Khodadâd Khan, wakes to find himself in the hands of his judges, or Chapter X., with its description of the game of changan, or Mogul polo, are admirable pieces of writing, and we can enjoy the whole book whether the illusion prevails with our innocence or makes terms with our critical taste.

In "The Happy Medium," Mr. Marriott brings together fourteen stories which are decidedly cleverer in force of style than are most of the short stories of our popular novelists. Mr. Marriott has remarkable range, and is equally happy in handling a fantastic theme, "The Great Danger," a study in irony; "Other Times, Other Morals," or a pure piece of humor, "The Golliwog." The last tale is delicious. The mischievous and seductive Hilda Garland, when warned by her staid husband, Henry, that she is seeing too much of young Leyland, and that people are talking about them, responds by purchasing a large, black, woolly Golliwog, which she talks to at meals, and upon which "she lavishes all the adorable fondness which had been Henry's due." The parlor-maid, Ann, after struggling to keep her countenance, breaks down into hysterical shrieks, and the expressionless, middle-aged Caroline, who succeeds her, is initiated into her duties as follows:—

> "Oh, by the way, you'll find your master very considerate; but he has one peculiarity. He has an extraordinary affection for a—a sort of doll, a Golliwog. You know what a Golliwog is?"
>
> "Yes'm. A black woolly doll. Same as children play with."
>
> "Exactly. Well, your master doesn't play with it, but he likes it near him at meals. It was given him," said Hilda, with downcast eyes, "by a very dear friend."
>
> "Yes'm. I understand 'm. I knew a gentleman——"
>
> "Never mind the gentleman—Caroline, I think you said your name was. At breakfast, then, and dinner, you are to lay a place for the Golliwog, just as you do for us—on your master's right. Not at luncheon—unless he happens to be at home. Nor when we have company. Your master only needs it when he is lonely."

---

* "A Prince of Dreamers." By Mrs. F. A. Steel. Heinemann. 6s.
"The Happy Medium." By Charles Marriott. Nash. 6s.
"69, Birnan Road." By W. Pett Ridge. Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.
"Salthaven." By W. W. Jacobs. Methuen. 6s.
"The Man Who Understood Women." By Leonard Merrick. Nash. 6s.

GENERAL LITERATURE

Messrs. METHUEN have just published the following Books:—

THE WOMEN BONAPARTES. By H. NOEL WILLIAMS. Author of "Five Fair Sisters." With many Illustrations. In Two Volumes, demy 8vo, 24s. net.
In this work Mr. Noel Willams traces the careers of the mother and three sisters of the great Napoleon.

WOMAN THROUGH THE AGES. By EMIL REICH, Doctor Juris. With 36 Illustrations. Two Volumes. Demy 8vo, 21s. net.

GHIRLANDAIO. By GERALD S. DAVIES. With 55 Illustrations. Wide royal 8vo, 10s. 6d. net. [Classics of Art.

WELLS AND GLASTONBURY. By T. SCOTT HOLMES. With Maps, Plans, and Illustrations by E. H. NEW. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net. [Ancient Cities.

SINTRAM AND HIS COMPANIONS. By LA MOTTE FOUQUE. Translated by A. C. FARQUHARSON. With 20 Illustrations by EDMUND J. SULLIVAN, and a Frontispiece in Photogravure after Dürer. Demy 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net. In green parchment in box, 10s. 6d. net.

A HISTORY OF GERMANY, from 1713 to 1815. By C. T. Atkinson, M.A. With Maps, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

THE FIRST GOVERNESS OF THE NETHERLANDS. MARGARET OF AUSTRIA. By ELEANOR E. TREMAYNE. With an Introduction by MARTIN HUME. Illustrated, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net. [Romantic History.

OXFORD IN THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY. By A. D. GODLEY. Illustrated, demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

SECOND EDITION.

MAN AND THE UNIVERSE. By Sir OLIVER LODGE. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.
This is a study of the influence of the advance in scientific knowledge upon our understanding of Christianity.

SECOND EDITION NEARLY READY.

MEMORIES OF MY LIFE. By FRANCIS GALTON F.R.S. With 7 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.
This book contains the reminiscences of eighty-six years of a very varied life—the life of the most distinguished man of science of the day.

TWO ENGLISH QUEENS AND PHILIP. By MARTIN HUME, M.A., Pembroke College, Cambridge. With a Frontispiece in Photogravure and 12 other illustrations, demy 8vo, 15s. net. [Romantic History.

THE MEDICI POPES. By HERBERT M. VAUGHAN. Demy 8vo, 15s. net.

CHAUCER AND HIS ENGLAND. By G. G. COULTON. M.A. With 32 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.
"At once popular and scholarly. A vivid and realistic picture of life in the fourteenth century."—Times.

RUSSIAN ESSAYS AND STORIES. By the Hon. MAURICE BARING. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

COUNTRY WALKS ABOUT FLORENCE. By EDWARD HUTTON. With 32 Drawings by ADELAIDE MARCHI, and 20 other Illustrations, fcap. 8vo, 5s. net.
The byways, village churches, wayside shrines, villas, and gardens of the country in the vicinity of Florence.

MY LITTLE BOY. By CARL EWALD. Translated from the Danish by A. TEIXEIRA DE MATTOS. With Coloured Illustrations, fcap. 8vo, 5s.

THE WIND IN THE WILLOWS. By KENNETH GRAHAME, Author of "The Golden Age." Crown 8vo, 6s. [Second Edition.

HER INFINITE VARIETY: a Feminine Portrait Gallery. By E. V. LUCAS. Fcap. 8vo, 5s.
This is uniform with "The Open Road."

FORTY YEARS OF MUSIC, 1865 to 1905. By JOSEPH BENNETT. Illustrated, demy 8vo, 16s. net.
This is a delightful retrospect of the busy life of a great musical critic.

LORENZO THE MAGNIFICENT; and Florence in her Golden Age. By E. L. S. HORSBURGH. Illustrated, demy 8vo, 15s. net.

A SPANISH HOLIDAY. By CHARLES MARRIOTT. Illustrated, demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.
A charming account of an unconventional holiday in Spain, in which most of the interesting places are described.

COMPANIONS OF THE WAY. Edited by ELIZABETH WATERHOUSE, Editor of "A Little Book of Life and Death." Crown 8vo, gilt top, 5s. net.
This is a wonderful book of selections for morning and evening reading, and it contains over 760 pages.

THE HOLLAND HOUSE CIRCLE. By LLOYD SANDERS. With 24 Portraits and Illustrations, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.
A delightful gallery of witty and distinguished men and women—Rogers, Bacon, Moore, Sydney Smith, Macaulay among them.

HOME LIFE IN ITALY. By LINA DUFF GORDON (Mrs. Aubrey Waterfield). With many Illustrations, of which 13 are by Aubrey Waterfield, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.
The life of modern rural Italy is described with sympathy and intimate knowledge.

A GROUP OF SCOTTISH WOMEN. By Captain HARRY GRAHAM. With 16 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

THE OLD-TIME PARSON. By P. H. DITCHFIELD, M.A. With 16 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.
"Full of information and teeming with stories."—Guardian.

THE COMPLETE FOXHUNTER. By CHARLES RICHARDSON. With 46 Illustrations, of which four are in Colour, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

COROT AND HIS FRIENDS. By EVERARD MEYNELL. With 29 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

FLORENTINE SCULPTORS OF THE RENAISSANCE. By WILHELM BODE, Ph.D. Translated by J. HAYNES. With 94 Illustrations, wide royal 8vo, 12s. 6d. net. [Classics of Art.

ALL THINGS CONSIDERED. By G. K. CHESTERTON. Fcap. 8vo, 5s. [Second Edition.
A new volume of essays which plays over the whole range of modern life.

AN INTRODUCTION TO SOCIAL PSYCHOLOGY. By W. McDOUGALL, M.A. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.
The motive forces that underlie all the activities of individuals and of societies are defined, and the way in which they become organised in the individual mind and in society.

METHUEN'S POPULAR NOVELS

Six Shillings each.

HOLY ORDERS. The Tragedy of a Quiet Life. By MARIE CORELLI. [Second Edition ready.
"In Holy Orders the authoress has given us of her best. It is the work of a genius. None but an extraordinary woman could have conceived and written it."—British Congregationalist.
"A burning sincerity fills her story as with living fire."
—Bookman.

THE GREAT MISS DRIVER. By ANTHONY HOPE. [Third Edition in the Press.
"The style is suave, easy, polished."—Morning Leader.
"There is the same sparkle and felicity, and there is superadded a deeper note."—Manchester Guardian.
"A study full of complexity and of absorbing interest."
—Westminster Gazette.

INTERPLAY. By BEATRICE HARRADEN, Author of "Ships that Pass in the Night." [Fourth Edition in the Press.
"The story is admirable, full of quiet humour and deep observation."—Manchester Courier.
"A good story, human and tender."—Evening Standard.
"Here is a page of life itself, in which real people pass through common experiences."—Daily Graphic.

SALTHAVEN. By W. W JACOBS, Author of "Many Cargoes." Illustrated by WILL OWEN.
"A sniff at the title should be enough to send off anyone to the nearest bookseller. How shall we describe the narrative power that holds our rapt attention? No admirer of 'A Master of Craft' will be disappointed with 'Salthaven.'"—Morning Post.
"What Mr. Jacobs has given us, he gives us again in 'Salthaven,' and will, we hope, go on giving us in new books for many years."
—Times.

OVER BEMERTON'S: an Easy-Going Chronicle. By E. V. LUCAS, Author of "Listener's Lure." [Third Edition in the Press.
"Beside Mr. Lucas's cradle must have sat, each in her own hour, many a fairy godmother. From first to last in 'Over Bemerton's' whisks and flashes and fascinates the same light, dexterous hand."
—Times.
"The fascination of the story is not to be gainsaid, and the book is full of quiet enjoyment and subtle charm."—Liverpool Post.

THE HEART SMITER. By MARY E. MANN, Author of "The Sheep and the Goats." [Second Edition in the Press.
"Clever, direct, and concise."—Morning Post.

MIRAGE. By E. TEMPLE THURSTON. [Fourth Edition in the Press.
"The story is told with such dainty art, and with such a tender, unaffected sensibility, that it seems to us capable of charming all tastes."—Daily Telegraph.
"Unique in its simplicity and charm."—Bystander.

HILL RISE. By W. B. MAXWELL, Author of "Vivien." [Third Edition.
"An exceptionally clever and interesting story; an excellent example of ingenious and wholesome fiction; skilfully told and of absorbing interest."—Scotsman.

ANTHONY CUTHBERT. By RICHARD BAGOT. [Third Edition in the Press.
"Full of knowledge of human nature, motives, and manners."
—Yorkshire Herald.
"A singularly original and powerful story."—Dundee Courier.

A DAUGHTER OF FRANCE. By CONSTANCE E. MAUD, Author of "An English Girl in Paris." With a Frontispiece. [Second Edition in the Press.
"A bright, kindly, discerning book, full of humour."—Times.
"The situation ensures the reader's engrossment."
—Pall Mall Gazette.

COUSIN CINDERELLA. By SARA JEANNETTE DUNCAN (Mrs. Cotes). [Second Edition in the Press.
"A very welcome, pleasant, and effective book."—Pall Mall Gazette.
"Charmingly frivolous—thoroughly enjoyable."—Morning Leader.

SPANISH GOLD. By GEORGE A. BIRMINGHAM. [Third Edition in the Press.
"The book is as good as a holiday; it is pure undiluted humour from beginning to end . . . gloriously amusing."
—Morning Leader.
"As scene follows scene the reader's heart beats quicker with excitement, and laughter, and admiration."—Daily News.

"Very well 'm. Is that all 'm?"

"That is all, Caroline, thank you."

At the door the gaunt figure hesitated. "Please 'm, how do I speak of it—'m? As Master Golly?"

"As Master Golly," said Hilda primly.

As soon as the door closed Hilda flung herself on the sofa, stuffed her handkerchief into her mouth, and drummed with her heels in a silent convulsion.

Caroline was colossal. She might have been brought up with a family of Golliwogs. She didn't, like Ann, try not to see the Golliwog, but with a perfectly expressionless face—though evidently, as Hilda saw, with the intention of pleasing the master—gave it an almost motherly care. When, in passing, Caroline stopped to straighten the black, smiling figure on the chair, Hilda nearly choked. She got through the meal without an explosion, though later, when Caroline came into the drawing-room with whisky and glasses, she nearly broke down.

"Please 'm," said Caroline, with decently-folded hands, "do Master Golly sleep in the master's room, or have he a cot?"

"Oh, I'll see about that, Caroline," said Hilda through her teeth, in a wild murmur.

The wretched Henry has ten days of this monstrous punishment, after which, on admitting that he "has been a fool about young Leyland," he is handed a letter by his wife in which young Leyland thanks her for forwarding his suit with Violet, and says he is to be married the week before they sail for Ceylon. Most of the stories are as effective as "The Golliwog," though "He, She, and It," which aims at the horrible, merely falls into the gulf of the unnatural.

Mr. Pett Ridge's new novel is characterised by the keenness of eye for class outlook and shades of social manner which made "Name of Garland" a classic authority on suburban life. In "69, Birnan Road," the author pursues the same quarry with so deadly and exact a knowledge of its habits that the poor animal seems to have not the least chance of getting away. Fortunately for Mr. Pett Ridge the suburban Londoner, though gregarious in his instincts, never combines with his fellows for self-defence, or the hunted might turn and rend the hunter. In the story before us we watch the movements of the Hartley household, their friends, relatives, and acquaintances, nearly all of whom belong to the class of city clerk, with the same dispassionate interest that we gaze at a housefly under a microscope. Not that the author is lacking in feeling. But his vision is so extraordinarily cool and detached, and his humor is so dry, as to merge the artist in the skilled sociologist. The framework on which "69, Birnan Road" is built is ingenious. Chapter I. starts with the clever, sensible, young wife, Ella Hartley's, schooling of Fred, her good-humored husband, in the niceties of social behaviour, and the last chapter but one ends with her confessing her own inferiority to him: "Fred, it is I who can't keep step with you. . . . . You're a successful man, and you go out into the world each day of your life, meeting fresh people, collecting new ideas. In every moment of every day, something happens. . . . . My day is made up of rising in the morning, looking after Sixty-nine Birnan Road, and going to rest at night. . . . I am not even where I was. I have slipped back." Fred has risen in his business life as a railway man, and Ella has lost her good looks and her social aspirations along with them. But in a clever final chapter Mr. Pett Ridge relents and takes Ella to the great Mrs. Featherstone, and thence to the latter's modiste, Madame Beatrice, in Grafton Street, and the novel closes with Fred's cry, "You wonderful, wonderful woman!"

In "Salthaven" Mr. W. W. Jacob rather reminds us of an experienced stage-manager who is overhauling a limited stock of properties to see how they can be made use of for a new piece. Most of the characters in the novel recall the rag-doll of our childhood, which looked strangely familiar, even when endowed with a fresh linen face and new garments by the kindly parental hand. Perhaps Mr. Jacob is wise not to depart from the lines of his former successes, for once the British public has proclaimed its liking for a special brand of humor, it dislikes to be asked to smile in the unexpected place. And with Mr. Jacob's latter volumes we always know a little beforehand what we are going to smile at. The elderly mariner, Captain Trimblett, and his cautious cogitations anent his friend, Mr. Truefitt's, matrimonial prospects, is an old friend; so is the beautiful and engaging Miss Hartley, for whose sake her pertinacious suitor, Bert Saunders, takes an enthusiastic interest in gardening, which is her father, Mr. Hartley's, favorite hobby. It is de rigueur in this class of humorous novel that the men shall be severely henpecked by the women, and that the young girls shall keep their admirers on tenterhooks by a lengthy chain of skittish coquetries. Given this literary tradition, which derives ostensibly from Dickens, Mr. Jacob's humor is not without an individual freshness. He is never tedious or vulgar, and he conducts the intricacies of a well-won situation with a neat and workmanlike touch. His stay-at-home mariners, however, scarcely offer his power of invention a fair field. He has done the burlesque voyage before now, but why should he not take a leaf from the book of Frank Stockton, and launch a ship of nautical comedians on real salt water?

It is a little ironical that the "Opinions of the Critics" should be gathered together as an advertisement in the end-papers of Mr. Merrick's last volume of stories. Everything that the critics say in praise of the author's wit, wisdom, and artistic skill is true, but the volume itself is by no means equal to most of its predecessors. Of course, that does not imply that the book is not full of grace and charm. Everything that Mr. Merrick writes is delicately done, full of spiritual irony and wit. But most of the stories in "The Man Who Understood Women" depict the life of a semi-fantastic Latin Quartier. These artists and actresses, are types of a Bohemianism that never dies in Paris, but there is too strong a vein of Pierrot and Columbine in their mental histories to convey the illusion of reality. And we cannot afford to lose Mr. Merrick as a painter of everyday life. Witness the admirable "Time the Humorist," a story which puts in a nutshell all the irony that attends the development of our British drama, or "Dead Violets," which alone is worth the price Mr. Nash asks for the volume. Of the Tricotrin Stories—which America no doubt will rate highest—a charming example is "How Tricotrin saw London." The collection, in any case, is too good to be passed by, but Mr. Merrick's unique gift finds its true scope when he is analysing life this side of the Channel.

A MANUAL OF FREE TRADE.*

Mr. Robertson is, perhaps, the best equipped defender of Free Trade in this country. He is a trained economist with immense historical erudition, an acute logician, and a mighty hunter of myths and fallacies. In the revival of the Protection movement in England he finds a splendid hunting-ground, rich in all sorts of curious game. Though Mr. Chamberlain and his principal business backers have, for the most part, treated history with indifference, certain academic supporters of Tariff Reform have sown a variety of false doctrines relating to the past working of protective duties in this and other countries. Mr. Robertson, therefore, devotes a considerable space to tracing the growth of monopoly and Protection, exposing the erroneous notion that the Navigation Acts built up our shipping supremacy, and tracing the detailed injuries inflicted on our industrial development and our foreign and Colonial commerce by foolish policies designed to protect the woollen, silk, and iron industries.

"Trade laws and fiscal systems perforce expressed the prevailing views of the trading or land-owning classes; and the summing up of the whole chaotic mutation is: the imposition of the unenlightened will of the strongest interest for the time being. Now it is the fisc; now the gold; now the land-owning class as consumers; now the same class as producers; now the latter in combination with a class of manufacturers; now a combination of traders; and so on."

Each aspect of the mercantilist and bullionist theory and practice is accurately analysed, the impudent pretence that British supremacy in trade was built up by Protection in the eighteenth century is demolished, and the misery, waste, and corruption of the first decades of our nineteenth century Protection are illustrated in most serviceable detail.

Some of Mr. Robertson's best skill and learning is devoted to the argument that foreign nations must know what is good for them, and that they have thriven under

*"Trade and Tariffs." By John M. Robertson, M.P. Black. 3s. 6d. net.

NOW READY

MORLEY'S

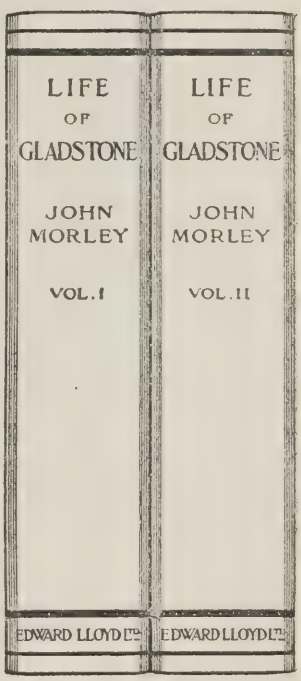
LIFE OF

GLADSTONE

Two Volumes, FIVE SHILLINGS complete.

TO-DAY you can buy John Morley's "Life of Gladstone" for Five Shillings net, because it is published at that price by the proprietors of the "Daily Chronicle."

TO-DAY Lloyd's Popular Edition of this great biography of the greatest Englishman of the Victorian Age, by the greatest living master of English, is ready at the bookshops and the bookstalls. It is a complete, unabridged edition, in two handsome, clearly printed crown octavo volumes. These contain 1,514 pages, or approximately 780,000 words, and they have beautiful frontispiece wood engravings of Mr. Gladstone and Mrs. Gladstone; still, the price is only 5/- net.



The Gladstone Statue in the Strand.

TO-DAY you should make a point of getting Lloyd's Popular Edition of Morley's 'Gladstone," a book for the people, now brought within reach of the people—a book which is not only the story of the most heroic figure of our own times, but a history of those times. Ask your bookseller to secure you a copy, or fill up the order form which follows, post as directed, and Lloyd's Popular Edition of Gladstone's Life will be sent to you carriage free.

ORDER FORM.

To the Publishers (Dept. 19), "The Daily Chronicle," 12, Salisbury Square, London, E.C.

Please send me Lloyd's Popular Edition of Morley's "Life of Gladstone," in Two Volumes. I enclose 5s.*

Name_____

Address_____

*Post free outside the United Kingdom, 5s. 6d.

P.S.—Write for an illustrated Booklet giving full particulars of Lloyd's Edition of Morley's "Gladstone."

Protection. In his opening chapters he examines the "medley of crude impulses" which have been resuscitated by our Tariff Reformers, the hatred of foreigners, the dread of imports, the sentiment of Imperial self-sufficiency, the notions of making work, and of forcing foreigners to pay our taxes, and so forth. All these passionate fallacies he shows operative in the fiscal history of other countries, in Germany, in France, in the United States, and always to the injury of trade. England and Holland managed to escape because they had the lesson of true self-interest driven home most forcibly by the necessities of their situation. The experience of Holland has been especially exposed to misrepresentation, and Mr. Robertson deals in a separate chapter with the curious ignorance displayed by Professor Ashley and Mr Balfour in their treatment of the experience of this and other countries.

He then proceeds in detail to examine the Protectionist claim that modern Protection promotes prosperity. Taking for his special field of inquiry Germany and the United States, the two countries upon which our Protectionists most rely, he shows that the typical evils of poverty, trade depressions and unemployment are more prevalent in Germany than here, and that, if the general condition of the people is better in America, a doubtful supposition, it is attributable to the operation of forces which, so far from being assisted, are antagonised by the protective tariff. He also points out the fatuity of dwelling upon the progress of Germany and America, while ignoring the larger body of experience furnished by France, Italy, Greece, Russia, Austria, Norway, Sweden Switzerland, Portugal, and Spain, "which have either not steadily increased their exports of manufactures at all, or have increased them much more slowly than Britain has done."

The last portion of his book is occupied with a most effective exposure of particular Protectionist arguments relating to the balance of trade, retaliation, dumping, unemployment, Imperial Preference, and the argument from revenue. The jumble of wild contradictions and illogic compressed in the reasoning of Messrs. Chamberlain, Balfour and Bonar Law in dealing with these issues is ruthlessly dissected. Taken as a whole, it is the most complete revelation of the base ethics, politics and economics of Tariff Reform that has appeared, and should be carefully studied by all who are actively engaged in the defence of our free import policy.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

The series of papers that constitute the late Grant Allen's "Evolution in Italian Art" (Grant Richards, 10s. 6d. net), originally appeared in two popular magazines. It was the author's intention to publish them in volume form, and he had revised and completed them with this end in view, when his death occurred. This is explained by a publisher's note in the volume before us, which also informs us that the chapters have been brought up to date by Mr. J. W. Cruikshank, the author of the introduction. The period treated by Mr. Grant Allen is that very active one between the end of the thirteenth and that of the sixteenth century—a period which embraced the beginning and the finish of the Renaissance, and remains unparalleled in regard to the rapid development of the art of painting. Mr. Allen makes his object quite clear at the start. He is an "evolutionist," not an art critic; and on the thesis that "phenomena well known in the organic world have their counterpart and parallel in the super-organic"—art belonging to the latter—he proceeds to discover and classify these phenomena. His method consists of taking a number of artistic themes common during the period, themes such as the "Marriage of the Virgin," the "Madonna and Child," the "Pietà," and so forth, and tracing their development in art, from the earliest manifestations to the latest, more or less in accordance with Darwin's principle of "Descent with modification." In only one case, that of the "Presentation," does he depart from this procedure, and then, in the manner of a biologist seeking an ancient form, he merely works backwards from maturity to origin. Certain reflections suggest themselves to the reviewer. To begin with, Mr. Grant Allen hypothecates that there are two distinct ways of regarding Nature and the works of man, including pictures; one man has an eye for the likeness between things, and another's is for the difference between them. Correctly enough, Mr. Allen observes that the former eye generally belongs to the scientist, and the latter to the artist or art critic; and it is clear that, for the purposes of this book at any rate, he places himself in the scientist category. But the book itself, with all its professions of scientific method and disclaimers of aesthetic judgment, leaves one very doubtful on this point. Mr. Grant Allen's literary activity was ubiquitous, and he assumed the rôle of the philosopher and the scientist, of the novelist and creator, and of the critic, with almost the same degree of success. What then was the proportion of his scientific perceptions to his aesthetic ones? We venture to think that they were more or less equally balanced. His nature was too sensuous to allow of his being wholly a scientist; and he had too much interest in scientific subjects to develop his artistic sympathies to their full extent. In this book with the "evolutionist" purpose a good deal of purely artistic sympathy displays itself against, as it were, the will and intention of the writer. Thus, though he is emphatic on the point that he is concerned "with paintings, not painters," "with subject, not treatment," with Byzantine, Giottesque, Venetian, and other "types" of painting, not with individual pictures, there are occasions when he is drawn into non-scientific eulogy of painters and treatment and pictures, when he gets far nearer to the artistic point of view than abstract scientific theories and cold-blooded deductions would appear to countenance. The book is none the worse for this; it is, on the contrary, better. For much of his advocacy of art study on "evolutionist" lines is calculated to inspire the student who follows Italian art along any other lines that commend themselves to his genius or temperament. Praise should be extended to the excellent illustrations in this volume.

* * *

No one who consults "Murray's Illustrated Bible Dictionary" (John Murray, 21s. net), will be likely to dispute the statement in the preface that the dictionary is frankly "conservative," though it can hardly be expected that all will agree that it is conservative "in the right sense of this much misunderstood term." Indeed, the most marked characteristic of the volume is a disposition to hold positions that have been abandoned even by those who are chary of accepting all the results of critical scholarship. Thus the article on "Jonah" tells us that, "His (Jonah's) experiences in the fish—the actuality of which, therefore, should not be denied—are intended to foreshadow symbolically the death and resurrection of Jesus." This is an extreme instance, but several other articles show a similar disposition to be satisfied with the traditional views. The important article "Jesus Christ" contains no discussion of the Virgin Birth beyond a meagre couple of sentences, and the reader who wishes to learn the views of modern scholars is referred only to Zöckler and Ramsay. This omission is the more serious as there is no article "Virgin" or "Virgin Birth." Again, the Pauline authorship of the Pastoral Epistles is accepted with the remark that "recent light on N. T. Greek from contemporary literature and archæology lessens materially the difficulty still felt by many under this head (that of language) as to authorship." Some illustrations might have been given instead of the inept quotation from Dr. Nägeli that follows. The Epistle to the Hebrews is dismissed in a page, and the writer adopts Origen's guarded view, "who the author is, God only knows!" The writer of the article, "Acts of the Apostles," describes Schmiedel's discussion of the question in "Encyclopædia Biblica," as "very fanciful," but he only glances at Blass's singularly interesting theory of the Western text of the Acts, and makes no effort to answer Schmiedel's criticisms. The way in which the evidence for the authorship of the Apocalypse is marshalled leans towards St. John. "The tone of the book is just what we should have expected from St. John as he is depicted in the Gospels, and the only serious difficulty in ascribing it to him is that of language." From all this it is evident that the editor of this dictionary had determined that the critical dogs should not have the best of it, and we cannot help feeling that a wider toleration, or even a fuller and more candid presentation of unorthodox theories and results, would have greatly improved the book.

The Rev. F. B. MEYER says—"This is a rare book. A man says as he reads it—'I have not lived like this, but I may begin to-day, and I will.' Get it, read it, talk about it, live it, pass it on."

Ready To-Day. New Cheap Edition. Crown 8vo, in paper cover, 1s. Also in cloth gilt, 2s.

TAKING MEN ALIVE.

Studies in the Principles and Practice of Individual Soul-Winning. By CHARLES GALLAUDET TRUMBULL.

The "R.T.S." now offer this invaluable work at the low price of One Shilling in order that it may be within the reach of all Christian Workers.

London: THE RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY, and of all Booksellers.

DO YOU WANT A SHARE OF £200?

See the list of Sensible Competitions in the

SUNDAY AT HOME FOR NOVEMBER.

READY TO-DAY, 6D.

S. R. CROCKETT'S NEW STORY, & 25 other items.

Published by THE RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY, London, E.C. And at all Newsagents.

EVERY WOMAN SHOULD READ

THE LOVE STORY OF THE TSARITSA.

Four Complete Stories, a Serial Story, 23 Pictures of Reasonable and Seasonable Dresses, and papers by Dr. EMIL REICH, MORITZ MOSZKOWSKI, DEAN HODGES, LADY CATHERINE MILNES GASKELL, and many others.

See the GIRL'S OWN PAPER & WOMAN'S MAGAZINE for NOVR.

The first number of the New Series Edited by FLORA KLICKMAN.

Ready TO-DAY, with PLATE, at all Newsagents, 6d.

THE BOY'S OWN PAPER 6D.

BEGINS A NEW VOLUME TO-DAY.

2 NEW THRILLING STORIES AND 33 OTHER INTERESTING ITEMS.

Two Coloured Plates. 100 Guineas Prizes.

SOME R.T.S. NEW BOOKS.

A Bit of Rough Road.

By AMY LE FEUVRE. With 16 Illustrations by PERCY TARRANT. Large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s.

The Fighting Line.

By DAVID LYALL. With 8 Illustrations. Large Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

Big Game.

A STORY FOR GIRLS.

By Mrs. GEORGE DE HORNE VAIZEY. Author of "About Peggy Saville," "Pixie O'Shaughnessy," &c. Illustrated. Large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

The Boy's Own Annual.

832 pages, with 12 Coloured or Tinted Plates and Hundreds of other pictures. Handsome cloth gilt, 8s.

The Girl's Own Annual.

832 pages, with 12 coloured or Tinted Plates and Hundreds of other Illustrations. Handsome cloth gilt, 8s.

The Sunday at Home Annual.

1,040 pages, with 17 Coloured or Tinted Plates, and over 500 other Illustrations. Handsome cloth gilt, 7s. 6d.

THE RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY, 4, BOUVERIE STREET, E.C.

Mr. Heinemann's New Books

AUTHORISED BY MR. WHISTLER.

THE LIFE OF JAMES McNEILL WHISTLER.

By E. R. & J. PENNELL.

Profusely Illustrated in Photogravure and Half-tone. 2 vols. Cr. 4to, 36s. net. Also an Edition de Luxe, limited to 150 numbered copies, on Japanese Vellum. £5 5s. net.*

MODERN ART.

A Comparatlye Study of the Formative Arts. Being a Contribution to a New System or Æsthetics.

By JULIUS MEIER-GRAEFE.

Without about 300 Illustrations. 2 vols. Demy 4to, £2 2s. net.*

TUNIS, KAIROUAN, and CARTHAGE, &c.

Described and Illustrated with 48 Coloured Plates.

By GRAHAM PETRIE, R.I. Royal 8vo, 16s. net.

Also an Edition de Luxe of 100 numbered copies on hand-made paper with Illustrations mounted. Price £2 12s. 6d. net.* [Next Week.

ROMANCES of the FRENCH REVOLUTION.

By G. LENOTRE,

Author of "The Flight of Marie Antoinette," "The Last Days of Marie Antoinette," &c. Profusely Illustrated. 2 vols. Demy 8vo, 20s. net.* [Next Week.

The varied incidents which these volumes relate appeal to an inborn love of romance as well as to a respect for historic truth. We have set before us the love stories of Camille Desmoulins and Lucille Duplessis and of Bonaparte and Josephine; we read of the arrival in Paris of young Napoleon with other military students and his life as a half-starved subaltern. Couthon, Heron, Fouquier-Tinville, and other leading, secondary, and supernumerary actors in the great Revolutionary drama pass before us, and everywhere M. Lenotre will be found to be as interesting as he is instructive.

THE REVOLT OF THE "POTEMKIN."

Reminiscences of CONSTANTINE FELDMANN.

Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

THE FIJIANS. A Study of the Decay of Custom

By BASIL THOMSON.

Author of "The Story of Dartmoor Prison." Illustrated. Demy 8vo, 10s. net.

DAN TO BEERSHEBA.

Work and Travel of Four Continents.

By ARCHIBALD R. COLQUHOUN, F.R.G.S.,

Author of "The Mastery of the Pacific." Demy 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.* With a Frontispiece from a painting by HERMAN G. HERKOMER.

RECOLLECTIONS OF A SPINSTER AUNT.

Edited by S. SOPHIA BEALE.

Demy 8vo, 8s. 6d. net. [Next Week.

The reminiscences from 1847 to 1874 of a sprightly dame who knew her world and the people in it, and who describes some of the best-known figures of the period.

Mr. Hall Caine's Reminiscences.

MY STORY. By HALL CAINE. Crown 8vo, 6s.

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

SWANAGE.

"CRAIGSIDE," Board Residence. Tel.: 6. Misses Fell

THE CLIMBER.

By E. F. BENSON, Author of "Sheaves."

A PRINCE OF DREAMERS.

By FLORA ANNIE STEEL, Author of "On the Face of the Waters," &c.

THE MAGICIAN.

By W. S. MAUGHAM, Author of "The Explorer." [Thursday.

MAURICE GUEST.

By H. H. RICHARDSON.

THE MAGNATE.

By ROBERT ELSON. [2nd Impression.

CHRISTOPHER HIBBAULT: Roadmaker.

By MARGARET BRYANT.

THE MAN WHO LIVED.

By BERYL TUCKER, Author of "The Ring."

MARCIA IN GERMANY.

An Indiscreet Chronicle.

* Prospectus of these Works and Mr. Heinemann's Autumn Announcement List, post free.

WM. HEINEMANN, 21 Bedford Street, W.C.

On the other hand, many of the articles on less contentious subjects are models of brief and lucid treatment—that on "Versions," by Dr. Oesterley, calls for special mention. The illustrations and maps are most useful and numerous. A one-volume dictionary of the Bible has long been wanted, and Mr. Murray has been the first to supply the want. His book is excellently produced, and is likely, in smaller and cheaper form, to play the part which Smith's "Dictionary of the Bible" has done for so many years.

* * *

In her book, "Marie-Madeleine, Countess de La Fayette" (Methuen, 10s. 6d. net), Miss Lilian Rea does not claim to bring forth any new facts concerning its subject, but she shows so much skill in arranging and presenting what was already known that the volume is in no sense superfluous. It gives an engaging portrait of Madame de La Fayette, and it contains a good account of some of the salient movements in the French history of the seventeenth century. Miss Rea takes us through the intricacies of the Fronde in a clear and satisfying fashion—in itself no inconsiderable achievement. She introduces us to the Hôtel de Rambouillet, gives us agreeable sketches of Richelieu, Mazarin, Anne of Austria, Mademoiselle de Montpensier, Madame de Sévigné, La Rochefoucauld, Henriette d'Angleterre, Segrais, Huet, La Fontaine, the Duchesse de Savoie, and many other famous personages of the age, and as we close her book we feel that we have become better acquainted with these familiar figures. Admitting that Madame de La Fayette is often used as an excuse for telling us something about those with whom she came in contact, Miss Rea can plead with reason that, had she been less discursive, the background of her picture would have been far less interesting. After all, there is little to tell about Madame de La Fayette. Her claim to remembrance lies in her influence upon French fiction. It is true that the "Princesse de Clèves" is one of those books which, to use Swift's simile, most people treat as they do a lord. They learn its title and then boast of its acquaintance. But it had a powerful and extended influence, and even in the nineteenth century, Taine, comparing it with Saint-Simon's "Mémoires," said that it is "a shrine of gold, wherein shine the diamonds with which the aristocracy adorned itself." Miss Rea has a gift for presenting character, and her treatment of Madame de La Fayette and her circle provides plenty of scope for its exercise.

* * *

In "Cults, Customs, and Superstitions of India" (Fisher Unwin, 14s. net), Prof. John Campbell Oman publishes a revised and enlarged edition of his former book on "Indian Life." He is well known as one of the most interesting and learned writers on the religions of India, and his knowledge was gathered during a long service as professor of natural science in the Government College of Lahore. It is only natural that he should be most intimate with the religions and customs of Northern India. Indeed, we think that in the present book there is hardly any notice of Madras and the South, where the religious feeling is very different, and, perhaps, more intense, though not so varied in form. With the Punjab itself, however, the author is very closely acquainted, if not with the United Provinces of Bengal, and the Punjab supplies types of all the teaching, religious forms, and beliefs of the country—Mohammedanism, the orthodox forms of Hinduism, the Jains, the reformed Hinduism of the Sikhs, and the modern outgrowth of the Brahmo Samaj and Arya Samaj. The accounts of the two latter progressive movements are, indeed, among the most interesting of Professor Oman's chapters, and the one failure of the book is that, owing to his retirement from India, he has not been able to keep pace with their most recent developments and their influence upon the present state of Indian thought and life. The second and third Parts leave religion, strictly so called, and tell of manners and fairs and folklore with the knowledge that can only come of that genuine and appreciative sympathy which seems, unhappily, to be growing rarer in the attitude of Anglo-Indians to the peoples around them.

* * *

"Napoleon and the Archduke Charles," by Mr. F. Loraine Petre (Lane, 12s. 6d. net), contains a full account of the campaign fought between Napoleon and the Archduke Charles of Austria in 1809. It appeals chiefly to students of military science, for Mr. Petre gives abundant details of the troops engaged, the positions held, the tactics employed, and all the minutiae both of the actual fighting and of the movements that led up to it. There are besides a number of carefully drawn maps and plans by which it is possible to follow every step in the campaign. Mr. Petre's general view of the campaign is that it was a comparative failure, and that Napoleon made a mistake in marching on Vienna instead of following Charles when the latter retreated into Bohemia. The view that the earlier part of the campaign was one of Napoleon's successful efforts is, according to Mr. Petre, overthrown by the fresh information contained in Colonel Saski's "Campagne de 1809" and General Bonald's "Manœuvre de Landshut." Mr. Petre's work is one for the military expert, though the lay reader who, while attracted by Napoleon, cares for something solider than the usual gossipy compilation, will find much of interest in this history.

* * *

Mr. A. C. Benson's readers will find nothing to surprise them in his latest volume, "At Large" (Smith, Elder, 7s. 6d. net). The greater part of its contents appeared in the "Cornhill Magazine," and the whole book is in the same vein of placid moralising upon trite themes to which Mr. Benson has accustomed us. Perhaps the present volume is a trifle more didactic, and also a trifle more wearisome, than its predecessors, and there are several pages which, if infused with more energy, would sound well if delivered from the pulpit. But a good sermon is very different from a good essay, and Mr. Benson's blend of essay and sermon seems to us to suffer from the disadvantages of both styles. Mr. Benson's many readers are, however, decidedly of the contrary opinion, and, as we said before, they will find in this volume that their author does not disappoint them.

* * *

A selection of ballads from Bishop Percy's "Reliques" has been published by Messrs. Chatto & Windus under the title "Legendary Ballads." Mr. Frank Sidgwick, who edits the volume, has a thorough knowledge of English ballad literature, and the specimens he gives are the best that could have been chosen. We regret, however, that Mr. Sidgwick's introduction is so short. It contains little beyond a few notes on some of the ballads and a sneer at Percy, who, despite his vandalism, deserves credit for publishing the "Reliques" in an age that despised such "Gothic" productions. The color illustrations by Mr. Byam Shaw are spirited and in keeping with the ballads.

* * *

A new edition of the late R. A. M. Stevenson's monograph on Peter Paul Rubens in the Miniature Portfolio Series (Seeley & Co., 2s. net), recalls a more than usually accomplished critic as well as a great Flemish painter. "The Art of Velasquez," the principal work of this critic, proclaimed him as a writer of strong artistic convictions, with a bias towards the French impressionists and their forerunners, the Romantic painters, and a corresponding distrust of Raphael and many another æsthetic moralist of his time; and his judgment of Rubens is colored by the same sentiments. The introductory sentence, "Those persons who are disquieted about the bearing of art upon morals turn round Rubens like a sanitary inspector sniffing about the apertures of a suspicious system of drainage," prepares one for an essay, brightly written from the painter's standpoint, brimming over with ideas, and influenced only by sympathetic spirits such as Eugène Delacroix and Fromentin.

* * *

"F.C.G.'s Froissart, 1903-1906" (Unwin, 3s. 6d. net), is a continuation of the two volumes of "Froissart's Modern Chronicles," published in 1902 and 1903 respectively. The history of the last three years of the Tory régime is related here by Sir F. Carruthers Gould with an admirable air of self-detachment; as the author himself puts it, his aim was to write the story "as if it had been done by Sir John Froissart himself, visiting this country and gathering, not only from public men, but also from less accurate gossips, the matter which he set himself to chronicle." The period is rich in political incidents, leading up to the great battle in which the Buffs overcame the Blues, otherwise the last General Election, and the author's quaint humor is finely displayed in treating such matters as the Wyndham-

Book Value.

A subscription to Mudie's Library is equal to hundreds of pounds spent on books. That statement is proved by the following figures, which are taken from last year's records. They show the value received under ordinary conditions by four subscribers.

Amount of Subscription Paid.	Number of Books actually Borrowed.	Total Value of Books Borrowed.
£1 1 0 per ann.—¾d. a day	361	£108 6 0
£2 2 0 ,,	727	£218 2 0
£3 3 0 ,,	490	£149 14 6
£4 4 0 ,,	525	£128 9 6

Write for Prospectus of Revised Terms and Catalogue of Books at Reduced Prices to

Mudie's Select Library,

30 to 34, NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.
48, QUEEN VICTORIA STREET, E.C. 241, BROMPTON ROAD, S.W.

BOOKS WANTED, 25s. Each Offered.—Brewer's Henry VIII., 2 vols., 1884. Burke's Armoury and Extinct Peerage, 1883. Borrow's Wild Wales, 3 vols., 1862. Eliot's Scenes of Clerical Life, 1st edition, 2 vols., 1858. Jerrold's Men of Character, 3 vols., 1838. Alice in Wonderland, 1865 or 1866. Stevenson's Edinburgh, 1879. Desperate Remedies, 3 vols., 1871. Churchill's Poems, 3 vols., 1844. Symond's Italian Literature, 2 vols., 1881. Swinburne's Atalanta, white cloth, 1865. Lorna Doone, 3 vols., 1869. James's Painters and their Work, 3 vols. Gardiner's History of England, 2 vols., 1863. Jackson's Old Paris, 2 vols., 1878. Freer's Last Decade, 2 vols., 1863. 100,000 books for sale and wanted. Please state wants.—HOLLAND BROS., Book Merchants, 21, John Bright Street, Birmingham.

Buy

The Saturday Westminster

Weekly Issue of "The Westminster Gazette."

Because

it contains all F.C.G.'S Cartoons of the Week.
of its unique page of "Problems and Prizes."
of its Book Reviews and Literary Columns.
of the Variety of General Articles and Short Stories.
it is the only Weekly Magazine-Review of the kind.
it costs but a Penny a Week. By post, 6s. 6d. (Home), and 8s. 8d. (Abroad) per annum.

It

Never Fails to Please & Satisfy

Offices: Tudor House, Tudor St., London, E.C.

MACMILLAN'S NEW BOOKS.

Lollardy and the Reformation in England.

An Historic I Survey.

By JAMES GAIRDNER, C.B., Hon. LL.D. Edin. 2 vols. 8vo, 21s. net.

The Athenæum.—"A work of the highest standard, wherein is marshalled, with innate honesty of purpose, an abundance of facts concerning a most complex and perplexing period of English history in Church and State."

Faust.

Freely adapted from Goethe's Dramatic Poem. By STEPHEN PHILLIPS and J. COMYNS CARR. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

De Libris. Prose and Verse.

By AUSTIN DOBSON. With Illustrations by HUGH THOMSON and KATE GREENAWAY. Extra crown 8vo, 5s. net.

EDITH WHARTON,S NEW BOOK.

A Motor-Flight Through France

BY EDITH WHARTON. Illustrated. Extra crown 8vo. 8s. 6d. net. [Tuesday.

The Little City of Hope.

A Christmas Story. By F. MARION CRAWFORD. A New Edition. With Illustrations in Colour by A. S. HARTRICK. 8vo, 5s. net.

The Jungle Book.

By RUDYARD KIPLING. With 16 Illustrations in Colour by MAURICE and EDWARD DETMOLD. 8vo, 5s. net.

FREDERIC HARRISON.

Realities and Ideals.

Social, Political, Literary, and Artistic.

BY FREDERIC HARRISON. Extra crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

FOURTH EDITION JUST PUBLISHED.

Free Trade.

By LORD AVEBURY. 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

Free Trade in Being.

By RUSSELL REA, M.P. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net. [Nov. 6.

Central Government.

By H. D. TRAILL, D.C.L. New edition, revised and corrected by SIR HENRY CRAIK, K.C.B., M.P. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

Working Lads' Clubs.

By CHARLES E. B. RUSSELL and L. M. RIGBY, Author of "The Making of the Criminal." Illustrated. Crown 8vo, 5s. net

Abraham Lincoln: The Boy and the Man.

By JAMES MORGAN. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

MACMILLAN & CO. LTD., LONDON.

The Economist.

(ESTABLISHED 1843.)

Weekly Commercial Times, Bankers' Gazette, and Railway Monitor.

A POLITICAL, LITERARY, FINANCIAL AND GENERAL NEWSPAPER.
PRICE 8d. BY POST, 8½d. ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM, £2
COLONIES AND ABROAD, £2 4s.

The established authority on all Financial and Commercial subjects. In addition to a large high-class general circulation, the ECONOMIST is subscribed to by Banking Houses, Chambers of Commerce, Mercantile Firms, and Railway, Insurance, and other Companies throughout the United Kingdom, the Colonies and Abroad; and, as its columns from week to week show, it is the recognised organ for the announcements of some of the most important trades in the Kingdom.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY IN TIME FOR THE MORNING MAILS

Offices: GRANVILLE HOUSE, ARUNDEL STREET, STRAND, W.C., and of all Booksellers and Newsagents.

McDonnell mystery, the still greater mystery of Mr. Balfour's views on Tariff Reform, and the thirty millions promised by the Randlords towards the expenses of the war. The pictures are suitably heraldic, though one must confess that their fun robs them of a little of the dignity of heraldry.

* * *

A Novel Reader's Guide—"The Conventionalists," by Robert Hugh Benson. (Hutchinson, 6s.). An interesting study of the conversion of a conventional mind to the spiritual truths of Catholicism.—"The Binding of the Strong," by Caroline Atwater Mason (Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.). An historical novel of the time of the English Civil Wars. Milton is one of the principal figures, and the story deals with the troubles of his domestic life.—"The Christian Marriage," by Vincent Brown. (Chapman & Hall, 6s.). The heroine, in opposition to the combined forces of the Church and the world, refuses to believe that her marriage is dissoluble in the sight of God, and takes back her husband in defiance of ecclesiastical law.—"The Diva's Ruby," by F. Marion Crawford. (Macmillan, 6s.). A romance of East and West, told with all the author's finished literary skill. The passages of intrigue are most convincing.—"The Galleon of Torbay," by E. E. Speight. (Chatto & Windus, 6s.). A good romance, the scene of which is laid in Devonshire and South America.—"Hoodman Grey, Christian," by D. Raeburn. (Cassell, 6s.). A religious story of Cornwall, giving a good picture of miners' superstitions.—"The Soul of Crœsus," by G. Villiers Stuart. (Laurie, 6s.). An ingenious story of a double personality with an "occult" leavening.—"Racket and Rest," by Harold Begbie. (Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.). A clever and humorous novel, depicting the manners of suburban London in the third quarter of the nineteenth century.

The Week in the City.

The Movement of Leading Stocks.

	Price Friday Morning, Oct. 23.	Price Friday Morning, Oct. 30.
Consols 2½ per cent.	84¾ ...	84⅝
German 3 per cent.	82 ...	83½
Russian 5 per cent. 1906...	98 ...	98½
Bulgarian 92	100½ ...	100½
Turkish Unified	89¾ ...	90¼
Grand Trunk 1st Pref.	103 ...	105
Grand Trunk Ord.	20⅝ ...	21½
Canadian-Pacific	180½ ...	179¼
Rand Mines	6 27/32 ...	6 31/32
Cons. Goldfields	4 25/32 ...	4 27/32

Business on the Stock Exchange remains very restricted in volume, but the tone is fairly steady. The Near Eastern question now fails to rouse more than an occasional tremor, but it seems doubtful whether the Kaiser's latest performance will have a good effect. It has already revived controversies and recriminations that had better have been left to sleep. A feature of the week has been a fairly sharp fall in the prices of Argentine railways, owing to the unfavorable view taken of the Buenos Ayres and Pacific accounts. It is quite possible that a different complexion may be put upon them by the Chairman at the meeting, as he is almost certain to speak hopefully of the results likely to accrue from the recent huge expenditure of capital. The future of the line practically hangs upon those results. Money is a little more usable, but the discount rate for best three months' bills remains at 2 per cent.

Russian Finance.

The definitive Budget of the Russian Empire for 1908 as submitted to and accepted by the Third Duma is now to hand, while a telegraphic summary has also been received of the main proposals embodied in the Budget for 1909. A consideration of these two documents enables a judgment to be formed as to the present condition of Russian finance, and, to state the truth, the result is not reassuring. Russian Budgets, as is well known, are divided into two sections, one comprising Ordinary, and the other Extraordinary revenue and expenditure. The Ordinary Budget deals with all the customary items of income and expenditure, while the Extraordinary Budget is in the nature of a capital account dealing with railways, war, famine, and other expenditure outside ordinary requirements, and on the income side the items mainly consist of borrowed money.

For the year 1908, the Ordinary Budget shows an excess of income over expenditure of £7,469,441, while in the Extraordinary Budget the expenditure exceeds the revenue by £18,147,647, which it is proposed to provide by means of "loans to be contracted." "For this purpose," it is added, "by the Imperial Ukase of June 19th, 1908, a third 5 per cent. loan of 1908 has been issued, to the nominal amount of £20,000,000." This loan is, apparently, not in the hands of the public, but will form part of the £50,000,000 that is shortly to be raised in order to enable the Minister of Finance to maintain the funds in the Treasury for at any rate a part of 1909. The statement made in introducing the Budget for 1909 indicates a still further discrepancy between total expenditure and total revenue. The Ordinary expenditure is estimated at £16,000,000 more than that for 1908, while the increase in revenue is expected to be no more than £9,000,000, so that the surplus shown on that side of the Budget for 1908 is practically wiped out. The estimates, again, do not provide for all the requirements of the Duma, and new taxes are suggested in order to meet the new expenditure, but the Minister judiciously remarks that "the equilibrium thus obtained would be easily disturbed if the expected revenue failed to come in in full." As to the Extraordinary expenditure he does not even mention what it may amount to, but contents himself with the statement that recourse must be had to a loan in order to cover it. He deprecates the issue of a loan every year, but it seems extremely doubtful whether, even if Russia succeeds in raising the £40,000,000 or £50,000,000 at which the amount of the coming loan is alternatively put, she will succeed in getting along even for twelve months without further borrowing.

Portuguese Difficulties.

The financial difficulties of Portugal are apparently rapidly coming to a head, and drastic measures will have to be taken if a catastrophe is to be averted. The leading Lisbon financial journal states that foreign bills for £1,400,000, representing part of the floating debt, fall due early next month, and as the Government is at the end of its resources, it will be unable to meet them. Its credits in London, Paris, and Berlin are also said to be quite exhausted. The floating debt is of unmanageable proportions, and is constantly being added to, owing to the recurring deficits in the annual accounts. It looks as if yet another arrangement of the Portuguese debt were within measureable distance, and though the existing Three's are secured on the Customs receipts it is not surprising that they have dropped to 60 from 65½ at the beginning of the year.

Lucellum.

EVANS' ANTISEPTIC THROAT PASTILLES
are without an equal for keeping the voice and throat in perfect condition for all vocal exercise.
Many eminent Preachers, Public Speakers, and Singers praise them in the highest terms for relieving hoarseness and soreness of the Throat.
They are also invaluable for Coughs, Colds, Bronchitis, and other throat and chest affections.
MADE TO A FORMULA OF THE LIVERPOOL THROAT HOSPITAL.
Can be obtained of all Chemists and Stores at 1s. and 4s. 6d. per box.
Write for Free Sample and Illustrated brochure of testimonials received, enclosing 1d. stamp to cover postage, to Sole Manufacturers—
EVANS SONS LESCHER & WEBB LTD.,
Hanover Street, Liverpool.
Ask for "Evans'" Pastilles and see you get them.
EVANS'
ANTISEPTIC THROAT
PASTILLES

Curio Club Bargains

Private persons desirous of disposing of antiques at bargain prices will find a ready sale for same at the "London Opinion Curio Club," 107, Regent Street, London, W.

To Collectors of China, etc.
Don't throw away anything broken in the home, but buy

"FORTAFIX"

Which is the Strongest Cement in the world, and

Withstands Boiling Water.

White in colour, it mends and repairs anything from a saucepan to a piece of china. It is fire-proof and chemical-proof. Of all Ironmongers, Stationers, Oilmen, Chemists and Stores,
Per 6d. Tube.
or sent post-free through nearest Agent on receipt of 6d. in stamps to BENJAMIN & GEE,
31, St. Mary Axe, LONDON, E.C.

BIRKBECK BANK
ESTABLISHED 1851.
SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.
2½ per cent. INTEREST
allowed on Deposits repayable on demand.
2 per cent. INTEREST
on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.
All General Banking Business transacted.
ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.
C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

100 POINTS FOR FREE TRADE

By L. G. CHIOZZA MONEY, M.P.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

(Reprinted from "The Daily News.")

The publication of 100 POINTS for FREE TRADE day by day during the last few months in "The Daily News" has been followed with the keenest interest. These 100 Points are now issued in convenient pamphlet form (100 Pages). Free Traders all over the country have thus an opportunity of possessing in a handy form the material for an immediate answer to the fallacies of the Tariff Reformer.

100 POINTS FOR FREE TRADE
PRICE ONE PENNY.

The price of this 100-page pamphlet, which is of a handy shape for the pocket, is 1d. for a single copy or 1½d. post free. A comprehensive index to the entire subject matter makes every item of information contained readily accessible.

We have arranged for special terms to be in force for large orders as follows:—

SPECIAL TERMS FOR QUANTITIES.
(Carriage Paid.)

2 dozen and upwards - 1d. each.
200 and upwards - - 1d. „ less 2½ per cent.
500 „ „ - - 1d. „ „ 5 „
1,000 „ „ - - 1d. „ „ 10 „

1d. 100 POINTS FOR FREE TRADE. 1d.

Applications to be made to THE MANAGER, Publications Dept., "The Daily News," Bouverie Street, Fleet Street, E.C.

MAKERS TO H.M. THE KING
Rowntree's "WARMS & CHEERS"
ELECT COCOA

THE
LEADING EGYPTIAN CIGARETTES

Kyriazis'
EGYPTIAN CIGARETTES
CAIRO.

Try them. They are the finest imported, and can be obtained from all High-class Tobacconists, Stores, &c.
Wholesale depot—20, Cheapside, London, E.C.

BOVRIL
helps you to eat and feeds you.

BOOKSELLERS.

THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE
Have the Largest Selection of Oxford and Other Bibles and Prayer Books from 6d. to £10.
I B L E S
Illustrated, Wide Margin, Interleaved, Teachers', Interlinear, Revised, and other Editions.
53, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C. Telephone Central 329

J. POOLE & CO., 104, Charing Cross Road, LONDON.
School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific, and Students'
BOOKSELLERS.
NEW AND SECOND-HAND.
All enquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered.

Catalogue No. 361. 148 Pages.
GLAISHER'S 1909 GENERAL CATALOGUE OF SELECTED PUBLISHERS' REMAINDERS.
Now Ready. Reduced Prices. Immense Variety.
WILLIAM GLAISHER, LTD.,
Remainder and Discount Booksellers,
265, HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON

EDUCATIONAL.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

CHANTRY MOUNT SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
BISHOP'S STORTFORD.

Head Mistress: Miss ESTHER CASE, M.A., Dublin (Class. Tripos, Camb.
Second Mistress: Miss ESTERBROOK HICKS, B.SC., London.
A limited number of boarders received.

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.

BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING
Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.
Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.
Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

CO-EDUCATION BY THE SOCIETY OF FRIENDS.
Friends' School, Great Ayton in Cleveland, Yorkshire.
A Boarding School for Boys and Girls (9-16). Modern Education. Preparation for Exams. Unique health record. Ten acres Recreation Grounds. Gymnasium, Swimming Bath, Laboratories, Domestic Science School. 30 Guineas per annum. Apply to the Headmaster for Prospectus, etc.

SOUTHPORT MODERN SCHOOL.
A First-Class School for Boys. Staff includes B.A., M.Sc., F.C.V., Mus. Bac, etc. Languages, Science, Commercial Subjects, Gymnastics, Swimming, Cadet Company. Prospectus from Secretary.

TANGLEWOOD, BARNT GREEN, THE LICKEY HILLS,
Near Birmingham.
BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.
On approved Modern Lines. Thorough Education with individual care and character training. Games, gardening, and open air life in lovely country, with bracing air. Good train service on main line. Escorts provided.
Principal - - MISS EBBUTT, M.A.
(Newnham College, Cambridge—Trinity College, Dublin.)

LINCOLNSHIRE COAST.
ESSENDON GIRLS' SCHOOL, SKEGNESS.
Headmistress, MISS PAGAN, M.A. Full Staff. L.R.A.M. Swedish Gymnastics. Higher Examinations. Tennis, Hockey, Swimming. Dry sunny climate. Bracing sea air. Exhibitions offered.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.
Scholarship Examination in December.
Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors. Enquiries should be addressed to the Bursar.

CRAIGMOUNT, EDINBURGH.
Private Boarding and Day School for Girls.
THE Principals, the Misses Gossip, are assisted by highly-qualified residents, English and Foreign Mistresses and visiting Professors. The aim of the school is a sound education, special attention being given to the study of English Literature, Modern Languages, and Music. The Gymnasium is fitted with Swedish apparatus and the school has its own Swimming Bath. The situation of the school is bracing and very healthy, and the grounds give abundant scope for games. Prospectus on application to the Principals.

CROYDON. Croham Hurst School for Girls.
House built for the purpose in healthy and beautiful situation. Limited number of girls taken. Thorough education on modern lines. Special encouragement given to reading and leisure pursuits, and to interest in current movements.
Hockey, Tennis, &c., &c. Swimming. Riding. Much outdoor life.
Principals { THEODORA E. CLARK. K. M. ELLIS.

EDUCATIONAL.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.
THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager,
R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C.
Telegrams: "TRIFORM, LONDON." Telephone No. GERRARD 1854.

SCHOOLS IN ENGLAND OR ABROAD
FOR BOYS AND GIRLS.
Messrs. J. and J. PATON having an intimate knowledge of the BEST SCHOOLS and TUTORS in this country and on the Continent, will be pleased to aid parents in their selection by sending (free of charge) prospectuses and full particulars of reliable and highly-recommended establishments. When writing please state the age of pupil, the district preferred, and give some idea of the fees to be paid.—J. and J. PATON, Educational Agents, 143, Cannon-st, London, E.C. Telephone 5,053, Central.

STAMMERING.
The severest cases cured, but only by personal tuition, by one who has cured himself after stammering for 10 years. Adults and boys received in residence or as daily pupils. Particulars on application to
Mr. A. C. SCHNELLE, 119, Bedford Court Mansions, W.C.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE, TAMWORTH.
YOUTHS TRAINED FOR HOME OR COLONIES.
Farm, 1,000 acres. Carpentry, Smith's work. Riding and Shooting taught. Prospectus.

SECOND IMPRESSION.

Towards a Social Policy

SUGGESTIONS FOR

CONSTRUCTIVE DOMESTIC REFORM.

By Various Writers.

Representing the conclusions of a Committee consisting of Messrs. C. R. BUXTON, H. C. FAIRFAX-CHOLMELEY, J. L. HAMMOND, F. W. HIRST, L. T. HOBHOUSE, J. A. HOBSON, C. F. G. MASTERMAN, M.P., J. H. MORGAN, and VAUGHAN NASH.

"We must all welcome, therefore, such a volume as the Speaker Office has produced under the title of 'Towards a Social Policy.' It is full of hard thinking and solid information, and should be a mine for platform speakers."—DAILY CHRONICLE.

"The book should be in the hand of everyone who loves his country. It is a lucid and comprehensive statement of the causes of the blight that is falling upon the race, and the remedies to be applied."
—DAILY NEWS.

"'Towards a Social Policy' decidedly 'gives us to think.' Its authors are doing the Liberal Party a notable service."—WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

"They (the readers) will find within its hundred and twenty odd pages much keen diagnosis of existing evils, much outspoken criticism of the slipshod palliatives with which we have hitherto been content to attempt to meet them, and many bold suggestions—some very bold indeed—as to the direction in which the real remedies are to be found. They may not agree. They cannot fail to be interested."
—MORNING LEADER.

Crown 8vo, 1s. net; post free, 1s. 2d.

LONDON: THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY, LIMITED
14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C.

THE INDEX TO VOLUMES I., II. & III. OF THE NATION

May be had free on application to the Manager.

TOURS.

£6 6s. LUCERNE TOUR.

Nine days. Short Sea Route. No extras for Conductor or Gratuities.

HENRY S. LUNN, M.D.

5, Endsleigh Gardens, N.W. 25, Cannon Street, E.C.
4, Charing Cross, S.W. 84, Piccadilly, W.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout, Bathrooms on every Floor, Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard and Smoking Rooms. Heated throughout.

Fireproof Floors. Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 6/0.

Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hote, Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London." Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.

HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplace. "The English Home."

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.

THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and Subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 25s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, THE NATION, and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following book sellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—W. H. Smith & Son, Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—Gordon and Gotch.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions are received.

Scale of Charges for Advertisements.

	FULL PAGE.	½ PAGE.	¼ PAGE.
Back Page, or Page facing matter ...	£10 0 0	£5 0 0	£2 10 0
Other Pages ...	8 0 0	4 0 0	2 0 0

Hotels, Hydros, and Educational

13 Insertions ... ... 8d. per line.
52 ,, ... 6d. ,,

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LONDON.

WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. Wild, C.C., Man. Direc. 30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

BLACKPOOL.

67, ALEXANDRA ROAD. Board and Residence. 5s. per day

PROSPECT HOUSE BOARDING ESTAB., 33, Central Par. facing Sea, Central for Amusements. South Aspect. Tel. 575 Manageress.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.

IDEAL RESIDENCE.

Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.

THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate

SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30s. week

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.

BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport

BRIGHTON.

THE HOTEL METROPOLE E. Richard, Manager

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston

BUXTON.

ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.

THE TORS PRIVATE HOTEL (en pension). Tel. 199. Mrs. F. Sara

DARTMOOR DOUSLAND, Nr. YELVERTON.

BARONS' PRIVATE HOTEL. Close to Moors. J. Wonnacott. Prop

DEAL.

BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson

EASTBOURNE.

CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Grdns. 5/- day

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day

EDINBURGH.

ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading Hotel

FARNWORTH (Station) Nr. BOLTON.

RAWSON ARMS HOTEL. Theatrical Accommodation

GREAT YARMOUTH.

HILLS MARINE VIEW BOARDING HOUSE.

MELTON LODGE RESIDENTIAL MANSION. Facing sea. 10/- per day

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.

THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.

RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta course

ILFRACOMBE.

COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea

LANCASTER.

BOAR'S HEAD HOTEL. Wm. McIntosh

STONEWELL RESTAURANT. T. M. Hey, Proprietor

MARKET HALL RESTAURANT. Prop. J. E. Dowthwaite

LEEDS.

HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station

LIVERPOOL.

COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone: 3032 Royal, 3 wires

LLANELLY.

CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver

MALVERN.

HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & M'g'r.—J. Wilson

MANCHESTER.

"OLD SWAN," Victoria Station Approach.—The Rendezvous of Lancashire Trade Unions.

MATLOCK.

SMEDLEY'S Hydropathic Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Mnger.

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links. (18 holes)

OXFORD (near).

SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny. Golf, etc. Lecture

PENTRE.

PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles

PORTSMOUTH.

SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director

SOUTHPORT.

KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St., Band and Illuminations. Turkish, Electric, Hydropathic, &c., Baths and Treatment

ROWNTREE'S CAFE, Lord St., Hot Luncheons, Afternoon Teas, Tel. 647

HOTEL CAFE CONTINENTAL, 207, Lord St., French and English Confectioners, Dinners, Teas and Suppers. Parties Catered for

SOUTHSEA.

STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress

TEIGNMOUTH.

REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner

WHITBY.

WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt

1650

To every particular Member of Parliament,

The humble Addreſs of the Sope-makers of London that lately preſented their Petition to this Honourable Houſe,

SHEWETH,

THe Complaint of the Sope-makers in briefis, That by reaſon of an Exciſe laid upon their Materials, and after they have made them into Sope, They are forced to pay 4*s.* 8*d. per* Barrel Exciſe; by meanes of which, thoſe that make it in holes and corners, ſteal the Exciſe of the ſaid 4*s.* 8*d. per* Barrel, and ſo are able to underſell them that pay it; by meanes whereof their Trade is loſt and deſtroyed. For remedy of which, they humbly deſire the Parliament will be pleaſed to lay 12*d. per l.* Exciſe upon all the imported Materials that Sope is made of, and totally take off the foreſaid 4*s.* 8*d. per* Barrel; which they humbly conceive will bring in annually, an equal revenue to what hath riſen of late years, both out of the Exciſe of Sope, and the 6*d.* in every 20*s.* that the Materials have paid, whereby all that make Sope ſhall equally bear the burthen of the Exciſe; and in caſe the Parliament ſhall Judge the ſaid 12*d. per pound* Exciſe upon the materials, not to be enough, they leave it to their Judgements and deſcretions to lay ſo much more above the ſaid 12*d.* in every 20*s.* upon the Materials onely, as they Judge annually will fully make up the ſame.

And they moſt humbly deſire that the Parliament would ſpeedily put this their Juſt Sute to an abſolute and final iſſue, and call upon Colonel George Thompſon to make his Report in the premiſes.

Roger Pears

John Hayes	John Hardwick
John Lilburne	Lawrence Whitwel
Tho. Howlet	Symon Weedon
Thomas Woodſtocke	Robert Barfoote
John Hutcheſt	Caleb Phinnies
Robert Drinkwater	John Murdock
Edm. Halley	Rickard Cox
William Rudd	Edward Leader
Edw. Whitwell	Tho. Bromley
Ja. Baker	William Heſter
John Wolcot	Tho. Poultney

1650.

Sorſon Dee

That Given in the Colliſeum days of Charles the Second Glare was Marvelo Soap

"THE NATION," with which is incorporated "The Speaker," printed for the Proprietors by the NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY LIMITED, Whitefriars House, London, E.C., and Published by THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY LIMITED, at the Offices, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C. Registered at the General Post Office as a Newspaper.—SATURDAY, OCTOBER 31, 1908.

The Nation

Vol. IV., No. 6.] LONDON, NOVEMBER 7, 1908. [Price 6d.
Postage: U.K., ½d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
DIARY OF THE WEEK ...	205
POLITICS AND AFFAIRS:—
The Meaning of the Royal Message ...	207
Hard Times and Socialism ...	208
The Downfall of the Democratic Party ...	210
Idealism and Life ...	211
In Sight of a Settlement ...	212
LIFE AND LETTERS:—
Science and Faith ...	213
The Soul of Cities ...	214
The Naming of Flowers ...	215
In Praise of Cats ...	216
THE DEAD MAN. By John Galsworthy ...	217
LETTERS FROM ABROAD:—
The New German Taxes. By Ed. Bernstein ...	218
THE DRAMA:—
Mr. Jones Philosophises. By William Archer ...	219
ART:—
The Autumn Salon ...	221
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:—
Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman's Papers. By the Right Hon. John Sinclair, M.P. ...	221
"The Right to Work." By Walter Menzies, M.P. ...	222
Mrs. Fawcett's Letter. By Mrs. Nash ...	222
"The Secret of Whistler." By St. John G. Ervine, Sidney Low, and A. Clutton Brock	222
The Taxation of Land. By W. R. Lester ...	224
Bad Harvests and Unemployment. By J. A. Hobson ...	224
POETRY:—
Vox Infirmitatis. By Lucy Lyttelton ...	224
THE WORLD OF BOOKS ...	225
Books to be Read ...	225
REVIEWS:—
The Story of the Brontës ...	226
Josephine	227
A Musical Gossip ...	228
A Novel of Anarchy ...	228
BOOKS IN BRIEF:—
The Edinburgh Review ...	230
The Quarterly Review ...	230
The Contemporary Review ...	230
A Novel Reader's Guide ...	232
THE WEEK IN THE CITY ...	232

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

The wretched Morocco squabble has produced another "crisis," arising from a trivial, foolish incident, not worth a day's anxiety, still less the nervous tremors as to war which have run through Europe. It will be remembered that the German Consular officials at Casablanca were assisting the escape of deserters, German and other, from the Foreign Legion, when French officers interfered, recovered the deserters, and assaulted the officials. On October 15, at Germany's suggestion, it was agreed to submit to the Hague Tribunal the complicated question of international law as to the rights set up by the French military occupation. On October 18, Prince Bülow proposed that this should be preceded by an exchange of expressions of regret—she to express regret for her Vice-consul assisting non-German subjects, France for the insult to Germany's Consular authorities. The French point of view is that the whole incident should be submitted to the Hague, and the French Press suggests that Prince Bülow is trying to get compensation at the expense of France for the "Daily Telegraph" episode. In Berlin it is pointed out that the German demand was put forward long before the interview appeared on October 28, and that it has not been added to since the storm arising from the Kaiser's communication and Prince Bülow's treatment of it. It would surely be open to the Germans to retort, with equal malice, and probably with as little truth, that M. Clemenceau was trying to maintain his tottering Ministry by an appeal to French Jingoism.

Clearly, therefore, before the suggestions of the French Press are accepted in this country, where, unhappily, everything that imputes Machiavellianism on Germany's part is greedily swallowed, we must determine whether the German statement is true or false. When that is done—and at present we see no answer to the communiqué in the "Cologne Gazette"—it is possible to judge the character of Germany's demand upon its merits. Germany's position is that two different questions are involved in the Casablanca incident—a question of international law relating to the extra-territorial rights of German Consuls over Germans serving in the French expeditionary force, and a question of national honor arising out of the violence done to German Consular officials. It is a pity that the whole dispute cannot be referred to the Hague Tribunal, which might properly decide whether the disputants should offer each other a mutual expression of regret.

* * *

However, Germany's position, whether right or wrong, seems regular enough. She is willing to submit the question of law to the Hague Tribunal, which is the authority to determine it, but she does not desire to submit the question of "national honor." From every arbitration treaty questions of national honor are excepted, and it is understood that they lie outside the sphere of arbitration. Germany wishes to settle her question of honor directly. She wants France to express her regret formally for the conduct of her officers, while she admits the error on the part of her own Vice-Consul in taking non-German deserters under his wing. The French Government will not apologise, but is willing to compromise by means of an exchange of regrets. Doubtless Germany will accept that, and an incident which, but for the excitement of the French Press, and the malicious gullibility of a portion of our newspapers, would never have looked serious, will be reduced to its proper infinitesimal proportions.

* * *

The Kaiser's approach to this country has been received with singular tactlessness, the Conservative Press generally hinting at a Machiavellian motive for an act which has involved the Emperor in serious difficulties with his own countrymen, while the "Standard" suggests, through a correspondent honored with the largest type, that the German General Staff supplied a plan of campaign to the Boers as a supplement to that which the Kaiser suggested for our own troops! This graceless comment is clearly rebutted by the anger of the Anglophobes in the German Press. That party joins with the Constitutionalists, who censure the Kaiser for acting on his own initiative in foreign policy. The joint attack has been so serious that Prince Bülow has been obliged to come to the Emperor's rescue, and declare that the communication, originally written by "a number of English gentlemen," was referred to the Foreign Office for criticism, and was sent out by them under the impression that publicity had already been authorised. This is not impossible, for the procedure of the German Foreign Office for some time has been notoriously lax. Prince Bülow also offered to retire from the Chancellorship, but the Kaiser refuses to accept his resignation. Indeed, he cannot well be replaced, for his only possible rival, Baron Marschall von Bieberstein, is not a Prussian, and is hardly eligible.

* * *

On Tuesday Mr. Taft was elected President of the United States by a plurality of more than a million popular votes. He probably carried every doubtful State except Nebraska, and will have something like 300 electoral votes, a number only slightly less than that which Mr. Roosevelt received in 1904. So decisive a victory came as a surprise even to the Republican managers, and still more to Mr. Bryan, whose campaign, for reasons not very apparent, went to pieces in the last fortnight. It is not quite clear how far the Socialist and Independence parties cut into the Democratic vote, but it is certain that Mr. Bryan did not get the Labor support he expected. In the State elections the Democrats did better than in the Presidential fight, though Mr. Hughes was elected in New York, and the conclusion is drawn that many Conservative Democrats voted against Mr. Bryan as too Radical. There is no reason to suppose that Mr. Taft's administration will lay him open to a similar suspicion, or that the Roosevelt policies will mean more in his hands than in those of their inventor.

* * *

On Monday the King addressed a Message to the Princes and Peoples of India in commemoration of the 50th anniversary of the direct government of India by the British Crown. Its terse and finished phrasing suggests the pen of Lord Morley. It will, we imagine, be followed by a series of resolutions, moved in both Houses of Parliament, embodying a series of reforms in Indian government. The Message takes credit for the "toil and courage" with which the tasks of half a century have been faced, and claims religious tolerance, respect for rights and usages, equality before the law, as the chief fruits of British rule—a rule that "concerns the destinies of countless multitudes of men now and for ages to come." It says that "guilty conspiracies that have no just cause and no serious aim" will be sternly suppressed, but promises (a) clemency for prisoners; (b) a "prudent" extension of representative institutions; (c) a larger share in government for "important classes," whose ideas have been "fostered and encouraged" by British example.

* * *

The salient features of the municipal elections have been the losses suffered by the Labor and Socialist parties, and the small success achieved by women candidates, only two of whom, out of twelve candidates, have been elected. In Birmingham the Socialists contested seven seats and lost all of them; in Bradford they lost the three seats they vacated; in Macclesfield they lost three seats; in Stockport two; and there were further losses in Manchester and Salford. Some of these seats were won by Liberals, more by Conservatives or Independents. The Liberals also suffered many defeats, the balance of gains going to the Conservatives. In many constituencies there were Liberal and Conservative combinations against Labor men.

* * *

The time of the House of Commons has been exclusively devoted during the past week to those clauses of the Licensing Bill which deal with miscellaneous amendments of the licensing law and with clubs. In these some important alterations have either been actually made, or have been promised on the Report Stage. The clause reducing the hours of opening on Sundays from six to three is to be made more elastic by enlarging the discretion of the justices in fixing the hours, and by allowing the consumption of liquor with meals during the additional hours of closing. In London the hours of opening on Sundays are to be four. Children under fourteen are to be excluded from the bars of public houses. The proposal to empower the licensing justices to restrict the employment of barmaids has been dropped. The closing of licensed premises on Parliamentary election days is to be made compulsory.

* * *

The duty of fixing the amount of monopoly value has been taken from the justices and given to the Inland Revenue Commissioners; and a definition of the words "monopoly value" has been introduced into the Bill which will allay the uncertainty felt by the Trade as to the extent of the burden to be imposed on it at the end of the time limit. We regret that the suggestion, repeatedly made in these columns, and spoken favorably of by the Prime Minister at an earlier period of the Session, that the monopoly value charges should go into the Exchequer instead of into county or county borough funds, has not yet been carried into effect. We have ground, however, for the belief that this matter may be dealt with in an early Budget. The club clauses have, on the whole, been strengthened, though not nearly to the extent we had hoped. The supply of liquor to members for consumption off the club premises is to be entirely prohibited. New clubs are not to be "tied."

* * *

The general attitude of Mr. Balfour to those parts of the Bill which have been under discussion during the week promises the drastic amendment rather than the rejection of the Bill by the Lords. He did not vote against the Sunday Closing Clause, and expressed himself as having an open mind upon it. He favored the compulsory closing of public houses on Parliamentary election days. The concessions made by the Government with regard to monopoly value were also favorably received by Mr. Younger, who speaks with some authority on behalf of the Trade. The abandonment of the Clause with regard to barmaids was resented by some Ministerialist and Labor members, and a substantial minority voted in favor of its retention. We think, however, that Ministers have acted wisely in lightening the Bill of a proposal which has excited much controversy, and for which public opinion is scarcely ripe. Moreover, the matter belongs more to the general question of female labor than to a Licensing Bill. On the club question the Government has shown itself timid, though not, we admit, more timid than the majority behind it. The Bill, even as amended, provides no effective checks on the undue multiplication of clubs.

* * *

Dr. Maclagan has resigned the Archbishopric of York, at the age of eighty-two. Not a great scholar or preacher, the Archbishop made an excellent administrator of the Northern Province, and his fine presense, good sense, charming manners, and natural openness and sweetness of disposition endeared him both to his own clergy and to men outside his Church. Probably no Archbishop of York lived in greater harmony with his people. The Archbishop was a Moderate in Church statesmanship, and he took practically no part in the opposition to the Education Bill of 1906.

* * *

The Newfoundland elections took place on Monday, and, although full returns are not yet to hand, it looks as though Sir Robert Bond's majority of thirty seats in a house of thirty-six had been transformed into a minority. Sir Robert Bond has been in office as leader of the Liberals since 1900, and the Opposition, under the name of the People's Party, consists of the relic of the Conservatives and dissident Liberals, led by Sir Edward Morris, who was the Liberal Minister of Justice till last year. The chief issues in Newfoundland politics are fish and corruption. With fish are bound up the United States and Labrador disputes, and Sir Robert Bond has evidently gained nothing in popularity from his reckless defiance of the Imperial Government. The corruption question of to-day dates from the contract with Mr. Reid in 1897, which handed over most of the island's resources. Sir Robert Bond came into power by denouncing that arrangement, but his modified arrangement in 1901 and other agreements do not seem to have given much more satisfaction, and it is declared that all his enterprises for the development of the island have collapsed. The dissatisfaction with his rule, or the effect of the depression in fishing, must be strong if the old trick of denouncing the Opposition for desiring confederation with Canada has not preserved his overwhelming majority.

* * *

The King and Queen of Spain have been paying a visit to Catalonia as part of M. Maura's scheme for breaking down the separatist spirit of that province. The visit does not seem to have been much of a success. A bomb explosion took place at Barcelona, the royal launch was run into, and a salute fired from a warship wounded some people standing on the royal yacht close to the King. These "accidents" are much commented on, and still more other episodes. All the municipalities when presenting addresses demanded autonomous rights in a sharp tone, and insisted that the proceedings of these ceremonies should be conducted in the Catalonian dialect. The Liberal papers declare that instead of subduing separatism the monarchy has been Catalonised, and they are even more indignant with the King for having accepted a canonry of Barcelona Cathedral, and on that occasion taken an oath to defend the Church and obey the Pope, which they hold to be inconsistent with his duty as monarch. The Catalonian visit will be discussed in the Cortes. They will have another unsavoury bone to pick in the concession of the naval contracts, which has been accompanied by exceptional "irregularities."

* * *

China is finding it hard to exercise her control over Thibet. The Dalai Lama has been in Pekin some weeks and proved somewhat intractable. On Tuesday, on the occasion of the Dowager-Empress' birthday, he was granted a pension of £1,150 a year and a dignified title, and ordered to return to Thibet to carry out the will of his suzerain. Meanwhile, in Thibet itself there has been trouble. Some time ago the Chinese Amban complained to his Government that 11,000 idle lamas were an intolerable burden on the country. The idle lamas have retaliated by attacking the Amban, who is now appealing for further military support. The Dalai Lama on his return will have a difficult task to reconcile the claims of his suzerain with the independent spirit of his people. Some rather fierce anti-Japanese riots in Hong Kong, arising out of the Chinese boycott of Japanese wares, illustrate the tense relations between these two peoples, and the determination of Chinamen everywhere to defend the interests or the prestige of China.

The next issue of The Nation will be a Special Literary Number.

Politics and Affairs.

THE MEANING OF THE ROYAL MESSAGE.

We shall make but one criticism of the Royal Message to the Princes and Peoples of India, and that is that it just misses, by no fault of its authors, the touch of sympathy which amounted to genius in Queen Victoria, and which directly animated the famous document of 1858. The King and Lord Morley have been compelled, by the nature of the case, to use the language of pure statesmanship, and that is something at once more precise and less appealing to an Oriental people than, let us say, the language of Napoleon's proclamations to his soldiers, or of some of the late Queen's letters on State occasions, or to the victims of private calamity. The Proclamation of 1858 was, indeed, a singularly happy document. It was fortunate in its authors, and in the sentiments of courage and magnanimity, two of the rarest qualities employed in the government of mankind, that inspired it. It would have been so easy to be timid and grudging in phrase, to issue a harsh admonition to the peoples of the new dependency, after an episode so alarming and so deeply seamed with horrors as the Indian Mutiny. It does small credit to our historical imagination that our Press and public should have greeted the far milder discontents of 1907 and 1908 almost as fiercely as their predecessors regarded the rising of fifty years ago.

There is no reflection of this spirit in the present Message. It properly takes credit for the three achievements of British rule in India during the last half-century which represent the fulfilment of the pledges of 1858—the preservation of internal peace, the protection of all forms of religious faith, and equality and uprightness in the administration of the law. And we think, also, that it promises quite clearly and definitely to fill what native India believes to be the great gap in those promises, and commits us to an advance in self-government whereby, as Queen Victoria said, Indians, "of whatever race and creed," will "be freely and impartially admitted to offices in our service, the duties of which they may be qualified, by their education, ability, and integrity, duly to discharge." On this subject the proclamation makes two important announcements. It declares that in future the abolition of race distinctions as a test of fitness for public work is to be steadily extended, and it pledges the King to a grant of representative institutions to classes who represent ideas and faculties that have been ripened and encouraged under British rule. These words seem to us to contain a promise satisfactory to those who saw in the discarded Simla scheme merely a reinforcement of the landowning element in native India. Lord Morley's policy clearly goes far beyond that now obsolete phase of the movement towards Indian reform. The educated classes—i.e., the men whom we have trained in our universities and colleges—are plainly bidden to look to new opportunities of serving their country under British rule, or, as the proclamation phrases it, to "a greater share in legislation and government." This is the right note. Indian discontent is, after all, our child, bone of our bone, flesh of our flesh. Sooner or later we must acknowledge it, and provide for it.

We need not discuss at length the precise methods that the Government will take to embody the definite and wide offer of the Royal Message. There are many fresh avenues of high public employment in special departments in which the services of natives can freely be used. There are the Executive Councils of the Viceroy and of the provincial governors. There are the Legislative Councils, on which we hope that Lord Morley will boldly establish elected majorities, and give them power to raise administrative questions, and to criticise and assent to legislation before it is passed. The Governor's veto would, of course, be reserved, as we reserve it in self-governing colonies. But a power of surveying and shaping policy and governing finance would be given to the regular representatives of native opinion. If, in addition, the Indian Government will release the municipalities from official control, will at least divide them between the elected and the nominated elements, and will revive a measure of home rule for the villages, it will have supplied a new basis and a new justification for our general control of Indian destinies. For our part, we should like to see Lord Morley give full effect to the language of the Proclamation by making India, equally with England, a centre of examination and preparation for the Indian Civil Service. This change, we hope, will come in time. But we believe we read the Proclamation aright when we see in it a design to open up a new epoch in Indian history.

Lord Morley is clearly right in coming to this decision. It is obvious from the language even of the Conservative Press that home opinion on both sides is ready for such a development, and expects it at Lord Morley's hands. The only fear we have is that the magnitude and comprehensiveness of the new Indian departure will not strike home to the imaginations of the Indian people. We are not thinking so much of the extremists in Bengal, and of the still smaller section which contemplates the unthinkable policy of severance from British rule. They may remain irreconcileable. But there is a mass of attachable native opinion which is the great prize that a bold and magnanimous progressive policy may secure. We hope that this party will be won over by just such a display of candor and generosity as Canning and Lawrence applied to the settlement after the Mutiny. There are some conditions of success. We imagine that the promise of amnesty will be fully applied to the political prisoners. It is with them, rather than with the average offender against everyday law, that the quarrel was opened which the Royal Message is designed, as far as possible, to close. And if clemency is essential, time, we believe, is equally valuable. The best observers are convinced that the Proclamation has produced a great effect in India. But the hopes it has kindled may become dim if the scheme of reforms it adumbrates is unduly delayed. And, above all, there is need for some undoing of the great administrative error from which the tide of passion and violence in native India gathered nearly all its strength. The partition of Bengal is no past question. It is keenly alive still. It might jeopardise the success of Lord Morley's policy. It certainly assumes a new aspect now that the process of government by consent has been broadly opened up by the new proclamation. No Government resting in any degree on the will of the people would have consummated so unpopular an act as the partition. Every form of proper and constitutional protest—petitions, meetings, representation by all kinds of speech and writing open to the people—was adopted without avail. So long as we proposed to keep along the line of pure repression, this evidence could be resisted. But now that the turn has been taken, we are convinced that Lord Morley will find the practical undoing of the partition the key to the success of his historic departure.

HARD TIMES AND SOCIALISM.

THERE is little of interest, in municipal election results, in the variation of balance between so-called "Liberals" and "Conservatives." The national differences between the historic parties are with difficulty translated into municipal affairs. The electorate is small, influenced by the women's vote, and, far more than in Parliamentary contests, deflected by the personal capabilities and popularities of the individual candidates. On these accounts Liberal or Conservative successes offer but slight indication of the general drift of parties upon the larger arena. One class, however, stands apart; and its progress or decline in the civic struggle is probably a real indication of a progress or decline in general public approbation. This is the Socialist class, the men who deliberately declare war on all other parties, who design to find in municipal Socialism a very definite policy towards a transformed society, who work as a collective body inspired by a definite ideal. That class has this week sustained a series of smashing reverses. In a time of unusually bad trade, with unemployment widespread and severe, and after an unexampled fervour of Socialist propagandism, it has been swept out of the great cities. Bradford—the "Mecca of Socialism"—has rejected all the Socialists; the West Riding—Leeds, Sheffield, Halifax—has followed its example; Liverpool, Manchester, Birmingham, Glasgow, will have nothing to say to them. Those who expected that "bad times" would mean a conspicuous leap forward in the Socialist advance find their prophecies disproved.

There are many causes for this defeat. A growing, and ominous, tendency of the two political parties to combine against Labor or Socialist candidates is one of them. But perhaps the most operative is just that which gave the new gospellers their chief hope of victory. Paradoxical as it may appear, the assertion is probably true that "bad times"—especially in connection with unemployment—are enemies rather than friends of the Socialist advance. It is quite a mistake to suppose that Socialism gains its firmest grip first upon the poorest, that its chief allies are hunger and cold. With us the poorest are often impervious to a direct political or social appeal; they are sunk below the level of consciousness which can respond to any hope of change. The skilled artizans of Colne Valley and Jarrow vote Socialist when trade is good and all the factories are working overtime. The slums of Southwark or Ancoats fail to respond to the vision of a new good time coming when all shall be free and equal and happy. What they are looking for is a relief of the immediate necessities of the moment, for food and drink for the day. Given these, they are content until the next scarcity arrives. More especially is this true of unemployment. When the artisan or laborer is in work, he will find leisure to interest himself in various social gospels, study the exhortation of the street corners, inquire the meaning of capital value and the exploitation of the working man. When he is out of work, he is naturally filled with but one impulse, which passes quickly from a terror into an obsession—an impulse to obtain work again. That impulse operates even amongst the men who remain in the factory. They see their companions turned away, tramping the streets in search of a job, undergoing all the privations which they themselves have experienced in similar vicissitudes in the past. They know that they have no security but one week's notice: that any Saturday the announcement will be made to them that their services will no longer be required. Under such circumstances the whole social problem narrows itself down to the one question of employment; or, rather, the question of employment enlarges itself to fill the whole horizon. Yesterday or to-morrow men may cherish the dream of a transformed society; to-day the quesion is merely the continuance of employment when others are falling around them. That is why Socialism has grown in times of prosperity and withered in times of decline. It is the Tariff Reformer, and not the Socialist, who stands to gain in days of trade depression. In those days "work for all" is a more persuasive appeal than "Justice to the worker" or "State ownership of all the means of production." Man, fallen to bedrock and fighting for his life, has little inclination to turn to visions of justice triumphant and comfort universal.

Socialism, indeed, at best—founded on Poverty and Social Discontent, and finding there its argument for change—does not flourish in the heart of that poverty and hungry wretchedness. The Socialist uses the sweated women and starving children as material to inflame us to pity and anger. But he rarely obtains adherents from the husbands of the women or the fathers of the children thus broken at the basis of society. The unemployed leaders are a different class and type from the unemployed whom they shepherd and control. The Socialist to-day, though he draws his recruits from the working man, is, in reality, rather remote from him. Mr. Crooks has been called the "superman" of East London—East London, that is to say, in the person of a member who is a representative as well as a delegate. But Mr. Grayson is far more typical of the actual Socialist "comrades": the men of the artisan and the lower middle classes who read the "Clarion" and wear red ties, and are filled with compassion concerning the poor, and cherish roseate visions of immediate social change. It is partly revolt against this type, as much as rejection of its policy, which is responsible for the Socialist municipal débâcle. No Socialist Councillor, declares an advanced newspaper proudly, has ever been convicted of municipal corruption. It is surprised that a party so pure should be rejected by the electorate. It has not yet learned that purity of purpose and incorruptibility of standard are not yet regarded by the average citizen as being the most essential qualifications for municipal honors. It is doubtful if, indeed, the average citizen, here and in America, is not prepared—except in sudden hurricanes of revolt against too flagrant corruption—to accept a not too ostentatious standard of civic purity, if the men who are running the machine are men of substance, energy, and position. Miss Addams, from Hull House, has described the failure of the reform party to carry an election even against the most offensive "boodlers." That party discovered that large numbers of decent and high-minded persons were convinced that not the reformers, but the solid, vigorous, wealthy Councillors, were the kind of persons who had built up the wealth and to whom should be entrusted the government of Chicago. The "comrades" propagate the cause with a splendid devotion, arguing at street corners, descending like locusts at by-elections, organising themselves cheerily as "Clarionettes" with particular buttons and badges and neckties. Men listen to their eloquence; but the citizen with a stake in the community shrinks from entrusting to them control of the ratepayers' money, and the rank and file of the working people turn away from a type so remote from their own boisterous, happy-go-lucky, acquiescent existence. An appeal for "Labor representation" can fill the working man with enthusiasm—the enthusiasm of Mr. Crooks's first sensational victory at Woolwich. An appeal for "Socialism" attracts him when his own position is secure: when that is precarious he is fearful, unless his trouble is prolonged until it threatens a revolution.

This bad trade is probably the first cause of the swing towards Protection, which has exercised its effect on the Liberal as well as the Socialist Party. Beyond these the revolt of the middle class against a Socialistic control of the rates, general indignation against the wilder utterances of Mr. Grayson and his comrades, combined with a certain fear of them, and the solid anti-Socialist vote of the women, have undoubtedly contributed. Another hostile factor is Mr. Blatchford's linking of an anti-religious crusade with an economic change. Popular Socialism received a great impetus from the editor of the "Clarion," but he also raised a barrier to its progress. Everywhere to-day, in statements which can never be overtaken and denied, the Socialist is represented as the enemy of religion and of the accepted moral standards. The considerable company of those who believe in religion, and the much more extensive company who pay respect to it, or who see no substitute for it, are thus converted into its implacable foes. But the danger to-day is not some wild advance into incalculable schemes of Socialism; certainly it is not the too rapid growth of idealism in politics—that, alas, is always slow; it is the far more cunning and skilful manipulation of the men who are engineering the campaign of Protection. "Work for the unemployed" is the demand of the Socialist. But a solution of the problem of the unemployed would appear to be more especially vital to the future of Free Trade.

THE DOWNFALL OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY.

The greatest athletic contest in the annals of electioneering has resulted in the election of Mr. Taft to the Presidency. Mr. Bryan has not improved the position he attained in the presidential voting of 1896 and 1900, and Mr. Taft's "plurality" is almost as large as that of Mr. Roosevelt over Judge Parker in 1904. Though some of the middle Western States have perceptibly weakened their Republican attachment, as, for instance, Ohio and Indiana, which have elected Democratic State governors, the only gains which Mr. Bryan has been able to add to swell the allegiance of his "Solid South" are Nevada, Montana, Colorado, and his native State Nebraska. The keystone States, New York, Indiana, and Ohio, all of which it was virtually essential Mr. Bryan should win to secure a reasonable chance of his return, have gone for Mr. Taft, and the nation stands firm to the cause of the Republican Party.

This result, foretold with confidence by most watchful observers of the currents of public opinion in the United States, must serve to correct some of the impressions of the American situation and the American character prevalent among foreigners. Mr. Bryan appeared to possess many of the qualities of an acceptable candidate. Shallow and uncritical as he was, he had personal magnetism and the gift of emotional oratory, and his platform appearances in the stupendous campaign which has just ended were admittedly more successful than those of Mr. Taft. Again, it was anticipated that the calamitous condition of trade during the last twelve months, directly attributed and not without some reason to the turbulent activities of the Republican administration under the stimulus of Mr. Roosevelt, would have told heavily against the Government. The Republican machine, at any rate, it was confidently held, would be crippled for effective electioneering by the withdrawal of the heavy financial support of the rich corporations, which it had hitherto received. Finally, a great parade was made of the entrance of the Federation of Labor, with its two million members, into party politics upon the Democratic side.

It is now evident that all these considerations had very little weight with the body of the American electorate, East or West, or else that any influence they exercised was counteracted by other more potent and less evident forces. There can be no question but that widespread and violent discontent exists among large sections of the people, particularly among the lower grade wage-earners of the industrial centres, who, even before the pinch of poverty in this disastrous year, had felt the crushing force of the Tariff and the Trusts. But why should this discontent find vent in the election of Mr. Bryan and the substitution of the Democratic political machine for the Republican? The Democrats do not even pretend to be Free Traders, or to seek more than to abate the burden of the Tariff, and, though they breathe fury against the Trusts, they have tabled no practical proposals of grappling with them more plausible than those set in operation by Mr. Roosevelt and his law officers. The discontented and the revolutionary elements have come to recognise that neither of the two historic parties has the will or the power to rectify by the federal instrument the heavy inequalities and economic abuses from which they suffer. It looks as if the more detailed record of the voting would give solid testimony to this feeling, either in a large abstention or in a considerable accession of votes to the Socialist and independent candidates.

If due allowance is made for this factor, the preference of what is known in America as "the better element" and of the solid phalanx of political indifferents for Mr. Taft is intelligible. The sober business American, whose secret influence upon the lower grades of citizens is very great, has returned the strong, safe man. He has felt that what was needed most just now was a restoration of confidence, and that Mr. Taft was more likely to bring about the restoration than Mr. Bryan. It is true that Mr. Taft is committed to a continuance of the drastic cleaning process which Mr. Roosevelt has applied with so much vigor to the business institutions of his country. But Mr. Taft's record has been bright rather than meteoric, he is less impulsive and more taciturn (to put it mildly) than his godfather, and his policy is likely to be slower and more conciliatory. Now this is what the ordinary "good American," who is neither a friend of trusts nor a Radical reformer, wants. A gradual restoration of profitable business, no sudden violent laying of hands upon the levers of public or private finance, a firm and moderately active foreign policy, and more discreet relations with the Federal Legislature—these are the principal requirements of the American whose influence has elected Mr. Taft. It will be a presidency more likely to mark time than to make history. But it may be none the worse for that, for there has been discernible a certain breathlessness in the efforts even of the more energetic sections of the American people to keep pace with the rushes of their President.

There are two reflections which we would make upon the character and the result of this election. The first has reference to the extraordinary and, to our interpretation of American institutions, the gravely improper part played by Mr. Roosevelt in using the influence of the White House, first, to procure the nomination of the Republican candidate, and, secondly, to push his candidature by assuming the part of chief organiser of a party campaign. To our mind, this is nothing other than an abuse of a high position of trust which the American Constitution, as interpreted by the uniform conduct of previous occupants of the Presidential chair, designed to be removed from and above the schemes and struggles of party. We are well aware that party as a political instrument stands on a different footing in the United States from here, and at least one important officer whose impartiality might have been expected to remain intact—to wit, the Speaker in the House of Representatives—has come to be little better than a party tool. If it were merely a question of personal dignity, we might agree with Mr. Roosevelt's friends that he has so much dignity he need not stand upon it to preserve it. But for a President, who had already stretched every precedent in encroachment upon those legislative functions which it was the most express design of "the founders" to remove from the executive officials, to end his term of office as a passionate partisan, might seem a licence likely to provoke resentment among constitutionalists in America.

Finally, some speculation upon the probable future of the Democratic Party is inevitable. It has long been recognised that the earlier lines of principles and policy which demarcated it from the Republican are almost obliterated. States rights no longer furnish a cleavage. No solution of the graver social problems of America is even conceivable upon State as distinguished from federal lines. There is no strong genuine difference between the attitude of the two parties on Protection, Imperialism, or Foreign Policy, the three largest issues clearly within the federal power. Upon control of transport and the curbing of industrial and financial illegalities the promises of the one party do not in principle transcend the performances of the other. The Republican Party upon the whole has displayed more consistency and more stability of purpose. The Democrats have now tried Mr. Bryan as financial revolutionist, Judge Parker as a Conservative, and Mr. Bryan again as a Liberal, and they have been thoroughly beaten upon each platform. It is difficult to believe that any party, in a live electorate like that of the United States, can survive so hopeless a record. Unless a thoroughly radical reconstruction can take place, it is hardly possible that the Democratic Party can avoid displacement before 1912 by some new, more virile, alignment of the reforming forces of the people.

IDEALISM AND LIFE.

The career of Dr. Edward Caird, whose death we regret to record this week, is one among a hundred illustrations of the influence of personality in guiding his movements of national thought. Dr. Caird was a considerable thinker, but he was first and foremost a great teacher. The best of him was not in his books, or rather it was difficult to appreciate his books, to get through the perfect phraseology to the real experience which it expressed and the human meaning which it was meant to convey, without some personal contact with the writer. This personal contact, however, was enjoyed for a long period of years by the alert and eager Scottish students at Glasgow, and among them by many who have risen to distinction, and even eminence, in the world of thought. Through his pupils Dr. Caird has exercised on the life and thought of our time an influence far more real and extensive than that of many a man who fills twenty times the space in the public mind.

This influence was, as we say, largely due to the personality of the man, the simple heart and the broad, deep mind. Most English philosophical movements are similarly traceable to groups gathering round an individual. Whether we think of the early Radicals grouped around the quaint, ungainly, narrow, but gloriously child-like and honest figure of Bentham, or the first pulse of German mysticism in this country beating high among those who gathered to hear Coleridge "discoursing through his nose of summ-ject and omm-ject," whether we think of the liberalised Benthamism of the younger Mill, or of Dr. Caird's own brother in arms, T. H. Green—in all cases and in both currents of thought we find a personality and a group of disciples at the centre of the movement. The master appeals to the wider public mainly through those in direct personal contact with him.

Philosophic idealism, in particular, owed most of its strength to the personal teaching of two men. Differing in numberless details, and in some fundamental points of method, Edward Caird and T. H. Green were at one in the belief that a solution for the ground problems of modern life, problems of religion, of conduct, and of government, was to be found by following up and developing the method of the German metaphysicians. It was the line to which Coleridge had pointed long before, the line followed, so far as stubborn native irrationalism allowed, by Carlyle. It was taken up anew with far more perfect equipment of scholarship, and the central influence was no longer Kant or Schelling, but Hegel. There is in the movements of thought a tide like that with which we are familiar in politics and practical affairs. There are moments when a particular current has run its course and done its work, when it slackens in its influence on active minds. This is the moment for a new tide of mental energy to bring old questions into a fresh setting, and give a new impulse to thought and action. In the 'seventies the Benthamite Radicalism, even in the newer and more human shape given it by Mill, had, as it were, exhausted its mandate. The conceptions of civil and religious liberty, of political democracy, of local and national autonomy, of legal and moral equality, had become, as ideas, thoroughly familiar. In practice something had been done towards realising them, and men saw, or thought that they saw, to the bottom of them. In particular, the negative conception of the State that was associated with them was going out of date. A quite new demand for collective action was arising, and had obtained practical expression in the Education Act of 1870. A closer and more organic relation between the individual and society was demanded, and men began to look for a theory of the State which should treat it as something more than a glorified policeman guaranteeing liberty merely by compelling its members to refrain from mutual aggression. Such a conception was found by Green and Caird, partly in the Hegelian doctrine of the State, partly in a modernised interpretation of Plato and Aristotle. The corporate life of the community was for them an expression of the personal life of its members. Public duties and private rights became different aspects of the same whole. Liberty became a man's right to make the best of himself, and to make the best of himself was to take a share as a responsible citizen in the life of the State to which he belonged. The idea of a social organism was worked out not on the biological lines which the term suggests, but by tracing it to the ethical and metaphysical principles involved in the notion of personality on the one side and social obligation on the other. A new basis was found for a type of political idealism which avoided the Scylla of the old Manchester individualism without falling into the Charybdis of Marxian materialism.

People say that academic thought does not affect affairs. But here is a body of doctrine which, familiar perhaps only to a few as a system of coherent ideas, has sent waves of influence along a thousand lines and channels of force throughout the field of politics through the space of a generation. At its best, as seen in the work of Green and Caird themselves, idealism has served as a logical framework and setting for the whole progressive movement of our time, justifying and fostering the quickened sense of a common responsibility, not by lowering but rather by heightening the claims of personality, justifying industrial legislation, housing reform, municipal progress, the regulation of the drink traffic, popular education, and at the same time insisting always on the superiority of the progress that a people achieves for itself over the mechanical good government that may be imposed on it from above. Such was the work of idealism at its best. At the same time, it must be admitted that in the hands of men of lesser intellectual and moral stature the same intellectual weapons have been used with hardly less potency, but with much more mixed effects. We can, in fact, recognise in the same doctrine of the State when conceived in more one-sided fashion the basis of the creed which dominates the European reaction. It was William Clarke who first clearly brought out the close affinity between the Hegelian ideal and the Bismarckian practice, and showed how the metaphysician's conception of the State in the centre of practical life was followed in the State system of modern Germany. A similar ideal, not untinged by more materialistic influences, is to be reckoned with in our own Imperialism and the semi-Socialistic Protectionism into which it is now evolving. The old individualism had its weak side, but it lent itself readily, whether in the hands of Bentham or J. S. Mill, of Cobden or Bright, to a generous humanitarianism. The State ideal as readily lends itself to the idea of the self-contained nation, raising its own standard, or seeming to do so, by the perfection of drill and by excluding the competition of the rest of the world. Political parties are not neatly separated off by the distinction of their ideals, and the forces which go to swell the growing influences of Tariff Refform are many and diverse. But it is always well to understand the ideal as well as the practical politics of an opposed party, and to deal with it as it is at its best. He who would so understand the drift of modern Protectionist-Conservatism will do well to follow up the intellectual affiliation thus hinted at, and to realise that underneath the haze of unscientific economics, and behind the materialism of commercial and landed interests, there is also a social ideal, an imperfect ideal, as we think, but still an ideal, of the self-contained State, marshalling its own members in the way in which they should go, but drawing its skirts away from contact with the foreigner.

It is probable that, both on the political and on the distinctly philosophical side, Idealism has now done most of what there was in it to do. Indirectly, but very really, a blow was struck at its influence by the ablest of all the thinkers which it produced. The work of Mr. F. H. Bradley tended, one may say, in the author's own despite to throw doubt on the power of the idealistic method to satisfy the hopes which it had raised, and so paved the way for the rise of Pragmatism, which at present holds the field of interest with a much cheaper and easier method of obtaining intellectual satisfaction. Irrationalism in various shapes is for the moment the dominant note in every department of life, and it is at least as powerful in philosophy as in sociology and in literature. But in the house of thought irrationalism is only a tenant at will. It holds high festival and vastly entertains itself and all the lookers-on with the dexterities of the political sceptic or the platitude-paradoxes of the rollicking journalist. But as soon as men bethink themselves again that life is not a jest nor a dream, and that its problems are neither to be dismissed with an epigram nor judged by the canons of the fairy tale, it has to give place, and once again a philosophy enters into possession. It is well for the world when it is ushered in by men of the calibre of Caird or Green.

IN SIGHT OF A SETTLEMENT.

We hope we may say with some confidence that the Government, with the assent of leading members of Nonconformist bodies on the one hand, and the Church of England, represented by the Primate and the Bishops, on the other, are within sight of an agreement on the Education question. There are differences, but we hope that they will be, and we certainly think that they ought to be, accommodated. The Archbishop has made an offer, which we generally described last week as carrying with it the transfer to the public authority of the rural schools, from which the original grievance of the Nonconformists and the passionate resistance to Mr. Balfour's Act arose. In return, the Primate has asked for a general right of entry for the purposes of denominational teaching in all provided or public schools. In other words, he is willing to establish what we should describe as a Continent of State Schools, with one or two outlying islands in the shape of a few Anglican institutions, desiring to contract out of the general system, and, we suppose, the Catholic schools. The area being thus narrowed, contracting-out could probably be arranged on terms which both the High Anglicans and the Roman Catholics could accept. It is clear, however, that some questions of detail remain. On what terms is the right of entry to be conceded, and who is to give the religious instruction?

On these points it is not surprising to hear that differences have arisen, but we are glad to believe that they are not insuperable. Naturally, a Nonconformist would prefer to place the decision of the question whether any kind of denominational teaching is to be given in a public school in the hands of the Local Authority. This course seems to be open to one grave, and indeed, fatal, objection—that it leaves the religious controversy unsettled, and, therefore, defeats the main purpose of a concordat. The great force behind the Government and the Churches is the national desire for religious peace in the schools, and this could not be assured under a system which would allow the Surrey County Council to go one way and the West Riding Council to go another. Moreover, it seems to us that the Church is entitled to some return for its surrender of the area of control where the battle has raged the fiercest. The Anglican Church is a great and a powerful institution, and by entering into negotiations with it the Government has acknowledged that it has a case, and that that case must be considered even by a Ministry basing itself largely on Nonconformist support. Moreover, by associating themselves with the Conferences the Nonconformist leaders have endorsed the Church's claim to consideration. If, therefore, the right of entry is to be admitted, it is clear, we think, that the national Government must take the responsibility of establishing it. The question remains, Who is to give the religious instruction? The Church naturally asks for the head teacher; Nonconformists might, we imagine, be induced to concede the right to volunteer to a second or assistant teacher. If the Church obtains the victory on the first of the subordinate issues we have described, she might, with the grace and wisdom which she has shown in the latter stages of this controversy, give way on the second. Her statesmen, we imagine, desire, for a variety of reasons—religious, educational, and national—to close the educational war. Now that she has gone so far, and that Nonconformists have advanced so frankly to meet her, the body of public sentiment in favor of peace will, we believe, become irresistible.

The same inducement may, we think, be held out with equal force to the great Nonconformist bodies. Does the settlement we have indicated annul any one principle of their educational policy? We think not. It disposes of tests for teachers. It establishes public control in exchange for public support. It does away with the fixing of purely denominational schools on the rates, and, therefore, with the raison d'être of passive resistance. Against these signal gains must be placed the concession of the right of entry, which, we suppose, will be qualified in some quarters as the admission of the priest into the nation's schools. But, after all, the priest or his representative will only go in to minister to those scholars whose parents desire the special kind of religious teaching for which he stands. Is that unfair? The Nonconformist, to his everlasting credit be it said, has stood in this controversy not for any advantage for his creed, or shade of creed, but for a national system of education. Under the scheme which the Primate and Mr. Runciman have been negotiating we arrive at that desired and desirable goal. Extremists on both sides will find fault with the way that the negotiators have chosen in order to reach it, but we believe that the mass of the British people will acclaim a settlement in the interests equally of religion and of education.

Life and Letters.

SCIENCE AND FAITH.

Has there not been much needless heart-burning in the antagonism between science and religion, much futility of intellectual ingenuity in the efforts to achieve a reconciliation? There are many windows from which man can look out upon the Universe, and every outlook must be different. Science herself has gone far to cancel the old arrogant assumption that only one absolutely true conception of life and the Universe could exist, valid for all persons and all purposes. Everyone is now aware that out of the same objective phenomena each of us makes a different world for himself, to accord with his peculiar interests and needs, selecting and neglecting and imposing his patterns upon the floating mass of raw experience. Each deals with the same loose texture of things, but, taken up at a different point, the fabric falls in different folds and takes a different shape. Why should the religious man and the man of science be expected to see eye to eye? It was only when each of them claimed a supremacy, an objectivity, of vision that a quarrel seemed justifiable. It is time that we should clearly recognise that reconciliation between diverse outlooks has no real meaning. The naturalist and the sportsman in their attitude towards "country life" approach the same subject-matter, have not a little in common in their methods of approach, and yet their temper and purpose are at many points irreconcilable. To the eye of the artist and of the social reformer the disorder and decay of a huddle of medieval streets present scenes of utterly opposed significance. To say that one view is true, the other false, or that some compromise between the two is possible, is recognised at once as destitute of meaning.

It is perhaps natural, however, that science and religion, marching from such diverse poles of intellect and feeling, with historic claims of universal dominion over man, should have come into conflict, and that peace-makers on both side should arise to reconcile and show in true British fashion that both sides were right and that they really "meant the same." But many thoughtful persons are now coming to see that these ingenious reconcilements have not been intellectually convincing, and that a good deal of distortion of scientific law and theological dogmas has taken place in order to furnish buttresses for rhetorical or sentimental bridges of very dubious stability. What we mean is that the time has come when science and religion should submit rather to an abatement of claims than to a reconciliation. Is such abatement possible? Do not both parties assert their superior right to interpret life and the Universe? This is the premiss from which the most recent and the most energetic of the reconcilers from the scientific side, Sir Oliver Lodge, sets forth in his new exposition of his thesis. "Science and Faith." Methuen & Co.)

The controversy, as he represents it, still rests upon "two distinct conceptions of the Universe: the one, that of a self-contained and self-sufficient Universe, with no outlook into, or links with, anything beyond, uninfluenced by any life or mind except such as is connected with a visible and tangible material body; and the other conception, that of a Universe lying open to all manner of spiritual influences, permeated through and through with a Divine spirit, guided and watched by living minds, acting through the medium of law indeed, but with intelligence and love behind the law: a Universe by no means self-sufficient or self-contained, but with sensitive tendrils groping into another supersensuous order of existence, where reign laws hitherto unimagined by science, but laws as real and as mighty as those by which the material Universe is governed."

Now, our criticism is that the trouble has arisen from that intellectual and spiritual pride which has impelled science and religion to regard their functions as requiring them to form conceptions of the Universe, instead of attitudes towards the Universe. The attitudes are not merely consistent, but, in a sense, supplementary; but the conceptions are not fully reconcileable. Science is bound to regard the Universe as self-contained and self-sufficient; her methods require that hypothesis, and even if Sir Oliver Lodge is right in thinking that the scientific view is too narrow, and requires enlargement by admitting free relations with another order of existence, science will and must continue to regard this larger Universe as self-contained and an area for the operation of "scientific law." On the other hand, attempts to force the spiritual emotions into a "distinct conception of the Universe," because their operation seems to imply certain ideas about the purposes of life, is surely an endeavour to make religion do the work which belongs not to her, nor, indeed, to science, but to philosophy. In other words, a distinct, complete, and consistent "system of thought," such as Sir Oliver imagines, cannot be obtained by expanding, piecing, and harmonising laws and doctrines of orthodox science and orthodox religion; for though each, in a sense, uses the whole of life, the use it makes is different in kind. Science uses "life," i.e., experience, for discovering and formulating such regulations as serve for the practical conduct of human life, for though pretence is sometimes made of "disinterested science," it is, in fact, nothing else than a contradiction in terms, implying an unattainable sort of truth. Religion, on the other hand, uses life as food for emotional discipline and expression, for direct sympathy with the operations of a larger life, the pulsations of which it feels directly in contact with humanity, with Nature, and with all large elements of ordered life which suggest or represent a spiritual whole in its unity of working. Since no emotion is utterly divorced from the intellectual element, it would be wrong to say that the advance of science towards a formal interpretation of the Universe has no reaction upon the religious sentiment. But those most familiar with the literature of religion will be aware how little the growth of intellectual wealth has affected the more precious elements in the religious life, how entirely modern, for example, are such works as "The Confessions of St. Augustine" or Pascal's "Pensées." This should, at least, suggest to us that a greatly exaggerated importance has been given to endeavors to reconcile an intellectual interpretation for purposes of ordinary material life with an emotional intuition into spiritual life.

The correspondence of material and spiritual, attested by the close interaction between mind and matter, even the reduction of all matter to terms of something like consciousness, do not really meet the difficulty, which lies deeper than Sir Oliver Lodge seems to recognise in his effort "to evolve a system of thought." For his doctrine of Divine immanence, almost essential to a "scientific" conception of a spiritual system, seems impossible to reconcile with a view of Divine guidance such as will justify his conviction of the efficacy of prayer, a cardinal doctrine of his creed for which he labors much to find a scientific support. For any thorough-going correspondence of material and spiritual would seem to require so diffused a "guidance" that each ion or atom must be accorded its own angel, and though the more complex constitution of matter in cell, organ, organism, and super-organism, might lend itself to a hierarchy of spiritual units, it is difficult to regard this as other than a mechanical structure of the spiritual world, or as fraught with any real significance for the religious life. A not less serious difficulty is involved in the notion of a "limited" Deity, to which Sir Oliver is sometimes driven to commit himself. How is Divine immanence really consistent with a universe which "is struggling towards a perfection not yet attained," and which contains "defects for which he is in some sort responsible"? A power engaged in curing defects and struggling with refractory elements cannot be immanent in any proper sense. Nor can we believe that Sir Oliver has firmly grasped the logic of Evolution when he regards the Whole, the Universe itself, destitute as it is of all environment, as capable of Evolution.

To such quagmires are those brought who, following the specious application of natural laws in the spiritual world, seek to draw the two aspects of life into a common "system." The ultimate reason why no such reconcilement is possible lies in the fact that while Science approaches Man and the Universe by laws which in the last resort are quantitative measurements, Faith approaches them not as quantities but as values, by processes of direct experience. It is true that we may by convenient metaphor apply certain conceptions of science to the spiritual life, as, for instance, did Emerson in his laws of compensation and polarity; and other analogies of physical causation are applicable through psychology. But the science of psychology is not religion, and no extension of modes of measurement can really assist in shedding light upon the life of faith or in working it into an intellectual system.

THE SOUL OF CITIES.

A DEAL of building has been done on this island for which there is little now to show. Last week, for instance, if among the greys and browns of windy autumn, you had happened to be crossing a quiet hill in Berkshire, you would have seen a score of men digging long trenches, about four foot deep, at right angles up and down a large fallow: and here and there at the bottom of the trenches you would have found the bases of ancient walls, revealed to the light of day after fourteen centuries of dark forgetfulness. A little further on you would have come to a chaos of grassy heaps and mounds. One of the diggers might have told you, "The Duke of Wellington made them there things," and your thoughts would have gone back to Uncle Toby fortifying the bowling green in the similitude of all the Netherland towns in turn; for you would naturally have supposed that the Duke used these mounds to illustrate Peninsular victories and the lines of Torres Vedras, when distinguished visitors came to call at Stratfield Saye.

But you would have been wrong. These were no labored rampart-lines; they were but toys which the Duke forgot to put away. For, after the world's earthquake at Waterloo, the great World-victor's victor spent much of his time in making little chasms in that field to discover the remains of a vanished city. There is something pleasant and childlike in this occupation for such a man—something reminding one of Stevenson's hopes that when he had grown to man's estate he would tell the other girls and boys not to meddle with his toys—and one likes to think of the iron hero sitting among the ruins of the Roman Empire. For the hand of Rome had been laid upon that hill, and the score of men, who seemed to be running drain-pipes, were uncovering the traces of it. Nineteen summers they have sunk those trenches to the foundations of old walls. During all those years upon that Berkshire hill, without afforestation or the erosion of a sea coast, the problem of unemployment has been solved, and it is Rome that has done it.

There the city stood, humming with Welshmen, held and governed by foreigners bred on the Tiber, just as India is held by foreigners bred on the Thames, and of its long and busy life—as long as from Columbus down to ourselves—there is scarcely a recorded word. It was an old city when it went below ground, but we know more of Old Parr than of it. An ancient farmhouse now stands above its eastern gate, and as soon as the foundations of its walls are uncovered and mapped, they are covered up again, that crops may grow over them. Yet the foundations of great flints cemented together show a carefully planned municipality, with little square houses and courts and streets, and, one supposes, a market, a temple or two, and a church of later date. All round the hundred acres of the city ran a great wall, still visible in parts for five or six feet above the surface, and at one corner of the wall stood an amphitheatre, now a grassy bowl, where wild beasts, gladiators, and martyrs gave their entertainments.

A city carefully planned, as though its design sprang from a single brain: and it seems never to have changed or spread beyond its walls throughout the living age of its oblivion. It is not so we build our cities now. Here and there, once in a century, someone, like Mrs. Barnett designing her Garden Suburb, may catch a shadow of Dido's joys in building Carthage. But such fortune is rare, and few among us get a chance of playing charming games with a box of bricks when we are grown up. For lack of this personal interest in design and construction, with what dreary monotony our modern cities grow! Stretching out over abandoned fields in long-drawn suburbs of ignoble decency, they add street to street, only to magnify their hideousness and their ground-rent. And beyond the iron railings of the suburbs we scatter at random over whole counties those well-to-do residences that flaunt a picturesqueness of crazy gables and hillsides of roof, fit habitations for angular and cranky souls. It is the same at the centre. If you asked a magician to set you down in modern Frankfort, or Vienna, or Lyons, or Marseilles, or Brussels, or Dresden, or Rome herself, it would not much matter where he translated you. Unless you inquired of the monotonous passers-by in electric trams, you would never guess through which city they were whirling. Nowhere would you find a trace of the distinct personality —the separation of character that should mark all cities as it should mark all men. Or, if there were a touch of individuality at all, it would be the smearing touch of the dead hand that Haussmann laid on Paris.

Berlin maintains a certain rigid and academic temperament, and under its lime trees, as at a meeting of the Charity Organisation Society, you may still feel that if you are good you will be happy. But what a dusty change from Constantinople, where every stone is alive with the generous and incalculable personality of the Arabian Nights! In that contrast is revealed the individual nature which every true city should possess. On entering a city you ought to know it by its very smell, and in the case of all noble cities there is a certain point at which you find, as it were, its name written on its heart. Where you touch that point you reach the character that great builders would unconsciously preserve throughout the city's growth, and, as a rule, the point is obvious enough, for history has naturally centred round it. So it may be some basking Square of the Sun, gay with beggars, or a hill of sparkling domes and sonorous bells, or a castle couchant on a rock high above the smoke, or a covered bridge, or the darkening ghosts of spires and palaces in the grey mists of a river. The moment those things are seen, there is no mistaking the city of which they are the heart. Its life is there summarised, its personality can be felt, and it speaks with its own voice as distinctly as one soul may speak to another, although in silence.

At such moments we may realise what it meant to the sailor when he rounded Sunium through the purple water and greeted the gleaming rock where Athene with her spear watched over the most beautiful work of man; or what it meant to pass daily in and out under the lions above the haunted gate of Mycenæ; or to be a citizen of that Median town which stood like a circular rainbow upon the plain, the battlements of its seven concentric walls each rising higher than the other, and showing each a more brilliant color than the last, whether of scarlet, blue, sardonyx, or gold. Certainly, the human soul lives isolated in its own citadel, separate and aloof; but we cannot suppose that the inhabitants of such cities remained uninfluenced in the temper of their own personality by the spirit of their home.

And now, while the famous cities of Europe and our own country are growing as indistinguishable as Kaffir kraals, we have Mr. John Burns meditating his Town Planning Bill, and here was Mr. Patrick Geddes the other day lecturing to the Sociological Society how the thing should be done. Being, we believe, Professor of Things in General at Dundee, which was once so emphatically called Bonnie, he has long devoted himself to showing the provosts, or baillies, or whatever they have in Dundee, how they may recover and preserve the special character of bonniness, which jute-sacking, or marmalade, or whatever they make in Dundee, appears to have lost them. And, having started Dundee upon the right way, he has come to our southern regions to bestow on us the same guidance, with a voice persuasive as Amphion's lyre that harmoniously built the walls of Thebes.

His object is what we have tried to explain—to preserve the character of every city and town as it grows; not to allow the lives of man's noblest and most distinctive creations to lie at the mercy of jerry-builders at so much a square foot, or of Borough Councillors with Haggerston's ideals, but to tend the unfolding of a city as carefully as a queen's. With charts and maps and those statistics of existence that can be made the romance of knowledge, he would have us become acquainted with all the ancient and present life of the town. So far, others have taught the same, and there are few documents of such pleasurable interest as the old maps of cities, with houses and churches as they stood, swans on the still lakes, and historic boats navigating the rivers. They rival the Hereford map of the world, with the Cross of Calvary at its centre, and the stream of Ocean rushing round its circumference full of monsters. But Professor Geddes takes us to maps of the future, and shows us with what careful foresight the municipalities must carry forward their city's life under the proposed new Act. Let us hear his purpose in his own words:—

> "For this new danger (crude plans of monotony or imitation) there is one remedy and only one—that of instituting the Civic Survey. For its immediate result is to bring out into clear and public view the individuality of its town—manifest from its position and from its past (and this in even so-called new cities), and still latent, however incrusted by neglect or overlaid by importation. That each townlet, still more each city, has its own personality, is no doubt too much forgotten, both there and at its dominant capital."

There stands the spirit of the perfect builder—the same spirit that designed the Roman city long hidden by the Berkshire ploughs. In this spirit the new Town Planning Bill may help the future Borough Councillor, like Blake and Professor Geddes, to build Jerusalem in England's green and pleasant land. Only it must, before all things, be an English Jerusalem! And then, as the lines of coming greatness are well and truly laid, the Borough Councillor who can utter his "Vixi," and, imitating the queen who killed herself for love, can exclaim, "I have established a noble city; I have seen my walls arise."

THE NAMING OF FLOWERS.

THERE can be no greater evidence of the mental vitality of our medieval forefathers, of their vivacious play of fancy, and their keen delight in natural things, than is to be found in the popular names given to common flowers in old England, and, indeed, in all European lands. A comparison of these old-world names with the names of new varieties in a seedsman's catalogue of the present day suggests that this imaginative delight in nature, this observant fancy and quick seizing of resemblances, this joy in lore and legend and sacred thoughts, has completely died out of the human mind. The old names, of course, were coined by the people, and came from a great traditional culture which they all shared in common. The new ones are the creations of individual gardeners and botanists, whose efforts at nomenclature may be described by a slight variation of a verse of the Psalms, "They called the flowers after their own names." Roughly speaking, all new flowers since the sixteenth century are the blossoming advertisements of Swedish botanists, German professors, American millionaires, and Scottish gardeners.

The old folk-names belong to a more blithe and cheery, a more simple and kindly, a more honest and modest world. Many of them come from the world of fairy tales, the world in which the village lad sets out in the March morning to find a treasure and win a princess, in which kings and cats and millers hold familiar intercourse. To take the first that comes to mind—the name "foxglove" has in it the very secret of enchantment. It is hardly too much to say that when such a name was coined the whole people was composed of Rudyard Kiplings, who, without knowing it, were always making "Jungle-Books." "Foxglove" is a name that could not be coined at the present day. If the flower were discovered to-day in the Himalayas by a botanist named "Fox," or grown at great expense in the conservatories of a politician of the same name, it would, doubtless, be called "foxia." (This, by the way, was the case with the "fuchsia," so far back as 1542.) The French popular name for foxgloves is still more delightful. They are "les gants de Nôtre Dame," "les doigtiers de Nôtre Dame." "Snapdragon" is another example of the same quaint Gothic fancy. There is a dusky, velvety flower once frequently seen in cottage gardens, which, to the present day, the writer only knows by its old-fashioned cottage name of "blackamoor's beauty." In this name there is the soul of all the popular romance about the East, coming down from the time of the Crusades. This play of fancy is seen again in the name "southernwood." From the plant, with its delightful fragrance, home-keeping country folk must have caught a suggestion of all the aromatic woods of the South, of islands of sandal wood and clove trees.

In these old world names the flowers are all alive. They are often directly personified, as in "ragged Robin," or, again, in "ragged Jock." In Fernan Caballero's Spanish romances there is frequent mention of a flower named "Dom Pedro," which dictionaries give no help in identifying. It is an excellent name for a flower, and suggests something very pompous and sumptuous, all scarlet and yellow. The "sweet William" of English cottage gardens is a lover untimely slain, or, perhaps, the boy martyr, William of Norwich, one of the Christian children supposed to be slain by Jews, like "young Hugh of Lincoln," or Simon of Trent, who so moved the pity of our medieval forefathers. "Sweet Nancy" is a name sometimes given by old-fashioned country people to the Madonna lily. In Russia there is some sort of cornflower, mentioned by Tolstoy, called by the very sacred name of "Ivan-da-Marya," John and Mary, Mary and John.

Flowers were often humanised by being called after some article of daily use, as gloves or slippers, mirrors or girdles. Often, again, they were named from the human eyes or hair. To take some examples only of this last. "Maiden hair" is a delightful one. The Italian equivalent is "Capelvenere"—"Venus's hair." In Germany the wild briony is "Engelshaar," "angels' hair," and in France it is "cheveux de la Vierge." Among ourselves the same plant is "old man's beard," and in Flanders "barbe du bon Dieu," no doubt from the grey flowing beard in pictures of the Eternal Father.

The difference between the old and the modern names is that the old names all show love for the flower itself, and delight in it, the new ones witness to the desire to exploit it for the profit or glory of some individual. "Mignonette," for instance, is the "little darling." To-day, as likely as not, if it appeared for the first time, it would be called "Rockefellia." Time was when the people named the daisy, "the eye of day," the eye of the sun. The resemblance would not strike our own populace at the present time, either in town or country. It is questionable whether a sunflower would be named a sunflower in England in our own day. Far more probably it would be dubbed "Smithsonia," or "Simpsonia," or "Proudia," and would pass into France, Italy, and Spain under some such name of darkness instead of tournesol, mirasol, girasol. "Meadow-sweet," again, is a name full of delight in the flower itself, and even more charming is the French "reine des près." The same story is told by the "traveller's joy," but perhaps the best example of all is found in "speedwell." Our forefathers in Old England saw in the blue patch by the wayside not only a bit of delightful color, but a hint of Nature's kindness, Nature's greeting to the wayfarer, which one likes to think often really cheered and helped him on his way.

The belief in the sacredness of herbs and flowers is a world-old thing. The word "verbena," for instance, meant originally "a sacred bough." It is curious to find that the "vervain" was known in England as the "holy herb." There was a folk-charm or rhyme:—

> "Hail to thee, holy herb,
> Growing on the ground,
> On the Mount of Olives
> First wert thou found;
> Thou art good for many an ill,
> And healest many a wound,
> In the name of sweet Jesus,
> I lift thee from the ground."

To pious fancy, the Mount of Olives, trodden by the Blessed Feet, was carpeted with all fragrant and health-giving herbs. But they saw sacred meanings in all flowers. It is unnecessary to dwell on such well-known examples as "Star of Bethlehem" or "Marygold." But in the old name "archangel" for the yellow-flowering dead nettle is there not a suggestion of the lily held out by Gabriel to Mary, the stingless and thornless flower? A medieval writer says of Martha of Bethany that "she cured the sick with that same herb which the Scripture says she planted in the garden in order to recall to mind Blessed Jesus, when she could not see Him."

The flowers appear to suggest no sacred thoughts to anybody now. Our modern seedsman's catalogue is dreary reading, with its dahlias, zinnias, deutsias, freesias, galtonias, cattleyas, clematis jackmanni. The dahlia gets its ugly name from a Swede named Dahl. The name of this eminent Scandinavian botanist does not increase the joy of the world. Who or what the zinnia is named from Heaven knows! With its suggestion of tin it is, however, a quite good enough name for the metallic, scentless flower. "Cattleya," again, seems a suitable name for a flower so devoid of charm as the orchid is. Latin flower-names, indeed, at their best are hard and unsympathetic, while the Greek names possess an extraordinary beauty. They are beautiful in themselves, and have often most beautiful associations. Think, for instance, of such names as anemone, crocus, adonis, narcissus, hyacinth, daphne, iris, corydalis, amaryllis, asphodel! It is hard to tell how much of the charm of these flowers comes from their intrinsic beauty, and how much from the beauty of their names. There can be no greater fallacy than the statement that what we call a rose by any other name will smell as sweet. The cattleya and the clarksia can never form part of the poetry of the world, nor could they if they were fifty times as beautiful as they are. But the names that have come from the Greek mythology and the romantic popular names of Christendom do, indeed, paint the lily and add a perfume to the violet.

IN PRAISE OF CATS.

It is the final proof of the civilisation of the French that they have learned to understand the cat. In no country, since the dog-loving Greeks overthrew the maturer culture of Egypt, has she been a popular idol, or extorted the reverence of crowds. But in France, at least, there is literary testimony in her favor, and the French intellect has bestowed upon the task of comprehending her a talent and a devotion, which we have squandered on the horse and the dog. Balzac described the passion of one of Napoleon's veterans in Egypt for a leopardess, with a sureness of insight and a depth of feeling that proclaim him a devotee of the cat tribe. Gautier has been eloquent and fantastic about the cat. Loti has been tender and graceful, and his essay on the death of an aged cat has a sincerity and truth which are wanting in his sugared writing about Oriental women. A man must put self aside who loves a cat; there is in all the range of sentiment no emotion so entirely disinterested. We have before us a small volume of minor verse which carries this distinguished tradition yet a little further.* It is a eulogy, relieved by humor and marked by what is rarer still, a nice and accurate study of cats. M. Alfred Ruffin not only loves cats; he loves them for the true reasons. He loves them for their grace and their elegance, reverences their self-sufficiency and their sublimity, accepts their egoism, and feels a becoming awe at the concentration of diabolic vigor which can reveal itself, under the stress of passion, in the limbs of a fireside Tom. He sings the mistress whom no praise can corrupt, the friend whose intimacy flatters no human vanity. He paints her amid rare vases and works of art, admiring herself more than any masterpiece. He delights to tell of her ravages among his precious china, and exclaims, as he contemplates the sublimity of her indifference, "One might as well accuse the pyramids." He tells of the mingled prudence and courage with which she meets the perils of a street, where every journey is an anabasis through barbarian lands. He dwells with a sane and restrained tenderness on the rare moments in her relations with her human servants, when her habitual tolerance warms into an almost maternal affection.

* "Le Livre des Chats," Par Alfred Ruffin. Paris: Alphonse Lemerre.

It is doubtless because we are an Imperial people that we have taken as our patron Saint George, who was in the flesh a not impeccable army contractor. For the same reason we maintain a patriotic cult of the dog. The dog is the tame native among beasts, the national scout in the politics of the animal world. He has been conquered, and he tells us for ever that he is glad to be conquered. He declares with every ripple of his tail that we are the superior race. He wears his collar like a uniform of khaki. He bands himself in traitorous packs to pursue his fellow animals for our service. He hunts his brother, the fox, as the "tame" Boers hunted De Wet. He has the air, when he begs on his haunches for a bone, of appealing to us to take up the white man's burden. All his service is a flattery, all his friendship a servility. He graduated for his post in society before ever man had tamed him. He tamed himself in the life of gregarious packs, in which the old bullied the young and the weak fawned on the strong. The cat, on the other hand, has emerged from no shameful gregarious past. He was ever an individual, and even civilisation cannot corrupt him. Even in his loves he is resolutely exogamous, and refuses to contract a permanent tie or bend himself to domesticity. Of one thing only is a fighting Tom afraid, and that is a newly-born kitten. Never, unless he is actually starving, will he stoop to feign gratitude or ape servility. It is a common superstition that the cat when he rubs upon a human leg is indulging in an act of flattery. He does indeed flatter, but he flatters only himself. The act, combined with that same arching of the back which makes him in combat terrible and great, is really a self-centred expression of satisfaction or pleasurable expectation. For once that he rubs himself upon a human leg at such times, he rubs twice upon a chair or a tree. He is not stroking the leg to flatter it: he is stroking himself by means of the leg. Equally ill-observed is the current notion that his chronic disobedience and his failure to come at call are due to some want of intelligence. It is his profound individualism, his triumphant self-sufficiency, which make him disdain to obey or to learn tricks like a dog.

To respect the cat is the beginning of the æsthetic sense. At a stage of culture when utility governs all its judgments, mankind prefers the dog. Let it advance to a level at which it can admire an object of beauty with a disinterested passion, and it will venerate this egoist among animals, who suffices for himself. Only in the mouth of the egoist is egoism in others a matter of reproach. To the cultivated mind the cat has the charm of completeness, the satisfaction which makes a sonnet more than an epic, a fugue more than a rhapsody. The ancients figured eternity as a snake biting its own tail. There will yet arise a philosopher who will conceive the Absolute as a gigantic and self-satisfied cat, purring as it clasps in a comfortable round its own perfections, and uttering as it purrs that line of Edmund Spenser's about the Cosmos—"It loved itself, because itself was fair."

There is, however, a deeper reason why the cat is, in the domestic hierarchy, a relatively unpopular animal. It is not content to stand aloof from all human activities; it views them with a disquieting disdain. It is the anchorite who makes our luxuries foolish, the anarchist who rebukes our organisations and our politics. The dog, within the limits of his understanding, must share in all we do, scratch when we dig and retrieve when we hunt. When his understanding fails him, he looks at us with a mute appeal for enlightenment, like some Galatea waiting for the breath of life. The cat in the same circumstances stares severely, winks one eye, and goes to sleep. More than the lilies of the field she rebukes us for our care for the morrow. The student Faust in the old engravings had always a human skull among the vain instruments and the barren alembics in his study. A cat blinking at midnight among your papers and your books declares with more eloquence than any skull the vanity of knowledge and uselessness of striving. Mahomet, nursing a cat one day, was minded to rise upon some great errand of revelation or conquest. But, man of action though he was, he was Oriental enough to value her passivity. He cut off the sleeve of his robe, and left her seated on it. There comes to those who love a cat a further questioning, which is the paralysis of all morality. Why, after all, should one rise at all, and what is worth the sacrifice of a sleeve? The cat enjoys the march of seasons, spins through space with the stars, and shares in her quietism the inevitable life of the universe. In all our hurrying, can we do more? She sits among creative work, the indolent spectator of our progress, blinking at our questions the malicious eyes of a sphinx. And the real secret of the Sphinx, one suspects, was that she alone knew that there was no riddle to answer.

THE DEAD MAN.

In the Spring of the year 1950, a lawyer and his friend were sitting over their wine and walnuts. The lawyer said: "In turning over my father's papers the other day, I came across this cutting from a journal. It is dated December, 1908. Rather a singular document. If you like I'll read it to you."

"Do," said the friend.

The lawyer began to read:—

'Some sensation was caused in a London Police Court yesterday by a poorly dressed, but respectable-looking man, who applied to the magistrate for advice. We give the conversation verbatim:—

"Your Worship, may I ask you a question?"

"If it is one that I can answer."

"It's just this: Am I alive?"

"Go away!"

"Your Worship, I am perfectly serious. It's a matter of vital importance to me to know; I am a chain-maker."

"Are you sane?"

"Your Worship, I am quite sane."

"Then what do you mean by coming here and asking me a question like that?"

"Your Worship, I am out of work."

"What has that to do with it?"

"Your Worship, it's like this. I've been out of work, through no fault of my own, for two months. Your Worship has heard, no doubt, that there are hundreds of thousands of us chaps."

"Well, go on!"

"Your Worship, I don't belong to a Union; as you know, there's no Union to my trade."

"Yes, yes."

"Your Worship, I came to the end of my resources three weeks ago. I've done my best to get work, but I've not been successful."

"Have you applied to the Distress Committee of your district?"

"I have, your Worship; but they are full-up."

"Have you been to the Parish Authorities?"

"Yes, your Worship; and to the parson."

"Haven't you any relations or friends to help you?"

"Half of them, your Worship, are in my condition, and I've exhausted the others."

"You've——?"

"Exhausted the others—had all they could spare."

"Have you a wife and children?"

"No, your Worship; that's against me, it makes me come in late everywhere."

"Yes, yes—well, you have the Poor Law; you have the right to——"

"Your Worship, I have been in two of those places—but last night dozens of us were turned away for want of accommodation. Your Worship, I am in need of food; have I the right to work?"

"Only under the Poor Law."

"I've told you, sir, I couldn't get in there last night. Can't I force anybody else to give me work?"

"I'm afraid not."

"Your Worship, I'm very badly in want of food; will you allow me to beg in the streets?"

"No, no; I can't. You know I can't."

"Well, your Worship, may I steal?"

"Now, now; you mustn't waste the time of the Court."

"But, your Worship, it's very serious to me; I'm literally starving, I am indeed! Will you allow me to sell my coat or trousers——" Unbuttoning his coat, the applicant revealed his bare chest. "I've nothing else to——"

"You mustn't go about in an indecent state; I can't allow you to go outside the law."

"Well, sir, will you give me permission, anyway, to sleep out at night, without being taken up for vagrancy?"

"Once for all, I have no power to allow you to do any of these things."

"What am I to do, sir, then? I'm telling you the truth. I want to keep within the law. Can you give me advice how to go on living without food?"

"I wish I could."

"Well, then, I ask you, sir: In the eyes of the law, am I alive at all?"

"That is a question, my man, which I cannot answer. On the face of it, you appear to be alive only if you break the law; but I trust you will not do that. I am very sorry for you; you can have a shilling from the box. Next case!"

. . . The lawyer stopped.

"Yes," said his friend, "that is very interesting; very singular indeed. Curious state of things!"

JOHN GALSWORTHY.

Letters from Abroad.

THE NEW GERMAN TAXES.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The utterance of the Kaiser as revealed by the "Daily Telegraph" has made a protest against the irresponsible direction of the diplomatic affairs of the Empire inevitable. In relation to the political parties at home William II. has fallen between two stools. Those who most heartily sympathise with his endeavors to improve the relations of Germany and Great Britain are the most decided opponents of personal government and the policy of unlimited armaments, and those who most frantically support the Kaiser's naval programme and boast of unswerving attachment to the Monarchy are disgusted with the civility, or, as they allege, the obsequiousness, of their lord and master towards haughty Britannia.

British readers are now informed as to the criticisms of the leading papers of the Empire on this topic. They are only a feeble echo of what is everywhere said in private about the Kaiser's latest indiscretion—a general feeling that the matter must be discussed at the earliest opportunity in the Parliament of the Empire. The Reichstag does not possess the institution of questions as it is in use in the British Parliament. But questions of importance can, by general agreement, be put as Interpellationen on the agenda of an early meeting, and the discussion of the Budget offers many other opportunities to broach matters of this kind. Thus we shall soon hear the controversy opened from the tribune of the Reichstag and the Ministerial Bench. But he would be a very sanguine person who would expect any change in the constitutional system of the Empire from these debates. "We have not yet arrived at this point," as Bismarck used to say.

For the moment the most urgent political question of the hour is that of Imperial Finance. Two years after the grant of 1906, which consisted of seven new taxes, to the amount of 160 millions of marks a year, the Exchequer requests an additional yearly increase of over 500 millions of marks in order to make both ends meet. The official Bill will be out in a few days, but from what has been communicated to the Press considerably less than the fifth part of that amount will be covered by direct or semi-direct taxation. An Imperial Estate Duty will bring in some 45 millions of marks—considering the remarkable increase of the wealth of the nation, a ridiculously paltry impost. And yet the agrarians have already raised their voice against it. It will, they say, "undermine family life" and damage agriculture by imposing unbearable fiscal burdens on agricultural holdings.

But this is mere bluff. Apart from the smallness of the tax, there is not the slightest doubt that the Ministerial Bill will protect agrarian interests wherever possible. The law of 1906 on succession duty has shown this favoritism to satiety. Not only do the prescriptions as to assessment favor land in every respect. Agricultural holdings, large as well as small, are assessed only according to the actual revenue they bring in, whilst all the property is assessed at its common or market value, and landholders are allowed exceptional facilities in regard to payment in instalments. Another consideration is that no duty has to be paid at all where agricultural property has changed hands by death within five years, and only half the duty is imposed where the previous change by death took place within ten years of the new decease. Similar provisions will assuredly be found in the present Bill or inserted by the Reichstag where the agrarian interest is all powerful. The outcry of the agrarians would be incomprehensible if it were not known how they detest the official inventory the estate duty would involve. It might reveal the fact that the pet children of the German legislation are, after all, not so badly off as they pretend to be.

How much the legislator protects them is also shown in the provisions of the Bill on the Imperial monopoly in the wholesale trade in spirits, which is to supplant the present spirit duties, and will yield the Exchequer yearly a hundred millions of marks more than spirits bring in to-day. In principle, this Bill is, next to the Bill on estate duties, the least objectionable of all the measures intended to constitute the great scheme of financial "reform." Even those who generally oppose monopolies cannot say much against it. For the proposed monopoly will only take the place of an existing one represented by the syndicate of the German distillers and their selling office, the Zentrale für Spiritus Verwertung (the Central Office for the sale of spirits).

This syndicate, the Spiritus-Ring, as it is called, controls 85 per cent. of the German spirit production, and owes its existence and great power to the protective character of the present spirit duties with their famous benevolences.

At present the Empire raises three duties on spirits. The one is the Brennsteuer (distilling duty), and is raised progressively, according to the quantity of spirit produced by the distiller. The second is the Maischraumsteur (duty on the mash-tun), and is raised according to the size of the distilling tun (or vat), wherein the mash ferments, at the rate for each new charge (filling) of 1 mark 31 pf. the hectolitre. The third is the Verbrauchsabgabe (consumption duty). This tax is raised from that portion of the spirit produced that leaves the factory in a state in which it can be manufactured into liquors to be consumed within the Empire itself. The rate is 50 marks the hectolitre for a certain quantity ("contingency"), covering only about nine-tenths of this portion of the spirit, and of 70 marks the hectolitre for the rest of it—the "super-contingent." The amount of this "contingency" was revised from time to time, according to the fluctuations in the consumption, and the share of each distiller in it settled in conjunction with the authorities.

By this system, and a proportionately high import duty, the wholesale price of the spirit meant for consumption was always kept at 70 marks per hectolitre, above the actual producing costs, and the producers—i.e., the distiller-agriculturists—could pocket the margin of 20 marks for the "contingent" taxed only 50 marks the hectolitre. As the "contingent" was always over two million hectolitres, this extra profit amounted in the whole to over 40 millions of marks a year!

This is the famous "benevolence" (Liebesgabe in German) to the distillers. The proposed Imperial monopoly would do away with it in its present form, but it would not do away with the principle of favoring the agrarian distillers. To win them over it is proposed in the Bill to pay them a compensation for the old disappearing "benevolences" of 200 millions of marks, payable in ten annual instalments. Secondly, the State —i.e., the Empire—will in future buy from them the "contingent" of spirit at a price covering the producing costs, and leaving out of account the very valuable residue of the distilling process. The producing costs will be calculated on the basis of a well-conducted agricultural distillery having an output of 800 hectolitres, bigger distilleries getting less and smaller ones more per hectolitre of their output. What they produce above their share of the "contingency" will be paid less, and be used for exportation. Of the non-agricultural (refining) distilleries, some of the best ones will be bought by the State and be worked by it, whilst the rest will probably, until a later time, be allowed to continue in existence, and work for the State at conditions it may prescribe. The compensation given to the non-agricultural distilleries will not be proportioned to their profits made during a period of some years, but to the present conditions of the market, which are much less favorable than until the present year.

You see how differently the agriculturists and the mere industrial distillers are treated. There are some good reasons why the latter should not get more than is intended to give them; but that the agriculturists, already protected in so many ways, should be compensated for the loss of an absolutely unearned benefit is still less justifiable. It must not be forgotten that the agriculturists having distilleries are only a section of their class. It is not agriculture all round that is benefited by the described favors, but only certain classes of the agricultural population, and they will in the future be in the agreeable position of producers to whom the State guarantees a good profit, freeing them at the same time from any commercial risk.

Here you have some of the bad features of the proposed legislation on spirits. To the price paid to the distillers and the cost of refining, the State will add such an impost that the selling price to the dealers and the manufacturers of drinks will, on the whole, bring to the Empire a revenue of about 250 millions instead of 150 millions. It is estimated that it will have as a result a certain decrease in the consumption, and from the point of view of the fight against alcoholism, this would seem to be an advantage. But it is to be feared that the higher price will, with the mass of the poor, result only in the consumption of worse mixtures than those consumed now. Unless the price is raised to a prohibitive level which the agrarian interest will not allow, the mere increase is hardly the proper means to fight the drinking habits of the people. There is the smaller prospect of this result inasmuch as the comparatively less harmful competitors of spirits—to wit, beer and wine—will also be loaded with new taxes.

Wine will in future yield 30 millions, beer 100 millions more revenue. The tax on beer has, in the shape of an increased malt tax, already been increased in 1906, and the cost has risen also through the new duties on barley, maize, and other requirements for brewing. But thus far the retail price of beer has not visibly risen since the malt tax was graduated, and heavy competition, in consequence of a declining consumption, has compelled the brewers and the publicans to reduce other expenses in order to avoid an increase in their selling price. It is impossible to expect that the new tax will leave things in this respect as they are. In order to yield 100 millions of marks surplus it must be four times the increase of 1906, and this must, one way or the other, react on the price or the quality of the product, if not on both. Experience leads to the conclusion that the final result most probably will be heavier beer and the replacement of many of the present cheap restaurants by drinking bars. Cheap beer provided Germany with numbers of cheap and pleasant restaurants, where people could have good meals at astonishingly moderate prices, the profit on beer paying the working expenses. Our rulers will change all that. They insist that we shall become a dear country, and change our habits accordingly.

Consequently the cigar, too, must be made dearer. Having increased the tax on cigarettes and cut tobacco in 1906, the legislator is now going to tax cigars. A tax raised in the form of stamped packings and banderols shall yield 60 millions of marks. Counting the present taxes, tobacco will then on the whole pay about 140 to 150 millions of marks into the Imperial Exchequer. And, in order to leave no luxury untaxed, the new Chancellor of the Exchequer has worked out the draft of a tax on lighting, gas, electric light, and electric power, which will make modern light and power dearer by over 5 per cent. A graduated tax on advertisements and placards, and a tax on people freed from military service in the shape of an additional duty on their estates, round off the bunch of new taxes which the Reichstag will have to vote or replace by others.

There is little need to criticise them here. They criticise themselves. If some of them leave the taxpayer less burdened than he is in Great Britain, it must not be forgotten that the German consumer pays some 300 millions of marks in taxes on the necessaries of life which are untaxed in Great Britain. True, he pays only part of this amount into the Imperial Exchequer. Four-fifths, if not five-sixths, of it go into the pocket of the landowners. We increase the cost of living all round.

There is much grumbling about it. Everyone is dissatisfied, and those interested in the articles threatened with new taxation raise their voice in more or less fiery protests. Great slackness of trade strengthens their objections, and it is not impossible that one or other of the proposed taxes may be rejected. But, on the whole, the Government will get what it demands. Protectionist, Militarism, and Marinism mean increasing Budgets, and as long as the majority of the nation indulges in these luxuries, it must foot the bill. No doubt many begin to reflect who until now were very loud in swelling the "hurrahs." But from this to a decided change of political color is still a long distance.—Yours, &c.,

ED. BERNSTEIN.

The Drama.

MR. JONES PHILOSOPHISES.

IN the theatrical history of the year 1908, the great event, beyond a doubt, has been the Coming of Maugham. I say Maugham without pre-name or prefix, because it is not the individual man I have in mind (if, indeed, he exist, which seems doubtful), but rather a type and a tendency. "Somerset Maugham"—an improbable combination on the face of it—would seem to be the title of a syndicate. When three or four theatres are occupied by works of the syndicate, and there is danger that the registered title may pall on the public, another pseudonym, such as "Roy Horniman" or "H. H. Davies," is adopted for additional productions. H. H. Davies was in bygone days the name of a playwright of some individuality; but the syndicate seems to have swallowed him up and assimilated him. The activity of Maugham Unlimited has indeed been prodigious. Barely a year has elapsed since it made its first venture with "Lady Frederick," and while that play was still running it produced six others: "Jack Straw," "Mrs. Dot," "The Explorer," "Idols," "Bellamy the Magnificent," and "Lady Epping's Lawsuit." Perhaps it may have captured other theatres under other pseudonyms—I have not of late been very assiduous in my playgoing, and may have missed one or two of the syndicate's productions. But all the plays I have mentioned show the Maugham trade-mark plainly stamped upon them. They are not all of the same merit—"Mrs. Dot" and "Idols" are distinctly below the level of the firm's general output—but they one and all bear the impress of the same factory.

And what is the trade-mark of the syndicate? It is cleverness; it is shallowness; it is perfunctoriness; it is a sort of insincere worldly wisdom, shading off into cynicism; it is the negation alike of ideas and ideals. The work turned out is far from despicable in point of ability. It is much cleverer than the average second-rate work of ten years ago—to say nothing of the 'seventies and 'eighties. It gives one no cause for despondency in regard to the actual amount of talent in the theatrical market. What is really disquieting is the thought of the conditions which compel, or at any rate tempt, such talent to produce such poor, thin, monotonously superficial plays. One of the chief characteristics they have in common is that they are all manifestly written for a star actor or actress—Sir Charles Wyndham or Mr. Hawtrey, Miss Marie Tempest or Miss Mary Moore. And it is evidently understood that the star actor or actress will shy at anything but what may be called an after-dinner play. The result is that the environment must be that of the idle rich; titles must abound (only one of the syndicate plays, if I remember rightly, fails to fulfil this condition); there must be an unlimited field for the display of frocks and frills; a little mild social satire is permissible, but morals and politics are emphatically barred; passion must be ignored, but hints at the hopeless corruption of English society are eminently in place; a cynical triviality, in short, must be the prevailing note, and all that is great, and subtle, and noble, and terrible—all the aspects of life that are in the least worth thinking or feeling about—must be resolutely dismissed from our ken. A more attenuated, anæmic form of art it would be hard to imagine.

But what has all this to do with Mr. Henry Arthur Jones? He, surely, is not a member of Maugham, Unlimited? No, he is not; but after seeing "Dolly Reforming Herself" one almost wishes that he were. For this comedy has all the characteristics of the syndicate style—with one difference. Ideas, as we have seen, have no place in the Maugham plays; but in Mr. Jones's piece there is quite distinctly an idea, a moral idea, nay, a philosophic idea. We came away from "Dolly Reforming Herself" the richer by a wide generalisation—the foredoomed futility, to wit, of all good resolutions. The idea is not precisely new. Other dramatic moralists have shown us that "Promises are like pie-crust," that "Hell is paved with good intentions," and so forth and so on. But it has been reserved for Mr. Jones to supply a philosophico-physiological basis for these shrewd maxims of disillusionment. He introduces us to a certain Professor Sturgess—one of those amazing men of science who wander through the British drama, correcting the proofs of their epoch-making works in other people's drawing-rooms—and out of the mouth of the Professor he proves that free will is a "purely subjective illusion." The Professor apparently devotes his life to this demonstration; yet, so far as we can see, he has only one point of attack on free will—he harps on the irresponsibility of sufferers from cerebral lesions. But to jump from the fact that madmen are mad to the theory that the "Dollies" of this world can by no possibility reform themselves, is to achieve a breakneck feat of logical inconsequence. The problem of free will and necessity has, in fact, nothing to do with the efficacy of good resolutions. It may be a mistake to suppose that I am free to resolve or not to resolve; but that does not prove my resolution useless. Even if it be only a link in the endless chain of causation, it is none the less efficient, and none the less psychologically valid, on that account. Some good resolutions, no doubt, are links in a chain that does not lead to amelioration; but it is nonsense to maintain that futility is the general characteristic of all resolve. This doctrine can only tend to a relaxation of moral fibre; and the play which preaches it may, in many cases, form a link in a chain leading to apathy and acquiescence in evil.

Of course I am taking Mr. Jones's humor far too seriously. His play is, in fact, as irresponsible as his heroine, and its philosophy is such manifest moonshine that it cannot possibly do a ha'porth of harm. But when an author lays stress on an idea, and it happens to be a false one, it is the business of criticism to say so. Mr. Jones's determinism certainly differentiates his play from the ordinary Maughamisms of commerce; but one could have wished for a different differentiation.

The title of the play ought by rights to have been "The Incurables"—but that, for obvious reasons, was out of the question. Had that title been possible, it would have done something to correct the moral balance of the piece. We should have thought of it as a study of particular instances, not as a would-be demonstration of a general law. There are plenty of moral incurables in the world—people who are incapable of effective resolve. That is the real trouble with Mr. Jones's characters—not that their good resolutions are powerless, but that they only pretend to form good resolutions. Their purpose of reformation is not in the least sincere; how, then, should it be efficient? Their characters are so shallow and arid that no resolution can take root in them. As a text for the vicar's next watch-night sermon I venture to recommend Mark iv., 5 and 6.

The merit of the play lies in that vivacity of scenic manipulation which is one of Mr. Jones's chief gifts. Even at its shallowest, it is light, bright, and entertaining. The dialogue, without being exactly witty, is thoroughly telling, and one of the characters—the wife of the predestinarian professor—is aptly observed, if not profoundly studied. That the play has either no plot or two plots, as you choose to look at it, is a technical defect which matters very little. More important, perhaps, is the fact that the nominal heroine has only one big scene, and is scarcely more than an onlooker during the greater part of the action. Such flaws trouble an audience but little so long as it is kept amused from moment to moment; and in that Mr. Jones succeeds. If it amuses you to see a set of idle people, living a luxurious and sensual life, without an idea, an aspiration, or an intelligent interest of any sort, you will probably enjoy "Dolly Reforming Herself." I am not myself such a puritan as to take no pleasure in it. That there is, in England, an immense amount of such high living and low thinking is only too true; and why should not the dramatist portray it? He has every right to do so, if he chooses; but he has also a right to show some consciousness of the dreary futility of the life he portrays; and this right Mr. Jones has apparently abjured. One gets a little tired of his shoulder-shrugging tolerance—the true philosophy of almost all his lighter work.

Miss Ethel Irving, after showing herself in "Lady Frederick" a mistress of finesse, proved herself, in the part of Dolly, no less a mistress of what may be called comic emotion. Her great scene was extremely able. Miss Margaret Halstan was an excellent selection for the part of Mrs. Sturgess—she played it to the life. Mr. C. M. Lowne, Mr. Robert Loraine, Mr. Charles Maude, and Mr. Lyall Swete were all as good as they had any occasion to be.

WILLIAM ARCHER.

Art.

THE AUTUMN SALON.

It is difficult to make any adequate summary of the pictures now on view in the Grand Palais, comprising works of such different elements as those of a comparatively little known pupil of Titian, retrospective collections of Monticelli and the engraver Bresdin, modern Finnish painters, besides the usual contributions of living French Artists, and a large and important exhibit of the applied arts.

This is an age of "discoveries," and there are many, while thanking the organisers who are responsible for bringing together the work of two such disparate temperaments as those of Theotocopuli and Monticelli, who may perhaps seek for some analogy in thus coupling their names. The ascetic Greco has no affinity with the sensuous Marseillais, unless it be that they were both little seen or understood thirty years ago. It would be idle to discern any such subtle reasoning, and it would be ungrateful not to enjoy, and foolish to quarrel with the directors of the Salon if the retrospective collection cannot pretend to throw down the glove of challenge, aiming as it does simply to make these works more widely known and appreciated. El Greco's battle has been fought and won now some years, and of late the auction rooms have shown Monticelli's brilliant coloring frequently. Most of El Greco's work in the present show belongs to his later manner; the form has become more attenuated, the tone richer, and the shadows blacker. A portrait of an ecclesiastic is especially fine in character, and the red dress remarkable in richness and depth of color.

Monticelli is eminently a painter who arrived in spite of a most unpromising début, and it would have been hard to foretell from his early work the great gift for color he developed later in life. His work is now so familiar that the collection of it here will not add materially to its value.

Though the work of the associates is of such a heterogeneous nature, there are several striking characteristics which pervade the rooms of this gallery. It is impossible not to note the almost entire absence of subject, nor to see the wilful avoidance of composition. The former may tend to a gain in artistic purpose —but it is by no means a corollary; the latter is a serious defect, and becomes most obvious when repeated in numerous canvases. Most noticeable, too, is the decorative aim of many modern artists. Now, in the hands of all but the ablest, this soon degenerates into the meaningless piling on of paint, and the inevitable loss of those finer qualities of painting which the Dutch appreciated so well. This note is so conspicuous in the work of a certain group that they have anticipated, it would seem, a near future when greatly altered social conditions might involve a complete revolution in the art of painting, entailing the death of the easel picture, and the birth of a new art designed for the decoration of public buildings, and conceived so as to tell from a distance. Whether this will take place or not cannot be discussed here, but this essentially decorative element is very much in evidence, and must not be overlooked.

Equally striking is the part chemistry plays in the work of yet another group of men. The researches of Chevreul and Rood have rendered incalculable service to modern art, and in no branch more than in that of landscape painting. Monet, Sisley, and others have shown how to put these scientific theories into practice. A later school has arisen, declaring the colorist to be made, not born, and that study alone is requisite to become a fine colorist. They insist on the more scientific aspects of their art, and not content with absorbing volumes on chromotography, must need at any cost show the public the ways by which they attain their ends. This is art behind the scenes, and chemistry plays a far larger part in their productions.

M. Maurice Denis contributes a series of decorative panels, illustrating the story of "Cupid and Psyche," in which his talent shows him to be maturing steadily. There is great beauty in some of the female figures, though the flesh tones are unpleasantly cold. Could M. Denis, like M. Piot, free his drawing from the archaistic, how his work would gain! Their imitators, having freed themselves from the bonds of former academic ideals, now find themselves only more fettered by the conventions of rock carving among savage peoples. In trying to be new, to break loose from dark brown shadows, they now see everything in acid blue and black, fondly believing themselves original, and above all "new." Still lower in the scale are the perpetrators of the strident dissonances, which raise a smile from the indulgent, and despair from the more thoughtful; these apparently naif artists are indeed omniscient, and exasperated at their own inability to be original, seek refuge in the clumsy and would-be archaic.

M. Piot is one of the few moderns who has attempted fresco, and his three compositions, "Requiescat—in pace—Miserere mihi," are full of a rich harmony and fine design. M. Valloton's "Rape of Europe" reveals a master of drawing, but is spoilt by his incorrigible inkiness of color.

The Finns display great fancy, allied to close observation, and the nude studies in sunlight are full of merit, those of MM. Thomé, Faven, and Enckell being very well conceived. They still have naiveté, which is so absent in the work of the less able exhibitors.

Portraiture is ill represented, but the lady in a variegated dress by M. Simon Bussy is by far the most remarkable, and is a more complete harmony than anything he has yet done. There are heads by Mr. Lavery and Kelly.

M. E. Saglio sends some charming studies of the seashore, in delicate tones of silver. It would be a pity to pass them by, as they are small but none the less personal, and among the most ably painted here. Mr. J. Morrice, too, sends some very harmonious color notes of the sea in his usual manner, and Mr. Horton's snow scenes show a truly exquisite sense of "values." M. Lempereur's views of the race course are breezy as they should be, and of the landscapes of M. Lebasque, a group of girls in the glade is the best, the chequered sunlight being especially well rendered. The work of MM. Dagnac Rivière, Truchet, and Jourdain should not be overlooked, nor the sunny panel of M. Laprade of "Florence on a May Morning." Pictures by MM. Olivier, Lambert, Milcendeau, and Bonnard will repay attention, also the water colors of Mme. P. Charpentier. This review cannot claim to do more than resume general aims, and mention of much meritorious work has been of necessity omitted. With the exception of a score of truculent canvases, there is still much of real interest and sincere endeavor and achievement in an exhibition which, for all its shortcomings, is never dull.

Letters to the Editor.

SIR HENRY CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN'S PAPERS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—The announcement of the details of the will of the late Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman intimates that all his letters and papers, private and political, have been entrusted to me. I shall be grateful if you will allow me to invite those who are able to do so to be so good as to give me the opportunity of perusing, and, if necessary, copying, any letters or other documents from the late Prime Minister which they may have in their possession. I will gladly make myself responsible for the custody of any such communications, which shall be safely returned to their owners. Any other information in the form of reminiscences which any of your readers may be able to give will also be welcome.—Yours, &c.,

John Sinclair.

2, Cambridge Square, London, W.
November 5th, 1908.

"THE RIGHT TO WORK."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I have read with lively interest and much surprise your article in this week's issue on above subject, and, as an old subscriber trust you will give publicity to a few remarks from me on the same matter.

Where would your argument as to the "right to work" lead us?

Labor, like Capital, always finds its own level. When trade is brisk and prospects bright in our towns, when wages are good, and conditions of life favorable, labor flows in upon our manufacturing centres from all quarters. Our rural areas are depleted of population, and even young and ardent men from the Continent appear amongst us, as if by magic, to take advantage of the opportunity. Capital, too, during that time is well employed and handsomely remunerated.

Then, trade gradually becomes dull. The country laborer, having tasted what he considers to be the sweets of town life, refuses to go back, and becomes one of the unemployed, or displaces some one who is less fit, and who, in his place becomes the unemployed. The young foreigner proceeds to cut down wages to starvation rates by taking whatever wage he can get and whenever he can get it.

Now, your practical agreement with the "right to work" claim, means that the State, or municipality, would gradually require to find work for all these men to do, just as, and even as, they gradually become unemployed through dull trade, and we are to keep them in this relief employment until trade becomes better.

When this happy moment would arrive under the system I do not know, but we may, I think, fairly assume that it would be longer than if there had been no such system.

You may say that you did not mean to include the foreigner in your scheme, but it appeared to me that the processions of unemployed about three years ago consisted mostly of foreigners. If, therefore, you did not intend to include them, the unemployed class would still be with us, after your scheme was in operation, but if you intend to include every foreigner amongst us who finds himself unemployed, then, indeed, there is an unenviable and illimitable horizon opened to the British taxpayer.

Your article further conveys the idea that we could, by some unknown "inducement," arrange to "stimulate regularity" in employment and so prevent "exaggerated fluctuations."

Well, owing to free imports and exports, we have less violent fluctuations now in employment in this country than in any other manufacturing country in the world. Nothing, however, that you, or anyone else, can suggest will prevent fluctuation. The trade of the world fluctuates. The trade of the individual fluctuates. One employer may find from good management and business methods, or from good quality and quick delivery that his individual business is advancing by leaps and bounds. He enlarges his premises, increases his machinery and employs more men. He believes he is justified in doing this by his own prospects, and by the continual increase in the trade of the country for fifty years past. He knows, too, that if he does not enlarge and deliver his orders quickly some competitor will. Another employer in the same trade with less ambition, let us say, refuses, in a time of good trade and bright prospects to increase his staff, his premises, or machinery. He hopes to do a regular, steady trade without fluctuation. Like the rain from Heaven, depression in trade comes, and falls on both these employers impartially. The less ambitious man has, indeed, very often to dismiss a greater proportion of his employees than the other. Modern methods, and the bustle of competition, have left him far behind, and even his customers know it. As an old employer of labor then, I know of no "inducement" which will prevent fluctuations in employment, skilled or unskilled, and I do not believe there is any. Supply and demand have always ruled the labor market, as they have every other market, and I believe they always will.

It is quite true that you somewhat recover from all this frightful obsession, and conclude, by a natural process of evolution, that, for this work compulsorily provided under your scheme, payment in some cases "might be made by maintaining the worker and making payment to his family, in other cases by substituting payments in kind for cash."

This is, of course, somewhat better than Poor Law relief, but not much, and it will neither satisfy the "right to work" man, nor the extreme party in this House of Commons. A little further consideration, too, will convince you that this method would be unfair both to the man who is able and willing to give a good day's work for a good day's wage, and to the strong, unskilled laborer whose work you would thus be surely and gradually taking from him.

Let us come down from all these heights to ordinary common sense. Trade was even worse a few years ago than it is now. Government help and private help, given directly and indirectly, was at that time sufficient to stem the tide until trade improved. This help is being given even more liberally by the present Government in this crisis, and we undoubtedly will, with ordinary application, and with business already improving, get over the hardships of this coming winter.

Nothing, you will say in dismay, has been suggested but palliatives and expedients. Precisely. It is only possible to mitigate the evil. There is no cure for this disease yet invented.

If you were able by organisation to place 100,000 on afforestation, another 100,000 upon reclamation of waste land, and yet another 100,000 on any other relief work of supposed public utility, these men would, simply and inevitably, become a permanent portion of the vast body of workers of this country and would remain at the occupation to which they were set. There would be a few exceptions—some would get back to their original occupations—but these would only prove the rule.

The man who would be re-employed when trade improved is the man who was last dismissed, who has been waiting patiently for this improvement ever since he was dismissed, and who is in daily touch with his old employer, manager, or foreman, each and all of whom have been, for their own interests, daily trying to get him back to his work.

At the next period of trade stagnation which would arise, you would require by your "right to work" scheme to provide employment for a new batch of unemployed, and that, even when your first were still engaged at the afforestation, reclamation, &c., &c., to which you set them at the previous period.

No. There is no cure. There are only palliatives and expedients. The Prime Minister has told us of an important measure which he hopes to bring forward next year, and which he hoped would have a more permanent effect than his present suggestions, to help the working-man of this country to tide over a period of dull trade.

I sincerely hope that it will include some measure of compulsory insurance for all workers, under State control, against unemployment, invalidity, and infirmity.

Every man with £100 per annum or less should be compelled to insure against these. From £100 to £300 he should be allowed to join the scheme voluntarily and get its benefits.

Germany is ahead of us in this matter. The Chancellor of the Exchequer lately visited that country and has come back most favorably impressed with their workmen's insurance schemes. We may even get the benefit of their experience and improve upon their schemes.—Yours, &c.,

House of Commons, S.W., November 2nd, 1908. WALTER MENZIES.

MRS. FAWCETT'S LETTER.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—May I correct a small mistake in Mrs. Fawcett's letter to you? I did not invite Mrs. Fawcett or her society or any representative of it, to sign the memorial initiated by the Women's Co-operative Guild, though I should have done so with great goodwill if it had been my place.

It was generous of the National Union to join with "democratic" suffragists, and though the suffrage societies have not abandoned their old demand, I do not see how anyone can doubt that when it came to the point they would put aside any class prepossession felt by a section of their membership, and welcome anything they could get, however big.—Yours, &c., ROSALIND NASH.

42, Well Walk, Hampstead, November 4th, 1908.

"THE SECRET OF WHISTLER."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. Sidney Low is wrong. It is not true that Whistler pursued Art for Art's sake. It is not true that "it is not the business of the artist, any more than it is the business of the engineer or the doctor, to teach morals directly." It is not true that "Cathedrals do not get themselves built by meditation on the glory of God, nor bridges by the love of humanity"; and, above all, it is not true that "the genius of the great craftsman, whether he works with metal or clay or words, is, like all genius, mostly unconscious."

Let us, first of all, be quite clear as to what we mean by an Art-for-Art's-saker. Such an one is a perfect gentleman who plays with paint pretty much in the same fashion in which he plays with love for the fun of the thing, for the mere sake of playing with it, unimpelled thereto by any moral passion.

Says Mr. Low, "To speak of Art for Art's sake is surely no more unreasonable than to speak of engineering for engineering's sake, or architecture for architecture's sake." But, sir, we do not speak of "engineering for engineering's sake." Is there an engineer on the face of the earth who would build an engine for the sake of building it, regardless of the need which called that engine into being? Thus the man—it will be observed that Mr. Low begs the whole question by writing men instead of man—who "drew the rampart athwart the Nile flood" did not do so because he thought it would improve the view, but because he thought it would improve the conditions of the life of the fellaheen. The fact that it does improve the view by regularising the flow of water is an incident very desirable in itself, but by no means fundamental in its effects. Mr. Low is on safe ground when he declares that he cannot imagine that the men who "threaded the arches of Waterloo Bridge" "paused in their work to think of its inner and ultimate significance"; but surely the man who conceived the idea of throwing giant stones across the breast of the Thames must have paused frequently in his work to ponder over its "inner and ultimate significance." To believe otherwise were to believe that an artist is an automaton. It is quite possible that the same men who "threaded the arches of Waterloo Bridge" also wrought on that iron atrocity which connects Charing Cross railway station with the Lambeth side of the river; but it does not require an abnormally brilliant person to discover that the two bridges did not come out of the same mind; the builder of Waterloo Bridge being an artist, and the builder of Hungerford Bridge an Art-forArt's-saker. Mr. Low will doubtless imagine that by my last remark I have given myself away. He will argue, no doubt, that the designer of Hungerford Bridge was animated by a single, undefiled moral passion to get a train track laid across the Thames as securely as possible. But that is not the sole purpose of a bridge. It is essential, above everything else, that a bridge shall not outrage the common sense of decency. Any fool can get you over a river, but only an artist can get you over without hurting your feelings. Now, the Art-for-Art's-saker does not care whether he hurts your feelings or not; he is, in point of fact, simply not interested in your feelings. The artist expresses your feelings; and this expression of humanity's feelings is done deliberately and consciously. Humanity itself may not be aware of the feeling, but the artist is; for it is the business of the artist to be ever in front of humanity, taking his place in the noble army of prophets who are scourged by this generation to the greater glory of the next. The genius of the great craftsman may, as Mr. Low says, be "an emanation from the immanent and universal mind which it is given to him to translate into articulate forms," but it certainly is not unconscious of the thing to be translated, nor does it select the means of translation at random. That is the difference between the artist and the Art-for-Art's-saker; the former is super-conscious—the latter is sub-conscious. If I, being oppressed by the evils of unemployment or indignant because of the iniquities of landlordism, were to sally forth to Piccadilly and thrust my umbrella through the window of the first big shop I met, that would be the act of an artist. It would be my means of drawing attention to some evil; and the greater the force with which I pushed my umbrella through the window, the greater would be the artistic effect. But if I merely made a hole in the window for the sake of making a hole, I should be an Art-for-Art's-saker. The hole might be a pretty one; but if it represented nothing but the impact of an umbrella against glass, it would be of no value either to me or to the person who owned it or to the persons whose attention was attracted by it, and I should thoroughly deserve the six months' hard labor I should undoubtedly get.

At the bottom of all this miserable squabble about the purpose of Art, there is the implication that beauty is beauty and utility is utility, and never the twain shall meet. This horrible superstition is a device of the Evil One; and its baneful effects are incalculable. It has produced mobs of decorative people who know nothing about Art; and large numbers of business men who know nothing about utility. It is the sort of thing which makes a Reynolds paint a number of silly little angel heads which serve no purpose beyond enabling the uncultured to assume an air of artistic knowledge by exclaiming, "Isn't it funny?—he did them all from one head!"; whilst, on the other hand, it provokes a tea merchant to disfigure the Thames with abominably colored lights announcing the fact that he sells very good tea at a moderate price. Thus we arrive at the thought that God made the Thames and the devil made the South Eastern and Chatham Railway and the noble tea merchant. Will Mr. Low contend that Whistler's idea of beauty and purpose was as purblind as the tea merchant's idea of utility? The "Carlyle" and "Portrait of my Mother" were as Mr. Low admits, consciously painted; but so was Whistler's other work. Can anyone who knows how Whistler battled against the appalling gang who constituted the body of British Artists in the Victorian era believe that he worked unconscious of the purpose he was serving? Go to, Mr. Low, go to. Whistler was as conscious as Velasquez, and Velasquez was as conscious as God Almighty.—Yours, &c.,

ST. JOHN G. ERVINE.

13, Champion Park, Denmark Hill, S.E.,
November 2nd, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. St. John G. Ervine's letter, which you have been good enough to let me see, is too long and controversial for me to answer in detail. I do not think he has apprehended the full meaning of my argument, nor does he state my position in regard to Whistler and the alleged cult of "Art for Art's sake" quite correctly. I do not suggest that art must be divorced from morality; but I urge that the artist fulfils his moral purpose best by obtaining the technical knowledge and practical skill which enable him to produce a work of art. A perfectly drawn and justly coloured representation of, let us say, an omnibus, seems to me more likely to advance the ends of morality and produce an ethical effect upon the spectator than a picture of the Virgin Mother with all the lines distorted and all the colours crude. Mr. Ervine says that the man who built the Assouan dam did it "not because he thought it would improve the view," but because he thought it would improve the conditions of the life of fellaheen. I cannot imagine that he had any such ideas. He was not concerned either with improving the view or improving the fellaheen; but with building a dam in the best possible manner permitted by the conditions of the case. That was what he did; and I take it that in the main it was what he thought. Nor have I said that Whistler was "unconscious of the purpose he was serving." His purpose was to vindicate technical skill and scientific knowledge against ignorance and amateurish sentimentality; and of that aim he never lost sight. But whether, as Mr. Ervine suggests, "Whistler was as conscious as Velasquez and Velasquez was as conscious as God Almighty," is a question a little too extensive for me to discuss.—Yours, &c.,

SIDNEY LOW.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr Sidney Low, in his article on Whistler, raises the question, so often raised, whether a man who is not an artist is capable of judging a work of art. Whistler, of course, held that he is not, and Mr. Low gives Whistler's arguments, so far as I can see, very fairly. The parallel which he draws between painting and engineering is one that Whistler would have drawn himself—perhaps he has drawn it—and Whistler did ask, what right had Ruskin to criticise the painting of a picture when he could not paint one himself. Now, if my cook asked me what right I had to criticise one of her puddings when I could not make a pudding myself, I should answer that the proof of the pudding is in the eating; and so, I think, it is with a picture. Pictures are painted by artists not for other artists, for in that case they would be no better off than the natives of the Scilly Isles, but for the public; and what is done for the public, the public has a right to judge. It is a fact that nowadays the public is apt to judge pictures upon wrong principles; but artists also are apt to paint pictures upon wrong principles, as Whistler himself often said. In an age when art is feeble, everyone is likely to be bewildered about the principles of art, just as in an age of bad morals everyone is likely to be bewildered about the principles of morals. Whistler was led to his contention that art happens and that there are no great ages of art directly by his contention that the public has no right to judge works of art. For since, according to him, the public judgment of works of art is always worthless, it follows that neither can that judgment affect good works of art nor can good works of art affect that judgment; and so the artist is always quite independent of his conditions. We can test the argument by the conclusion, which is contrary to all the facts.

Consider, now, the parallel between art and engineering. When an engineer makes a bridge, he has a certain practical problem to solve. And the people who use that bridge are the final judges whether or no he has solved it. It is perfectly true that they cannot understand the science by means of which he attempts to solve it, but they do know whether it is a convenient bridge, and if it breaks down or has to be soon repaired or reconstructed, they know that his design is faulty. If they were told that they had no right to criticise the bridge because they were not engineers, they would have little patience with the objection. In the same way every picture has its practical problem, and that problem concerns the public. Painting is an act of expression. The painter has certain emotions to express, and also to communicate, for the communication of these emotions is the final test whether he has expressed them; and this test is applied, slowly, no doubt, and uncertainly, not to artists, but to the public. Nobody supposes that poetry is written only for poets, or music only for musicians. The life of poetry and music depends upon whether they continue to communicate emotions to the mass of men, neither poets nor musicians, who care for poetry and music. These are the people who judge and whose judgment has practical results; and so it is with painting.

Mr. Low tells how Whistler, after listening silently to a religious dispute, was asked what religion he believed in, and how he answered, "I am an amateur." This was really an ingenious way of saying that he believed in no religion. Those who are amateurs in religion will not go to church. Mr. Low comments on this, "Whistler's religion was the zealous pursuit of his art. There he was a priest." But, according to his own contention, he was the priest of a religion that ought to have no worshippers, for all amateurs must be in error about it—and what is the use of a faith which must be wrong?

We often hear it said of someone that art was a religion to him. Art, since it is something quite different from religion, cannot be a religion to anyone: but the two have this in common—that both need a public. A priest without worshippers is not performing his function; nor is an artist without a public, either of his own time or of the future. The public may not know how an artist produces his effect, but sooner or later they, and they alone, decide whether he has produced it.—Yours, &c., A. Clutton Brock.

THE TAXATION OF LAND.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Mr. Montague Fordham does good work in calling attention once more to the fact that the Small Holdings Act is threatened with failure because of the hostility of landed proprietors and others. "Something," he says, "must be done, and that quickly. The men are being forced back and the hope which sprang up when this Act was passed is quickly dying down." But it is when he comes to deal with remedies for this state of matters that the poverty of the situation is shown up. All he has to counsel is combination to force the landlord's hand. Fancy! Combination among these poor landless men to force the hand of the all-powerful landed interest. It is hopeless.

So long as the present situation obtains—the landlords having the land and the would-be cultivators begging leave to use it on almost any terms the landlord may in his bounty see fit to grant—so long will the Act remain to all intents and purposes a dead letter and small holdings as rare as the Dodo.

The real remedy is to make it to the landlord's interest that his land should be thrown open to the small holder, and conversely to make him suffer so long as he withholds it.

This can be done with absolute effectiveness by taxing land values. Landlords would then be as anxious to receive the small holder as they now are to keep him at arm's length, and we can well conceive the position arising where landlords were begging for tenants instead of tenants for land.

If Mr. Fordham wants to do effective work, he may continue to urge combination if he likes, but let it be combination with a view to urge the Government to implement their repeated pledges and at once to introduce their Bill for the valuation of land and its taxation on the basis of that valuation.—Yours, &c., W. R. Lester.

Clifton Lodge, Clifton, Beds,
November 1st, 1908.

BAD HARVESTS AND UNEMPLOYMENT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—In concluding my controversy with Mr. Laycock I wish to make two statements: First, I never denied, as he implies, that "a diminished yield will not afford as much employment from its handling and development as the more abundant harvest." On the contrary, in my opening letter, I expressly admitted this diminution of em ployment. Secondly, Mr. Laycock has from first to last produced no scrap of evidence in support of his contention that, if higher prices for a scarce harvest distributes the agricultural income in a different way, this difference of distribution will reduce the aggregate demand for other goods issuing from the agricultural class.—Yours, &c.,

J. A. Hobson.

[This controversy must now close.—Ed. Nation.]

Poetry.

VOX INFIRMITATIS.

Not for our soon-forgotten day,
Not that our looks are slow and blind,
That Thou hast set the mountain way
For lame and stumbling feet to find,
In hands too small hast lain the sword—
Not for our weakness spare us, Lord.

But for our single day of might,
When, long remote, the tempests blow,
The hidden altar flames to sight,
And high the immortal beacons show.
When these great hours shall lie forgot,
Have mercy, Lord, and spare us not.

Have mercy, when the glassy tide
Stirs not the stiller haven's sleep;
Our coward prayers be then denied,
The harbour with Thy surges sweep,
And hail into the clamorous seas
The ships that shelter there at ease.

Now in mine hour of strength I cry
The unfettered soul's discerning prayer;
Though pain and fear his company,
The living burden grant me bear.
When weakness shall the words unsay,
O Thou that hearest, turn away.

O Giver of the burning dream
To things of clay that fall in dust,
Since for no merit fell the gleam,
Neither for strength we hold the trust,
Not for unworthiness deny
The armour and the battle-cry.

Lucy Lyttelton.

The World of Books.

THURSDAY NIGHT.

THE current number of "The Dublin Review" contains an interesting fragment on John Keble, written in 1875, by Cardinal Newman, and now published by permission of his literary executors. Newman explains his difficulty in writing an appreciation of Keble's literary work. "The volume that has made him so specially famous is of that rare kind which scarcely comes under the idea of literature; and such, too, is its sequel, the "Lyra Innocentium." His translation of the Psalms, highly valued as it is by Hebrew scholars, belongs to a department of literary labour too closely connected with grammatical science to be easily included under the term 'literature.' His greatest literary work, his 'Lectures on Poetry,' so full of acute remark and so beautiful in language, is in Latin. Then as to his occasional compositions in prose and verse, though they are both valuable as his and worthy of him, still they neither created his high reputation nor can be taken as the measure of it. Lastly, of his edition of Hooker I will say this—that the learning and research, the pains and achievements of an editor are emphatically underground and out of sight; and if ever there was a man who, from reverence towards his author, as well as from innate modesty and a habitual disregard of self, would put his author in front and would hide behind him, it was Mr. Keble."

* * *

AN experiment in the direction of shorter and cheaper novels has been made this week by the issue of the first four books in Mr. Murray's series of "Short Novels by Great Writers." They are slender volumes such as may be comfortably read at a single sitting and the price is half-a-crown each. Previous efforts to overthrow the tyranny of the six-shilling novel with its minimum length of about fifty thousand words have not been very successful. Yet it is obvious that many plots and motives suffer from being spun out to this length, though they may demand rather fuller treatment than the ordinary short story allows for. Mr. Murray is giving his experiment a fair trial, as his opening volumes are by Miss Violet Jacobs, Miss F. F. Montrésor, Mrs. Gertrude Atherton, and Miss Mary Cholmondeley. None of the four, perhaps, is a "great writer," but all have produced work of some distinction. On the other hand we believe that Mr. de Morgan's coming novel is to be of even greater length than its predecessors and will appear in two volumes.

* * *

MR. MURRAY has in preparation a biography of Nelson's famous lieutenant, Vice-Admiral Sir Thomas Hardy, and the book will be published early next year under the title "Nelson's Hardy: His Life, Letters, and Friends." The joint authors are Mr. A. M. Bradley and the Rev. R. G. Bartlot, and besides the details given in "The Three Dorset Captains at Trafalgar" there will be a fresh introduction and two new chapters dealing with matter that has only recently come to light. This includes several hitherto unknown letters of Hardy and the whole of the correspondence in which Midshipman R. F. Roberts gives his Dorset friends a minute account of the battle of Trafalgar and the events that followed it.

* * *

A FURIOUS controversy has been provoked in France by the latest book of the Abbé Houtin, "Un prêtre marié," although it is not yet published. The priest in question is the late Charles Perraud, who was himself a popular preacher of renown, and was the brother of Cardinal Perraud, Bishop of Autun. Since the death of Charles Perraud in 1892, various edifying but mendacious accounts of his life have been published, and it is with the object of correcting these and telling the whole truth that M. Houtin is publishing his little book. The Abbé Hyacinthe Loyson, who was Charles Perraud's most intimate friend, has placed at M. Houtin's disposal the whole of his correspondence which clearly establishes that Charles Perraud, whose fine character and saintly life cannot be disputed and have been testified to by the most orthodox, was for many years secretly married. Cardinal Perraud was aware of the fact, and it was only for the sake of his brother and at his entreaties that Charles Perraud consented to keep his irregular marriage a secret. The publication of M. Houtin's book has been delayed by the action of the Bishop of Nevers, who, as literary executor of Cardinal Perraud, has begun legal proceedings to prohibit the sale of the book. M. Houtin now announces that the book may be obtained from his private address, 18, rue Cuvier, Paris.

* * *

NEXT week Mr. Lane will publish Mr. F. H. Cheetham's "Louis Napoleon and the Genesis of the Second Empire." The work is an account of Napoleon III.'s career and adventures up to the time of his election to the Presidency of the Republic in 1848. Mr. Cheetham takes the view that responsibility for the events that followed the coup d'état belongs quite as much to the French nation as to Louis Napoleon. It is right that every man should be, at least in some degree, a hero to his biographer, but we think that Mr. Cheetham will find considerable difficulty in maintaining his thesis.

* * *

A NOVEL called "The Family," to be published shortly by Messrs. Harpers, is the result of an eccentric experiment in fiction. The book originally appeared as a serial in "Harper's Bazaar," and each instalment was written by a different writer, whose identity was not divulged. There were altogether twelve authors who contributed to the novel, and as among them were Mr. Henry James, Mr. W. D. Howells, Miss Mary E. Wilkins Freeman, Mr. Henry Van Dyke, Miss Elizabeth Stuart Phelps, and Mr. John Kendrick Bangs, the book should have plenty of variety. The plot hinges on the engagement of the daughter of the house to a fickle youth who is in love with her aunt, and the whole family manages to become entangled in the complication.

* * *

MESSRS. HODDER & STOUGHTON have in the press Dr. Hay Fleming's Princeton Lectures on "The Reformation in Scotland: Its Causes, Characteristics, and Consequences." Dr. Fleming traces the Scottish Reformation from its early beginnings down through the Lollards to the period of Patrick Hamilton. Among the secondary causes of the Reformation he gives special attention to the corruption of morals, the incompetence and ignorance prevalent among the clergy, and the ineffectual remedial legislation of the Provincial Councils. He also discusses the destruction of altars, images, and works of art by the Reformers, as well as the freeing of legitimate traders from clerical opposition, the removal of ecclesiastical bars to marriage, the revived interest taken in education, and the introduction of laymen into the government of the Church. Dr. Hay Fleming has already given proofs of his capacity as a historian of sixteenth century Scotland, and his coming work is sure to be of great interest and value.

* * *

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

"The Evolution of Modern Germany." By W. Harbutt Dawson. (Fisher Unwin, 21s. net.)

"Morals in Evolution: A Study in Comparative Ethics." By L. T. Hobhouse. Second Edition. Revised. (Chapman & Hall, 2 vols., 21s. net.)

"The Life of Thomas Bailey Aldrich." By Ferris Greenslet. (Constable, 12s. 6d. net.)

"A History of the English Agricultural Labourer." By W. Hasbach. (P. S. King & Son, 7s. 6d. net.)

"New Light on Ancient Egypt." By G. Maspero. (Unwin, 12s. 6d. net.)

"Memories of Half a Century." By R. C. Lehmann, M.P. (Smith, Elder, 10s. 6d. net.)

"Some Eminent Victorians." By J. Comyns Carr. (Duckworth, 12s 6d. net.)

"The Eye-Witness." By H. Belloc. (Nash, 5s. net.)

"The Human Woman." By Lady Grove. (Smith, Elder, 5s. net).

"Cornish Characters and Strange Events." By S. Baring-Gould. (Lane, 21s.)

"Nadir Shah." By Sir Mortimer Durand. (Constable, 10s. 6d. net.)

"The Revolt of the 'Potemkin'." By Constantine Feldmann. (Heinemann, 6s. net.)

"An Immortal Soul." By W. H. Mallock. (Bell, 6s.)

"Le Cénacle de la Muse Française 1823-1827." Documents inédits. Par Léon Séché. (Paris: Société du Mercure de France, 7fr. 50.)

"Dogmengeschichte des Protestantismus," Von Otto Ritschl. (Leipzig: Hinrichs Bd. I, M.91. 50.)

Reviews.

THE STORY OF THE BRONTËS.*

Mr. Clement Shorter admits in his preface, with good taste and sound sense, that Mrs. Gaskell's "Life of Charlotte Brontë" is a literary masterpiece which he cannot hope to supersede. His object has been to correct errors which were, perhaps, unavoidable at the time she wrote, and to bring together all the information about the Brontë family which his untiring industry has accumulated. If the result seems disproportionate it is impossible to complain of an author who frankly admits that he has sacrificed symmetry to completion. Concerning the Brontë family the literary world has always been inquisitive. Even if Anne be put aside, two such sisters as Emily and Charlotte upset all theories and confound all speculations. They had no advantages of any kind, and they wrote as if they had been born with pens in their hands. Shakespeare himself is not more unaccountable than these daughters of an Irish clergyman settled in Yorkshire, who wrote because they could not help it, and died mere girls. There are few more baffling riddles in the history of the human mind. It is, of course, no part of Mr. Shorter's task to explain this phenomenon. He is a collector rather than an analyst. Boswell himself was not more indefatigable in pursuing every track, and examining every corner. Charlotte Brontë's husband, Mr. Nicholls, who shunned publicity as much as Charlotte herself, yielded to Mr. Shorter's importunity, and told him everything he asked. The two big volumes which Mr. Shorter has produced defy anything like descriptive criticism. They are meant for people of all tastes to examine and choose for themselves. Mr. Shorter's faith in his heroine is justified. For every fresh scrap of knowledge must increase the admiration not only of her genius, but also of her splendid courage, unswerving rectitude, and heroic abnegation of self. The simple facts are more eloquent than anything Mrs. Gaskell said, and they may well be left to speak for themselves. The happiness of Charlotte's brief life with her husband, which would scarcely be inferred from Mrs. Gaskell's book, is here plainly shown.

Nothing has escaped Mr. Shorter's minute and patient scrutiny. Even the love-letters of Charlotte's mother are faithfully reproduced. Mrs. Gaskell contents herself with quoting Charlotte's account of the emotion with which she received them from her father, and yet its few touches are more affecting than the letters themselves. Here is the passage, which will bear quotation:—

> "A few days since a little incident happened which curiously touched me. Papa put into my hands a little packet of letters and papers, telling me that they were mama's and that I might read them. I did read them, in a frame of mind I cannot describe. The letters were yellow with time, all having been written before I was born. It was strange now to peruse, for the first time, the records of a mind whence my own sprang; and most strange, and at once sad and sweet, to find that mind of a truly fine, pure, and elevated order. They were written to papa before they were married. There is a rectitude, a refinement, a constancy, a modesty, a sense, a gentleness about them indescribable. I wish that she had lived, and that I had known her!"

On the other hand, there are episodes in Charlotte Brontë's life which are best treated by entire accuracy of detail. The readers of speculative biographies, for instance, have been led to suppose that Miss Brontë was willing to correspond with M. Héger of Brussels, the original of Paul Emmanuel in "Villette," without Madame Héger's knowledge. Mr. Shorter has proved that that is exactly what she refused to do. Her conduct throughout was perfectly dignified and refined. M. Héger's fascination for her was purely intellectual, and there can be little doubt that his powers were magnified in the glass of her own imagination. To keep people she knew out of her novels was impossible for her, and she had the art of combining an accuracy which would now be called photographic, with an imaginative vividness which made her simplest touches memorable for their literary art. Mr. Shorter enables everyone to judge how much her characters owe to their creator, and how much to themselves. As a general rule, it is very rash to assume that personages in fiction are other than fictitious. It is the peculiarity of Charlotte Brontë that her neighbours and acquaintances recognised themselves, or, at least, each other, where the general public saw only artistic types. Her love of truth was curiously interwoven with her instinct for literary fitness, just as her modesty never softened her judgment of what appeared to her wrong. If Mrs. Gaskell conveyed in any way an erroneous impression of her heroine, it was in suggesting, perhaps unconsciously, that Charlotte Brontë never enjoyed life. With all her sorrows and cares, she was capable of appreciating the opportunities she had, and of admiring excellence even in matters which were not within the ordinary range of her experience or interest. Mrs. Gaskell did not bring out the humorous side of Miss Brontë's mind, which may be seen in "Shirley," and without which it is impossible to understand her point of view. It was a grim humor that she put into the book, such as she had encountered in the Yorkshire dales. But it was genuine, and those who knew it best admired it most. Her own personality so completely animates her stories that Mr. Shorter contributes to the literary criticism of her works by the details and circumstances of her life which he has accumulated. If we are inclined to be impatient with the number of other people whose characters are analysed and portrayed in these volumes, we must remember that they are essential to the purpose of exhibiting Charlotte Brontë herself, and that any other method would merely have imitated Mrs. Gaskell in a line where she is truly inimitable.

A single example will illustrate the situation, and the difficulty of dealing with it. Ellen Nussey was to Charlotte Brontë what Horatio was to Hamlet. Miss Nussey's sound, strong, healthy, cheerful, practical nature had the same attraction for the sensitive, imaginative genius of Miss Brontë that the student of Wittenberg had for the Prince of Denmark. Miss Nussey's letters from Miss Brontë are not all very interesting in themselves. But they show, as nothing else could, the impression which the author of "Jane Eyre" made upon a good, sincere woman with a wholesome mind, and no genius at all. It is from Hamlet's language, not from Horatio's, that we understand the relations between them, and the character of Horatio is only valuable in the play for the light which it throws upon the character of Hamlet. Although she shrank in nervous terror from general society, Miss Brontë was almost effusive, and quite expansive, with her real friends. She did not idealise them, as was her way with Thackeray, and other celebrities of less note. She had, in truth, a great need of friendship, not because she was unable to rely upon herself, but because her sympathy with others craved for a return. If she had the irritability of genius, she blamed herself more than anyone else, and the smallest incidents in the lives of her friends were as full of concern for her as if they had been episodes in her own. Most of those with whom her lot was cast were too like herself in susceptibility to emotion. Miss Nussey represented the plain sense of ordinary existence, and Miss Brontë's correspondence with her was a useful corrective of the high tension at which her nerves were kept. The parallel of Hamlet still holds. Charlotte Brontë lived so much in the world of imagination and reverie that she needed the companionship of homely folk, who could admire her work without ceasing to regard her as a human being with the strongest possible claims upon the affection and support of strong minds and warm hearts. Even Mr. Nicholls was too nervous and excitable to be altogether good for her. She came to understand him, and he her. But it took time; whereas with Miss Nussey, the possession of the qualities she herself lacked made their friendship stable and useful from the first. Miss Brontë stood in no need of fellowship with kindred spirits. She was not likely to find anyone with more imagination than her own sister, Emily. She liked corresponding about books with Mr. Williams, reader to the firm of Messrs. Smith & Elder. But then, Mr. Williams was a man of business, perfectly straightforward, respectable, and commonplace. With George Henry Lewes, on the contrary, she soon quarrelled, and even so cordial an admirer as Thackeray could not help offending her. In the society of such a friend as Miss Nussey she found rest.

* "The Brontës' Life and Letters. Being an Attempt to Present a Full and Final Record of the Lives of the Three Sisters, Charlotte, Emily, and Anne Brontë from the Biographies of Mrs. Gaskell and Others, and from Numerous Hitherto Unpublished Manuscripts and Letters." By Clement Shorter. Hodder & Stoughton 2 vols. 24s. net.

When she wrote to Mrs. Gaskell, she would grow eloquent and excited over such topics as Thackeray's misplaced lenity to Fielding. When she wrote to Miss Nussey, it was about the ordinary affairs of life, which, for her, were sad enough, requiring just the kind of personal, simple, and genuine sympathy and advice which her friend could give her. Of Charlotte Brontë as a novelist, enough, and more than enough, has been written and said. The student of character, of nature, and of life, will find in these volumes an almost inexhaustible store of materials for a romance stranger than any that Miss Brontë wrote herself.

It is far from Mr. Shorter's object to explain Miss Brontë away. If he is not content simply to let her speak for herself, his comments and explanations are really little more than notes required by difficulties in the text. Where they go beyond that modest function, they may be neglected without injury to the result. No one can accuse Mr. Shorter of forgetting, even for a moment, his main purpose and project. He may sometimes seem to be afraid that the reader will be unable to make the most obvious reflection for himself. But the space occupied by Mr. Shorter's own reflections is comparatively so small that it would be churlish to grudge him the opportunity of making them. The lesson of Charlotte Brontë's life is not merely an intellectual one. It is a story of triumph over obstacles which no mere genius could have surmounted. Miss Brontë's moral strength and courage are quite as wonderful as her eloquence, her fancy, or her constructive power.

JOSEPHINE.*

That the surroundings of early life leave a deeper imprint on a woman than on a man is an assertion that few would dispute; for details are more to her than to him, and her nature is generally more receptive. Perhaps the assertion, as stated above, is a trifle too sweeping. But would anyone be found to deny that a girl of an easy, pliable disposition is, to a large extent, moulded for life by the environment of, say, her first twenty years? Is she likely ever to lose the stamp of the ideas and customs of that impressionable age? Are not many cases known of women, far from strong mentally, quietly, but firmly, persisting in the path that has come to be second nature to them, and practically ignoring the behests even of able and autocratic husbands? Some of the most piquant problems of conjugal life centre in this power of quiet resistance of seemingly backboneless natures. The riddle is solved in part when we remember that heredity and early surroundings are influences against which the marital fiat may be wholly unavailing.

How else can we explain the failure of Napoleon to mould Josephine to his will? One of the supplest of natures withstood the passionate entreaties and ceaseless endeavours of a man of genius, who, at first, madly loved her, and always regarded her with affectionate interest. A conqueror in every other sphere, he never absorbed her. The graceful Creole who captivated him in 1795 remained, in all essentials, unchanged when she underwent the ordeal of the divorce fifteen years later. Josephine never became Napoleonic; she remained the easy, impressionable, vain, but lovable, creature who reigned supreme in the salons of Barras and Madame Tallien.

This survival of a somewhat shadowy individuality, even by the side of one of unique forcefulness, can be explained partly by their utter unlikeness. We can imagine a woman who longed for distinction in the political sphere—say, Mme. de Staël—immersing herself in the schemes of Napoleon until she became almost part of him. But that was not the ambition of Josephine. Her desires were never his desires. She rarely took an interest in his policy, except when her woman's wit detected a flaw in it, as in the case of the Duc d'Enghien and the Spanish enterprise of 1808. For the most part her interests began where his ended. For campaigns, military or diplomatic, she cared naught. And what to him were the little arts and graces by which she retained an undisputed sovereignty in the Court? For natures moving along in different planes there could be no union. They lived apart, even in the few happy months at Milan or Montebello, after he had won his first laurels and began to give laws to Italy and Europe. Her empire was the salon: his was the world.

In this sketch of the life of Josephine by Mr. Sergeant, we are reminded again of the incongruity of the two natures, alike in their bent and in their training. While that of Bonaparte was almost Spartan, that of Marie Joseph Rose Tascher de la Pagerie had been Sybaritic. The contrast between the stern, warlike life of Corsica and the languor of Martinique furnishes a clue to their characters. The Taschers were well connected, and had the usual number of servile attendants. Josephine (the name was Bonaparte's pet name for her) had a very scant education and large possibilities in other directions. Stories of her precocity in affairs of the heart should, of course, be received with the suspicion which Mr. Sergeant very properly shows. But it is significant, as revealing the state of morals on the island, that her engagement to Alexandre de Beauharnais was decided mainly by the mistress of the Marquis de Beauharnais, she having succeeded in ousting the marquise from the home of that nobleman. When we remember the laxity of morals under the ancient régime—especially in the tropical colonies of France—and the confusion in domestic circles brought about by the Revolution, we find some cause for condoning the frailties of Josephine. There is no doubt that she was more coerced than coaxed into matrimony with the eager young Corsican in 1796. Her first husband having been disposed of by the guillotine, she felt little inclination to wed a second time, especially with a suitor who had naught to offer her but vague and terrifying ambitions.

We find it difficult, however, to pardon her indifference to the passion of the young hero. While he poured out his soul in passionate love letters, she—showed them to friends, once remarking, on an outburst of jealousy, which included a reference to the dagger of Othello, "Il est drôle, Bonaparte!" Saint Amand's suggestion, that her indifference was assumed in order to keep alive her husband's devotion, is rather strained; for the time came when she saw that her indifference was resented; but it remained her usual mood. The difficulties with the Bonaparte family began at Montebello, near Milan, after the end of the campaign of 1797. While enjoying the almost regal splendour of her life, she saw difficulties ahead in the shape of envious sisters-in-law. Mr. Sergeant quotes from the Memoirs of Arnault some vivid touches describing the behaviour of the wayward and lovely Pauline.. Nothing less than Bonaparte's frown could restrain her from publicly making mouths at Josephine. There, too, at Montebello was an old flame, Hippolyte Charles, the stories about whom were already compromising enough to ensure his expulsion from the army by the jealous commander. As we know, Charles was the evil genius of Josephine during Bonaparte's absence in Egypt; and here the author might have cited the "Lettres de Mme. Reinhard" as strengthening the case against Josephine. His frequent quotations from Bourrienne and the Duchesse d'Abrantes are apt to awaken suspicion among those who know the untrustworthiness of those writers.

Mr Sergeant, in his laudable endeavour to be concise, sometimes omits details that are needful, as when he dismisses in six lines (Vol. II., page 399) the "religious" marriage with Josephine on December 1st, 1804. The details of that ceremony, especially the absence of the curé of the parish, show that Napoleon even then wished to leave open a loophole of escape. The politics of the years 1808-9 should also have been sketched, so as to show the import of the events which conduced to Josephine's downfall. Mr. Sergeant seldom opens up vistas into the subtle problems of character that are involved. His narrative contains no facts that are not to be found in M. Masson's full, though rather wearisome, volumes. But he writes easily and fairly, having none of the misogynist bias that so often appears in the Frenchman. The present volumes contain enough detail to outline clearly a life full of incident, and by no means wanting in pathos. Whether Napoleon continued really to love Josephine, as Mr. Sergeant thinks, is open to question; for, apart from the divorce, which was a political necessity, his conduct had often been such as implied growing indifference. Mr. Sergeant's closing remarks on Josephine are, surely, somewhat hard, in view of her

* "The Empress Josephine: Napoleon's Enchantress." By Philip W. Sergeant. 2 Vols. Hutchinson & Co. 24s. net.

languorous, semi-tropical nature, her miserable upbringing, the many provocations inflicted by the Bonapartes, and the not infrequent infidelities of the Emperor himself.

A MUSICAL GOSSIP.*

Mr. Joseph Bennett, for five and thirty years the chief musical critic of the "Daily Telegraph," and in his time representative of some half-dozen or more other journals, clearly learnt something himself while he was laying down the law for the benefit of other people. His book is to the reader of to-day as remarkable for the omissions from it as for its contents. There is a copious and presumably reliable index. Yet it has no reference to Debussy, the most discussed of modern French composers, who had made something of a reputation for himself even in this land long before 1905. Tschaikowsky, who was fêted in London in the year that preceded his untimely death, and was a "guest of the evening" at one of the concerts of the Philharmonic Society of which Mr. Bennett, during long years, was the "official analyst" as it were, whose "Pathetic" symphony Mr. Bennett, if memory serves, was the first to dissect for an impatient public (as he has good cause to remember), whose music became a vogue unequalled by that of any other composer since that which Wagner created now upwards of a quarter of a century ago—this Tschaikowsky is not even referred to. Nor is Richard Strauss, nor is Hugo Wolf, nor is Johannes Brahms, if we except a brief but pointed reference in a letter to the author of the book from the famous pianist, Moritz Rosenthal, which reference, by the by, is incorrectly indexed.

Now, it is inconceivable that in the long space of time covered by Mr. Bennett's book, more than half of the average life of man, nothing can have occurred in connection with these great men of sufficient interest to be recorded here. Were Mr. Bennett still the laudator temporis acti, to the detriment of all musical things present and future that once he was assumed to be, the point would be clear enough. But he is not, or at least he does not wish himself to be so regarded. In speaking of the earliest production in London of Wagner's more advanced music dramas, he reprints, from his own contemporary writings, whole passages to show whom it may concern that even then, in the early 'eighties and before, he was not antagonistic to Wagner the composer. Wagner the man Mr. Bennett places in quite another category:—

> "I never exchanged a word with Wagner, either viva voce or in writing," he says. "Honestly, I never wished to do so, and therefore sought no opportunity; while it is more than likely that Wagner, on his part, would have sported his oak against me had I tried to break in upon the presence."

Mr. Bennett, too, recalls a conversation he held at Bayreuth (which he calls "the Franconian city"), with the late Edward Dannreuther, in which, to quote Mr. Bennett's own words:—

> "it came to pass that Dannreuther drew himself up stiffly and said, 'The master does not receive,' to which I made reply, 'And the outsider does not visit.'"

Mr. Bennett, who, we repeat, "never exchanged a word with Wagner," disliked Wagner "for his personal qualities. . . . To me he was impossible." What these personal qualities were the author states he would not "describe if it were needful to do so." As in this matter Mr. Bennett exhibited the reticence referred to, many will regret that he did not exercise it in speaking of S. S. Wesley, to whose many endearing qualities a number of living muscians can abundantly testify. From reminiscences from which so much has been omitted, at least one more omission would have been graceful. The book would have lost nothing in general interest if Wesley's letter beginning, "Let me ask what you would be pleased to accept for writing me a review," &c. (p. 127), had also not found a place in the volume.

Among the pages which treat of music in England, with which Mr. Bennett, of course, was chiefly concerned, his professional visits to the Continent having been singularly few, those which deal with the once famous Crystal Palace concerts are of peculiar interest, and the chapter on Eisteddfodau will appeal to the Welsh, while the critical fraternity will appreciate Mr. Bennett's opinion that criticism to-day is on a different (and clearly a better) footing than in his earliest days. His devotion to Davison, a brilliant yet jaundiced, critic, is touching; but though it may be doubted if the critics of to-day have not at least as keen a sense of wit and humor as their predecessors, it is tolerably certain that not one would endure the shafts of "wit" with which Davison was wont to prick those of his colleagues whom he held in contempt. If there is no Davison to-day, it is open to question if the musical world loses thereby, since, if it has lost his strength, it has gained not a little in what may be called "manners and deportment."

Mr. Bennett speaks well and cordially of Sir Michael Costa:—

> "His work was practically over when the modern conductor, charged with the duty of evolving new ideas from old texts, made his appearance. Costa had no such mission. He read the music, and, reading nothing into it, was therewith content."

Happy Costa! Happy Mr. Bennett! However, there is no need to describe these reminiscences much further. Arthur Sullivan, who at one period was on terms of intimate friendship with Mr. Bennett until the latter saw the former "wasting time which was precious not only to himself, but to the nation," by "striving for such poor honors as the Turf can bestow," or "immersed in West End life which is never healthy for an artist," is treated at some length. But, really, is it Mr. Bennett's conviction "that gifts so exalted as his (Sullivan's) were not turned to best account in the writing of comic operas, however popular and charming?" We hold to the opinion that Sullivan was far greater and more lively in his low estate as the creator of the music of the Savoy operas than as the composer of the already dead "Martyr of Antioch," or the "Light of the World."

* "Forty Years of Music, 1865-1905." By Joseph Bennett. Methuen. 16s.

A NOVEL OF ANARCHY.*

The author of "Elder Conklin" and of the best analytical criticism of Shakespeare in modern English letters appears too seldom as a writer of fiction; he has style, feeling, ideas, and he has the gift of statement, so rare with us, so common with French men of letters. And in "The Bomb" he has chosen a very difficult, yet a very interesting, subject—the anarchist outrages in Chicago. The horror of those events and of the trial which succeeded them left a deep mark on American history, and Mr. Harris, who knows America and can write of it, and who has the faculty for narrative, has special qualifications for reviving the story and for making it tell. We imagine that he has followed its actual setting of fact with tolerable closeness. The chief actors in it—Parsons, Engel, Lingg—are here; and the nominal hero of Mr. Harris's novel, Rudolph Schnaubelt, is the supposed thrower of the bomb, who was never arrested, who escaped to Germany, and who was believed to have died in his bed in Bavaria. The book, in fact, is half fiction, half history, and on this form of novel one has always to suggest the criticism that its virtue must come from within, not from without—that is to say, that the author must combine his materials in a method entirely different from that which the historian adopts.

This, indeed, Mr. Harris has endeavored to do. He has written a love story which has nothing to do with the story of the bomb-throwing. He has clearly invented the character of Rudolph Schnaubelt, the bomb-thrower and teller of the tale of the conspiracy and of his own share in it. And he has raised a moral question, the ethics of bomb-throwing and the character of the anarchist who commits this crime, with his eyes open, with his moral sensibilities in full play, and with the belief that such action is essential to the kind of industrial society which Chicago represented at the time of the labor troubles. This problem Mr. Harris suggests chiefly through his sketch of the head-centre of the conspiracy, Lingg, who committed suicide in prison.

* "The Bomb." By Frank Harris. John Long. 6s.

A SELECTION FROM

James Clarke & Co.'s New List

THE WEB OF CIRCUMSTANCE.
A New Novel. By ISABEL BURGIN. Large crown 8vo, illustrated, cloth boards, 6s.—"The author has quite a gift for novel-writing."—Pall Mall Gazette.

THE HEART OF JESSIE LAURIE.
By AMELIA E. BARR, Author of "The Bow of Orange Ribbon," &c. Large crown 8vo, cloth boards, illustrated, 6s.—"All the characters of this most readable story are more than well depicted. We predict for it a well-deserved success."—Brighton Herald.

SIDELIGHTS ON RELIGION.
By J. BRIERLEY, B.A., Author of "Our City of God," "Ourselves and the Universe," &c. Large crown 8vo, cloth boards, gilt top, 3s. 6d. net.—"Not an article in this closely-packed book which will not amply repay careful study."—Northern Whig.

MESSAGES OF HOPE.
By GEORGE MATHESON, D.D., LL.D., F.R.S.E. Author of "Thoughts for Life's Journey," "Leaves for Quiet Hours," &c. Handsomely bound in cloth boards, gilt edges, 3s. 6d. net; leather 5s. net.—"The papers in this volume are sure to be treasured by a wide circle of readers."—Scotsman.

JESUS: SEVEN QUESTIONS.
By J. WARSCHAUER, M.A., D.Phil., Author of "The New Evangel," &c. Large crown 8vo, cloth boards, gilt top, 3s. 6d. net.—"The New Theology has found an able and eloquent advocate in Dr. Warschauer."—Dundee Courier.

THE EVOLUTION OF OLD TESTAMENT RELIGION.
By W. E. ORCHARD, B.D. Large crown 8vo, cloth boards, gilt top, 3s. 6d. net.

THINGS MOST SURELY BELIEVED,
By J. D. JONES, M.A., B.D., Author of "The Gospel of Grace." "Model Prayer," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 2s. 6d. net. —"The volume may be unhesitatingly recommended."—Dundee Advertiser.

CONQUERING PRAYER; or, THE POWER OF PERSONALITY.
By L. SWETENHAM, Author of "Religious Genius." Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 2s. 6d. net.—"Will stand comparison with any of the numerous volumes on prayer recently issued."—Methodist Recorder.

London: JAMES CLARKE & Co., 13 & 14, Fleet Street, E.C.
And of all Booksellers.

J. W. ARROWSMITH'S AUTUMN LIST.

SIX SHILLINGS.

A LOYAL MAID, W. G. TARBET.

THE CANNIBAL CRUSADER.
Mrs. J. E. PANTON. Author of "Leaves from a Life," &c., &c.

A ROMAN TRAGEDY AND OTHERS
JOHN AYSCOUGH. Author of "Marotz." (In preparation.)

THE MAN WHO WAS THURSDAY.
G. K. CHESTERTON.
"It is 'awfully' droll, witty, racy, vivacious, paradoxical, humorous, pithy, and what not else. . . . Mr. Chesterton has done an admirable thing, and probably knows it."—The Observer.

THREE SHILLINGS AND SIXPENCE.

OUR BYE-ELECTION.
ROSALINE MASSON.

ANGEL ESQUIRE.
EDGAR WALLACE.
"Sherlock Holmes himself is not in it with 'Angel Esquire,' who, while seemingly concerning himself with racing, betting, and good living, knows the history of every criminal in the country, and orders the destiny of all the luckless men and women with whom he has to deal."—Yorkshire Observer.

NEW EDITIONS AND REPRINTS.

HETTY WESLEY.
A. T. QUILLER-COUCH. 1/- net. Fcap. 8vo. Cloth.
(With Special Preface, in which the Author replies to criticisms.)

THE PRISONER OF ZENDA
RUPERT OF HENTZAU
SOPHY OF KRAVONIA
By Anthony Hope
On Fine Paper. Pocket Edition.
2/6 net, Cloth.
3/6 net, Leather.
(With Illustrations.)

BRISTOL: J. W. ARROWSMITH LONDON: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & CO.

THE EVOLUTION OF MODERN GERMANY.
By W. HARBUTT DAWSON. 21s. net.
Traces the economic and industrial transition through which Germany has been passing during the last thirty or forty years. The book is strictly non-controversial, and avoids all topics which divide English public opinion at the present time.
T. FISHER UNWIN.

MY CLIMBS IN THE ALPS AND CAUCASUS.
By A. F. MUMMERY. New Edition, with Introduction by Mrs. MUMMERY and J. A. HOBSON. 21s. net.
"The book will undoubtedly find a place in every climber's library."—Sir W. M. CONWAY, in the Pall Mall Gazette.
"One of the most amusing and thrilling narratives that have ever passed through our hands."—Daily Chronicle.
With Photogravure, Coloured, and Half-tone Illustrations by Joseph Pennell and others.
T. FISHER UNWIN.

MOUNTAINEERING IN THE LAND OF THE MIDNIGHT SUN.
By Mrs. AUBREY LE BLOND (Mrs. Main). 10s. 6d. net.
In this volume the author describes her series of ascents within the Arctic Circle. The Book is profusely Illustrated from Photographs by the Author.
Please write for a copy of the new Illustrated Prospectus of "Books on Climbing."
T. FISHER UNWIN.

THE SCENERY OF SHERWOOD FOREST.
By JOSEPH RODGERS. 21s. net. Write for Prospectus.
With some account of the Eminent Families once Resident there, and an Essay on Robin Hood. With Illustrations of the Magnificent Trees and Characteristic Scenery from Drawings by the Author, and with Portraits in Photogravure.
T. FISHER UNWIN.

NEW LIGHT ON ANCIENT EGYPT.
By G. MASPERO. Illustrated. 12s. 6d. net.
In this book Professor Maspero divests himself of the technical apparatus usually deemed indispensable by the expert and puts his scholarship at the service of the layman.
T. FISHER UNWIN.

A LITERARY HISTORY OF RUSSIA.
By Professor A. BRÜCKNER. With Frontispiece. 12s. 6d. net.
A new volume in "The Library of Literary History." Intended for the general reader, the book is accurate and elaborate enough to deserve the careful attention of the scholar.
T. FISHER UNWIN.

A LITERARY HISTORY OF THE ADELPHI.
By AUSTIN BRERETON. New Edition. 10s. 6d. net.
With a New Introduction, Photogravure Frontispiece, and 26 other Full-page Illustrations. Many of these have been obtained from a private source, making the collection absolutely unique.
T. FISHER UNWIN.

THE REAL JAPAN.
By Sir HENRY NORMAN, M.P. Illustrated. 5s. net.
Mr. Norman's pen and camera have between them produced a very charming picture of Japan, full of colour, fresh observation, and insight."—Daily Chronicle.
T. FISHER UNWIN.

FROM THE EAST & FROM THE WEST.
By T. C. LEWIS. Verses Translated from European and Asiatic Sources. 6s. net. T. FISHER UNWIN.

Please write for a copy of the illustrated prospectus "Books on Climbing." Sent post free on application to
T. FISHER UNWIN.

THE INTERNATIONAL.

A Review of the World's Progress.

NOV.] PRINCIPAL CONTENTS. [1s. net.

J. A. HOBSON
The Nationalisation of Railways.

THE EDITOR
Constitutionalism in the Factory.

CANON BARNETT
The Problem of Distress among the Unemployed.

"The Women's Movement in France," "Over-Production and Shorter Hours in the Cotton Industry," "Anti-Militarism in Russia," "Child-Labour in India," &c. &c.

T. FISHER UNWIN, 1, Adelphi Terrace, London.

This man Mr. Harris represents as manufacturing the bomb, as deliberately inciting Schnaubelt to throw it by working on his sensuous, neurotic, excitable temperament, and as contriving his escape. At the same time Lingg is made to rank himself morally with the peaceful anarchist who thinks to dissolve society as it exists without conceiving or willing any physical ills to the people who now control it, who, in Lingg's words, "desires by sheer loving-kindness" to "turn the hangman's noose into a symbol of the eternal brotherhood of men."

This is Mr. Harris's theme, and we shall venture to say that, though it is worked out with much literary skill, and though it might apply to phases and temperaments incidental to the Russian Revolution, it does not apply to the Chicago bomb-throwing. That was surely an incident of a miniature war, with blows struck ruthlessly in a brief, horrible ebullition of human passion, provoked and sustained by the lawless strain in American life. Mr. Harris makes us realise the brutality of the Chicago police, and the fierce drive and cruel physical ills attending industrialism in an American city. But he does not give us enough of Lingg's case against society to let us conceive how he came to regard the work he did as "good work." If he was as intelligent as Mr. Harris suggests, he must have known that it was not good, that nothing was changed for the better by it. We can understand, as we have said, a miscalculation of this kind on the part of a Russian Nihilist, or his modern successor, shut out from all means of intellectual or moral expression of his case against the Government, a witness of the failure and despair of the flower of his countrymen. But we cannot disentangle this element of insight from the dreadful impatience of the Chicago anarchists. The best of them, by far, seem to us to have been men like Parsons, who were almost certainly guiltless of the outrages, and destitute of knowledge of or sympathy with them. Mr. Harris is, of course, not inventing his own sentiments; he is making one anarchist describe the motives of another. But he has not quite convinced us of the "verifiableness" of the type.

Mr. Harris has a born writer's eloquence, he has knowledge of his subject, and he often expresses himself with a distinction of phrasing and a precision of thought which give real value to his work. Here, for example, is an interesting indictment, which he puts into the mouth of Lingg, of the absence of opportunity which modern life presents to the more fastidious kind of talent:—

> "The worst fault in our civilisation here," said Lingg, "is that it is not complex enough. It holds up one prize before all of us—riches. But many of us do not want wealth; we want a small competency without care or fear. We ought to be able to get that as employees in some department of State. That would remove us from the competition, and tend to increase the wages of those who live in the whirl of competition. Some of us, too, are born students, want to give ourselves to the study of this, that, or the other science; there ought to be chemical laboratories in every street; physical laboratories in every town with posts attached at small pay for those who would give their lives to the advancement of knowledge; studios, too, for artists; State-aided theatres. Life must be made richer by making it more complex. By not reserving whole fields of industry to the State, by giving everything to the individual, we are driving all men into this mad race for riches; hence suffering, misery, discontent, the ill-health of the whole organism. The brain and heart have their own rights, and should not be forced to serve the belly."

There is the same distinction of style in this passage:—

> "There are three manifestations of the divine in man," he went on, as if speaking to himself; "beauty in girls and boys, the bodily beauty and grace of youth, which we hide and prostitute, and which we should exhibit and admire in dances and public games, for beauty in itself humanises and ennobles. Then there is genius in men and women, which is for the most part wasted and spent in a sordid conflict with mediocrity, and which should be sought out and put to use as the rarest and most valuable of gifts. And then come the millions of the toil-weary and dispossessed—each of them with a spark of the divine and a right in human pity to a humane life. Oh, there needs no saviour of men from among the gods," he cried; "but a saviour of God, of the Divine, among men . . ." and again he broke off suddenly, smiling with inscrutable eyes.

The actual story of the bomb-throwing, of Lingg's pressure on Schnaubelt, of the man's physical recoil and breakdown after the deed, is told with great power, the more so that the cheap kind of "descriptive" effect is not attempted.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

"The Edinburgh Review" for October is a particularly strong number. Free Trade forms the subject of the opening and closing articles, the latter of which is a convincing reply to Lord Milner's criticisms upon the discussion of Canadian Preference in the last number of the "Review." The opening article, entitled "The Free Trade Congress, Political Reaction and the Hop Industry," contains an examination of the methods by which a policy of tariffs was engineered in other countries. The reviewer has little difficulty in showing that tariffs ostensibly imposed to nurse infant industries have been increased rather than diminished when these industries were established. He further shows that the Protectionist reaction has been everywhere brought about by combinations of special interests and he notices that our own "so-called Tariff Reformers" are adopting a similar policy. "There are the same appeals to the interests of particular industries, the same efforts to unite them in a combination against the general body of consumers, the same profuse expenditure of money by manufacturers aiming at monopoly—in short, the beginnings of the same system of corruption of the political institutions of the country, as yet confined to the constituencies." "The New Era in Turkey" summarises the recent history of the Ottoman Empire, and gives a clear and very well-informed and instructive account of the chief forces now at work. The writer concludes that the men who have wrought the Revolution "may be trusted to face its consequences with courage and prudence." Other articles deal with "The Industrial Position of Women," "The Survey of the British Empire," "Goethe's Novels," "New England Nature Studies"—a sympathetic interpretation of Thoreau, Burroughs, and Whitman—"The Paston Letters," "Early London," "Beauty and Expression," and the Memoirs of the Comtesse de Boigne and Baron de Frénilly.

* * *

In the "Quarterly Review," two articles, "Our Endangered Sea Supremacy" and "The German Peril: A Rejoinder to Prince Bülow," bring forward all the average alarmist arguments for spending more money upon the Navy. The writer of the former article, in answer to the German Chancellor's attack on his first statement, admits that "Germany has every reason to equip a larger fleet than she has hitherto possessed for the defence of her growing oversea commerce," and concedes that she "probably does not desire war with us, because it would be a gamble in which all her oversea commerce and her mercantile marine would be at stake." Nevertheless, he insists on the danger created by a fleet of the size and character outlined in the latest German Navy Act, and even declares that with this force an invasion of this country would be "a venture by no means hopeless." No one disputes that there were circumstances connected with the organisation of the new German Navy calculated to make British opinion uneasy, but the "Quarterly" reviewer italicises all the "i's" and crosses all the "t's" with over-emphasis. Major Darwin discusses "Municipal Trade" and reaches the conclusion that "a searching and impartial inquiry into municipal trade would materially strengthen the hands of those who in such cases advocate the less Socialistic methods of meeting the complaints made with regard to existing conditions." Mr. C. Grant Robertson writes on "The First Earl of Chatham"; Mr. W. A. Baillie-Grohman on "Medieval Sport"; Mr. C. E. Bedwell on "The Inns of Court"; Mr. John Cooke on "Vagrants, Beggars, and Tramps"; Professor S. J. McLean on "The Presidential Election in the United States"; and Professor Ridgeway on "The Origin of Tragedy." There is a good anonymous article on "John Delane and Modern Journalism." The reviewer is, on the whole, hopeful that journalism will regain its influence, but he thinks it has gone far as a provider to sensationalism and the interest in crime.

* * *

"The Contemporary Review" opens with two articles on the Near East, "The Near Eastern Crisis," by Dr. E. J. Dillon, and "'Constitution' in North Albania," by Miss M. Edith Durham. The chief interest of Dr. Dillon's article is his account of the Gueshoff incident and of Germany's

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST

allowed on Deposits repayable on demand.

2 per cent. INTEREST

on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.

All General Banking Business transacted.

ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.

C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

BOOKSELLERS.

THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE,

53, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C.,

CATALOGUES POST FREE.

Have the Largest Selection of Bibles, Prayer Books, and Church Services. Publishers of "The Marked Bible," Lectern Lesson Book," "Priest's Pocket Bible," "Daily Service Book," &c.

CASH DISCOUNT, 3D. IN 1S.

☛ Thousands of Bibles, etc., at HALF-PRICE.

Catalogue No. 361. 148 Pages.

GLAISHER'S 1909 GENERAL CATALOGUE OF SELECTED PUBLISHERS' REMAINDERS.

Now Ready. Reduced Prices. Immense Variety.

WILLIAM GLAISHER, LTD.,

Remainder and Discount Booksellers,

265, HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON

TYPEWRITING.

TYPEWRITING. — Typewriting of every description high-class work. Author's MSS. 10d. per thousand words prompt, accurate. E. C. PEARCE, 30, College Road, Reading.

Buy

The Saturday Westminster

Weekly Issue of "The Westminster Gazette."

Because

it contains all F.C.G.'S Cartoons of the Week.
of its unique page of "Problems and Prizes."
of its Book Reviews and Literary Columns.
of the Variety of General Articles and Short Stories.
it is the only Weekly Magazine-Review of the kind.
it costs but a Penny a Week. By post, 6s. 6d. (Home), and 8s. 8d. (Abroad) per annum.

It

Never Fails to Please & Satisfy

Offices: Tudor House, Tudor St., London, E.C.

THE INDEX TO VOLUMES I., II. & III. OF THE NATION

May be had free on application to the Manager.

TANGYE OIL ENGINE

AUTOMATIC TUBE IGNITION.

NO LAMP EXCEPT FOR STARTING

TANGYES LTD BIRMINGHAM.

ALPINE SPORTS, LIMITED,

Beg to announce that they have secured for their clients the accommodation in the following Hotels in some of the sunniest Swiss Resorts for those who desire a Winter Holiday with

SKI-ING, CURLING, TOBOGGANNING, SKATING, Sleighing, &c

BALLAIGUES—GRAND HOTEL AUBEPINE
ST. BEATENBERG—GRAND HOTEL VICTORIA
HOTEL BELLEVUE
CHAMONIX—GRAND HOTEL COUTTET
HOTEL DES ALPES
CHESIERES—HOTEL CHAMOSSAIRE
KANDERSTEG—GRAND HOTEL VICTORIA
KLOSTERS—GRAND HOTEL VEREINA
LENZERHEIDE—HOTEL KURHAUS
HOTEL SCHWEIZERHOF
MONTANA—PALACE HOTEL
MORGINS—GRAND HOTEL DES BAINS
VILLARS SUR-OLLON—GRAND HOTEL, MUVERAN
HOTEL BELLEVUE
HOTEL DU PARC
HOTEL VICTORIA

All the rooms in some of the above Hotels have already been booked for certain periods. All rooms must be booked in London, and plans of any of these Hotels will be forwarded on application to the Secretary, Alpine Sports, Ltd., 5, Endsleigh Gardens, London, N.W.

If you want to know about the books of the season get the November BOOK MONTHLY, now ready, 6d. net. It is full of literary gossip, literary articles, literary news, and literary illustrations. Get it from your bookseller, or from the publishers, Simpkin, Marshall and Co., Stationers' Hall Court, London.

BOOK BARGAINS.—Garnier's English Landed Interest, 2 vols., 6s. 6d. (published 21s.) Cruikshank's 400 Humorous Illustrations, 4s. 6d. (published 16s.) Pepy's Diary, 4 vols., 15s. (published 30s.) Fennimore's Cooper's novels, 32 vols., 42s. Thackeray's complete works, 26 vols., 45s. (cost £4 12s.). Chaffer's Pottery and Porcelain, 28s. 6d. (cost 42s.). Art of Extempore Speaking, 2s. 6d. 100,000 books for sale and exchange. Menpe's World's Children, 8s. 6d. (cost 20s. net). Wood's Complete Natural History, 5 vols., 2,000 illustrations, 27s. 6d. (cost £2 12s. 6d.). Harmsworth's Encyclopædia, 8 vols., 25s. Please state wants. Catalogues free.—HOLLAND BROS., Book Merchants, 21, John Bright Street, Birmingham.

Rowntree's Elect Cocoa

"WARMS & CHEERS"

MAKERS TO H.M. THE KING.

part in it. "But when he afterwards, in conversation with Turkish dignitaries, on whom the decision depended, gave it as his opinion that having deliberately omitted Gueshoff's name (from the list of invitations to an official dinner), they ought not to insert it after his protest, he went beyond his legitimate sphere, and in lieu of a peacemaker he became a mischief-maker. To that extent, and only to that extent, is it true to speak of the Gueshoff incident as 'made in Germany.' As soon as the Young Turkish leaders, it is added, discerned the mistake, they undertook to make the fullest amends for the past and to accept Bulgaria's view of her representative's status in the future." We have reason to believe that this is an accurate account of the circumstances; we are afraid it does not acquit Germany of responsibility. Miss Durham, who has been travelling in North Albania since the Young Turkish movement succeeded, gives some amusing instances of the tribesmen's notions of what a "Constitution" means, and of the advantages they expect it will bring them. The Moslem population—or some of it—seems to have quaintly reversed its meaning. "When," asked one of them, "is this Constitution ready to begin? When are we to attack the Giaours?" Mr. Edwin Pears argues with much authority and knowledge for international control over the Bagdad Railway and for British co-operation, and thinks that Germans will now recognise that such co-operation is essential to the success of the scheme. Canon Barnett suggests several measures of Poor Law Reform based on the belief that while the form of relief offered must be less attractive than work, still relief must aim at developing self-respect. Mr. George Barlow writes pleasantly and warmly on "The Genius of Dickens"; Colonel F. N. Maude on "Air-Ships and their Value in War"; and Mr. S. Udny on "Dante's Intuition of the Infinite."

* * *

A Novel Reader's Guide.—"The Gentleman," by Alfred Ollivant. (Murray, 6s.). An exciting tale of war in Sussex in the Napoleonic period.—"Tormentilla, or the Road to Gretna Green," by Dorothea Deakin. (Smith, Elder, 6s.) A story of country life told with real humor.—"The Court of Conscience," by Ella MacMahon. (Chapman & Hall, 6s.). A novel of love, politics, and society, showing both power of character drawing and skill in the management of the plot.—"Edwin Trafford, Altruist," by W. K. Hill. (Nutt, 6s.). This book, described as an economic romance, is spun out to too great length, but shows promise. It deals with woman's suffrage and the relations between workers and their employers.—"The Red Stain," by Sir William Magnay. (Ward, Lock, 6s.). A detective story neither above nor below the average of this type of fiction.—"Irresolute Catherine," by Violet Jacobs. (Murray, 2s. 6d.). A clever piece of analysis describing the influence of those around her upon a simple Welsh girl.

The Week in the City.

The Movement of Leading Stocks.

	Price Friday Morning, Oct. 30.	Price Friday Morning, Nov. 6.
Consols 2½ per cent.	84$\frac{3}{4}$ ...	84$\frac{3}{8}$
German 3 per cent.	83$\frac{1}{2}$ ...	83
French Rentes 3 per cent.	95 ...	95
Turkish Unified	90$\frac{1}{4}$ ...	89$\frac{3}{4}$
Grand Trunk 1st Pref.	105 ...	105
Canadian-Pacific	179$\frac{1}{4}$ ...	178$\frac{1}{2}$
Southern Pacific	110$\frac{1}{2}$ ...	114$\frac{1}{4}$
Union Pacific	174$\frac{3}{4}$ ...	181$\frac{1}{2}$
Rand Mines	6$\frac{31}{32}$ ...	6$\frac{15}{16}$
Cons. Goldfields	4$\frac{27}{32}$ ...	6$\frac{1}{8}$

The whole attention of the markets up to Thursday was centred on the American elections, but on that day there was a diversion of a disagreeable character, caused by a new cloud on the international horizon, owing to the acerbity of the diplomatic exchanges between Germany and France in reference to what is known as the Casa Blanca incident. The result of the elections in the United States has certainly been to lift the prices of American Rails to a very substantial extent, but reasons are given below for believing that the advance is not likely to be maintained for any length of time. The Franco-German incident gave rise to an attack of "nerves," which was, however, quite short-lived. The reports on Friday morning indicated that the matter was in course of settlement, and that no very great alarm is felt on the Bourses is proved by the steadiness of Consols and International securities. French Rentes are unchanged, and German Imperial Threes have dropped ½, which may be due as much to the taxation scheme as to the Casa Blanca affair. South African shares are rather lower on the week owing to the diversion of interest to other markets and to disappointment at the Consolidated Gold Fields' dividend, which was reported to be more than 20 per cent.

The American Election and Trade.

Perhaps the most eagerly awaited result of the Presidentian Election in the United States, next to that of who was to be the new President, was the stimulus expected to be administered to trade and finance by the success of Mr. Taft. For weeks past the market for copper has been held up almost entirely by speculation, on the chance of the popular candidate's election, and in a less degree, the other markets for metals and produce of all kinds have been in a similar condition. The stock markets have been anticipating a boom from the same cause, and the intense interest aroused in the result was proved by the formation of a kerbstone market in Throgmorton Street at seven o'clock on Wednesday morning. It seems very doubtful whether all these sanguine forecasts, arising from the incurable optimism of American traders, are going to be realised. It is affirmed, indeed, that some large railway and other contracts were held back until the election of Mr. Taft became a certainty; but they can hardly be of so much importance as to affect the general volume of trade to a great extent. It has often been proved that the possession of office by any particular party has no very profound influence on the course of trade and finance; and it seems too much to expect that the occupation of the White House by Mr. Taft instead of Mr. Bryan can immediately turn deep depression into abounding prosperity, increase the demand for commodities, and provide the railways with more traffic and larger revenues. There have been some encouraging signs of recovery in the United States recently, and the termination of the political turmoil will probably result in these becoming more pronounced. But the effects of the collapse last autumn are too deep-seated to be at once removed by the result of an election; and it is most likely that after the speculation aroused by the event has spent itself, there will be a fresh reaction of some duration. The recovery, when it comes, must almost of necessity be a gradual process.

The New German Taxation.

The German Finance Minister, Herr Sydow, has now produced his scheme for raising the additional revenue of £25,000.000 per annum, which he declared a few weeks ago to be essential for the purpose of meeting the Imperial expenditure. He hopes to get £5,000,000 by acquiring for the Government a partial monopoly of the manufacture and sale of spirits, from increased excise duty on beer £5,000,000, on tobacco £3,850,000, on still wine in bottles £1,000,000, tax on electricity and gas £2,500,000, a tax on newspaper advertisements £1,650,000, and from an increase of the death duties £4,600,000. The total of the new imposts is about £23,600,000, and the balance of the £25,000,000 is to be raised by an increase of the matricular contributions from the States from 40 pfennigs to 80 pfennigs per head. The scheme involves the arrangement of an immense amount of detail under each head; but generally, the contributions are levied for the most part in such a way as to fall on the shoulders best able to bear them. They are calculated also, with the exception of the tax on light, to increase the cost of production in manufacture only indirectly, and to a comparatively small extent. A sudden addition of £25,000,000 to the taxation of an already heavily burdened community in a time of profound peace is enormous, and should bring home very forcibly to the German people, the penalty of indulging in excessive expenditure on armaments. It remains to be seen whether the Government will be able to obtain all it wants. There is sure to be a long and bitter fight over each separate proposal, and not least over that for increasing the matricular contributions. Previous suggestions of the kind have been met with determined and successful resistance.

Lucellum.

SMOKED EVERYWHERE BY (NEARLY) EVERYBODY

No. 6, Driving.

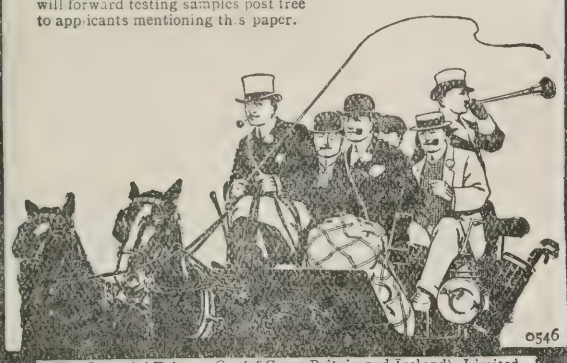
"THE MIXTURE OF MATCHLESS MERIT."

PLAYER'S "NAVY" MIXTURE

SOLD IN TWO STRENGTHS:

MEDIUM 4½d. per oz., 1/6 per ¼lb. Tin.
MILD 5d. per oz., 1/8 per ¼lb. Tin.

John Player & Sons, Nottingham will forward testing samples post free to applicants mentioning this paper.



The Imperial Tobacco Co. (of Great Britain and Ireland), Limited.

THIS IS THE TIME OF YEAR WHEN

Liver troubles

ARE MORE PREVALENT.

If the Liver is weak, the change from Summer to Autumn, renders it incapable of performing its duties, and the result is, an accumulation of bile in the blood which causes depression, irritability, and may develop into Dropsy.

MERIT'S (FAVRINE) Liverets

STRENGTHEN WHILE THEY REGULATE

will quickly and positively cure all Liver disorders, When the valuable curative and tonic properties they contain, are absorbed into the system, the circulation carries them direct to the Liver, where they stimulate this organ to perform its duties naturally, and strengthen it to maintain health action. MERIT'S LIVERETS are prepared as prescribed by an eminent Physician, from purely vegetable ingredients. Price 1/1½ of all Chemists and Stores, or if unable to obtain, send direct to

MERIT & CO., 66, St. Mary Axe, London, E.C.

CAUTION.—None are genuine unless the name "MERIT'S LIVERETS." and the signature MERIT & Co., is on the package. Spurious imitations will not cure you.

THE

LEADING EGYPTIAN CIGARETTES

Kyriazis'

EGYPTIAN CIGARETTES

CAIRO.

Try them. They are the finest imported, and can be obtained from all High-class Tobacconists, Stores, &c.

Wholesale depot—20, Cheapside, London, E.C.

MISCELLANEOUS.

To Unitarians Living at a Distance from a Congenial Place of Worship.

SERMONS or PAMPHLETS will be sent weekly to anyone paying in advance 2s. 2d. to cover a year's postage.

Apply by letter to
Lady Wilson, 86, Church Road, RICHMOND, SURREY.

[COPY.]

APOLOGY.

THE WRECK OF THE "ARGONAUT."

SPRINGFIELD,
ENNIS,
October 28th, 1908.

To the Co-operative Cruising Co., Ltd.

Sirs,

With reference to my letter which appeared in the "Times" newspaper of the 5th of October on the above subject in which letter I stated that "every boat was full," I now express to you my unqualified regret for having made this statement without having first of all taken any steps to ascertain the facts of the case.

I now know that, so far from my statement being correct, the facts are that the "Argonaut" had boating accommodation certified by the Board of Trade the day the vessel left London, a copy of which certificate was posted up on board the "Argonaut" and might have been seen by me, stating that there was boating accommodation for 378 souls, being 40 more than the "Argonaut" was licensed to carry and 148 more than were actually on board.

I agree to pay the costs of advertising this apology in any papers in which your Company may elect to advertise it.

Yours &c.,
(Signed) C. L. RYNNE

Curio Club Bargains

Private persons desirous of disposing of antiques at bargain prices will find a ready sale for same at the "London Opinion Curio Club" 107, Regent Street, London, W.

To Collectors of China, etc.

Don't throw away anything broken in the home, but buy

"FORTAFIX"

Which is the Strongest Cement in the world, and

Withstands Boiling Water.

White in colour, it mends and repairs anything from a saucepan to a piece of china. It is fire-proof and chemical-proof. Of all Ironmongers, Stationers, Oilmen, Chemists and Stores,

Per 6d. Tube.

or sent post-free through nearest Agent on receipt of 6d. in stamps to

BENJAMIN & GEE,
31, St. Mary Axe, LONDON. E.C.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE DRINK THE

RED WHITE & BLUE

Delicious for Breakfast & after Dinner.

In making, use LESS QUANTITY, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

EDUCATIONAL.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

CHANTRY MOUNT SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
BISHOP'S STORTFORD.

Head Mistress Miss ESTHER CASE, M.A., Dublin (Class. Tripos, Camb.
Second Mistress: Miss ESTERBROOK HICKS, B.Sc., London.
A limited number of boarders received.

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.

BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING
Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.
Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.
Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

CO-EDUCATION BY THE SOCIETY OF FRIENDS.
Friends' School, Great Ayton in Cleveland, Yorkshire.

A Boarding School for Boys and Girls (9-16). Modern Education. Preparation for Exams. Unique health record. Ten acres Recreation Grounds, Gymnasium, Swimming Bath, Laboratories, Domestic Science School. 30 Guineas per annum. Apply to the Headmaster for Prospectus, etc.

SOUTHPORT MODERN SCHOOL.

A First-Class School for Boys. Staff includes B.A., M.Sc., F.C.V., Mus. Bac, etc. Languages, Science, Commercial Subjects, Gymnastics, Swimming, Cadet Company. Prospectus from Secretary.

TANGLEWOOD, BARNT GREEN, THE LICKEY HILLS,
Near Birmingham.

BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

On approved Modern Lines Thorough Education with individual care and character training Games, gardening, and open air life in lovely country, with bracing air. Good train service on main line. Escorts provided.

Principal - - MISS EBBUTT, M.A.
(Newnham College, Cambridge—Trinity College, Dublin.)

LINCOLNSHIRE COAST.

ESSENDON GIRLS' SCHOOL, SKEGNESS.

Headmistress, MISS PAGAN, M.A. Full Staff. L.R.A.M. Swedish Gymnastics. Higher Examinations. Tennis, Hockey, Swimming. Dry sunny climate. Bracing sea air. Exhibitions offered.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.
Scholarship Examination in December.
Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors.
Enquiries should be addressed to the Bursar.

CRAIGMOUNT, EDINBURGH.
Private Boarding and Day School for Girls.

THE Principals, the Misses Gossip, are assisted by highly-qualified residents, English and Foreign Mistresses and visiting Professors. The aim of the school is a sound education, special attention being given to the study of English Literature, Modern Languages, and Music. The Gymnasium is fitted with Swedish apparatus and the school has its own Swimming Bath. The situation of the school is bracing and very healthy, and the grounds give abundant scope for games. Prospectus on application to the Principals.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager,

R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C.
Telegrams: "TRIFORM, LONDON." Telephone No. GERRARD 1854.

EDUCATIONAL.

SCHOOLS IN ENGLAND OR ABROAD
FOR BOYS AND GIRLS.

Messrs. J. and J. PATON having an intimate knowledge of the BEST SCHOOLS and TUTORS in this country and on the Continent, will be pleased to aid parents in their selection by sending (free of charge) prospectuses and full particulars of reliable and highly-recommended establishments. When writing please state the age of pupil, the district preferred, and give some idea of the fees to be paid.—J. and J. PATON, Educational Agents, 143, Cannon-st., London. E.C. Telephone 5,053, Central.

STAMMERING.

The severest cases cured, but only by personal tuition, by one who has cured himself after stammering for 10 years. Adults and boys received in residence or as daily pupils. Particulars on application to
Mr. A. C. SCHNELLE, 119, Bedford Court Mansions, W.C.

A PAPER FOR
MR. REDMOND AND MR. McKINNON WOOD.

This conversation took place in the House of Commons on Wednesday, Oct. 28th:

MR. W. REDMOND: May I ask the Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs whether the Foreign Office has any information as to the authenticity of the interview with the German Emperor appearing in the Press this morning?

MR. MCKINNON WOOD: I have not read the account of the interview—alleged interview—to which the hon. member refers, and I am consequently unable to express any opinion, or give any information about it.

MR. W. REDMOND: May I ask whether it will be possible for the hon. gentleman's department to make such arrangements that in future, when interviews of this character with important personages are given, they should be put in newspapers which we all read? (Laughter.)

PUBLIC OPINION

is a paper which will meet the cases of both MR. MCKINNON WOOD and MR. REDMOND. MR. MCKINNON WOOD by reading PUBLIC OPINION will see at a glance the important things which have appeared in the papers. MR. W. REDMOND will be able to read without trouble about important things dealt with in papers of which he disapproves and which he will not buy.

MR. REDMOND referred to the interview with the German Emperor in the Daily Telegraph and summarised in the last issue of PUBLIC OPINION.

PUBLIC OPINION

for nearly half a century has summarised for busy people the most important things in the world's best Papers, Magazines, and Books. It is published every Friday at twopence and can be obtained at all bookstalls, or will be sent post free for one year for 10/10 in the United Kingdom; or for 13/- to any part of the world.

PUBLIC OPINION OFFICES,
31 & 32, Temple House, Tallis St., E.C.

HIGHEST QUALITY
TURKISH TOWELS
AND SIMILAR GOODS.
SOFT AND ABSORBENT.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWEL.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH SHEET.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH MAT.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH GOWN.

THE "OSMAN" Turkish Goods enumerated here are an absolute necessity in every household. They are a luxury, but not expensive, and can be obtained at prices within reach of every one. Be sure to buy the "Osman" brand and avoid imitations.

MADE BY
BARLOW & JONES, LIMITED, MANCHESTER;
And Sold by all High-class Drapers and Upholsterers.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout, Bathrooms on every Floor, Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard and Smoking Rooms. Heated throughout.

Fireproof Floors. Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 6/0.

Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hote, Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London." Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

LONDON.
WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. WILD, C.C., Man. Direc. 30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

BLACKPOOL.
67, ALEXANDRA ROAD. Board and Residence. 5s. per day

PROSPECT HOUSE BOARDING ESTAB., 33, Central Par. facing Sea, Central for Amusements. S. Aspect. Tel. 575 Manageress

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.
IDEAL RESIDENCE.
Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.
THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate

SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30/- week

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.
BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport

BRIGHTON.
THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston

BUXTON.
ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.
THE TORS PRIVATE HOTEL (en pension). Tel. 199. Mrs. F. Sara

DARTMOOR DOUSLAND, Nr. YELVERTON.
BARONS' PRIVATE HOTEL. Close to Moors. J. Wonnacott, Prop.

DEAL.
BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson

EASTBOURNE.
CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Gdns. 5/- day

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day

EDINBURGH.
ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading Hotel

FARNWORTH (Station) Nr. BOLTON.
RAWSON ARMS HOTEL. Theatrical Accommodation

GREAT YARMOUTH.
HILLS MARINE VIEW BOARDING HOUSE.

MELTON LODGE RESIDENTIAL MANSION. Facing Sea. 10/- per day

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.
THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.
RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta Course

ILFRACOMBE.
COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea

LANCASTER.
BOAR'S HEAD HOTEL. Wm. McIntosh

STONEWELL RESTAURANT. T. M. Hey, Proprietor

MARKET HALL RESTAURANT. Prop., J. E. Dowthwaite

LEEDS.
HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station

LIVERPOOL.
COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone: 3032 Royal, 3 wires

LLANELLY.
CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver

MALVERN.
HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & Manager—J. Wilson

MANCHESTER.
"OLD SWAN," Victoria Station Approach.—The Rendezvous of Lancashire Trade Unions.

MATLOCK.
SMEDLEY'S Hydro. Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Manager

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links (18 holes)

OXFORD (near).
SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, &c. Lecture

PENTRE.
PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles

PORTSMOUTH.
SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director

SOUTHPORT.
KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St., Band and Illuminations. Turkish, Electric, Hydropathic, &c., Baths & Treatment

ROWNTREE'S CAFE, Lord St., Hot Luncheons, Aft'noon Teas, Tel. 647

HOTEL CAFE CONTINENTAL, 207, Lord St., French and English Confectioners, Dinners, Teas and Suppers. Parties catered for

SOUTHSEA.
STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress

TEIGNMOUTH.
REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner

WHITBY.
WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.
HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplace. "The English Home."

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.
THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE NATION PUBLISHING CO. LTD., and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following booksellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—W. H. Smith & Son's Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm Norden and Jephson.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—Gordon and Gotch.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions are received.

Scale of Charges for Advertisements.

	FULL PAGE.	½ PAGE.	¼ PAGE.
Back Page, or Page facing matter ...	£10 0 0	£5 0 0	£2 10 0
Other Pages ...	8 0 0	4 0 0	2 0 0

Hotels, Hydros, and Educational
13 Insertions ... ... 8d. per line.
52 ,, ... 6d. ,,

THE INDEX TO VOLUME III. OF THE NATION

Is NOW READY and can be had free on application to the Manager.

The Index to Volumes I. and II. can also be obtained free.

FROM CHATTO & WINDUS'S AUTUMN LIST.

From Island to Empire.

A SHORT HISTORY OF THE EXPANSION OF ENGLAND BY FORCE OF ARMS.

By J. S. C. BRIDGE. [Now Ready.

With an Introduction by Admiral Sir CYPRIAN BRIDGE, G.C.B. With many Maps and Plans. Large crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. net.

"To the literature of sane imperialism this should prove a valuable contribution."—Scotsman.

"It is all admirably put together, and the whole forms a most readable description of the way in which our magnificent Imperial structure has been built up."—Manchester Evening News.

In the Abruzzi: [Now Ready.

THE COUNTRY AND THE PEOPLE.

By ANNE MACDONELL, Author of "Sons of Francis," "Touraine," &c. With 12 Illustrations after Water-Colours by AMY ATKINSON, Illustrator of "Touraine," &c., and end-paper Maps. Large crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. net.

"Mrs. Macdonell begins her delightful and extremely sympathetic book on the Abruzzi with a note of humour . . . but we find also an erudition, a digested knowledge, and a power of the pen which make the book a gem which all should possess."—Daily Telegraph.

From the North Foreland to Penzance. [Now Ready.

THE PORTS AND HARBOURS OF THE SOUTH COAST.

By CLIVE HOLLAND. Fully Illustrated after Water-Colours by MAURICE RANDALL. Large fcap. 4to, cloth, gilt top, 12s. 6d. net. Large-paper Numbered Copies, 21s. net.

"A charming and readable colour-book. . . . Mr. Randall's delightful pictures are always happy in catching the spirit of the scene, and their atmospheric effects are well charged with ozone."—Scotsman.

Of the Imitation of Christ.

By THOMAS A KEMPIS. [Now Ready.

As Translated out of the Latin by RICHARD WHYTFORD (A.D. MDLVI.). Re-edited into Modern English with an Historical Introduction by WILFRID RAYNAL, O.S.B. With Reproductions in 4 Colours after Water-Colours, and Decorations, &c., in Line, by W. RUSSELL FLINT.

The binding after a fine Sixteenth Century example now in the British Museum. Large Crown 8vo, with 8 plates in 4-Colour, buckram, 7s. 6d. net. Also a Special Edition, in small 4to on pure rag paper, deckle edges, with 4 additional Plates in 4 colours, all the plates mounted, bound whole parchment, 15s. net; whole pigskin with clasps, copying the Sixteenth Century binding, 25s. net.

Assisi of Saint Francis.

Being an Historical and Topographical History of the City of Saint Francis. With which is incorporated the Story of St. Francis and His Order. By Mrs. ROBERT GOFF. With an Essay on the Influence of the Franciscan Legend on Italian Art by J. KERR-LAWSON. Fully Illustrated in Colour and otherwise after Water-Colours and Pencil Drawings by Col. R. GOFF, and with Reproductions (8 in Colours) after the chief Paintings inspired by the Franciscan Legend; also Plans of Assisi and of its Environs. Large fcap. 4to, cloth, with Map and Index, 20s. net. Also 100 Large-paper Copies, 42s. net. [Immediately.

The Barbarians of Morocco.

By GRAF STERNBERG, Member of the Reichstag, Author of "My Impressions of the Boer War." Translated by ETHEL PECK. With 12 Illustrations after Water-Colours by DOUGLAS FOX-PITT, R.I. Large crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. net.

"It is written as the result of careful investigation at the hands of a keen observer. The Count writes of what he has seen, and he has a long sight and a vigorous judgment. . . . All will admit that he writes with obvious sincerity and with unfailing gusto. This is a healthy, wholesome book, stimulating ideas even where it does not command assent."—Daily Telegraph.

Legendary Ballads from Percy's "Reliques." [Now Ready.

Edited, and with Introduction, Notes, and a Glossary by F. SIDGWICK. Illustrated with 10 full-page Reproductions after the Water-Colours by BYAM SHAW, R.I. Large fcap. 4to, gilt top, 6s. net. Also Large-paper Numbered Copies on pure-rag paper, the Plates mounted, bound in parchment, 12s. 6d. net.

THE KING'S CLASSICS.

Each Volume is adequately Edited by a Specialist upon the subject with which it deals, while the majority of the Titles are not to be found in any other series.
Printed on Antique laid paper, 16mo (6 by 4½ in.), gilt tops, with frontispiece. Attractively bound in red cloth or quarter-bound, antique grey boards, 1s. 6d. net.

NEW VOLUMES NOW READY,

Asser's Life of King Alfred.
Swift's Battle of the Books.
Translations from the Icelandic.
Dante's Vita Nuova.
Daniel's "Delia" and Drayton's "Idea."
George Pettie's Petite Pallace of Pettie. His Pleasures (2 vols.)

A detailed list of the complete series of 60 vols, post free.

THE NEW MEDIEVAL LIBRARY.

Each volume contains photogravure or woodcut reproductions of the Illustrations contained in the works translated. Each volume further contains a Title-page engraved upon wood, after notable contemporary examples.
Size, 6½ by 4¾ inches. Boards, cloth, 5s. net; whole brown pigskin, antique style, with clasps, 7s. 6d. net.

NEW VOLUMES READY IMMEDIATELY.

7. Early English Romances: Romances of Love.
8. Early English Romances: Romances of Friendship.

Detailed prospectus of the Series post free on application.

A CHILD'S GARDEN of VERSES

By ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON.

The First Edition Illustrated in Colours to be Published in this Country.

With 12 Full-page reproductions of Water-Colours, numerous Illustrations in the text in Line, designed End-papers and Title (printed in gold), and a special Binding-design by MILLICENT SOWERBY.
Large crown 8vo, cloth 5s. net. Also a special Edition, limited to 1,000 copies on large pure rag paper, the plates mounted, and bound in whole parchment, 10s. 6d. net.
"Mature lovers of 'A Child's Garden of Verses' will be sure to like Miss Sowerby's dainty head-pieces, while the full-page plates in colour will as certainly delight younger folk. . . . . These plates are perfect embodiments of the delightful poems."—Burlington Magazine.

THE COLOUR OF PARIS.

By MM. LES ACADEMICIENS GONCOURT, under the general Editorship of M. LUCIEN DESCAVES (Secrétaire de l'Académie Goncourt). Translated by M. D. FROST. With an Introduction by M. L. BENEDITE (Conservateur du Musée National du Luxembourg), and an Essay by the Artist. Fully Illustrated after Water-Colour and Sepia Drawings by the Japanese Artist, YOSHIO MARKINO. Large fcap. 4to, cloth, gilt top, 20s. net. Also 200 Large-paper Copies, 42s. net. [Immediately.

DEVON: Its Moorlands, Streams, and Coasts.

By Lady ROSALINE NORTHCOTE. Fully Illustrated in Colours by FREDERICK J. WIDGERY. Large fcap. 4to, cloth, gilt top, 20s. net. Also 150 Large-paper Copies, 42s. net. (For the L.P. Edition inquire of the Booksellers, as it is "out of print" with the Publishers.) [Immediately.

ART AND LETTERS LIBRARY.

NEW VOLUMES NOW READY.
Each volume is issued in two forms, viz., the Ordinary Edition, large crown 8vo, with eight 4-colour illustrations, and twenty-four in half-tone; buckram, gilt tops, 7s. 6d. net. The Special Edition on pure rag paper, deckle edges—with four additional 4-colour illustrations, and a special coloured frontispiece, engraved on the wood or in collotype; small 4to, whole parchment gilt top, 15s. net; whole vellum, 20s. net; whole red polished morocco, 30s. net.

Stories of the Flemish and Dutch Artists.

FROM THE TIME OF THE VAN EYCKS TO THE END OF THE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY.
Collected and arranged by VICTOR REYNOLDS.

Stories of the English Artists.

FROM VANDYCK TO TURNER.
Collected and arranged by RANDALL DAVIES, Author of "English Society of the XVIIIth Century in Contemporary Art," and CECIL HUNT.

The Little Flowers of S. Francis of Assisi.

Being a New Edition, wholly revised and in part augmented, of the Translation by Professor T. W. ARNOLD.

London: CHATTO & WINDUS, III, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

"THE NATION," with which is incorporated "The Speaker," printed for the Proprietors by the NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY LIMITED, Whitefriars House, London, E.C., and Published by THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY LIMITED, at the Offices, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C. Registered at the General Post Office as a Newspaper.—SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 7, 1908.

The Nation

Vol. IV., No. 7.] LONDON, NOVEMBER 14, 1908. [Price 6d.
Postage: U.K., ½d. Abroad, 1½d.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
Diary of the Week	237
Politics and Affairs:—
Good Allies and Bad Europeans	240
Suffragists and Suffragettes	241
The Finance of Social Reform	243
The Control of the Motor Car	244
The Vacant Archbishopric	245
Life and Letters:—
The Harvest of an Ideal	246
The Thoughts of the Poor	247
"The Bacchanals"	249
The Robberies of the Sea	250
The Drama:—
The Magnanimous Engineer. By William Archer	251
Letters from Abroad:—
The Fall of Baron von Beck. By a Viennese Resident	252
Letters to the Editor:—
A Tale of Unemployment. By A Working Cabinet-maker	254
"The Conciliation of the Irreconcileables." By Virendranath Chattopedhyeya	255
"Grammaticals." By "Grammaticulus"	255
Murray's Bible Dictionary. By the Rev. William C. Piercy	255
Arbitration and National Honor. By J. F. Green	256
Persian Liberals and Great Britain. By Dr. Ishmael Khan, and others	256
Poetry:—
The Pleasant Life. By W. H. Davies	256
The World of Books	258
Books to be Read	258
Reviews:—
Lord Panmure's Predecessor	260
Irving	262
Engraving and Etching	264
The Christ of Toro	266
Books in Brief:—
Along the Rivieras	266
Scottish Gardens	266
The Wife of Lafayette	266
A Novel Reader's Guide	268
The Week in the City	268
Literary Supplement:—
The Latins in the Levant	275
The Story of the Scaffold	276
The Beginning of the Roman Fall	277
A Traveller for Science	278
Eight Voices	280
The Catholic Encyclopædia	282
Emperors Intime	284
Novels of the Hour	286

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

The Prime Minister reviewed the difficult foreign situation at Guildhall, on Monday, in a speech of much force and precision of phrasing. He said that the country greeted the birth of Constitutionalism in Turkey with "special gratification," and added that any change in the Treaty of Berlin must receive the assent of all the parties to it, including Turkey. But any agreement which Turkey might freely conclude with Bulgaria or Austria would be acceptable to us also. He declared that Russia adhered to the British policy of non-intervention in Persia. Neither in the Near East nor elsewhere did Great Britain desire the formation of "separate groups" or "rival combinations," for all the Powers together were joint trustees for civilisation and peace. The country would not "falter or fall short" in respect of its "special engagements," but would take any hand, including Germany's, offered in goodwill and good faith. For its own defence, its main reliance was on the Navy, and the Government intended to maintain "unquestioned and unquestionable" command of the sea. A portion of the Press has underlined the passage in the speech which touches the French entente, and suggests, quite falsely, that it covers a direct alliance in arms.

* * *

The Kaiser's communiqué to the "Telegraph" has swollen to a constitutional crisis. The Reichstag, in almost all its sections, has fallen upon him with a fierceness that should act as a warning to foolish people in this country, who talk of the "King's policy," and invite the Monarch to step out of the healthy shadow of Ministerial responsibility. Praise of our constitutional system was the keynote of the debate, and Prince Bülow did not think well to challenge it. Its other satisfactory feature was the general repudiation of the Kaiser's judgment that a section of the German people were anti-English. The debates, therefore, make emphatically for peace, and discourage the new Navy scare now being manufactured in this country. The Chancellor spoke with much constraint, and his reception was chilling. His line was to shade off the specific declarations of the interview into rhetorical commonplaces. The supposed anti-Boer plan of campaign consisted of "a few purely academic opinions." The "Telegraph" had laid on the colors too thickly in the suggestion of anti-English feeling in Germany, of German intervention in South Africa and the Far East—a hint which the "Telegraph" repudiates. He hinted that his term of office might be short, and that, even so, it was conditional on the Kaiser's promise to maintain "reserve" in speech and writing.

* * *

This humiliating apology had little or no effect on the debate, which resolved itself into a demand for an end to Byzantinism. The Socialists asked directly for an amendment of the Constitution, and openly scoffed at the Kaiser's "fantastic imagination" of "a special personal relation to God," and of omniscience in secular things, from art to politics. The Conservatives declared that Germany accepted a secondary rôle to England in naval affairs, and the Radicals insisted that they never more sincerely envied her her political institutions. Even the National Liberals supported the general plea for Constitutional rule; but the debate, throughout vehement and unfettered in tone, ended without a resolution.

* * *

On Thursday the Prime Minister was asked by Mr. Arthur Lee, an anti-German of the extreme school of Mr. Maxse, and of no great personal weight, whether "the Government accepted the two-Power standard of naval strength as meaning a preponderance of 10 per cent. over the combined strengths, in capital ships, of the two next strongest Powers; and, if not, could he state the definition of the two-Power standard which was accepted by the Government." Mr. Asquith replied that the answer to the first part of the question was in the affirmative. The answer won great Conservative cheering, and is interpreted by the Conservative Press as implying an obligation to build six, or even seven, "Dreadnoughts," with the auxiliary types, a-year. It also applies to the two-Power standard the extreme mechanical test which the late Prime Minister refused to it. We deal with some of its implications elsewhere, and we gather from letters we have received this (Friday) morning that a considerable section of the Liberal Party in Parliament regards it with surprise and concern.

* * *

A grave administrative error in dealing with the unemployed question has been committed by the Local Government Board. In announcing the Government's policy the Prime Minister stated two relaxations of the present tests. The first was that, in future, assistance was to be given "in proper cases" to persons who had received poor law relief within a twelvemonth; the second that it was to be given to persons who had been assisted under the Unemployed Act within the last two years. In a circular to the Distress Committees the Local Government Board took advantage of the words "in proper cases" to declare, in flat contradiction of Mr. Asquith's language, that neither disqualification was removed, but the Distress Committee might waive one or the other "in proper cases." Mr. Burns adopted their misinterpretation and defended it in Parliament, in pursuit, we are afraid we must say, of his and the "Spectator's" policy of forcing the unemployed into the workhouse, and of narrowing the entrance to the Unemployed Act. The Labor Party had no alternative but to move the adjournment of the House so that the Ministry's action could be squared with the Prime Minister's words. Mr. Asquith stated, with his accustomed frankness, that the Local Government Board's circular was at variance with his pledge, and that he meant the removal of the two tests to be general, though the Distress Committees would, of course, exercise discretion. He added that Mr. Burns assented to the issuing of a new circular. The Labor Party then withdrew their motion.

* * *

The Franco-German dispute has been settled very simply. Germany modified her demand for an expression of regret for the violence done to her Consular official, because a report on the Casablanca scuffle by the French police inspector at that port raised the question whether the French or German officials had been the first to use violence. This issue of fact, as well as the issue of law, is to be submitted to arbitration, and meanwhile both Governments express their regret that an incident accompanied by violence took place, and each pledges itself to a further expression of regret if the decision of the Court of Arbitration goes against it. M. Jaurès pointedly asks why the exchange of the all-important reports should have been delayed so long, and draws the conclusion that it is a sign of a grave lack of cordiality between the two Governments. But the worst feature of the episode is the way in which a portion of the English Press, with the "Times," of course, at the head, seized the occasion to confuse the issue, and make bad blood.

* * *

The Committee stage of the Licensing Bill was concluded on Monday evening. The time for the Report stage has been cleverly allocated, and the amendments to be proposed by the Government—over sixty in number—have been issued. Most of them are either mere drafting amendments or provisions in fulfilment of pledges given in Committee. The closing of public-houses on Parliamentary election days is merely to cover the hours of poll. The serving of liquor with meals on these days is provided for. The Licensing Justices are to have power to prohibit the sale of liquor in general, or any particular kind of liquor, on licensed premises before eight o'clock in the morning. On the question of off-licences, the Government have gone back on the amendment they inserted in Committee. Off-licences are not to be new licences after the end of the time limit, the only alteration made in their present position being that monopoly value payments are to be imposed on them after 1930. The opportunity for the Justices to review with a free hand the entire provision for the sale of liquor by retail at that time is, therefore, limited.

* * *

The provisions for local option at the end of the time limit do not, in our opinion, fulfil the Prime Minister's promise to Mr. J. A. Bright that the widest possible liberty of experiment should be provided for. Even reduction or limitation of licences to their existing number is not dealt with, the only option given or hinted at being that of prohibition by a two-thirds majority. The expectation of a further seven years' life at the end of the time limit is to be treated, in calculating the compensation to be paid to a licence extinguished before 1923, as being worth a certain run of three years. No doubt, if the Bill reaches the Committee stage in the Upper Chamber, this part of the Bill will be modified; but it is unfortunate that tactical considerations have put the Government into the position of having to receive lessons in logic and in justice from the House of Lords. The implacable enemies of the Bill—Lord Rothschild among them—are making unremitting efforts to prevent the Peers from giving it a second reading, and its prospects darken as the chances of a settlement on the Education question improve. If the time limit clauses pass the Lords, it will be because the Trade realises that the taxation of licences in next year's Budget may mean a greater annual financial burden than the creation of a sinking fund to replace licence values in twenty-one years—in other words, that Mr. Lloyd George's little finger may be thicker than Mr. Asquith's loins.

* * *

On Tuesday the Labor Party withdrew its support from Mr. Deakin's Government, which was defeated, and resigned. Mr. Fisher, the Labor leader, has been entrusted with the formation of a Labor Cabinet, the second in Commonwealth history. Mr. Deakin had, with Labor's help, half held office for three years, but of late the Labor Party in Australia, as in New Zealand—where the Seddon alliance has gone to pieces—had got impatient of playing second fiddle, more particularly as, since the last election, the Labor Party has been stronger than the Deakinites. The occasion for the breach was the constitutional amendment to render the New Protection legal. The Labor Party wished the whole control of social and industrial legislation to be transferred to the Commonwealth Parliament, which is manifestly the right authority, but Mr. Deakin was not prepared for so strong an attack on State jealousies. It is not known yet whether Mr. Fisher will dissolve Parliament. Probably he will maintain himself with the assistance of Radical-Protectionist Deakinites, who are not likely to co-operate with Mr. Reid's group of Free-Trade individualists and plutocrats. The first Labor Ministry lasted only a few months, but the second should have a better chance, for the spirit of the party is higher, and in Mr. Fisher it has an abler and more vigorous leader than Mr. Watson proved.

* * *

Between the Shah and the English and Russian Foreign Offices the situation in Persia is becoming more and more involved and perilous. On Sunday the Shah played the first act of a comedy for the overthrow of the Constitution by promising his best consideration to a "faked" petition against the Constitution extracted by military pressure. This was done at the very time that the British and Russian Ministers were urging him to re-establish a constitutional system. Russia repudiates a desire to intervene, but she is clearly anxious to occupy Tabriz now that it is impossible for the Shah to recapture the town. The "Times" shamelessly puts the sacrifice of Persia to Russia forward as part of the price of a new Triple Alliance opposed to the old Triple Alliance. The one satisfactory item of news from Persia is the reported recall of M. Hartwig, the Russian Ambassador, but the egregious Liakhoff, who has just been exhorting his Cossacks to destroy the Constitution and win the loot of Tabriz, still remains, and has been joined by yet more Russian officers.

* * *

The list of Birthday Honors contains no peer, four new Privy Councillors, five new baronets, and the usual host of knights, more or less distinguished. We are glad to see that it is not quite partisan, for Sir Edward Clarke, a strong Tory and one of the most virile figures in our public life, becomes a Privy Councillor. The most honored name in the list is that of Alfred Russel Wallace, the veteran of modern English science, who joins the Order of Merit. Mr. Herbert Samuel's great Parliamentary skill is rewarded by a Privy Councillorship, and so is Mr. Pease's tact and energy as Chief Ministerial Whip. There is a new Nonconformist knight in Mr. James Duckworth, and Mr. Frampton, the first of our sculptors, becomes Sir George Frampton. Sir Charles MacLaren is properly added to the Privy Council, and the most familiar and popular figure among the baronets is that of Sir John Barker. Sir Courtenay Ilbert and Mr. Thring, two of the ablest of our public servants, are made K.C.B.'s. Mr. Hugh Graham, the proprietor of the "Montreal Star," the leading Canadian paper, has also been knighted.

* * *

The outrage-mongers among the Indian Nationalists have reappeared, apparently to nullify the coming reforms and to discredit the Moderates and the Constitutionalists. On Sunday, at Calcutta, a student of nineteen, named Chowdhury, made a clumsy attempt—the fourth—to shoot Sir Andrew Fraser, the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal. He is said to have implicated other students. On Monday the native sub-inspector of police who traced the murderer of Mrs. and Miss Kennedy was shot dead in a Calcutta lane by three men, who riddled his body with bullets. A thousand students gathered, bare-footed, at the ghat where the body of the murderer of an informer was being burned. The Government seems ill served by its police—a bad and inefficient force. An informer appears to have trumped up the "conspiracy case" at Midnapur, in which a Rajah and leading men of the town were wantonly implicated.

* * *

A committee of eminent men and women, including Mrs. Asquith, Mrs. Gladstone, Mrs. Fawcett, the Duke of Norfolk, Mr. Gerald Balfour, and Mr. Arthur Henderson, have issued an appeal for "personal service" among the London poor during this winter. They ask for the names of men and women who will visit regularly one or more families, and be ready for friendly help, based on direct experience. The Central Unemployed Body and Charity Organisation Society offer their advice and help in selecting cases and providing relief. The plan falls short of the Elberfeld system in power of effective organisation; but we wish this tentative effort very well. In the ideal State, where there will be neither rich nor poor, such personal service will, we imagine, be universal. In a State where both these extremes exist, it will at least help the two classes to understand each other.

* * *

The Liberal League, after a varied and interesting career, has come down to a chop-house in Queen Anne Street—a very charming and appropriate situation—which has been duly opened by Lord Rosebery. The members of the Liberal League are noted Amphitryons, and we have no doubt that the cooking will be good. We suppose that "Cotelettes à la petite Anglaise" will be a standing dish.

* * *

Mr. Henniker Heaton put before the Royal Colonial Institution on Tuesday a proposal for universal penny-a-word cables. His contention was that the cable companies keep down the traffic in cabling by exorbitant charges, and that a penny-a-word rate would ultimately pay by causing a great expansion in traffic and that the world in general and the British Empire in particular would be all the better in consequence. He was not very explicit as to how this revolution was to be reached, and obviously, for his finance relied rather on faith than calculation. Apparently Mr Henniker Heaton wants the British and Colonial Governments to buy out the cable companies, to come to an agreement with the Continental land lines, and to erect new land lines in the Colonies. The cable companies will have no objection to being bought at an indefinite number of millions, and as the Continental and Colonial Governments are in telegraphy for business, not for "their health," the prospect of a penny rate involving a magnificent deficit for no very convincing purpose seems excellent. As things stand there is some point in the retort of a cable expert that on the same lines Mr. Henniker Heaton might advocate a universal shilling fare.

* * *

To Victorien Sardou, whose long and active career closed last week, England owes at once a debt and a grudge. Undoubtedly he has given to the English public a great deal of entertainment. What playgoer of the older generation does not remember with pleasure Mr. and Mrs. Kendal and Sir John Hare in "A Scrap of Paper" at the old Court Theatre, or the "cast of all the talents" which contributed to the triumph of "Diplomacy" at the old Prince of Wales's—Sir Squire and Lady Bancroft, Mr. and Mrs. Kendal, Arthur Cecil, John Clayton, Forbes Robertson? In these plays, and a score of others, whether adapted into English, or presented by French actors in their original language, the public of the last three decades of last century took infinite delight. But that means, it must be remembered, that they took delight in an essentially inferior order of art, which flourished because of the weakness of our native drama, and helped, by its inordinate popularity, to depress and discourage the energies of our native playwrights. That the form of art was inferior, was proved by its very adaptability. A play which goes to the heart of life in any one country cannot possibly be transmogrified, as were "Peril," "Diplomacy," "Duty," and the rest, so as to bear any plausible resemblance to the life of another country. Sardou was, in brief, a great manufacturer of plot-mechanisms—of mechanical figures which could be dressed in the costumes of almost any country, and go through their motions with a certain semblance of life.

Politics and Affairs.

GOOD ALLIES AND BAD EUROPEANS.

Mr. Asquith's speech at Guildhall was a calm and reticent treatment of a European situation which seems, even to sober onlookers, one of the most angry and complicated which recent experience can recall. Public opinion is almost everywhere over-sensitive and suspicious. The dread of war incites to an apprehensive vigilance which scours the remotest frontiers in search of its occasions. Nor are those occasions difficult to discover. A street riot at Belgrade or Tangiers or Tabriz might set the legions marching, and the least consequence of their movements would be the extinction of one nominally independent nation. Nowhere, least of all in Berlin, do we discover, to explain these alarms, the reckless spirit of adventure which counts turmoils and alarms among the joys of life. It is everywhere a morbid fear which makes for the disturbance of the world's peace, a fear of seeming weak by being reasonable, and by seeming weak of inviting aggression. Even the luckless Servians, whose temper seems to a superficial ear so warlike, are influenced only by a despair which might conceivably drive them to a gamble with death. It is in fear that Governments contemplate the waste of fresh millions upon navies, in fear that they contract unnatural alliances, in fear that they load their subjects with mountainous debts and intolerable taxes. To this sombre situation has Europe been brought by its pursuit of Imperialism, its secretive and anti-democratic diplomacy, its refusal to seek peace by limiting its armaments.

Two crises have served in the past few weeks to focus these alarms. The miserable dispute about the Casablanca deserters, now happily settled in a manner equally honorable to both parties, raged for some days in full publicity. It is really superfluous to comment on the merits of a controversy so trivial. It was important only because it led newspapers, confessedly in touch with official sources of information, to talk as though it might have led to a European war. If there can be any right or wrong in a question affecting a handful of cosmopolitan tramps, who had deserted first their native land and then their adopted flag, we are inclined to think that the balance of reason was on the French side. No sane man cares two straws about the original dispute, but France at the outset deserved our sympathies by accepting arbitration without reserves. Germany's procedure has been stiff and slow; her desire to limit the scope of the arbitration was as difficult to defend, as her insistence on a too nicely worded expression of preliminary regrets was difficult to understand. But it is the French who have raised this obscure incident to the level of an international crisis. It is their semi-official Press which lent it a raucous publicity, and in the process, by the simple method of confusing essential dates, gave to what was on Germany's side nothing worse than bad manners and Prussian formalism the appearance of a wanton and maliciously-timed attack. Prince Bülow's stormy past made him perhaps a natural object of suspicion; the French were manifestly anxious to repair the diplomatic defeat of 1905, which forced them to dismiss M. Delcassé.

Much more serious is the other crisis, which has for the moment gone under ground and lost itself in blind alleys. More than a month has passed since Austria tore up the Treaty of Berlin, and for the moment the search for some new basis on which to rest the public law of Europe seems nearly hopeless. The effort to assemble a Conference of the Powers makes no apparent progress, and that for three reasons, any one of which would be fatal. Austria refuses to enter any Conference at which the annexation of Bosnia would be treated as a subject open to discussion. Turkey, on her side, sees no reason why she should gratuitously condone a wrong wrought at her expense, or cover the accomplished fact with her formal acceptance. In Russia, the artificial resurrection of a conservative and aristocratic party as the main factor in a packed Duma has brought with it the revival of Pan-Slavism. This party, its memory eagerly jogged by the Servians, recalls the pledge given by Alexander II., never under any circumstances to recognise an Austrian annexation of Bosnia. We are very properly bound by an undertaking to recognise no breach of the Treaty which Turkey as the wronged party is unwilling to condone. Germany must follow Austria, and France take her lead from Russia. Ingenuity has failed to invent any plan of compensation for Turkey and the Servian peoples to which Austria is likely to assent. While this deadlock continues, it is difficult to see how the situation can possibly be regularised either by a Conference or by direct negotiation. Yet the failure to regularise it means a tacit acceptance of the fact that a Concert of Europe no longer exists, and that public law no longer governs the complex relations of peoples and Powers in the Near East. The moral consequences of such a failure would be serious, the material consequences might be disastrous. For while this act of violence is neither purged nor undone, neither compensated nor accepted, there can be no end to the rivalry of armaments and the perpetuum mobile of Balkan intrigue. Russia, Turkey, and Servia, by refusing to accept the situation, may be presumed to reserve their right at the first opportune moment to disturb a position which has no legal sanctions. In such conditions the apt moment tends to hasten its arrival; and even if its coming is delayed, it forces those who await it to pledge the hope of progress for the hardware of Creuzot and Essen

The conception of a European Concert is assuredly no easy ideal to realise, nor has it ever existed in anything but a rudimentary form. It implies among all the Powers a certain mutual confidence, and at the same time a certain mutual independence. Only if each is free to judge of an emergency on its merits, can one hope for the prevalence of any impartial or disinterested body of opinion. But in the present state of things each Power is for its ally, and no one is for Europe. "My ally, right or wrong," becomes a principle destructive of European solidarity, from the moment when every Power is tied by understandings or alliances. The general sense for the public law of Europe is extinct, precisely because the special sense of loyalty to faction is now so sharp. From this general reproach our own policy is by no means free. Mr. Asquith at Guildhall, aware as he doubtless is of the dangers into which this spirit of faction is leading us, declared that we have no intention of forming "groups" in Europe. Intentions count for little; it is results that matter. The plain fact is that our practical adoption of Lord Lansdowne's policy has had the effect of forming an Anglo-Franco-Russian group, which is, for most practical and sentimental purposes, as stable as a Triple Alliance. Our first concern in any crisis is now to rush forward to demonstrate our loyalty to France. In the Press there is hardly a daily newspaper, save the "Manchester Guardian," which now affects to scrutinise French policy in Morocco with a show of impartiality, and even for Russian proceedings in Persia it has become the fashion to make excuses. There can be no Europe while this close grouping continues; there can only be an inner and an outer ring of Powers. The two groups may bargain and transact, but they acknowledge no loyalty to anything outside their ranks. We all agree in denouncing the opportunist spirit of Bismarckian foreign policy, ready to befriend a Kruger to-day and a Chamberlain to-morrow, and laughing at political affinity or national sympathy as guides in the choice of partners. Yet no one doubts that in a few weeks the City will be launching a Russian loan, at a moment when 60,000 "politicals" are in exile, untried, for their opinions. Nothing has been finer in recent years than the unanimous sympathy of the nation for the Turkish reformers, to which Mr. Asquith gave expression in his Guildhall speech. Yet, under the stress of an expediency dictated by our need for Russian support, our rulers are ready to trust Russian policy in Persia, at a moment when Colonel Liakhoff, in a public order, incites his Cossacks to "destroy the Constitution," and to revel in the loot of Tabriz. We were recently an island. We are to-day a unit in a Continental group.

There is no short way out of this disastrous confrontation of groups. The only hope lies in the chance of an internal change within the Powers themselves. This opportunist policy is in no country a national or a popular instinct. Nations can be moved to generous sympathies, to adventurous aggressions, or to panics of self-defence. But the elaborate and calculating work of mining and counter-mining, of barter and compromise, amid which opportunism has its being, interests only the professional diplomatist and the "experts" who are his satellites. A democratic country can rarely pursue this course for many years together with the necessary coldness. It is work for an autocrat and his officials, and even they muddle their tasks by giving the rein to purely personal emotions. A diplomatist wrecks his work by allowing his amour propre to be engaged in it, a king becomes absorbed in some triviality of buttons or etiquette, a camarilla rises and falls at Court, or an ambitious soldier hurries on a war. The best symptom for the future is the dramatic revolt in which the German Reichstag has risen against the Kaiser's intervention in foreign affairs. The best security for European peace would lie in the success, even of the present Reichstag, Imperialistic though it is, and of the present Duma, unrepresentative though it is, in capturing the direction of foreign affairs. Both have begun to assert themselves; but, despite the outspokenness of the German protest, there is hard work to be done before the Court and its allied interests can be driven from the obscurer entrenchments in which its power is still unchallenged. But for us the movement is full of promise. The time is drawing nearer when in Germany, as in France, we shall have a nation to deal with. With the German people we have neither disputes nor misunderstandings, and the Kaiser made no greater mistake than in his announcement that the middle and "lower" classes are hostile to Great Britain. Of the working classes, at least, we know that three millions and a half are Socialist voters, resolutely opposed to every form of race hatred and "Hurrah-Patriotismus."

It was inevitable that this anxious European situation should revive at home the cry for a stronger Navy. Exact thinking is never our foible in times of crisis. Yet the logic of this panic is more than usually hard to follow. The disturbing forces in the Near East possess no navies. The Kaiser's offence was that he had expressed a too impulsive friendship for ourselves, and incidentally declared that the adventure for which he is building is some remote disturbance in the Pacific. The wretched Casablanca squabble could have involved us only if we are in effect the ally of France. But in that event it is essential to remember that the French Navy, still the second of the Continent, would back our own. It is in this connection that we fail to understand the Prime Minister's acceptance of the formula tendered him by Mr. Arthur Lee, that we should maintain "a preponderance of ten per cent. over the combined strengths, in capital ships, of the two next strongest Powers." This appears a wide extension, in spirit and in letter, of Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman's reading of the two-Power standard. Is it conceivable that it bears its surface interpretation that we are to keep our eyes on any two Naval Powers and build against their combined force, irrespective of their relationship to each other and to ourselves? That is to say, that if America builds against Germany and Germany against America, the sum of the additions to the two fleets is to constitute the unit up to and beyond which we must build? Or if France and Japan—our ally and our friend—develop their naval powers so that, again, either they, or Germany and one of them, step into the place of the "two next strongest," are we to count the growth of the friendly force as a reason for adding to our own in mathematical proportions to its extension? This seems to us to reduce the naval problem at once to simplicity and to absurdity. And what of the cause of European peace? A great increase in our shipbuilding can only foster the belief that we are attempting to dominate Europe, and might tempt an overwhelming military Power to break once for all a friend whom we should be powerless to aid on land. The crisis has begun to cure itself by its own intensity. It lies with us to seize the psychological moment to win confidence by giving it.

SUFFRAGISTS AND SUFFRAGETTES.

We are glad to see that the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies have this week been encouraged to go forward with their accredited plan of campaign, and to set aside the tactics of the "suffragettes." The difference between the two political ideas is important, and needs to be clearly set forth. The Women's Social and Political Union, which is Mrs. Pankhurst's organisation, and its allies propose to attack every Liberal candidate, whatever his views and record on the suffrage may be; the older organisation desires to support or to oppose candidates with strict reference to their opinions on the question of votes for women. Here is a distinct line of divergence, and those who have any acquaintance with the course of political action can hardly doubt where the way of wisdom lies. The "suffragettes" have borrowed their tactics from the Nationalists, without correctly appreciating the Irish method. Even when the Nationalists opposed the Liberal Party, they made exceptions in favor of Liberal Home Rulers, and, per contra, they did not support the Conservatives, as in the Election of 1885, without receiving precise and important benefits from that party. The "suffragettes," on the other hand, are engaged in what we may fairly describe as a political gamble. They have not, we understand, received any pledges from the Conservative Party in favor of the enfranchisement of the limited class of woman whom their scheme will benefit. Nevertheless, they are bent on establishing a claim of gratitude on the Conservative Party for electoral services which two or three years hence Mr. Balfour may or may not be willing or able to acknowledge. And, on the other hand, they choose to ignore Liberal sympathies and to treat as hostile a Parliamentary party which on the day after the General Election contained a large majority favorable to women's suffrage, and whose leader, the Prime Minister, has at least half-opened the door to the passage of a measure of women's suffrage. If the "suffragettes" had ever wished for a Liberal Suffrage Bill, we cannot but think that they would have devoted their very considerable ability to the task of enlarging Mr. Asquith's concession. They have preferred to develop two grounds of Tory support. The first is their warfare on Liberalism, the second their advocacy of a propertied franchise. We suppose their expectation is that just as the Tories condoned Maamtrasna, Mr. Balfour, in view of the material reinforcement which the women bring to his cause, will wink at the campaign of violence and the attacks on the House of Commons. They may be right or they may be wrong. But the older suffragists may well pause before they decide to base their more considered movement on such methods and calculations.

They have, indeed, decided to modify their general attitude to the Women's Social and Political Union. Hitherto they have refrained from censure even of such a proceeding as the assembling and encouragement of a huge mob, with a very distinct criminal element, to "rush" the House of Commons. They considered, we imagine, that the signal success of the Union in stimulating women's interest in the suffrage excused their errors of tactics, whose fruits include, we regret to say, the growing alienation of the Liberal Party from their cause and the shutting out of women from the hearing of debates in the House of Commons. The older suffragists have now decided to condemn a policy of lawlessness, and to hold themselves apart from it. It would be still more interesting to learn whether they intend to intervene authoritatively with any counter-proposal on the suffrage, or whether they propose to accept a Property Bill, if they can get no other. If they make the latter choice, we cannot but think that the cause of the great mass of the married women and the working-women, i.e., the great feminine interest, will be abandoned, or only feebly defended, and the effective guidance of the movement will be left, in spite of the protests of the constitutionalists, in Mrs. Pankhurst's hands. Should events work out on this plan, we shall have an entirely new principle introduced into movements for the extension of the suffrage—that is to say, the super-endowment of property. In such a cause it will be held lawful and right, if one or other of the parties obstruct the settlement, to violate not merely the amenities and orderly habits of public life, but to raid the legislature, and to trick and defy the law.

Now is this kind of game really worth the candle? We are afraid that many excellent women are disposed to exaggerate the practical uses of the vote. It will not do for poor women what it has failed to do for poor men. But at least a larger measure of sympathy and hope attaches to an agitation where the prize is the betterment of millions of humble lives than to a movement of well-to-do women, whose existence is largely free from the most depressing of material cares. And the action of the suffragists shows that they realise that a special error, from the women's point of view, resides in the promoting or the condoning of violence. Enthusiasm and violence in politics are two separate categories. They may mix, but we hold it to be a special interest of women to keep them apart. Violence is not only an evil in itself—an evil which grows with what it feeds on, and cannot be measured or restrained by those who enter on it with a limited belief in its efficacy. It is also peculiarly unsuited to the entrance of women into the political field. To employ it against man is almost as unfair as for a hostile army to advance under cover of the white flag. Its use, and the intemperate and not too candid or scrupulous acts that have characterised it, have immensely fortified the traditional objections to women's suffrage, which base themselves on the belief that women will always be too heady for other than the sensational side of politics, and that they will bring to our public life not a new moral element, but simply an atmosphere of flightiness and intrigue. We do not say, or think, that that is a just judgment. But the women are already feeling its effect, and they must expect to see its full force exerted before the controversy goes much farther. It is men, not women, who hold the key to the Parliamentary suffrage. If moral weapons are thrown away in the struggle, physical force will not count for much, and in reliance on it, and on the scuffling, half-serious, warfare of the streets and the lobbies, women put themselves finally at the mercy of the anger, or even the easily aroused sex-hatred, of men.

All this is obvious enough. But we are equally clear that if this agitation goes astray, the "suffragettes" will not alone be to blame. It is evident that it is to the disadvantage of Liberalism to have another Tory settlement of the franchise. What Liberal wants to see the registers stuffed with faggot voters and Primrose Dames? But if this is not to be the end of the controversy, it is none too soon to warn the party against letting temper do duty for insight and policy. Already one signal mistake has been made. We may call the "suffragettes" what we please—unscrupulous, hysterical, ill-balanced. But they represent a political movement which has changed the current of life and thought for thousands of women, and incidentally has detached much feminine work and sympathy from the Liberal cause. Its conductors, in coming into contact with the law, as other agitators have come, have a clear right to plead their motives as a reason for escaping the special forms of personal degradation which attach to our prison system as applied to the average criminal. And that plea ought at once to have been acknowledged by the Home Secretary. The Home Office is not a mere department of Scotland Yard. It is a great political organism, which is especially charged, as the "Law Times" firmly reminds Mr. Gladstone, with the exercise of the Royal prerogative of pardon and clemency in the execution of justice. That function, says the chief legal journal, "is wholly unaffected by the operation of any recent legislation in respect of imprisonment or prison treatment"; and, therefore, Mr. Gladstone's reliance on the Act of 1898 to secure him against interfering on behalf of the suffragettes is unsound. And, if it does not hold, surely a man of Mr. Gladstone's name and temper is not keeping Mrs. Pankhurst in the second division of prisoners in order to pay her out for incommoding the Government. On the contrary, the case of the suffragettes supplies the opportunity of laying down once and for all the doctrine as to the special rights of political prisoners which he and his father enforced in the case of Mr. William O'Brien. It is not less urgent for the Liberal Party to affirm its special interest in the democratic view of women's suffrage. If the "suffragettes" are prepared to barter the cause of the working women for a property franchise, we at least ought to aim at averting that special temptation from the general body of the suffragists. We cannot refuse such aid to the women's cause because some women are violent, any more than the Whigs refused the Reform Bill of 1832 because some workmen burnt hay-ricks. The historic business of Liberalism has been to disentangle causes where elements of justice and right existed—as in Ireland always, as in India to-day—from factors of violence or unreason. There is nothing in the "suffragettes'" onslaught on law to qualify this duty of discrimination and of action.

THE FINANCE OF SOCIAL REFORM.

THERE can be no concealment of the fact that the financial situation is a subject not indeed of alarm but of grave consideration for the Government, and, we would add, for the nation. For, with the fullest approval of the people, the Government has committed itself to a constructive policy of social reforms, many of which must involve a heavy call upon the public purse. Old Age Pensions means the finding of five or six additional millions. The national subvention of any efficacious remedies for unemployment, and the other schemes for dealing with the poverty and inefficiency that fall at present under the administration of the Poor Law, which they will be called upon to undertake, must impose a considerable new burden upon the Exchequer. A large though gradual increase of expenditure upon education is a demand which no Liberal Government, having due regard not merely to the requirements of personal culture but to the furtherance of industrial efficiency, can hope or desire to resist. These burdens might in ordinary years be met out of the normal increase in the yield of existing sources of revenue, amounting in this country to some two millions per annum. But, as we know, trade is depressed, times are bad, and though the decline of national revenue for the portion of the year already run, amounting to five millions, may grow no larger, or may even be reduced by the increased yield of the remaining months, a deficit of considerable size can hardly be averted. Though, happily, some signs of recovery from the deep and general depression are exhibited both here and in foreign countries, the Chancellor of the Exchequer cannot be expected to bank upon such speculative expectations in making financial provisions for the coming year. Such were the main considerations which occupied the speakers in the Conference held a few days since, under the Chairmanship of Lord Welby, at the New Reform Club, to discuss the question, "How Shall Social Reform be Financed?"; and it is a most urgent necessity that all thoughtful politicians should bend their minds to a close study of a question with the answer to which the fortunes of Liberalism are bound up.

It is admitted that a good many millions will be required to provide for the financing of these social reforms. It would, we think, not be rash to predict that to do this work effectively an addition of ten or twelve millions to present expenditure will be required. How is it to be found? The most rigorous advocates of economy cannot pretend that any considerable portion of such a sum will be obtained by cutting down the cost of the Services. The European situation does not promise a reduction of expenditure, at least upon the Navy. A suspension or reduction of the contribution to the sinking fund is possible; it may even be legitimate. Lord Welby, for example, holds that in a period of temporary embarrassment the national savings of the last generation may be drawn upon to meet emergencies. But no sound financier, having regard to recent disturbances of national credit and their damaging reactions upon trade, could contemplate the provision of any large proportion on these lines.

In a word, a large amount of new revenue must be found by fresh taxation. And here we desire to emphasise the deeper implications of the policy of social reform to which Liberalism is committed, not for next year only, but for all the future years, unless it is to perish of inanition. What is needed and demanded is a thoroughly thought-out and—shall we say?—a scientific, reconstruction of finance which shall furnish a large increase of revenue, without imposing burdens which may depress industry, or impair the efficiency of our workpeople. If there are incomes or properties which either wholly or in large part come to their possession as "unearned" elements, taken because they can be got, but not necessary to induce their recipients to apply productively land, capital, or ability, they evidently form sound subjects of increased taxation. The imposition of a tax on them implies no real sacrifice upon their possessor, for they have not been "earned," and have a full ability to bear a tax.

Economists and statesmen have long agreed that rent of land, or land values as distinct from the value of improvements, fall within this category, and municipal reformers in particular have been urgent upon the taxation or rating of this revenue. But there are several difficulties to be overcome when the Imperial Exchequer turns its attention to land values as a source of new revenue. In the first place, we have no record or measurement of land values as distinct from their improvements. A sound policy of taxing them would involve an expensive and a lengthy process of separate assessment and registration. Even if this could be compassed without an Act of Parliament, it is not clear that it would yield any large sum to ease the present situation. Though public opinion is favorable to such a readjustment of rating as to throw the whole or most of the incidence of rates upon site values, it would hardly sanction the imposition of a separate new Imperial tax upon existing values. It might be thought unfair to choose for such taxation values which have always been regarded, for practical purposes, as one form of investment, the ownership of which is inextricably blended with the ownership of industrial capital. At any rate, any such attempt to recover for the public purse past accretions of land values would be difficult and slow. If any considerable share of existing land values is to be secured for the national revenue, it must be by means of a more general taxing policy directed at all forms of "unearned" income, not at rent alone. But this objection does not apply to a tax upon future increments of land values, and we hope the Government is closely considering ways and means of tapping this new source of revenue. For it cannot seriously be urged that such increments, not due to municipal activity alone, should be devoted exclusively to the municipal exchequer. City and suburban lands, mines, sporting values, and other luxury uses, present a thoroughly sound subject for taxation, and a considerable share of the rising income which they afford should be available for national revenue. But, as regards city sites, it will be necessary for the Government to grapple firmly with the legal difficulties presented by existing contracts so far as they interfere with the imposition of taxes on future increases of land value. Even then it must be remembered that this taxation, though desirable for the permanent finance of social reform, cannot supply any large immediate revenue. Even if the rejection by the Lords of the Licensing Bill enabled Mr. Lloyd George to fortify his finance by a new tax upon liquor licences, it would still be necessary to have recourse to another and a broader basis of Imperial revenue.

A further, a bolder, and a more scientifically ordered graduation of the income tax must be the chief instrument in the constructive Liberal finance of the future, and it will be advisable to take definite steps in this direction for the forthcoming Budget. For most forms of "unearned increment" or excessive income are not, like land values, susceptible of separate measurement. They are mixed up with various legitimate and necessary payments for the use of capital, of ability, enterprise, and skill in the processes of industry, commerce and the professions. That many such elements do come into the incomes of most or all rich men no one acquainted with the part played by economic force, favor, contrivance, and luck in the operations of industry, finance, and commerce, is likely to deny. The graduation which is already adopted in our income and inheritance taxes, as in those of other countries, rests upon an implicit acceptance of the principle that the larger the income or property, the larger the amount of "unearned increment" it may be presumed to contain. We are sometimes told that an extension of this system, for the purpose of securing to the revenue a considerably larger share of the unearned, or socially created, elements in the higher reaches of these incomes, would either be unfruitful or else a dangerous encroachment upon private property. We are not convinced of the validity of either plea, and we are certain that if some such experiments are not made, the most powerful defence of the fortress of Free Trade will be neglected. For whenever a Conservative party is once more placed in power, unless they find prepared for them such an instrument of revenue, their necessity as well as their express committals will drive them on to Protection.

THE CONTROL OF THE MOTOR CAR.

It was the fond belief of motorists—meaning by the term not those who drive motors, but those who do not mind how they are driven—that the agitation for the liberty of the road would die down with the close of the holiday season. It is, indeed, during the holidays that the grievance is most generally and most acutely felt. In the off season not only is there less motoring, but there are whole tracts which are comparatively immune from the trouble. The daily tale of accidents is reduced, and when two people are killed at Birmingham in one day, the incident stands out as something almost exceptional. Nevertheless, in every town, and, still more, in every suburb, along every main road, and in all ways leading from the great centres to places of beauty and repose, especially at the week-ends, when tired town folk are seeking rest in fresher air, the din and danger of the motor are in full evidence all the year round. The quiet of the country walk is spoilt, the suburban lane is rendered as dangerous for children or the aged or infirm as a crowded London street. The nuisance continues, and people are alive to it.

The motorist is fond of telling us that the motor has come to stay. It is a formula which, with its appeal to all that is flabbiest in modern ways of looking at practical questions, is sure of some response. We may reply that the agitation for the control of the motor has also come to stay. The situation has radically changed since we first wrote on the subject. On all sides the question is mooted. The Road Union and the Highways' Protection League had their conference of representatives at the Mansion House, and formed a standing committee to consider and forward legislative regulations. A committee of Members of Parliament has been brought together for the same purpose, and, throughout the country, district and borough councils in London and the provinces begin, at length, to make their voices heard.

It is, therefore, high time to open up constructive work. The problem, as we have often insisted, is a complex one, for which, probably, no single remedy will avail. The speed limit will not settle everything, for behind it lies the still graver question how the limit itself is to be enforced. Noise and smell, the abuse of the horn, dust, and mud, are among the nuisances which are indirectly connected with speed. It might have been better if the Act of 1903 had contained no speed limit at all, but had merely enforced the duty of prosecuting for driving to the common danger, and in such manner as to cause a nuisance. But the mischief done by that Act can only be repaired, we think, by a reduction of the limit. The Act has been so worked as to create a general impression that twenty miles an hour, instead of being a maximum, is a kind of standard legitimate speed, and it is highly necessary that that standard should be reduced. We see that the conference of representatives of London borough councils, held at the close of last week, passed a resolution in favor of limiting the speed of motor 'buses to eight miles an hour within the radius and ten outside, while for other motor vehicles fifteen miles an hour was to be allowed. This latter figure is too high for urban traffic. It is too high, apart from other considerations, because it cannot be enforced without the machinery of stop-watches and traps. On the contrary, if ten miles be taken as the limit, it is possible for the ordinary man to tell with but little difficulty if this is materially exceeded. For the urban horse and cycle traffic moves at rates that run up to nearly ten miles. The hansom moves at seven, eight, or nine. The cyclist in an open street goes at anything from eight to twelve. He will average nearly ten, and if he much exceeds that rate is seen to be "scorching." Now, if a motor comes tearing past this body of traffic, it is easy to see that it is exceeding ten miles an hour, just as, by comparing the trotting horse with the pedestrian, it is easy to see that the horse is exceeding four miles an hour. But how great is the excess, whether he is going fifteen, or eighteen, or twenty, it is impossible to tell without a mechanism specially adapted for the purpose. We think, then, that the law should set the standard of ten miles an hour for all vehicles in towns, villages, and populous places generally. At the same time, local authorities should have full powers to impose further restrictions, especially with a view to safeguarding owners. Quite recently we saw a powerful car coming up a main road through the outskirts of a London suburb at a great pace, though the hill was against it. The road turns a right angle, which every local cyclist takes with caution. The car dashed round at full speed on the wrong side of the road, within a few feet of the pavement. Had any vehicle been descending the hill a disaster would have been inevitable, but, of course, we should have heard that the car was going at seven miles an hour. The hill would have been foraged in aid of more testimony. Probably the occupants would have expressed great compunction, have carried off the wounded to the hospital and the dead to their homes, and secured a tribute to their philanthropy from a sympathetic Press.

In any case the need for fresh legislation and fuller powers for local bodies is clearly established. The futile circular of the Local Government Board may simply be set aside. We see, in fact, that the Public Control Committee of the London County Council has very properly replied to it with the remark that the powers of the Council are limited, and that fresh legislation is needed. If it were not, we should not be witnessing the conflict between public rights and private licence which has scandalised even the "Times." Any traveller, indeed, can see for himself that we are far behind the rest of Europe in the regulation of the motor nuisance, and even as we write the German Government is introducing into the Reichstag a plan of control much severer than our Liberal Ministry has even hinted at. The movement is now ready to take political shape, and only needs organisation to make itself felt at by-elections. Legislation is only a question of time, and will be the more drastic if long delayed. We trust that Mr. Burns and the Government as a whole will find the necessary time for doing something to abate the evil before the next holiday season is upon us.

THE VACANT ARCHBISHOPRIC.

We very much hope that the Government will take the opportunity suggested by the resignation of the Archbishop of York to make an appointment that can be called Liberal in the large as opposed to the narrow partisan sense of that word. We have no doubt at all that the Prime Minister will be urged to take a different course. Reaction in the Church has some vigorous and highly presentable promoters on the Episcopal Bench. One or two such figures have a colorable suggestion of Liberalism, and yet stand in stiff opposition to progress in the Anglican Communion. The Prime Minister has hitherto shown a singularly clear sense of the kind of lead that the Church wants in high places, of the claims of scholarship, joined to large and sympathetic ideas of modern life and its problems. His breadth of view is now to be tested afresh. Belief in progress is not a very salient quality in the Anglican Church of to-day. It was not conspicuously fostered by either of the great Prime Ministers of later Victorian days who have had most to do with the selection of her high ecclesiastics. And of her two great divisions the Northern Province especially calls for a head in sympathy with the freer and more robust movements of the national life. We thought that from this point of view the translation of the Bishop of Sodor and Man to Newcastle was a grave mistake, and experience has shown that we were right. There is all the more reason to avoid repeating it in the larger field which an Archbishop of York surveys.

Happily there is at least one Bishop of whom it can be said that he is a Liberal in more than the form and the name. The Bishop of Hereford would, we have reason to believe, be peculiarly acceptable to the people of the northern country from which he derives. He is a man of the people; he has the quality of courage, of simple outspokenness and directness of view, which all those who influence their fellows possess. His own Church knows him as an admirable administrator, an overseer of whom the Anglican Church, with its many traditions of good government, is proud. But Dr. Percival is something more than an efficient Bishop. In associating a man of his character with the headship of the Northern Province, the Prime Minister would do the Church the very special service of distinguishing a man awake to the signs of the times, a friend and helper of democracy, as well as a personality of transparent candor, of great moral strength, of singular weight in speech and counsel, and of no mean intellectual force. These are ample qualifications, but there is another reason for nominating to the Northern Archbishopric a Churchman of Dr. Percival's stamp, which, we think, outweighs all others. Dr. Percival is a Broad Churchman; that is to say, he accepts the theory of development in religious truth which is the most important and the most powerful idea, not only in modern Christianity, but all over the religious world. The Anglican Church has not yet set itself right with this tendency. It has not taken the turn forward which men like Stanley and Maurice wished to see it take; it has, on the whole, gone back with Pusey and his school. We do not know whether it realises how far it has retreated from the broad current of the religious life of its times, how far it has become imitative and retrospective, basing its hopes on some unimaginative and unimaginable revival of the past. It is to the advantage of a religious communion, beset with these hesitations, that it is not left to its own choice of governors. There is a party in the Church of England which would cut itself away, not merely from the State connections, but from the laity. In such a Church we agree that men of Dr. Percival's stamp would have little place. But a communion of this type could not hope to retain its special influence with the English people. It would merely be a bad copy of the Church of Rome, it would be grievously narrowed in its choice both of administrators and of spiritual guides, and it would sink into the profitless and endless quarrel with the modern State which devitalises the Roman Communion. The Founder of Christianity imagined no such society. He desired men to help each other as their respective needs developed. The Church of England, conservative as it is, has never quite lost sight of this ideal, and statesmen do her a real service when they find ministers able to realise it.

Life and Letters.

THE HARVEST OF AN IDEAL.

THERE is no phenomenon which at first sight seems less easy to explain than the great metamorphosis of national characteristics that marked the third portion of the nineteenth century in Europe and Asia. The sudden transformation of Japan from dense feudal medievalism to modern progressiveness in its most aggravated shape still continues to puzzle us. The awakening of Germany after the Franco-Prussian War is almost equally strange. The contrast between the Teutonic spirit as it manifested itself a hundred years ago and as it finds expression to-day, still fills observers with a kind of bewilderment and vague alarm. In Mr. W. Harbutt Dawson's new book, "The Evolution of Modern Germany" (T. Fisher Unwin), there is a suggestive, if too brief, chapter on this point. Mr. Dawson's whole volume is well worth close study. It is, by a long way, the most impartial and exhaustive analysis of the economic and political situation in Germany which has appeared in England for several years past. In this respect its only worthy rival is to be found in the chapters on Germany in Dr. Arthur Shadwell's well-known work, and it is altogether beyond comparison with those superficial polemical pamphlets, hastily thrown together in a temper of angry partisanship, which have attracted a quite undue amount of attention in England of late. Those who want to understand the real condition of modern Germany should ponder over Mr. Dawson's chapters, fortified as they are with statistics and judiciously selected citations of original authorities.

Like everybody else who has considered the subject seriously, Mr. Dawson finds himself impressed and a little perplexed by the contrast just noted. The antithesis between the Germany of Goethe and Schiller, of Kant and Fichte, and the Germany of Kaiser Wilhelm II. and Herr Ballin is indeed sufficiently striking. Many contemporary German writers are themselves commenting on the change. Take these words, for instance, from Herr Fuchs, the author of "Der Kaiser und die Zukunft des deutschen Volkes":—

> "One is often pained and overcome with longing as one thinks of the German of a hundred years ago. He was poor, he was impotent, he was despised, ridiculed, and defrauded. He was the uncomplaining slave of others; his fields were their battleground, and the goods which he had inherited from his fathers were trodden under foot and dispersed. He shed his blood heroically without asking why. He never troubled when the riches of the outside world were divided without regard for him. He sat in his bare little room high under the roof, in simple coat and clumsy shoes; but his heart was full of sweet dreams, and uplifted by the chords of Beethoven to a rapture which threatened to rend his breast. He wept with Werther and Jean Paul in joyous pain, he smiled with the childish innocence of his naïve poets, the happiness of his longing consumed him, and as he listened to Schubert's song his soul became one with the soul of the universe."

Mr. Dawson says that the struggle to which Germany has, since 1860, devoted its undivided strength is not a struggle waged consciously in the name and for the sake of civilisation, it is not a struggle for intellectual or political ideals, or ideals of any kind, but a struggle for sheer mastery in the realm of matter and for political ascendency among the nations. And he enlarges on that worship of material force which does, indeed, spring to the eye on all sides in modern Germany. "Everywhere," he says, "even in the architecture of the rebuilt cities, one sees the worship of massivity, the striving after crude, imposing effects." It is a primitive art, wherein form is subordinated to size. These works impress, indeed, by their mass and dimensions, and by the suggestion of power which they convey, but they are without imagination—they are body without soul—and create in the beholder a sense of unrest and oppression. What the old Germany gave to the world we know, and for that gift the world will always be grateful. But:—

> "We do not know what modern Germany, the Germany of the overflowing barns and the full argosies, has to offer beyond its materialistic science and its merchandise, or whether > the later gift will be of a kind to call for either thankfulness or admiration. . . . It is questionable whether unified Germany counts as much to-day as an intellectual and moral agent in the world as when it was little better than a geographical expression, and the reason is that for the present its strength is not the strength of a nation that lives by and for ideals."

There is much truth and force in this; but one may question whether the breach between the old and the new Germany is quite so complete as is here suggested. For, after all, this materialism, this eager striving for mastery, represents only one side of modern Germany. If we read Mr. Dawson's chapters—those especially on "Technical Education," "State Enterprise," and "Agriculture and Industry"—and his own previous volume on the German workman, we shall find that it is not this feature which is specially emphasised. What strikes us more particularly as the main factor in the industrial and mercantile advance of the country is the regard for method, for training, for systematic organisation, and for the practical effectiveness attributed to educated and wisely directed intelligence. Germany prevails not so much because it is a masterful nation as because it is a disciplined nation. Its successes are due much less than is commonly supposed to the Bismarckian ideas and much more to those which it inherited from the two generations that preceded the assertion of the Prussian hegemony. Indeed, one may even go further and suggest that the spirit of which Bismarck was the embodiment has obstructed rather than assisted the advance of Germany, since it has been the fruitful source of domestic troubles and international enmities. A great deal of the friction between classes and in the relations of capital and labor, which may yet shatter the whole fabric of German society by a volcanic explosion, is caused by the hard reliance on force that has obsessed the governing elements in politics and society. No one can deny that modern Germany has raised about herself a whole host of difficulties by her tendency to march rough-shod, with spurred heel and mailed fist, over all opposition.

All this kind of masterfulness, this cult of massivity and violence, has obstructed much more than facilitated the progress of the nation, even in the political sphere, and much more in the social and industrial. The real successes have been won by other methods, and in the main by that profound belief in the value of thoroughness and exact knowledge to which we are constantly brought back in any adequate survey of the condition of the country. Not long ago, the present writer found himself seated at a public dinner beside a member of the Prussian Ministry. The conversation turned upon the electoral system, and the Englishman expressed surprise at the existence, in the twentieth century, of a narrow oligarchical constitution whereby the great majority of the people are excluded from their fair share of political power. "Why," he asked, "should you oppose the extension of the franchise on genuinely democratic lines? You would then," it was suggested, "probably have a contented instead of a discontented people, and you would deprive the Socialists of their most formidable weapon. Why not allow the Legislature to be really elected by the majority of the population instead of by a comparatively small section of the propertied classes?" "But if we did so," replied the Minister, "we should allow the direction of affairs to fall in the hands of the ignorant (Ungebildeten), and no State can be properly governed under those conditions." This exactly expresses the attitude of most educated Germans towards practical matters; and even in politics it is acquiesced in by the masses with a tolerance that seems astonishing to outsiders. The reverence for the trained expert amounts to a passion; and it accounts in large part for that discipline which it seems easy to enforce in all departments of the national activity, not merely in the army, but in the family, the school, the city, the factory. The German everywhere has a rooted distrust of the amateur; he has been brought up in the belief that in any sphere of human endeavor there are fixed principles and scientific rules which can be discovered by methodical study. Hence his respect for the learned man, the Gelehrter, which, through all the materialism of the money-making era, prevails to an extent that is almost unintelligible to the Briton.

The power of knowledge, said Matthew Arnold, by no means implies a high and fine general culture. What it does imply is the necessity of knowing scientifically the things which have to be known to us; of knowing them systematically, by the regular and right process, and in the only thorough manner. And this sense, as Arnold tried to impress upon his countrymen, the Germans specially possessed. If they had it fifty years ago, they have not yet lost it; and by this, more than anything else, the successful new Germany of the workshop, the counting-house, and the big navy, has been created. Germany, as we see it in Mr. Dawson's pages and in those of other competent observers, is eminently an organised and trained nation. Its inspiring motive is that things are not to be left to chance or to the haphazard achievements of individual impulse, but to prevision, method, arrangement, the carefully thought-out adaptation of means to ends. That spirit is responsible for much that to us seems least admirable—for the imperfect understanding of political liberty, the administrative tyranny, the bureaucratic and police dragooning, the growth of the great capitalistic combinations, which are, perhaps, more powerful, if they are less rapacious, than in the United States. But it has, at any rate, fostered the impatience of disorder and confused thinking which is characteristic of the entire people and pervades their common life.

On this principle the children are taken in hand from the cradle and supervised by skilled and qualified guardians—doctors, schoolmasters, teachers in continuations, drill instructors—till they are grown men and women. On this principle the municipalities are controlled, not by public-spirited amateurs, but in large part by professional adepts whose business in life it is to manage urban affairs. And on this principle the manufacturer distrusts mere rule-of-thumb knowledge, and has an almost fanatical belief in technical scholarship, filling his works with highly educated assistants who have learnt all that is to be known about their particular craft in the laboratory and the study.

This science, this forethought, this calculation, and this marshalling of the intellectual resources are, no doubt, devoted for the most part to strictly material ends, to the acquisition of riches, and the pursuit of power. Yet they have their roots in the old German culture, and in the traditions and habits which grew up in the period when Germany was still disunited and politically weak. The victories of the industrialists, not less than those of the French battle-fields, were the harvest of the seed sown in the library, the lecture-theatre, and the schoolroom, as well as in the barrack and the bureau, during the previous hundred years. The reverence for culture which Goethe and Lessing had taught reacts upon the Teuton of to-day, albeit he may care more for dynamos and mineral dyes than for poetry and literary criticism; the philosophers are not much read, but their evangel of reason and abstract thought has not yet lost all its power. The practical, hustling twentieth-century German is unconsciously treading in the half-effaced footsteps of his grandfather, who dreamed in his garret over Kant and Hegel and wrestled with the Subject and Object. Germany's greatest danger lies in breaking away completely from the influence of the ancient ideals, and in imagining that she really owes her successes to blood and iron and mere "masterfulness," rather than to system and thoroughness and methodical thinking—in a word, to the efficiency born of mental discipline and organised knowledge.

THE THOUGHTS OF THE POOR.

Sixty years ago Disraeli described the rich and poor of England as two nations. To-day there are observers who find national distinctions less dividing than the fissure between the summit and the base of society. "Their civilisations," says Mr. Reynolds—of the middle classes and the poor—"are not two stages of the same civilisation, but two civilisations, two traditions, which have grown up concurrently." A similar testimony is expressed by all who have intimate and first-hand knowledge of the life of the hand worker. "The more one sees of the poor in their own homes," is the verdict of Miss Loane, a witness of varied and peculiar experience, "the more one becomes convinced that their ethical views, taken as a whole, can be more justly described as different from those of the upper classes than as better or worse." Most present-day failures in legislation and social experiment are due to the neglect of this fact. It has been cheerfully assumed that the artisan is but a stunted or distorted specimen of the small tradesman; with the same ideals, the same aspirations, the same limitations: demanding the same moulding towards the fashioning of a completed product. We are gradually learning that "the people of England" are as different from, and as unknown to, the classes that investigate, observe, and record, as the people of China or Peru. Living amongst us and around us, never becoming articulate, finding even in their directly elected representatives types infinitely remote from their own, these people grow and flourish and die, with their own codes of honour, their special beliefs and moralities, their judgment and often their condemnation of the classes to whom has been given leisure and material advantage. The line is cut clean by both parties, neither desiring to occupy the territory of the other. "There is not one high wall, but two high walls, between the classes and the masses," declares Mr. Reynolds; "and that erected in self-defence by the exploited is the higher and more difficult to climb."

Only by laborious and sometimes painful enterprise can this barrier be surmounted and the entrance effected to the remarkable region beyond its borders. Those who have embarked upon such journeys and who bring back authentic news of the land thus partially explored deserve as high honour as any traveller through distant places or diver in deep seas. Miss Loane—especially amongst the London poor—was one of them. Mr. Bourne, in his "Memories of a Surrey Laborer," revealed, by patient observation, the strange, furtive, slow-moving mind of the peasant on the land. Mr. Reynolds, in a fascinating volume, combining observation and a high gift of writing with a wide human sympathy, has presented a striking picture of the Devon fisherman. In "A Poor Man's House" (John Lane) the huddled cottages of the fisher village of a South Coast watering-place are seen from inside; the observer penetrates behind the appearance—to the normal visitor—of a rather squalid fishing suburb, with swarms of untidy children, and the fishermen, deferential, seeking patronage of the brisk or bored holiday maker. The author has lived amongst them and loved them. He has convinced them that he has no desire to do them good. He comes to their life having "swallowed all the formulas" with a perhaps exaggerated contempt for the "intellectuals" and upholders of the middle-class moral code. He is enchanted by the life he finds there, despite all its discomforts. In the existence of the poor, in an experience fixed on the hard rind of life, testing to the full its salt and bitter flavors, he finds a sincerity and an adventure denied to the more secure classes above. Always faced by elemental facts, and demanding a continuous courage for the maintenance of an unending struggle, these men and women exhibit clean-cut, simple, elemental qualities which vindicate their existence before any absolute standard of values.

As may be supposed—it is a common experience in all similar exploration—the poor are inclined to suspect and dislike the classes just above them, the tradesmen. Nowhere is the moral standard more divergent than between the frugal, laborious, and rather timid assiduities of the lower middle class on the one hand, and on the other the reckless, generous, improvident life of the working peoples. To the "gentleman," the attitude of the sea folk is different. He is despised for his ignorance; he is sometimes regarded as fair game for deceit or extortion, outside the moral standard of the home community, just as the colored peoples are regarded as outside the recognised codes of civilisation to-day. Yet there is little envy of his riches and enjoyments, and even a certain admiration for him, so long as he conforms to certain accepted laws of kindliness. "'An 'orrible lie!' between two poor people is fair play from a poor man to a wealthier, just as, for instance, the wealthy man considers himself at liberty to make speeches full of hypocritical untruth when he is seeking the suffrage of the free and independent electors, or is trying to teach the poor man how to make himself more profitable to his employer." The "gentlemen" are permitted idleness, luxuriousness, and the freest self-indulgence without criticism; but anything from them in the nature of meanness is resented. Haggling, for example, over the hire of a boat, is an unpardonable offence. The fishermen, on their occasional holidays, spend their savings lavishly and without question; why should not the "gentlemen" do the same? "When Tony goes away himself, he pays what is asked; regrets it afterwards, if at all; and comes home when his money is done. 'If a gen'leman,' he says, 'can't afford to pay the rate, what du 'ee come on the beach to hire a boat for—an' try to beat a fellow down? I reckon 'tis only a sort o' gen'leman as does that!'"

And this, indeed, is only congruous with that changed estimate of moral values which prevails amongst the poor. Mr. Reynolds, amongst his Devon fishermen, finds the same general summing-up of moral guilt or excellence as Miss Loane has found in the mean streets of the great cities. "Generosity ranks far before justice, sympathy before truth, love before chastity, a pliant and obliging disposition before a rigidly honest one. In brief, the less admixture of intellect required for the practice of any virtue, the higher it stands in popular estimation." It is the emotional, indeed, against the intellectual: to one point of view, life in an incomplete condition of development; to another, life lived nearer to its central heart. Certainly, in the combination of Christian and ethical dicta which make up the popular moral code of modern civilisation, the standard of the poor is the Christian standard: one can see how much the New Testament assertions have been fashioned from the common democratic mind, as Socrates and Plato from the aristocratic. Yet religion—here, as in the record of the Surrey laborer—counts for little in the scheme of human affairs. There is, indeed, nothing of a definite denial; the fishing village would be scandalised by any eager disproof of Christianity. The children go regularly to Sunday School; their parents believe in God and in a better time coming. Yet the general spirit reveals that widespread and prevailing uncertainty, and conviction of uncertainty, which to-day is the most dominant attitude in face of ultimate problems. Tony the fisherman pronounces the same verdict as Bettesworth the old agricultural laborer. "Religion is the business of the clergy, who are paid for it, and of those who take it up as a hobby, including the impertinent persons who thrust hell-fire tracts upon the fisherfolk. 'Us can't 'spect to know nort about it,' says Tony. ''Tain't no business o' ours. May be as they says; may be not. It don't matter, that I sees. 'Twill be all the same in a hunderd years' time, when we're a-grinning up at the daisy-roots.'"

It was thought, says Mr. Charles Booth, of a certain experiment in East London, that as the poor were not going to Church, they would attend the Hall of Science. When the Hall of Science was opened, is was as deserted as the churches. The people wanted neither religion nor its antidote. All they wanted was to be left alone. All that the poor want, runs the popular Socialist declaration, is that the rich shall get off their backs. All that the poor want, would be a truer aphorism, is to be left alone. They don't want to be cleaned, enlightened, inspected, drained. They don't want regulations of the hours of their drinking. They assiduously avoid the hospitals and parish rooms. They don't want compulsory thrift, elevation to remote standards of virtue and comfort, irritation into intellectual or moral progress. All they want is to be left alone. In that diverting novel, the "Lord of Latimer Street," the peer who owns the neighborhood, disguised as a lodger in a block of scandalous tenements in Bermondsey, announces that the philanthropic landlord is going to pull them down and convert the site into a recreation ground for the people. A universal fury is aroused. Why can't he leave them alone? They pay their rents without complaining. Why can't he go and spend the money at Monte Carlo or Newmarket "like the other lords do"? Mr. Reynolds is not only conscious that the poor want to be left alone: he is convinced that they ought to be left alone. He does not believe that interference—either collective or individual—can be of any practical service. The effect of our interference is similar to the effect of the preaching of Western morals in the East. The old faiths are destroyed. The new faiths are not assimilated. He is very doubtful concerning the boon of Elementary Education. He dislikes the preaching of thrift. Amongst the poor, "extreme thrift, like extreme cleanliness, has often a singularly dehumanising effect. It hardens the nature of its votaries, just as gaining what they have not earned most frequently makes men flabby. Thrift, as highly recommended, leads the poor man into the spiritual squalor of the lower middle class." Mr. Reynolds, indeed, is willing to make almost any sacrifice for his friends, if only they can retain their chief vindicating quality—that insouciance or contempt for life's ills and dangers which enables them ever to take the thunder and the sunshine with a frolic welcome. He finds this greatly characteristic of his fishermen: he probably would find less manifestation of it in the difficult darkness of the cities, where Fear, rather than Courage, is the driving force of common humanity. But, however much churches may talk about sin and virtue, "we know well in our hearts," says this observer, "that pluck and courage are the great twin virtues, and that cowardice is the fundamental sin." He finds amongst the poor not only the "will to live," but the "courage to live"; not only endurance of existence, but exultation in it. They are not afraid of life. They keep something of the adventure which takes all risks: the resolute action which cannot even see the risks it is taking. With Stevenson, he will have nothing to do with the negative virtues. With Renan, he believes that this daring and patience of the poor is the great reservoir by which the world will yet be saved.

"THE BACCHANALS."

It is the tragedy of the contest between two spirits—the spirits of moderation and excess, of good sense and enthusiasm, of established order and revolution. Many other mysterious spiritual laws and groping prophecies of things to come enter into the play—the symbolic significance of blood and wine, sacrifices of Divine life and re-birth, the incalculable strangeness of man's double personality revealed by ecstasy or the force of a higher will, and the possibility of a God Who is no thundering warrior, but a spirit of gentleness and almost womanly attributes. All these things are there, and we cannot in a page exhaust the meaning of one of the strangest and most subtle remains of Greek poetry. But as it was enacted at the Court Theatre last Tuesday, and next Tuesday is to be repeated, the drama is the tragedy of that recurrent human contest between established order and revolution. By his arrangement of the final scene Professor Gilbert Murray, the exquisite and daring translator, appears to insist on this. For amidst the woe of the mother's discovery that the lion's head she swings in triumph is her own son's, he boldly introduces the dancing Bacchanals still wild with inspiration; he shows us the mother, Agave, seized again by the ecstatic influence and joining in the holy dance.

An incalculable power has entered a city unawares. Upon the habits of law and order and routine it acts like a touch of leaven in a lump of dough. It reduplicates itself, it quickens, it stirs, it seethes, it permeates, it rouses, it defies all limits. Sober citizens, accustomed to established ideas that broaden slowly down, are aghast at the rapid transformation. They feel puzzled and very much annoyed. Everything was going so comfortably and straight before; the course of the city's progress was well marked out, and while she continued to prosper there was no reason why they should not eat, and sleep, and worship the gods as usual. Then came this blast of a new spirit, driving decent progress all athwart, upsetting the shipshape conveniences of life, and making everybody disagreeable. They try ridicule ("there is nothing so deadly as laughter") but the spirit only laughs back at them; they lose their tempers and try abuse, but the spirit remains calm; they talk of "stern measures," and "the iron hand"; but almost before they have turned the keys on the new spirit it is outside again. It is everywhere. Like the wind, it bloweth where it listeth. Stone walls do not its prison make. "Cannot God overleap a wall?" asks Dionysus of the steady-going tyrant, and the tyrant stood bewildered. For the first time he was confronted with the spirit of faith, a quite incalculable thing.

After all, Pentheus, the city's ruler, was but the average man of affairs, the ordinary governor or official, with a dislike of troublesome novelties. He reckons on the common motives of mankind for full explanation of this annoying movement. He attributes it to money and sensuality—the two motives to which all spiritual and revolutionary movements have from time immemorial been attributed, and always will be attributed by people blind to spiritual things. Pentheus is not blinder than other men; he is only just as blind. "Where is he? For mine eyes discern him not," he asks, staring into the very face of the god. He is so blind that when he cries, "This needs an iron hand," and swears he will bring the inspired women back to labour at his distaff, and strives to chain the god himself, he can but chain a bull in his place and goes hewing the empty air with his sword. At the end of the play Dionysus himself utters one little sigh of lament over the common blindness:—

> "Thus speaketh Dionysus, Son confessed
> Of no man but of Zeus!—Ah, had you seen
> Truth in the hour you would not, all had been > Well with you, and the Child of God your friend!"

But from such natures spiritual vision is necessarily excluded. Professor Gilbert Murray has himself depicted their type:—

> "Those haggard, striving, suspicious men, full of ambition and the pride of intellect, almost destitute of emotion, unless political hatreds can be called emotion, were hurrying through Life in the presence of august things which they never recognised, of joy and beauty which they never dreamed of. Thus it is that 'the world's wise are not wise.'"

In and out among these common examples of all governing classes the new spirit began to move invisibly, and Dionysus came to Thebes. The son of lightning came to his birthplace, and his birthplace did not receive him. It saw no use in his courteous ways, his indeterminate powers, and his symbolic gift of the vine. Only an old man here and there perceived the hint of divinity in Semele's child:—

> "Who found the drink of the grape, and on mankind
> Conferred a gift that banishes all their pain
> When the wine-jar pours it out, and brings them sleep
> And sweet forgetfulness of daily plagues,
> Nor is there any other drug for care."

Of the wise and prudent only an old man or two discerned the newcomer's power. But to those who were not counted among the world's wise the new spirit was revealed. It swept into their souls like a flood of light. It brought with it that transfiguration of the squalid world, for which all men but worldlings long. At its coming, thoughts and lips were set free; the stiff chains of the world were loosened, rocks and trees joined in reeling dances, obstinate nature relaxed her laws, snakes licked their human friends, and she-wolves brought their cubs to be nourished by women kindred to themselves. To those who received the new spirit no harm could come; flames could not burn their hair, and before their faith mountains were removed and plates of bronze and iron were shattered. From the inmost dungeons of the oppressor they heard the voice of the spirit calling them, and they answered. Force had no power against them; the tyrant's own guards whispered that they were on their side, and only used violence under orders. For its worshippers the new spirit had filled up existence; it was impossible to imagine life deprived of it now. "Oh, what was left if thou wert gone? What could I but despair?" cried their leader. Without the new spirit of freedom the world would be a blank—a foggy marsh from which they had emerged into the sun. "What else is wisdom?" they asked, in those central lines of the play:—

"What else is Wisdom? What of man's endeavour
Or God's high grace, so lovely and so great?
To stand from fear set free, to breathe and wait;
To hold a hand uplifted over Hate;
And shall not Loveliness be loved for ever?"

Then comes the tragedy of all revolutions—the severance of closest ties, the sword that the new spirit brings upon earth instead of peace. The blind oppressor is overwhelmed by his own folly; the lion walks into the net; we see the mother's hands reddened with a son's blood, and she comes rejoicing in the trophy of her hunting—"bearing in triumph her own broken heart." It is a savage thing. Even the inspired Chorus hesitates whether to rejoice or mourn. Old Cadmus, the mother's father, who had himself been touched by the new inspiration, breaks down under the human pity of the sight, and will never be moved by the spirit again. In Dionysus—perhaps in all these incalculable powers—there was always that double nature—that grim and terrible side. So sweet in manner, so like a gentle-hearted woman, yet he drove his worshippers to rend beautiful creatures in pieces, to devour living flesh, and brandish the bleeding limbs in the triumph of his revels. Heads borne on pikes, assassinations of governors when Bastilles crumble, September massacres—for such things there are tears, there is human pity. But the new spirit passes upon its way.

It is commonly thought that the play was a typically Greek protest against excess—another illustration of the "Nothing too much" inscribed on Apollo's Delphi. But it is impossible thus to limit its significance. As is well known, it was the last thing that Euripides wrote, and he wrote it in exile on the slopes of Olympus, looking over the bay to Salonica, where St. Paul was to come in about four hundred and fifty years. It was a time of deep depression and disappointment, when all the bright hopes of Greece after the Persian defeat and of Athens under Pericles had faded away in political factions and civil wars. He may have meant by his play that the one hope for mankind was a new afflatus, a devouring enthusiasm. Even Aristotle, whose search for "the Mean" is the text of our teachers, admits that all excellence is "in a sense extreme," and denounces those who warn us that, "being mortal, we must think only of mortal things." For what honor has the world ever given to a man who was merely "moderate" in love or in courage or in generosity or in anything else worth having or giving? When a Scotsman told the House that his nation was generous, but tempered generosity with prudence, even that cautious assembly smiled, knowing at heart that, in the words of another poet, "Prudence is a rich, ugly old maid, courted by Incapacity," and only by the road of ungrudging lavishness is life's greatness to be won.

THE ROBBERIES OF THE SEA.

A FURIOUS East wind drives along the coast, but under the lee of a sandstone cliff we are in a garden of bliss, the warm sun pouring on us from a sapphire sky, and scarcely a trace of the cold wind reaching us. Even the spring flowers are still blooming (or already blooming) in this notch, where the wind-shorn blackthorns make walls almost as impermeable as the red brick that surrounds a favored garden. We have just had sight of a primrose open in its rosette of leaves, and by its side the rolled bud of its successor, while in several corners of the thicket the full pink of the campion gladdens the eye and the heart. But here we sit facing the sea, its waters now piled at the high tide mark. They are the color of lead with the charge they have taken from the blue clay that prevails lower, and now the leaping, rolling, lapping, smashing, backwashing waves are attacking the grass banks and the tough roots with which the gorse attempts to keep them for the kingdom of air. A piece of the bank that has fallen into the closer grip of the waves weighs probably half a ton, and seems toughly woven into one by the roots. The first wave lifts it tantalisingly towards the shore, but drags it down again amid the rattling pebbles. Another falls headlong upon it, flattening its fibres, but extracting a perceptible amount of its solubles in the back-wash. Another grinds it into the shingle, another sprinkles it with little stones, then one, sweeping along the shore, takes it in flank and rushes it down into the trough, where the rest of its disintegration is invisibly undertaken.

A few yards beyond, the waves are washing off a deeper soil from a layer of pudding-stone richly dyed with iron, the peebles, loosely mortared as they are, resisting attrition considerably more than their covering. Next to this the little cliff rises sheer, or rather overhangs, where the sea pelts the rock with shingle, grinding it off according to the varying resistance of its strata, and driving a cave deep under its base, as though for an instrument on which to play a resounding tune. For centuries this bit of coast has been thus steadily ground down. Far out, at the low-tide mark and beyond it, the fossil forest testifies to the fact that once the annual commercial damage was still heavier than it is now. All along the cliffs behind us, cracks near the edge tell of further depredations almost infallibly marked out. The owner of a mile of this foreshore soon loses an acre to the sea, or to the more fortunate owner of some other ocean frontage. A few years ago, the sea was steadily gnawing into the railway track a little to the west of where we sit, and at high tide a big wave would sometimes hurl shingle on the passing trains. The company saw to the stopping of this advance. A groin or two judiciously placed turned erosion into accretion. The obliging sea, to which the necessary magic word had been spoken, now piles up tons of shingle almost at every tide. To-day, at any rate, we can see clearly where the freshly washed stones have been swept over the bank and laid on the dusty heap that seldom knows the washing of a tide. And a little to the east can be seen very plainly the place whence this daily present to the railway company comes.

It is possible that the inhabitants, except they be landowners, fail to follow the slow process by which the coast-line is daily changed. We remember very well what this place was like seven years ago. Then, three great banks of shingle sloped steeply down to the sea, the whole forming a mound apparently twenty feet high. Now, when the tide is out, a flat table of rock apparently slopes the other way, standing a foot or so out of the waves and coming down under the foot of the cliff, which to-day the tide gnaws at when it is up. It is difficult not to believe that the land here has sunk bodily, letting the waves fly at the throat of the cliffs instead of at their knees. Of course, it may have done so, though the removal of the shingle towards the west by a newly directed scour of the tides can be found a sufficient explanation. It must be related, however, that the father of the farmer who now has the crumbling cliffs used to graze his sheep on a substantial strip of grass beneath the cliffs—acres that are now far under the waves. The inference seems clear that just here England is taking one more of those slow dips in the sea of which in the ages she has taken so many.

When the Royal Commission on Coast Erosion issues its report we shall get something like a general view of the robberies and the gifts of the sea. Most of the stories told to the Commission are stories of robbery, and they come from nearly every coast. Lately we had news of a large fall of cliff at Cromer, a few years ago of one at St. Margaret's Bay, in Kent. The sea seems inclined to make two Isles of Wight of one by smashing in at Freshwater, where the broken military road, far out on the shore of the bay, shows how rapid the encroachment has been. Elsewhere, of course, notably at Hythe, the piling up of sand has made inland towns of what once were harbours, and the silt of large and muddy rivers has changed saltings into first-rate meadows. We know one landowner who, by merely sinking old barges full of stones, has induced the river to pile round them acres of rich mud, on which bullocks now make heavy beef. His tale, we suppose, will not come before the Committee, though if in another of his estates Neptune should have robbed him, the nation will hear of it. It may be that by the silt he has taken someone else is the poorer. Here is the exact reversal of the usual land problem as indicated in the phrase "unearned increment." The industry of one man in setting up groins or retaining walls, not only leaves his neighbor's property unimproved, but often causes it to be worsened. The sea may next creep round the improver's land through the other's neglect and, taking it in flank, sweep it worse than if he had done nothing to protect it. Yet, on the whole it is true of maritime neighbors that when your land consumes mine is in danger.

From the ordered, mechanic action of the tides in a river we have evolved a simple enough code of rights and duties obtaining between neighbors. Each must keep his dam at the prescribed height, and keep it waterproof. The vagaries of ocean and their intensification under groining and other diversion of currents create many paradoxes besides that of the best neighbor being the worst. There is groining and counter-groining. The scour that has been handed on from A to B must be passed on again to C, or returned to A with interest. Then what of the hinterland proprietor who might expect to come into the firing line more quickly if those on the frontier were not so active? The man in the front calls upon him, with show of justice, for contribution to the expenses of their common cause. But is it common, when we remember that, if the hinterlander could come up to the sea with reasonable chance of staying there and not going down into the waves, his property would often be more valuable than it is now? At any rate it is an affair of interest to the nation at large, and it is upon the Exchequer that our sea-coast landlords call for a contribution to their expenses of maintenance. In this case, if in no other, the scheme must be just as national as the support. We cannot subsidise A and B to throw shingle at one another to no nationally useful end. Let the State protect its own coast line from the sea as from any other national foe, and even push the war into the enemy's country by reclaiming the Wash, planting the dunes, and finding work for its waste labor on its waste lands.

The Drama.

THE MAGNANIMOUS ENGINEER.

"The Builder of Bridges" is a piece which everyone who really likes the theatre will like; for it belongs to the very best sort of theatrical play. It is exceedingly interesting. It keeps one constantly agog to know what is going to happen next; and the thing which does happen is apt to be vastly effective, from the theatrical point of view. It is very well written, tersely, nervously, and (on the whole) naturally. It contains passages of real originality and thoughtfulness. It is put together with no small technical skill; and, to crown all, it is not quite unlike life. All this (or most of it) is implied when one calls it a theatrical play of the first order. But a play of character it is not; it is not a drama of ideas. Perhaps one cannot describe it better than by saying that it contains many strong situations, but no great scene.

And why are its merits theatrical, and no more? Because its hero is the consummate type of the ideal personage, while its heroine, though far enough (heaven knows!) from being an ideal personage, is never rendered wholly credible to us. I cannot quite make up my mind whether her initial action is in itself incredible, or whether Mr. Sutro has failed to go deep enough into her character to make us believe in it. I incline to the former opinion.

The case is as follows: Arnold Faringay, a clerk in the office of a large firm of engineers, has been tempted into bucket-shop gambling, and has stolen £3,000. The firm is building a great bridge in Egypt; the engineer on the spot wants £8,000; but Arnold contrives to put down his demand as £11,000—sends him £8,000, and pockets the difference. Of course, when the engineer returns and goes into the accounts, he will notice the discrepancy, and the game will be up. But Arnold has a sister, Dorothy, who is wildly devoted to her big brother. She is engaged to a young Civil servant, Walter Gresham, who has a little patrimony of £2,000. To him she goes, and, without telling him that her brother has actually stolen the money, begs him to give up the £2,000 and borrow £1,000 more, to save Arnold (as she represents) from bankruptcy. This Walter declines to do; he will not impoverish himself and Dorothy at the very outset of their married life. But there is still another expedient left. The engineer whose return will bring Arnold's crime to light is, as Dorothy learns, making a pause at St. Moritz on his way home. Edward Thursfield is his name. She does not know him, but Arnold does, and she has heard his character praised. She takes a great resolve. Without saying a word to either her brother or her betrothed, she sets off for St. Moritz. There she makes Thursfield's acquaintance, and he justifies her calculation by falling madly in love with her at first sight. In a fortnight she is engaged to him, and together they return to England. Her design is that, when Thursfield discovers Arnold's peculation, he shall conceal it from the firm, thus becoming an accomplice in the crime. Then, as soon as Arnold is safe, she will throw Thursfield over and marry Walter Gresham, who is meanwhile to remain in happy ignorance of all that is going on.

A pretty little scheme, is it not? Its reckless audacity is only equalled by its heartless baseness. It is not quite fair, perhaps, to ask how Dorothy could count so confidently on finding Thursfield, a bachelor of fifty, so instantly susceptible to her charms. Mr. Sutro may reply that she did not "count upon" it, but thought it worth trying as a last resource, and that it happened to come off. This is a specious plea, but does not remove the difficulty of understanding how so fantastic a scheme—one in which she had so little reason to hope for success—ever came into her head. Waiving this point, however, we are met by a more serious difficulty in her bland assumption that if Thursfield succumbs to her charms he will be ready, as a matter of course, to descend to her brother's level, and aid and abet him in robbing their employers. This amazing moral obtuseness is not only a mistake, but an easily corrigible one. Why should not Dorothy know or suppose Thursfield to be a fairly wealthy man, who could easily replace the stolen money? She tells us in so many words that this idea never entered her head—but why not? Why should it never occur to her that Thursfield might do what she had vainly besought Walter Gresham to do? As a matter of fact, it is what Thursfield actually does—out of his modest savings of £5,000, he makes good the defalcation. Mr. Sutro's motive for making him a comparatively poor man is evident enough—it enhances his heroism. But there is no reason why Dorothy should not imagine him richer than he is, and conceive that the £3,000 would be a mere trifle to him. Or does Mr. Sutro intend us to see in Dorothy a woman absolutely devoid of moral sense, who holds it easier for a man to participate in a felony than to devote £3,000 to the service of the woman he loves?

The starting-point of the action, then, puts a severe strain on our credulity; but here is once more illustrated that principle of the excellent Sarcey, that an audience will never cavil at what happens before the rise of the curtain, if only the scenes deduced from these postulates are logical and interesting. I will not take the edge off the reader's curiosity by following in detail the process of the action. Truth to tell, the main appeal of the play is to curiosity; and if that appeal be forestalled, there is not very much left. Suffice it to say, then, that Mr. Sutro works up his material with great ingenuity, and wrings from it (during the first three acts, at any rate) every ounce of possible effect. It is not long before we discover that Dorothy has come really to love her magnanimous engineer, and is heartily tired of poor, narrow-minded, egoistic Walter Graham. Walter does not fail to give her a more or less adequate excuse for breaking off her engagement to him; and it seems as though her scheming were to be crowned with a most immoral success, when of a sudden, in an admirably-conceived situation of quite extraordinary poignancy, all her high-built happiness comes tumbling about her ears, and Thursfield sees how he has been duped, diddled, and befooled. Here, indeed, Mr. Sutro rehabilitates himself as a moralist, preaching, by implication, a sermon from the good old text:—

> "O what a tangled web we weave,
> When first we practise to deceive."

Dorothy has involved herself and her brother in such a tangled web that their conduct seems a great deal viler than it really is; nor can they by any means unravel the tangle and make Thursfield realise the true limits of their culpability. This is particularly hard upon the brother. For Dorothy's conduct there is little enough to be said, beyond the fact that she now sincerely loves Thursfield; but Arnold had no complicity in Dorothy's doings at St. Moritz, and is, on the whole, by no means the unspeakable hound he appears in Thursfield's eyes. However, the case against both of them looks so extremely black that Thursfield's refusal to hear any explanation, though in fact a device for getting a fourth act out of the theme, seems almost natural and justified. As the audience thunders its appreciation of the really thrilling scene which brings the third act to a close, one says to oneself, "Yes, this is a very strong and striking bit of drama; but can the author get his heroine effectively out of her hobble?"

I think he might have done so; but I don't think he has. He has missed what might have been the most original scene in the play. What he does is very simple—he gives Dorothy an opportunity of pleading her cause with Thursfield, re-asseverating the sincerity of her love for him, and bringing forward in proof of it something she wrote while at St. Moritz, to the effect that if she should break her promise of marriage, it would only be because of the stern sense of honor bidding her to fulfil her prior engagement to another. For my part, I do not see that this proves anything. A woman capable of Dorothy's other peccadillos would be quite capable of making this declaration without meaning a word of it. Thursfield, however, is uncritical of evidence, and accepts the document as conclusive. "Je vois, je sais, je crois!" he cries, two minutes after he has been vowing that he cannot believe a word she says. Morally, psychologically, and even theatrically, the ending is a lame one. The tangled web is never definitely straightened out. To the very last Thursfield does not know exactly what happened, or what was the due apportionment of blame between Dorothy and Arnold. This fact, I think, might have put Mr. Sutro on the track of a better solution. The great scene of the last act might have been one in which Thursfield, recovered from the shock of the first revelation, thought calmly back over the circumstances, and disentangled for himself, by following this clue and that, the good and the evil in Dorothy's conduct. There was one point at least which ought to have shown him, on reflection, that the theory of a deliberate conspiracy between the brother and the sister did not quite meet the case. Had there been such a conspiracy, why should Arnold, just as it was on the verge of success, have confessed his crime to the manager of the firm he had robbed? This he had done; and the sense of justice inseparable from the character of the magnanimous engineer ought to have impelled Thursfield to ask himself, "Why?" Starting from this point he might have traced things backwards until he came to understand the true facts in their true sequence. He would then have found in Dorothy a woman sorely in need of moral guidance, but not irreparably base; and who could be better fitted to afford her moral guidance than a magnanimous engineer? This scene of the love-stricken hero piecing together the case for the defence of the woman he loves might have been (perhaps with some slight readjustment of the antecedent circumstances) at once ingenious, interesting, and true. It would also have given us that analytic judgment of Dorothy's action which our moral sense demands. But Mr. Sutro has chosen a different conclusion; and the result is that his last act, though not uninteresting, gains its interest from extrinsic matters, and not from the actual scene of reconciliation.

How strange is the absolute dominance of that stage convention which makes all engineers perfect paragons of manly virtue! Ibsen himself, in general no respecter of conventions, did homage to this one. Borgheim, in "Little Eyolf," was a road-maker, not a bridge-builder; but there is no essential difference. It is to be noted, however, that Borgheim is only a subsidiary character. Had he been compelled, like Edward Thursfield, to take the centre of the stage for a whole evening, I fancy we should have found some slight human weaknesses in him. Edward has not a single redeeming vice; and it says a great deal for Mr. George Alexander's skill and firmness of handling that his unflagging nobility did not become tedious or ridiculous. But Mr. Sutro will never do himself justice as an artist until he shakes off the fascination of the waxwork hero, the "perfect lover" and model of manhood. In one of the speeches of Thursfield's chief, old Sir Henry Killick (a capital character, capitally acted by Mr. William Farren), there is the germ of a fine play. Protesting against Thursfield's determination to marry, instead of setting forth afresh to conquer the wilderness, Sir Henry says, "We are the masters of Nature, we engineering chaps, and not her slaves, like the other people." Here is the hint for a truly dramatic conflict—why should not Mr. Sutro develop it, and take us a little deeper into the psychology of engineering?

Miss Irene Vanbrugh plays Dorothy with great and yet admirably restrained nervous energy. It is an extremely difficult character to handle, being, as I have hinted, a bundle of inconsistencies. Miss Vanbrugh succeeds, in a most reprehensible way, in doing odious things without forfeiting our sympathy. Perhaps the most interesting details of the play are the dilemmas of conduct which his sister's headstrong action forces upon Arnold Faringay. These are mere by-products of Mr. Sutro's scheme: Arnold's character is never allowed space to develop itself; but it contains several highly dramatic moments, which Mr. Dawson Milward handles in a quite masterly way. Miss Florence Haydon is delightful as ever in a delightful character, which ought, however, to be lightened of one or two cumbrous speeches; Mr. Harcourt Williams is good, though perhaps a little too boyish, as Walter Gresham; and Mr. E. Vivian Reynolds, as Thursfield's confidant, Peter Holland, contributes an excellent character-sketch.

WILLIAM ARCHER.

Letters from Abroad.

THE FALL OF BARON VON BECK.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

VIENNA, November 8th, 1908.

SIR,—With the fall of Baron von Beck, the Premier of Austria, the country slips into the line of undisguised reaction. The Clerical Anti-Semitic Party have gained the upper hand, and their friend, Baron von Bienert, Minister of the Interior in the late Cabinet, has been entrusted with the formation of a new one. The turn came unexpectedly. Owing to the quarrels between the Germans and the Czechs, their representatives in the Cabinet resolved to resign. The differences were by no means so great as necessarily to cause a Ministerial crisis. But the Clerical Anti-Semitic members of the Cabinet availing themselves of the momentary difficulty, tendered their resignations, and the Ministry fell. Their action was emphatically supported by the Heir Presumptive. Baron von Beck, the ablest Premier that Austria has ever had, fell a victim to the lâches of his own colleagues. He is, however, so remarkable a figure that he deserves an appreciation, for sooner or later he is sure to come to the front again.

Up to the present hour, Baron von Beck has been the great man of Austria. He was the engineer of universal franchise, of the treaty with Hungary, and of all the difficult transactions in which the four preceding Cabinets had failed. Everything he undertook succeeded; every important matter passed through his hands. He was the driving wheel of the State machinery, and nothing, however slight, was done without him.

Two and a-half years ago hardly anybody knew the name of von Beck. "Who is he?" "Where does he come from?" were universal questions when he was appointed Premier. Well, he came from the bureaucracy, as most Austrian statesmen come. The old Parliament of privileged classes produced very few politicians of note. Baron von Beck worked at his desk in the Ministry of Agriculture, and rose from it to the rank of Under-Secretary of State. All that was known of him in this peaceful sphere was that he had instructed the Archduke Francis Ferdinand, the heir presumptive, in public law.

In May, 1906, in Austria, politics had reached a thoroughly critical point. It was the eleventh hour of the renewal of the treaty with Hungary, concerning which negotiations had been carried on in vain for nearly ten years. The difficulties on both the Austrian and the Hungarian side seemed insurmountable. It looked as though Austria must go to pieces, and cease to be a Great Power. Moreover, the cry for universal suffrage had sprung up with irresistible force. These two questions had swallowed up the Cabinets of Herr von Koerber, Baron von Gautsch, and Prince Hohenlohe. The situation seemed desperate. No man appeared to make the great effort; all the leading statesmen had been used up.

A bright thought of Privy Councillor Dr. Sieghardt, the right hand of the preceding three Prime Ministers, saved the situation. This excellent judge of men was the first to recognise the qualities of the worker in the Ministry of Agriculture. At his suggestion the dark horse was taken to the starting post. Practically unknown, with no experience of active politics, Baron von Beck in forty-eight hours formed a Cabinet such as had never before existed in Austria, consisting of representatives of all the great national parties. As the saying goes here, he "Parliamentarised" the Ministry, which formerly consisted of civil servants, from the fact that there is no settled majority in the Austrian Parliament. In a short time he had a majority of three quarters of the two Houses. Yet his personal position was difficult. A Clerical and a Conservative, the measures he proposed were to a large extent Radical, and he had to gain and enjoy the confidence of all the parties, living, as they were, in a state of incessant feud. The Clericals and Anti-Semites considered him their man; the Liberals placed complete confidence in him since his act in including a Liberal Minister of Education in his Cabinet; the Progressives did not fear him. The Austrian Socialists (orthodox Marxists as they were) were his opponents outwardly; but in fact they rather supported him. Their leader, Dr. Adler, once described him as an "enlightened statesman." It needed, indeed, a remarkable union of strength and patience to break down the immense opposition to universal suffrage in both Houses, and to get the Bill passed, despite the opposition of the bourgeois classes, and the intrigues of the aristocracy.

In overcoming his difficulties the new Prime Minister had the great good fortune to have a powerful supporter in the old Emperor. Incarnation of Conservatism as he is, the Emperor became the most eager canvasser on behalf of that Radical measure. He used to say to all objectors: "It is a Staatsnothwendigkeit" ("a necessity of State"). But in the struggle for the treaty with Hungary, the Premier had to rely wholly on his own resources. In that matter the Emperor was forced to observe neutrality. The farther the negotiations concerning the Ausgleich with Hungary proceeded, the greater seemed to grow the obstacles in both halves of the Monarchy. The negotiations went on for more than a year. Ever so many times they seemed to have failed, and at the last moment a complete breach with Hungary was threatened. In both Parliaments obstruction stopped the way to the Ausgleich, but von Beck succeeded in getting it accepted. The greatest distinction that the Emperor has in his gift—the Order of St. Stephen—was his reward for the extraordinary skill with which his critical task had been performed.

It was soon crowned by a fresh triumph. Hardly had the stability of the Empire been assured, when he announced a far-reaching scheme of social legislation and reconciliation between the Austrian nationalities. This last has always been regarded as an insoluble problem. It is because of Austria's eight nationalities, peoples of different races and creeds, and of widely divergent culture, that she is more difficult to govern than any other country in Europe. Incessant quarrels rage between Czechs and Germans, Poles and Ruthenians, Italians and Slavs, as well as between them and the Government. Every quarrel increases the mutual bitterness, and as a rule both parties are in the wrong. Full liberty would doubtless be the best cement to hold together the disrupting nationalities, for it would imply also free national development. But the peoples of Austria have not yet reached that point; democratic ideas have not yet permeated the mass. The national idea is placed before everything else, and in most cases behind the flag of nationalism are hidden the Church and the interests of the privileged classes. Small as these nationalities are, the idol of nationalism displaces all other political sanctities, and each element struggles for the upper hand over the others. Any measure, for instance, proposed for the free development of the Czechs is considered hurtful to the Germans, and passionately opposed by them, and vice versâ. The consequence is that the uproarious and disgraceful scenes in the provincial diets and in Parliament are brought about now by the Ruthenians, now by the Poles, again by the Italians or the Germans. And the Government is the universal scapegoat. Whatever it does for the one nationality is denounced by the others as partisanship and oppression.

We have said that Baron von Beck was the first Austrian Premier to enjoy the confidence of all parties. As he said of himself, he was in turn the father confessor of all. He had already brought about a number of small national compromises in Bohemia and Moravia; and if there was anybody likely to succeed in the great legislative scheme it was he. But long, tedious work, involving intricate negotiations and bargainings, had to precede it. His fascination, his eloquence, his enormous powers of work, his fertile, suggestive mind, and his singular sweetness of character and address, were all brought to bear on his task. His mere exterior betrays a striking personality. Tall, slender, and quite grey, although only fifty-three, he maintains the impression of youth. In word and movement he is quick and lively; in tactics, dexterous yet straightforward. His own boast is only of his "energetic patience." "I have no nerves," he once said; "I sleep well, eat well, and am never angry. During the wildest uproar in the Chamber I am as calm as if taking a walk along Ring Strasse." Once he summed up the principles of government in Austria as follows: "The formula of government by a simple majority and party cannot be transferred to the anomalous Austrian State. In Austria not only parties, but also nationalities oppose each other. Therefore, every one-sided régime is only too readily felt to have the sting of nationalist oppression. The Government which is called upon to mediate between such mutually opposing parties and nationalities must be composed like a court of arbitration; it must not become the Government of one party; the Emperor's Government must be for all."

In the way of social legislation Baron von Beck's greatest achievement was the nationalisation of some 3,500 kilometres of railway lines. It was toilsome work, in which three of his predecessors had failed. For years they struggled with the recalcitrant companies. The late Prime Minister did the work in a few months. Now there are some 18,000 kilometres in the hands of the Government, which accordingly regulates the tariffs according to the public needs. Only the Southern Railway, and a few small lines in Bohemia, are still owned by private companies.

Less than a fortnight ago Baron von Beck laid before Parliament a scheme for the most difficult piece of social legislation that he has attempted, a scheme of State insurance for old age and invalidity. The Bill he introduced is much wider and more radical than the English and German models, and is based on purely actuarial calculations. Not only industrial and agricultural laborers are to be insured against old age and invalidity, but also the small masters and petty landowning farmers. Proof of poverty or invalidity is not to be demanded, nor is there to be a "pension" from the State, but the insured are to have an absolute right to their insurance money, comparable to the claim on a private insurance society. Undoubtedly an immensely wide scheme. Austria seemed about to take the first step where no country had preceded her, where no experience existed to guide her. A leap in the dark! Baron von Beck had the courage to take it. Will Baron von Bienert, the Anti-Semitic Premier, try to carry his predecessor's Bill?—Yours, &c.,

A Viennese Resident.

Letters to the Editor.

A TALE OF UNEMPLOYMENT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—I was unemployed for the first time in my life, during the whole of the working part of which—twelve years—I had had but one employer, a medium-class house furnisher in Manchester. During the twelve years I had seen the gradual decline of the cabinet-maker's art. When I first knew the trade men took pride in their work, and beautifully finished pieces of furniture, of sound construction, went out daily from the workshop. But little by little the time allowed on each job was cut down, inferior wood was used, the varnish-brush began to take the place of the rubber in the finishing, and the quality of the work steadily deteriorated. Shops stocked with the products of the alien sweaters' dens sprang up in opposition. Prices went lower still, and with the prices, the quality.

The rise of the hire furnishing system dealt another heavy blow at the cabinet-makers' art, for it led to still more "scamped" work. When the orders were given out in the morning it was: "Get out one of those sideboards—pick the worst—that with a 'shake' in the top will do, and rush it. It's weekly payments." Rarely a day passed without an order of the kind. Six years after I entered the trade the amount of time allowed on a sideboard (to take one instance) had been cut down by more than one half, the result of the competition of the Jewish sweater, and, in a lesser degree, the hire system.

And so, in the show-rooms of furnishers catering for the working classes, you see—in the place of the soundly constructed furniture of twelve years ago—shoddy, though I admit it is often nicely designed shoddy. In my own case things went steadily worse, until, on the 25th of March the bailiffs were in, and I was out—of work.

I was not greatly concerned at first. I was young, strong, with excellent references. I was sure to get work soon; and so I regarded it as a new experience, an adventure. Daily I made excursions to neighboring towns: Oldham, Rochdale, Heywood, Bromley, along the Rossendale valley—but everywhere I was told, "The trade (so far as the making was concerned) had gone to the dogs." As a Stacksteads man put it: "Folks can beigh (buy) it chepper fra' t'Jews nor they con mek it; un if they durn't beigh it, other folk will, un where shud we be then?"

Then I went further afield. Day after day passed, through town after town I went, and still no sign of work. The month of May—my birthday—dawned, and found me on the way to Worcester, penniless, all my belongings gone, possessing nothing but the clothes in which I stood up; and fear began to grip me. For the first time I recognised the seriousness of my position. "What if I kept on and on, and still no work—what then? These men I have met—on the road—in the slums—broken men, broken bodily and mentally and morally—did they first start with eager, confident hope, as I? Had they something to give the world once? Is it my lot to be broken on the wheel as they—broken and flung on to the world's dust heap—useless?" The heart-sickening fear was almost too much.

I went round the shops in Worcester; no work, many a snub, not one kind word. Then I plodded on to Tewkesbury—still no work; but, passing out on my way to Gloucester, I saw the Abbey, and, acting upon an impulse, I went on. Save for myself, it was empty; but to me it seemed filled with a great quiet, and as I sat there, with evening stealing on, something of its peace seemed to take possession of me. I was lifted out of myself, and it seemed to me that unseen hands ministered to me. That night I got a little broken sleep on the grassy border of a country lane. The day had been warm, but the night was bitterly cold, and I spent the greater part of it staring up at the blackness of a sky without a single star.

I found a pond near by in the early morning, had a swim, then started off for Gloucester. It was Sunday; the shops were closed, and I had to face another day of hunger before I could ask for work. To pass away the time, I went into the park, and watched the promenaders. A man sat down alongside me, and after a time we talked (my clothes were still good, my collar fairly clean). I happened to mention something I had seen on my way from Tewkesbury. "I suppose you are on a walking tour?" he said, curiously. I did not answer. We discussed books and their writers, when suddenly, looking at his watch, he stood up. "I have thoroughly enjoyed our conversation," he said, "but I must go to tea. Would you care to come to tea with me, and we can continue it?" It was an opportune invitation; but I did not care to sail under false colors, and I told him that I was not, as he supposed, on a walking tour, but on tramp for work. In a moment his whole attitude stiffened. He said a few words of sympathy, shook hands, and left me.

I have noticed all along that people seemed to think that because I was an "out of work" I was necessarily a "wrong 'un," and where—when asking for work—they have not snubbed me, their attitude has been one of suspicion. And I have felt it bitterly—felt it more, I think, than any other thing I have had to endure. For, after all, sympathy is very cheap, and a little would have gone a long way in keeping up my courage.

Near Bristol I got my first job—two days' work—my first meal, and my first experience of a common lodging-house. I do not think I shall ever forget it.

The kitchen was a low dark room. It had once been whitewashed, but the walls were now frescoed with reddish patches of slain vermin. The smell was frightful. Under the light of the lamp the men seemed low, disreputable, their conversation vile. My bed was one of seven in a low, dirty room; the night a night of horror. Vermin fed on me. My neighbor imagined that blue devils were crawling over his bed. I went in a youth; I came out a man. That was but one of my nights, and many have since come and gone.

Some have been spent in common lodging-houses, some by the roadside, in fields—wherever I could crawl away from the view of the police. And at last I have reached London. London! What pictures of its glories hung in the chambers of my youthful fancy! How different the realisation! London to me means the Embankment and the companionship of its outcasts; it means long, friendless thoroughfares, through which, in the silence of the night, I have been hunger-driven; it means flaunting wealth, which usually mocks my misery. It means, to me, the heart-breaking search through endless streets for work. It means the chasing of luggage-piled cabs. It means the haunting of the railway stations, seeking to earn a copper: getting snubs, insults, curses.

Do you know what it means to be unemployed, as I?

It means a dulled brain and a weak, hunger-wracked body. It means a memory-haunted mind. It means nights which lag terribly as I long for the first streak of dawn. The homeless in London may not sleep by night.

It means sinking lower and lower, until I shall be utterly broken—mentally, morally, physically. And, after that, what?—Yours, &c.,

A Working Cabinet-Maker.

[We have reason to know that our correspondent's experience is that which he has written down.—Ed. Nation.]

"THE CONCILIATION OF THE IRRECONCILEABLES."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I have no doubt that in so delicate a matter as a Royal proclamation, editors find it difficult to maintain an even balance between their loyalty and their intellectual faculties, but I have no hesitation in saying that your leader of the 7th instant is far below the standard I have grown accustomed to expect from THE NATION. And if you will let me state my criticisms briefly, I shall feel greatly honored. I have read carefully through almost all the comments that have appeared in the British Press, and I have failed to find in a single one of them any attempt to appraise the promises of our "second charter" at their true value. How is this true value to be determined? Is it to be determined merely by complacent self-congratulation on the achievements of the past, or a rhetorical declaration of the intentions of the future. The Royal Message was, we presume, devised to meet what is considered a critical situation; and whenever such situations arise, it is the duty of statesmen to lay aside their preconceived notions, to disabuse their minds of the fatally foolish doctrine of "settled facts," and go fearlessly and unflinchingly to the very root. That is where the trouble lies; not even you, Sir, have gone to the root of the matter, and the consequence is that you have fallen into the same trap as our Tory enemies and our Liberal friends. You seem to imagine that, even though the unrest is bone of your bone and flesh of your flesh, it can be allayed by the speedy and judicious and "magnanimous" granting of "reforms," by the admission of "natives" to the Imperial and Provincial Councils, by simultaneous examinations, by a larger share in the administration, and, in fine, by the adoption of the suggestions of the "Pax Britannica" school of Congressmen. You seem to think that the unrest is superficial, that it is confined to the ambitious classes, to the educated minority, &c., &c. And you believe that Lord Morley will soon "open up a new epoch in Indian history."

We have no doubt that the reforms will be comprehensive; but we have the gravest doubt whether the most comprehensive reforms will alter the situation. The reason is not far to seek. Ever since England undertook the management of the territories that became her Indian Empire, the theory has been that she has done it for India's good, and that there can be no possibility of her ever contemplating the independence of that part of her Empire. Now, Sir, this is a very comfortable theory so long as it meets with the approval of the majority of those whom it has been England's high privilege to rule for over a century. But in 1905 a movement began which questioned the need and truth and justice of the theory. It was then that many of us became conscious that England and India were standing at the parting of the ways. It has been the custom to make light of the Indian Nationalists, to consider them the dreamers of impossible dreams, nay, to look upon them as the enemies of peaceful progress. I state fearlessly that the true enemies of peaceful progress have been the bloodthirsty bureaucrats, who sanction the adoption of inhuman repressive measures and imagine they are rendering a service to the cause of humanity and civilisation by preserving the equilibrium known officially as "law and order"! But that equilibrium has become decidedly unstable now that the Nationalist Party grows visibly in strength and numbers. I have never been afraid or ashamed to preach the Nationalist gospel of absolute severance from British rule. You call that an "unthinkable policy," and in so doing you have missed the keynote of future Indian history. If the Proclamation had committed the British nation to a promise that the whole trend and endeavor of British policy would be towards the attainment of autonomy by India some day, even if that day were fifty or a hundred years hence, I have not the least hesitation in saying that the Nationalists would have worked peacefully and harmoniously with England towards that consummation devoutly to be wished. But not only has there been no recognition of the necessity and justice of the ideal of Svaraj, but the aspirations of the people have been openly denounced as conspiracies. It is clear, therefore, that England intends to hold India perpetually, even if it mean bloodshed; what alternative is there but that the Nationalists should intend that she shall not hold India perpetually, even if it mean bloodshed?

The conflict is not between England and India, but between Imperialism and Nationalism. If England has made up her mind that India shall continue to form part of her Empire, it is quite natural that she should be chary of giving the higher posts to the natives. It has been the opinion of every responsible Englishman that, to use the Duke of Wellington's words, "The higher posts must be closed against natives if our Empire in India is to be maintained." How, then, can you reconcile your undoubted desire to maintain that Empire, with the avowed desire to take steps "towards obliterating distinctions of race as the test for access to posts of public authority and power"? Either you do not realise that this promised obliteration of race distinctions means the extinction of your Indian Empire, or you must admit that the promise is not meant to be taken without a considerable number of mental reservations.

The truth is that the revolution has begun, and Britain attaches too much importance to "loyal" chiefs, too little importance to the Nationalists. There is only one course open to her. Nothing short of a frank and courageous admission of the Nationalist ideal into her policy will remove the discontent and break up the insidious alliance between the bomb and young India. Otherwise, I can see the sacred rivers of Hindustan needlessly reddened in the defence of the "Empire" on the one hand, and of the "Nation" on the other.—Yours, &c.,

VIRENDRANATH CHATTOPEDHYEYA.

78, Lancaster Road, W.,
November 10th, 1908.

"GRAMMATICALS."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I am glad that your grammarian and I have been able mutually to afford "simple fun" to each other. But I think he read my letter hastily. I justified nothing by the example of the Elizabethans—though Elizabethan English, the English of Shakespeare, Hooker, the Authorised Version, is not usually considered inferior to that of modern journalism. I merely pointed out that a particular construction was of respectable use and antiquity; saying at the same time that it had now become awkward. It was, of course, a Latinism; but in Latin you can inflect your participle so as to show whether it hangs on the subject or the object of the sentence. How, by the way, would your writer "analyse" "Having therefore boldness . . . let us draw near with a true heart," in Hebrews x.?

If I am wrong in saying "averse to," I am wrong in company with Addison, with Locke, with Jeremy Taylor, with Sir Thomas Browne, with J. R. Green (who says "averse from" and "aversion to"). That is good enough for me.

Your writer will excuse me for saying that, in my humble opinion, the "superior" person in these matters is not he who contents himself with following writers of English whom the world has agreed to recognise as its great writers, but he who, starting from a priori rules, often based upon a misunderstanding of the real principles of language, pronounces judgment on the language of his contemporaries, some of whom may perhaps hereafter take their place beside the great writers of the past.

Horace long ago told us that usage is the sole arbiter of forms of speech.—Yours, &c.,

"GRAMMATICULUS."

P.S.—It is often difficult for the most superior of us to act always on our principles. Has your grammarian ever heard of the school inspector who told the children that "A preposition is a wrong part of speech to end a sentence with"?

November 3rd, 1908.

MURRAY'S BIBLE DICTIONARY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In your notice of "Murray's Illustrated Bible Dictionary" in this week's issue you speak of the brief reference to the Virgin Birth in the article, "Jesus Christ," and to the fact that there is not an article "Virgin." Had your reviewer known that the name of the Blessed Virgin was "Mary," he would have found the subject dealt with under that head (where it properly belongs) as fully as could reasonably be expected in a book of this size. As the remarks are, therefore, misleading, and also unfair to the writer of "Jesus Christ," who, of course, was informed that the Virgin Birth was being dealt with elsewhere, may I ask for the insertion of this explanation in your next issue?—Yours, &c.,

WM. C. PIERCY,
Editor of "Murray's Illustrated Dictionary."
30, Markham Square, S.W.,
November 2nd, 1908.

[The Reviewer assures Mr. Piercy that the name of the Blessed Virgin was not unknown to him. His point was that, except for the books he mentioned, no reference was made to modern critical literature on the subject of the Virgin Birth. Moreover, he still believes that, in accordance with the usual practice of Bible Dictionaries, the heading to which the subject "properly belongs" is "Virgin" or "Virgin Birth."]

ARBITRATION AND NATIONAL HONOR.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—May I remind you of the exceptions to the rule laid down in your "Diary of the Week" (November 7th), that "From every arbitration treaty questions of national honor are excepted, and it is understood that they lie outside the sphere of arbitration"? So absolute a statement has a tendency to stereotype a public opinion already too slow to alter; while the departures from custom have been already sufficiently important for quotation at the Conference of the Inter-Parliamentary Union, London, 1906. In the "Report of the Commission on a Model Treaty of Arbitration," Freiherr von Pleuer cites the Danish-Dutch Treaty of February 12th, 1904, which allows all questions whatever to go to arbitration, and the Treaty concluded between Russia and Sweden and Norway—November 26th (December 9th), 1904—which excepts only differences relating to independence, vital interests, and the exercise of sovereignty, the usual stipulation about "national honor" being eliminated. M. de Krabbe, following, lays stress upon the case of Italy, as a greater State included among those that have entered into treaties of compulsory arbitration without reserve of subjects.

It is significant also that "national honor" is not mentioned in the Draft Treaty recommended by the Conference as one of those points which may be reserved.—Yours, &c.,

J. F. GREEN,
Assistant Secretary,
International Arbitration and Peace Association.
40 and 41, Outer Temple, W.C.,
November 12th, 1908.

PERSIAN LIBERALS AND GREAT BRITAIN.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

MONSIEUR,—Les Persans qui luttent pour la cause de la Constitution ne peuvent oublier que c'est en Angleterre qu'ils ont trouvé, dès le début, les plus sincères defenseurs; ils voudraient ne plus se souvenir de ce généreux appui, que tout viendrait le leur rappeler.

C'est donc un pressant devoir pour les patriotes de notre pays de remercier la Presse liberale de la Grande-Bretagne, qui soutient ces efforts avec autant de courage que d'éloquence.

La Colonie persane de France croirait manquer à sa tâche si elle ne venait pas vous exprimer toute sa gratitude. Au moment où tant de gens restent indifférents aux vicissitudes de notre patrie, rien n'est plus réconfortant que de sentir votre chaleureuse sympathie pour nos intérêts nationaux.

Déjà, autrefois quand la Perse cherchait sa route vers la Liberté, l'Angleterre a su lui montrer le chemin: un tel service ne peut sortir de la mémoire de tous les vrais patriotes.

Aujourd'hui l'honorable Taghi Zadih, le vrai représentant de la Perse libre, le champion de nos idées et de nos espérances, ainsi que les autres Députés de la Perse rencontrent auprès de vous le meilleur accueil; vous defendez avec un dévouement inlassable la cause qu'ils servent: C'est la nôtre!

Aussi, souhaitant que vos encouragements ne lui fassent jamais défaut, la Colonie Persane de France s'empresse-t-elle de vous témoigner ses remerciements les plus sincères et de vous assurer de sa profonde réconnaissance.

Croyez, Monsieur, á nos sentiments respectueux et dévoués,

DR. ISMAIL KHAN,
MIRZA AYA,
(Députe de Tabriz),
DR. ALI KHAN,
ABDEL-HOSSEIN KHAN,
MIRZA TAGHI YAHIA,
ASSADALLAH KHAN,
PRINCE SEYFODDINE BAHMAU,
ALY AKBAR KHAN DEKHOW,
FAZLALAH KHAN,
DJEVAD KHAN SYNEKI,
MOHAMED KHAN,
GASSERN KHAN,
DR. REZA KHAN,
SADELJH TABATABAY,
MOHAMED SADEG,
MIRZA MUHAMMAD,
DR. LETIF KHAN,
YAHIA KHAN,
DALUR,
ASSADOLLAH KHAN.

Paris, le 11 Novembre, 1908.

Poetry.

THE PLEASANT LIFE.

WHEN I came back to Nature's ways,
After a city's ill-spent days,
And saw in summer fields of gold,
That billowed in the wind, and rolled
Against green hedges, and the tree,
When all its leaves danced merrily;
And saw the simple cattle look
With eyes whose lashes hardly shook;
And clouds that changed Heaven's face, and could Seem motionless, stare how I would;
And all the sweet, wild blossoms seen
In leafy woods and meadows green:
When I saw these sweet sights, and heard
The music made by Brook and Bird;
The Skylark's voice, that happy hour
He soared up through a sunny shower;
And woodland Brook, that raised his tones
Each time he came to rocks and stones—
When I saw these sweet sights, and heard
The music made by Brook and Bird,
"Nature," I said, "take thou my trust
Until this Earth reclaims its dust."

W. H. DAVIES.

BLACKWOODS' BOOKS.

CHRISTMAS, 1908.

ALWAYS AN ACCEPTABLE GIFT.

GEORGE ELIOT'S COMPLETE WORKS.

Messrs. Blackwood are the only publishers of the complete works of George Eliot.

THE NEW POPULAR EDITION. With Photogravure Frontispiece to each Volume. Each work complete in one volume. 10 vols. in all, each net 3s. 6d.

THE WARWICK (POCKET) EDITION. 12 vols. "Life," 2 vols extra. Cloth, gilt top, each net, 2s., Limp Leather, gilt top, each net, 2s. 6d., Leather, gilt top, each net, 3s., Half Vellum, gilt top, each net, 3s. 6d.

THE STANDARD EDITION. 21 vols. 2s. 6d. each. A valuable edition for the library.

Adam Bede.
Mill on the Floss.
Felix Holt.
Romola.
Middlemarch.
Daniel Deronda.
Jubal and The Spanish Gypsy.
Scenes of Clerical Life.
Silas Marner.
Brother Jacob.
Lifted Veil.
Essays and Theophrastus Such.
Life. By J. W. CROSS.

A WANDERING STUDENT IN THE FAR EAST.

By the EARL OF RONALDSHAY, M.P.

With Map and 60 Illustrations. 2 vols. 21s. net.

Lord Ronaldshay's purpose in these volumes is to describe his travels, but still more especially to discuss—on the spot as it were—the problems of the changing relations of East and West which asserted themselves under his eyes, as they must suggest themselves to all thoughtful readers. The author writes both as a traveller and as a statesman, recording the appearances, and suggesting a forecast of the future of the countries through which he takes us.

FAMOUS DUELS OF THE FLEET.

By H. B. MONEY COUTTS, 6s.

In a series of graphic sketches Mr. Money Coutts brings before his readers fourteen of the most important single ship actions known in our naval annals. The purpose of his book, however, does not stop here. He draws from each of the Duels the lesson applicable to present-day conditions of naval warfare. The tactics of the combatant vessels are shown by diagrams, and the volume is fully illustrated.

THE ROMAN BREVIARY.

Reformed by Order of the Holy Œcumenical Council of Trent; Published by Order of Pope St. Pius V.; and revised by Clement VIII., Urban VIII., and Leo XIII. Together with the Offices since granted and the Martyrology. Translated out of Latin into English by JOHN, MARQUESS OF BUTE, K.T.

A new edition for use in England. A handsome demy 4to volume, £3 3s. net.

THE DEVELOPMENT OF GREEK PHILOSOPHY.

By ROBERT ADAMSON. Edited by W. R. Sorley and R. P. Hardie. 10s. 6d. net.

DRAKE: AN ENGLISH EPIC.

By ALFRED NOYES. The Complete Work in one Volume. 7s. 6d. net.

"There is the greatness of promise in such a production. But there is more. No fit reader will read it without recognising that there is in it also the greatness of achievement. . . . . Never once falls below a certain high level of dignity and force."—The Times.

POEMS. By DULCIBELLA ETHEL GREY.

With a Prefatory Note by H. CHOLMONDELEY PENNELL. Beautifully bound in half-vellum, 7s. 6d. net, and full vellum, 12s. 6d. net.

"Always fresh and unstrained."—Saturday Review.

SOME EIGHTEENTH CENTURY BYWAYS.

And other Essays. By JOHN BUCHAN. 7s. 6d. net. [Immediately.

LEAVES FROM THE DIARY OF A CRICKETER.

By W. E. W. COLLINS. 6s. [Immediately.

The Best New 6/- Novels.

THE HERITAGE.

By SYDNEY C. GRIER.

"The author has got right into the inside of Balkan politics."—Newcastle Chronicle.

THE FEAR OF LIFE.

By GERALD MAXWELL.

"A powerful and poignant story of deep human interest."—Court Journal.

THE STORY OF ESTHER.

By MAUD OXENDEN.

"A tender and touching story, marked by an elevation of spirit that takes it out of the ordinary ruck altogether."—Globe.

REALITY. By MARGARET PATERSON.

"A delightful story."—Scotsman.

CAPTAIN GRANT'S DISPATCH.

By GARRETT MILL.

"Dramatic in every episode, vigorous in literary style, and strong in all its constructive features . . . . and shows interest at the first page and holds it to the end."—Scotsman.

SALVATOR. By PERCEVAL GIBBON.

"The work of a man of genius."—British Weekly.

SALEH: A Sequel.

By HUGH CLIFFORD.

"A powerful character study of peculiar interest at a time when so much is heard of unrest in the Middle East."—Scotsman.

THE SIBYL OF VENICE.

By RACHEL SWETE MACNAMARA. Author of "The Trance," &c.

"A moving and fascinating tale of Venetian life."—Standard.

GLENTYRE. By EDMUND SELLAR. Author of "Muggins of the Modern Side."

AND

A New Scottish Humorist

JUST PUBLISHED.

THE RIGHT STUFF.

Some Episodes in the Career of a NORTH BRITON.

By IAN HAY.

"The book is, indeed, a triumph in its way, and should make good its author's title to rank among the first of living humorists."—Daily Telegraph.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS, EDINBURGH and LONDON.

The World of Books.

THURSDAY NIGHT.

IN spite of the large part which the novel has played in our literature during the last couple of hundred years, there have been very few attempts to deal at all adequately with the history of English prose fiction. One or two Americans have written upon the subject, but Professor Raleigh's book, "The English Novel," a little volume of less than three hundred pages, is the best that has yet appeared. We hear, however, that Professor Saintsbury has planned a big book upon English fiction to follow his "History of English Prosody," upon the third volume of which he is now engaged. Professor Saintsbury has some of the necessary qualities. Few men living have read so many books. He has a real love of literature, and the best of his life has been given up to its pursuit. On the other hand, he is the worst possible judge of an author with whom he is not in sympathy, his style is bad, and he makes inexcusable mistakes in matters of detail. To take only three writers of very different types, Oscar Wilde, the late Professor Churton Collins, and Mr. J. M. Robertson, have each drawn up and published lists of glaring mistakes made by the Professor.

* * *

THE biography of Sheridan, upon which Mr. Walter Sichel is at present working, will not be ready for some time, but we have reason to believe that it will contain a great deal of fresh and interesting matter. Mr. Sichel has unearthed a number of unpublished documents, including several new manuscript corrections of the plays, in Sheridan's handwriting, and a fragment of a diary by the famous Georgiana, Duchess of Devonshire. We have already plenty of biographies of Sheridan, Moore's and Mr. Fraser Rae's being among the best, while Mrs. Oliphant's in the "English Men of Letters" series is perhaps the worst, but none of them do full justice to Sheridan's political career. One of the most gallant struggles against the united forces of public opinion, Court influence, and a hostile majority, ever seen in the House of Commons, was that carried on by him together with Fox and Erskine in the years following the French Revolution.

* * *

ANTHOLOGIES seem to be in great favor among the publishers just now, for during the past couple of months they have been appearing at the rate of rather more than three a week. When Palgrave's "Golden Treasury" won the hearts of all lovers of poetry in 1861, it was "incomparable" in the same sense as the English "Book of Common Prayer," for there were hardly any other anthologies with which to compare it. Since then they have come in abundance, though "The Golden Treasury" still holds pride of place, its only dangerous rival being Mr. Quiller Couch's "Oxford Book of English Verse." The latter volume contains 883 poems, as against 339 in the former, but the numerical advantage is balanced by the critical insight shown by Palgrave and Tennyson in choosing and grouping the lyrics in their collection.

* * *

IT goes without saying that the best anthology of the present season should be the work of Mr. E. V. Lucas. This has been the case the past three or four seasons, and there seems every likelihood that it will continue in the future. Mr. Lucas's versatility is amazing. He writes delightful stories for children; he is an engaging essayist; his novels, "Listener's Lure" in particular, have a pleasant flavor of primness, that reminds one a little of Jane Austen; he is, besides, an accomplished biographer, and he is one of our few humorists. Still, if we had to decide what Mr. Lucas's next book would be, we should plump for an anthology. Their very titles are alluring. What agreeable trains of thought are suggested by "The Open Road," "The Friendly Town," "The Gentlest Art," and "Her Infinite Variety"! Or what happier title could there be for a child's book than "Anne's Terrible Good-Nature"? "Her Infinite Variety: A Feminine Portrait Gallery" (Methuen) is as pleasant to dip into as any of its predecessors. To present portraits of women rather than poems addressed to women, is the guiding principle of the selection, and Mr. Lucas gives us many engaging miniatures, often culled from the most unexpected sources. Among prose writers, Carlyle, Emerson, Burke, Horace Walpole, and even Greville and Creevey are all drawn upon. We miss, however, Mrs. Gaskell, Charlotte Brontë, and George Eliot, while a still graver fault on the part of Mr. Lucas is the complete exclusion of Dickens, and, except for one extract from Boswell, of Dr. Johnson.

* * *

MR. ALFRED NOYES, who is responsible for the issue of two other anthologies, is also happy in his title. He went for it to Keats, and "The Magic Casement" (Chapman & Hall) is a well-chosen series of poems upon fairies and fairy lore. Drayton is, of course, well represented, and so is George Darley, a poet now too much forgotten, though there were surely fairies about his cradle. We hardly think, though, that either Mr. G. K. Chesterton's "Modern Elfland," or Mr. R. C. Lehmann's "The Elf-King's Victory" has the feeling of detachment from modern problems, or the gossamer lightness of touch that one expects in a collection of fairy poetry. Both are powerful poems, and Mr. Noyes defends their inclusion on the ground that the former is "something like a definite 'criticism of life,'" and the latter a "pungent but delightful satire upon such futilities as modern warfare." It seems to us that these are just the reasons why the two poems should not have found a place in the collection. On the other hand, Mr. Noyes was right in printing the four poems from his own pen that are included, as he is second only to Mr. W. B. Yeats among the modern poets of fairyland.

* * *

THE other book for which we have to thank Mr. Noyes is a new edition of Scott's "Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border," which is issued by Mr. Andrew Melrose, a fresh and promising addition to the number of London publishers. The aim of the edition is "to remove two serious obstacles which have hitherto interfered with the complete enjoyment of the book—first, the absurdly large mass of prefaces, appendices, 'advertisements,' footnotes, headnotes, and what-not, wherein Sir Walter Scott saw fit to bury the gems he had just discovered and collected. . . . The second obstacle to the complete efficiency of the book was the curious intermixture of a certain amount of thoroughly bad and paltry work, which blurred the effect of the great ballads and poems." Mr. Noyes passes judgment upon several of the masterpieces of the collection. He describes the opening of what Coleridge called "the grand old ballad of Sir Patrick Spens" as "perhaps the simplest and grandest in all heroic poetry," adding that "the openings of at least two of the world's immortal epics are less majestic than the two first lines (sic) of that rude and simple ballad:—

'The King sits in Dunfermline town,
Drinking the blude-red wine.'"

Mr. Noyes also praises the "Twa Corbies" as "one of the grimmest lyrics in any language, and all the more powerful for its brevity." Now that interest is once again being turned to our old ballad poetry, this edition of a famous book is likely to find many readers.

* * *

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

"Justice and Liberty." A Political Dialogue. By G. Lowes Dickinson. (Dent. 4s. 6d. net.)

"First and Last Things." By H. G. Wells. (Constable. 4s. 6d. net.)

"Romances of the French Revolution." By G. Lenôtre. (Heinemann. 2 vols. 20s. net.)

"Louis Napoleon and the Genesis of the Second Empire." By F. H. Cheetham. (Lane. 16s. net.)

"A Wandering Student in the Far East." By the Earl of Ronaldshay, M.P. (Blackwood. 2s vols. 21s. net.)

"A Literary History of Russia." By Professor A. Brückner. (Unwin. 12s. 6d. net.)

"Chapters on Spanish Literature." By James Fitzmaurice Kelly. (Constable. 7s. 6d. net.)

"The Greatness and Decline of Rome." Vol. IV. "Rome and Egypt." By Guglielmo Ferrero. (Heinemann. 6s. net.)

"Contemporary Ireland." By L. Paul Dubois. Translated by J. M. Kettle, M.P. (Maunsel. 7s. 6d. net.)

"A Georgian Pageant." By F. Frankfort Moore. (Hutchinson. 16s. net.)

"Blackstick Papers." By Lady Ritchie. (Smith Elder. 6s.)

"The Kiss, and Other Stories." By Anton Tchekoff. (Duckworth. 6s.)

"L'Evolution du Roman en Allemagne au XIXe Siècle." Par Léon Pineau. (Paris: Hachette. 3 fr. 50.)

MESSRS. BELL'S NEW BOOKS.

At all Booksellers and Libraries. 6s. each.

MR. W. H. MALLOCK'S NEW NOVEL.

AN IMMORTAL SOUL.

By W. H. MALLOCK.

Author of "A Human Document," "The Individualist," &c.

In his new novel Mr. Mallock deals with the strange problem of dual personality, and the subtle delineation of the character of his heroine, or, rather, heroines, and the clever pictures of a certain section of English society, go to make up a story of enthralling interest.

Mr. Well's Striking Romance

THE WAR IN THE AIR.

By H. G. WELLS.

With 16 Illustrations by A. C. MICHAEL.

MORNING POST.—". . . The most powerful of many books of prophetic forecasts that have recently attracted attention. It is a book that enthrals. It may move the greatest stimulus that has yet arisen in the direction of International Peace."

DAILY MAIL.—"A striking picture worked out with great power and imagination.....supremely interesting, whether read as a picture of what might happen or merely as an exciting story."

SCOTSMAN.—"A dazzling and bewildering romance."

Imperial 8vo, 25s. net. With 75 Plates and other Illustrations.

SHEFFIELD PLATE:

ITS HISTORY, MANUFACTURE, AND ART.

By HENRY NEWTON VEITCH.

The author of this volume is not only a collector of Sheffield Plate, but has also a thorough practical knowledge of the technical details of its manufacture. He has thus been able to write a full history of the material, both from an artistic and a technical point of view. The volume is uniform with Mr. Masse's well-known handbook to Pewter Plate.

COMPLETION of Mr. TEMPLE SCOTT'S Edition of SWIFT.

THE PROSE WORKS OF JONATHAN SWIFT.

Edited by TEMPLE SCOTT. With an Introduction by the Right Hon. W. E. H. LECKY, M.P. In 12 vols., with numerous Portraits and Facsimiles, 5s. each.

Now Ready, Vol. XII., completing the edition. Bibliography and Full Index, with Essays on the Portraits of Swift and Stella by the Right Hon. Sir Frederick Falkiner, K.C., and on the Relations between Swift and Stella by the Very Rev. J. H. Bernard, D.D., Dean of St. Patrick's. With two Portraits and a View of Woodpark.

Fcap. 8vo, 5s. net.

THE POEMS OF CATULLUS.

Edited, with Copious Explanatory Notes, by CHARLES STUTTAFORD.

A new edition of Catullus for the reader whose Latin has grown "rusty." It is, however, in no sense a school-book.

Crown 4to, 5s. net.

THE 'PINAFORE' PICTURE BOOK.

The Story of 'H.M.S. Pinafore' told by W.S. GILBERT

With 16 Illustrations in Colour, numerous Black-and-White Drawings, and Special Cover and End-papers by Alice B. WOODWARD.

Queen's Treasure Series.

Small crown 8vo, with 8 Coloured Plates and Decorated Title-page, Cover, and End-papers, 2s. 6d. net each.

FIRST LIST OF VOLUMES.

COUSIN PHILLIS.

By Mrs. GASKELL. Illustrated by Miss M. V. WHEELHOUSE. With an Introduction by THOMAS SECCOMBE.

SIX TO SIXTEEN.

By Mrs. EWING. Illustrated by Miss M. V. WHEELHOUSE.

A FLAT-IRON for a FARTHING.

By Mrs. EWING. Illustrated by Miss M. V. WHEELHOUSE.

London: GEORGE BELL & ONS,
York House, Portugal Street, W.C.

MR. MURRAY'S NEW BOOKS.

BALDASSARE CASTIGLIONE.

The Perfect Courtier, His Life and Letters, by JULIA CARTWRIGHT (Mrs. Ady), Author of "Isabella D'Este." With numerous Portraits and other Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 2 vols. 30s. net.

"Mrs. Ady's volumes are not only of interest for their portrait of a great and good man, they delight the fancy no less for their broad and brightly coloured panorama of the whole movement of the Renaissance. One after another the great figures of the age pass across the stage—Popes and prelates, princesses and dukes, poets and artists—and to each figure as it passes is given some little touch of colour which creates a sphere of infinite and dazzling variety. It is a wonderful world, in which individualism was stretching out its hands to the dawn, and the pulses of the South were beating with a sense of dreams unrealised."—Daily Telegraph.

A STUDY OF SOME OF THE LEADING SOCIAL QUESTIONS OF THE DAY.

COLLECTIVISM.

By PAUL LEROY-BEAULIEU. Abridged and Translated by Sir ARTHUR CLAY, Bart. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

"It is a searching exposure of the shallowness and the sophistry of the leading Socialistic writers of our time, and could it only be plainly made known to the crowds who unthinkingly believe and applaud the Socialistic agitators in our streets it would serve a still more useful purpose. . . . Many difficulties which the Socialists have not detected are explained with much force and lucidity in M. Beaulieu's book, which it is to be hoped will be carefully read by all who have it in their power to influence the working classes of this country."—Yorkshire Post.

THE INNER LIFE OF THE UNITED STATES.

By Monsignor Count VAY DE VAYA AND LUSKOD, Author of "Empires and Emperors." Demy 8vo. 12s. net.

"An exhaustive study of national qualities and characteristics and represents 'the harvest of a quiet eye' intent on studying motive forces rather than their products . . . undoubtedly an authoritative contribution to our knowledge of the United States of to-day."—Sunday Times.

FROM RUWENZORI TO THE CONGO.

A Naturalist's Journey Across Africa. By A. F. R. WOLLASTON. With Maps and numerous Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 15s. net.

"An excellent specimen of how works of travel should be written. . . . Mr. Wollaston is full of the delight and romance of strange sights. He never bores the reader because he is never bored himself. Lightly and humorously he discourses of his hardships, joyfully and copiously he expounds the delights."—The Spectator.

NOW COMPLETE. VOL. IV. READY NEXT WEEK.

STORIA DO MOGOR.

Or, Mogul India (1653-1708). By NICCOLAO MANUCCI, Venetian. Translated, with Notes and Introduction, by WILLIAM IRVINE, late of the Bengal Civil Service; Member of Council, Royal Asiatic Society. With 61 Illustrations and a Map, medium 8vo., 4 vols. 12s. net each.

Edited under the supervision of the Royal Asiatic Society.

"The book is full of good stories and keen-sighted observation of character and manners. As a picture of Mogul life in the 17th century, not only at Court, but in camp and in the bazaars, it is unique. . . . We should add that the volumes are illustrated by reproductions of the original Indian portraits, which were specially painted for Manucci by an official in the household of Shah 'Alam.' Their authenticity seems incontrovertible—they are an interesting addition to an extremely valuable work."—The Times Literary Supplement.

THE COMMERCIAL PRODUCTS OF INDIA.

Being an Abridgement of "The Dictionary of the Economic Products of India." By Sir GEORGE WATT, C.I.E., M.B., LL.D. Medium 8vo. 16s. net.

"A work of comprehensive and well-digested information, lavishly supplied with references to the further literature of the many topics which itself does so much to enlighten, the book has a substantial importance which makes it well worthy of its official character ,and is indispensable to everyone who needs to be exactly informed as to the existing natural resources of the Indian Empire."—Scotsman.

PEARLS AND PARASITES.

ESSAYS ON SCIENTIFIC SUBJECTS.

By A. E. SHIPLEY, M.A., Hon. D.Sc. (Princeton), F.R.S. With Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

"There is a rapidly-growing class who, though they have no practical experience of scientific work, do take an intelligent interest in its problems. To such people we would recommend Mr. Shipley's Volume of Essays. There they will find set out in lucid English the story of the great campaign against malaria, and they will be enabled to form some estimate of the debt owed by the world to men like Major Ross. They will find, too, an account of the life of Pasteur. The essays show remarkable literary ability and a point of view which is certainly not the somewhat narrow one of the traditional man of science."—Morning Post.

Just out, a new Novel by the Author of "The Hill," "Brothers," &c.

THE WATERS OF JORDAN.

By HORACE ANNESLEY VACHELL. 6s.

". . . The best that Mr. Vachell has given us."—Black and White.

"The book marks a step forward in the author's progress. His style is more mature, his satire more keen, and his scenes and characters are clearer and stronger. The portraits of the criminally negligent landowner and his early Victorian sisters are especially vivid. The heroine, too, is a fine creation, and we feel all through that we are living with real people."—Daily Chronicle.

"Once again Mr. Vachell has given his admirers cause for joy. Let it be said at once that his latest work is in many respects his best. . . . A thoroughly wholesome piece of work, marked by many flashes of humour, and a good blending of sound philosophy."—Birmingham Post.

SHORT NOVELS BY GREAT WRITERS.

EACH 2s. 6d. NET.

1. VIOLET JACOB.
   Author of "The Sheepstealers," entitled IRRESOLUTE CATHERINE.
   "Capitally written, and the story breezily told. It is as healthy and refreshing as a summer gale."—Pall Mall Gazette.
   "An admirable example of the Shorter novel."—Birmingham Post.
2. MARY CHOLMONDELEY.
   Author of "Moth and Rust," entitled THE LOWEST RUNG.
   The Times says:—"Better worth a place on the bookshelves of series readers than many a longer and more pretentious piece of fiction."
3. F. F. MONTRÉSOR.
   Author of "The Burning Torch," entitled A FISH OUT OF WATER.
4. GERTRUDE ATHERTON.
   Author of "Rezánov," "Ancestors," entitled THE GORGEOUS ISLE.
5. STORER CLOUSTON.
   Author of "Count Bunker," entitled A COUNTY FAMILY.

JOHN MURRAY, Albemarle Street, W.

Reviews.

LORD PANMURE'S PREDECESSOR.*

It is a curious coincidence, which can hardly have been designed, that the appearance of this book should immediately follow the publication of the "Panmure Papers." The first Duke of Newcastle was the famous boroughmonger and Parliamentary manager of the eighteenth century. Mr. Martineau merely mentions that he was "for several years Prime Minister," which is saying either too much or too little. His brother Henry was Prime Minister before him, and not merely an "influential member of the Cabinet," as Mr. Martineau seems to suppose. The subject of this Memoir, however, belonged to a different branch of the family, and was certainly a man of very different character. Although Mr. Martineau has been assisted in his task by numerous letters from the fifth Duke of Newcastle himself, and from Lord Raglan, he does not profess to write with the present Duke's authority or approval, and his estimate of Newcastle's career is conspicuously free from what Macaulay described as the furor biographicus, or lues Boswelliana. The book is almost as much a Life of Lord Raglan as of the Duke, and in the account of the Crimean campaign the views of Kinglake predominate.

If it had not been for the Russian War of 1854, the Duke of Newcastle would have passed through public life as an ordinary specimen of aristocratic officialdom, courteous, laborious, and patriotic, but by no means particularly able. When he was still Earl of Lincoln, he sat in the Cabinet of Sir Robert Peel and became a Free Trader with his chief. Like Gladstone, and unlike Sir Robert, he was a decidedly High Churchman, notwithstanding which he obtained by Act of Parliament, then the only available method, a divorce from his wife. He did not, however, marry again, and his own personal character was absolutely irreproachable. A dignified sadness is the impression conveyed by his portrait, and seems to have marked him through life. He had one quality, the quality of fussiness, in common with the first Duke, and his correspondence with Lord Raglan shows that he could not allow the Commander of an expedition to settle details for himself. Lord Lincoln's devotion to Peel was perfect, and twice he saved his leader from a serious mistake. He not merely refused to be the bearer of a challenge from Peel to Lord George Bentinck in 1846, but even, so Mr. Martineau assures us, threatened to inform the police, and so stopped the possibility of a duel. "On another occasion," as Mr. Martineau vaguely says, it was Lord Lincoln who dissuaded Peel from reading in the House of Commons Disraeli's application for office. But Mr. Martineau is not always accurate about Sir Robert Peel. He says, for instance, that Peel "announced his intention never to take office again." If Mr. Martineau had consulted the authoritative "Peel Papers" he would have found that Peel told Cardwell he had never made such a statement. If the alternative had been a Protectionist Government, there can be little doubt that he would have accepted office. Mr. Martineau is almost triumphant over Lord Lincoln's loss of his seat for South Nottinghamshire in 1846, and suggests that he should have followed the example of Mr. Gladstone, who refused to contest Newark as Colonial Secretary against the Duke of Newcastle's wishes. Most people will probably think that a Cabinet Minister, to say nothing of a man, has a right to his own opinion, and that Mr. Gladstone showed an exaggerated deference to the old Duke, though the circumstances of the two constituencies were entirely dissimilar, Newark being to some extent a nomination borough. It is, however, a remarkable fact that the Duke of Newcastle only claimed one of the two seats, and a still stranger anomaly that, while Gladstone gave up one because he was a Free Trader, Lord John Manners surrendered the other because he was a Protectionist. Mr. Gladstone, as everyone knows, was returned for the University of Oxford at the General Election of 1847. Lord Lincoln did not remain so long out of Parliament, and speedily secured a seat for the Falkirk Burghs. There can be little doubt that every tenant of the Duke's who voted for Gladstone in 1845 would have been turned out of his house on the principle that his Grace, in his famous words, might "do what he liked with his own." It is surprising that Lord Lincoln, in Nottinghamshire, should have scored as many as a thousand votes.

Newcastle will, of course, always be remembered by his unfortunate connection with the Crimean War. For the policy which led to that conflict he had, indeed, no more responsibility than any other member of the Cabinet. But on the outbreak of hostilities his position changed. He had been appointed, in 1852, Secretary of State for War and the Colonies, a combination which had subsisted since the time of Pitt. In 1854 the offices were divided, and Newcastle became Secretary of State for War, though Sidney Herbert remained Secretary at War, with a seat in the Cabinet and control over military finance. Thus the Duke had entire responsibility, while the authority which he exercised was only partial. Mr. Martineau says that he "could overrule everybody and everything." But this is very loose. To begin with, and to say nothing about finance, the independent power of the Commander-in-Chief and the Horse Guards did not cease till 1870. If, as Mr. Martineau says, the Duke was responsible for the selection of Lord Lucan as a General of Division and of Lord Cardigan as his subordinate Brigadier, in spite of Lord Raglan's protest and warning, his perversity was grave indeed. But if, as he also asserts, Lord Hardinge insisted on the appointments, it may be doubted whether Newcastle could have prevented them without tendering his own resignation to the Queen.

Mr. Martineau never will admit that there can be another side to a question upon which he has made up his mind. There is, of course, a case for the Crimean war, and it has often been stated. But there is also a case against it, which cannot be refuted by sneers at the "peace-at-any-price clique." The contemporary opponents of the war, including Lord Grey, Charles Greville, and John Wilson Croker, besides Bright and Cobden, were not drawn from one set, class, or even party. The Emperor Nicholas was anxious to settle the Eastern question in alliance with England, and the late Lord Salisbury, looking back on the whole situation forty years afterwards, pronounced that "we put our money on the wrong horse." It is not a self-evident proposition that the claims of Russia to protect Christian subjects of Turkey were in the middle of the last century injurious to British interests, or fatal to the balance of power. Nor is it by any means certain that Russia would have been able to impose her own conditions upon Turkey, even if Turkey had not been assisted by England and France. These are matters of argument, not to be settled offhand by a few phrases, and in the biography of a statesman responsible for the declaration of 1854 they deserve the fullness of fair inquiry. What, for instance, would France, or, rather, what would Louis Napoleon, have done if the Government of this country had declined to meddle between the Sultan and the Czar? If he had sided with Turkey the result of the war would have been the same, and England would have been spared immense losses of money, together with thousands of lives more precious than gold. It is not difficult to plead that the liberties of Europe were enlarged by the defeat of Russia. But it is not possible to deny that those for whom Russia ostensibly fought were suffering worse oppression than any other people on the Continent. Lord Aberdeen saw one side of the question, Cavour saw the other. The Palmerstonian idea that Russia must be prevented from bullying Turkey ignored most of the material facts, especially the circumstance that the prime mover in 1853 was not Russia, nor Turkey, but France. To lose sight of that central truth is to misread history altogether. If the Protectorate of the Holy Places at Jerusalem had been left in Russian hands, Prince Menschikoff would not have been sent to Constantinople, and the Danubian Principalities would not have been invaded. Mr. Martineau's complacent theory that Lord Aberdeen and his colleagues found, when they took office, that Russia was engaged in a course of aggression which England, either alone or in combination with other Powers, was called upon to check, is mere fancy. The centre of disturbance was neither Petersburg nor Constantinople, but Paris. An ultimatum to the French Emperor would have been quite as logical as a defiance to the Russian Czar. The Duke of Newcastle deserves no blame for not seeing further than his contemporaries. But Mr.

* "The Life of Henry Pelham, Fifth Duke of Newcastle." By John Martineau, of Trinity Hall, Cambridge. Author of the "Life of Sir Bartle Frere." Murray. 12s. net.

ENGLISH REVIEW

MONTHLY HALF-CROWN NET

TO BE PUBLISHED NOVEMBER 25

CONTENTS.

No. 1. Vol. 1.

A Sunday Morning Tragedy — THOMAS HARDY
The Jolly Corner — HENRY JAMES
Some Reminiscences I. — JOSEPH CONRAD
A Fisher of Men — JOHN GALSWORTHY
Stonehenge — W. H. HUDSON
The Raid — COUNT TOLSTOI

AND

H. G. WELLS' NEW NOVEL, "TONO-BUNGAY"

(To be completed in the first four numbers.)

EDITORIAL: The Functions of the Arts in the Republic (I) Literature, Communications from Two Authors; MR. JAMES' Complete Edition.

POLITICAL AND DIPLOMATIC: The Unemployed (I) R. C. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM on "Aspects of the Social Question;" (II) W. H. DAVIS on "How it feels to be Unemployed;" (III) A. M. "Complete actuarial scheme for Insuring John Doe against all the Vicissitudes of Life;" A.D. on "Personal characteristics of the German Emperor.

REVIEWS: "L'Ile des Pinguoins" par ANATOLE FRANCE, reviewed by JOSEPH CONRAD; "The Age of Shakespeare" by ALGERNON CHARLES SWINBURNE, reviewed by DR. LEVIN SCHÜCKING, of Göttingen University.

SUBSCRIPTION FORM.

Please enter my name as a subscriber for the First Volume (Four Numbers, price 2s. 6d. each) of the ENGLISH REVIEW, dating from November 25, first issue.

....

....

Name of Bookseller.....

Date ....

N 020

DUCKWORTH & CO., HENRIETTA ST., W.C.

FROM

J. M. DENT & CO.'S LIST.

Important Works on Painting.

A NEW HISTORY OF PAINTING IN ITALY.

By J. A. CROWE and G. B. CAVALCASELLE. Edited and Supplemented with Notes by EDWARD HUTTON. At least 300 Reproductions of Pictures, 3 vols., demy 8vo., £3 net per set.

Vol. I., Now Ready. Vol. II., Spring, 1909. Vol. III., September, 1909.

JACOB JORDAENS: His Life and Work.

By MAX ROOSES. Translated from the Dutch by Miss ELIZABETH C. BROERS. Many very fine reproductions in Photogravure of this great contemporary of Rubens. One volume Imperial 8vo., £2 2s. net.

This is the first time the work of this painter of the Flemish School has been reproduced.

OLD MASTERS.

Examples of their work reproduced in colour, with notes on the Pictures and the Painters. 2 vols. Royal 4to. (13 by 10½ in.), 21s. net.

Each volume contains 50 coloured reproductions of works by various old masters from most of the important Art Galleries of Europe.

A New Napoleon Book.

MEMOIRS OF THE COMTE DE RAMBUTEAU.

Many beautiful Photogravures made specially in France, medium 8vo., 15s. net. Rambuteau was Napoleon's Chamberlain, and his memoirs give an animated account of the doings of the Imperial Court, both by way of informal amusement and public entertainment.

THE MYSTICAL ELEMENT OF RELIGION.

Studies in the lives of St. Catherine of Genoa and her Friends. By Baron F. von HÜGEL. Photogravure Portraits. 2 vols., demy 8vo., 21s. net.

ST. CATHERINE OF SIENA.

A Study of Italian History of the XIV. Century. By EDMUND G. GARDNER. With an Appendix containing some hitherto unpublished Letters of St. Catherine, and Illustrations reproduced in Photogravure. Square Demy 8vo., 16s. net.

OLD WORLD TRAVEL.

A new and attractive Series of Travel Books. Illustrated in colour. Square medium 8vo., 7s. 6d. net each.

The author and artist in all cases make special tours over the whole of the ground. Each volume will contain some twenty-five coloured illustrations and many line drawings in the text.

The First Two Volumes.

ALONG THE RIVIERAS OF FRANCE AND ITALY. Written and Illustrated in Colour and Line by GORDON HOME.

VENETIA AND NORTHERN ITALY By CECIL HEADLAM. Written and Illustrated in Colour and Line by GORDON HOME.

ATTIC AND ELIZABETHAN TRAGEDY.

By LAUCHLAN MACLEAN WATT, Author of "In Love's Garden," "The Grey Mother." Large post 8vo., 7s. 6d. net.

This Volume sets forth in a popular way the origins of Tragic Drama in the great poetic ages of Greece and England.

ENGLISH IDYLLS.

Each with 24 Illustrations in Colour by C. E. BROCK. Cloth, 5s. net; vellum, 8s. 6d. net each.

Two New Volumes.

SENSE AND SENSIBILITY. By JANE AUSTEN.

MANSFIELD PARK. By JANE AUSTEN.

INTERNATIONAL PROBLEMS AND HAGUE CONFERENCES.

By T. J. LAWRENCE, M.A., LL.D. Crown 8vo., 3s. 6d. net.

An account of the Hague Conferences, considered as important points in the evolution of National Society, with the secondary object of providing sound information on the subject in a permanent form.

Prospectuses of above Books on application.

J. M. DENT & CO.,
19, Aldine House, Bedford Street, London, W.C.

Martineau, who has the advantage of knowing the event, might have given a wider estimate of causes and consequences than this volume affords.

Mr. Martineau, with engaging candour, observes that for the Duke's life after between 1855 and 1859 there are "no materials." In Lord Palmerston's second Government the Duke of Newcastle was again Secretary of State for the Colonies till his fatal illness in 1864. He was the first Colonial Secretary to visit a British Colony during his term of office, and accompanied the present King, then Prince of Wales, to Canada in 1860. The most interesting document in this part of Mr. Martineau's book is the letter in which the Duke authorises, and, indeed, requests, Mr. Kinglake to publish his private correspondence with Lord Raglan. This letter certainly suggests, if it does not imply, that the historian had freely consulted the Minister in compiling the early part of his narrative.

IRVING.*

CURIOUS that we cannot get a real and complete "Life" of Irving! Mr. Percy Fitzgerald, an old and intimate friend, patronises and belittles him. In Mr. Bram Stoker's book Mr. Stoker himself bounces up and down the stage so incessantly that poor Irving is driven into the wings. And to-day comes Mr. Austin Brereton, with an earnest, affectionate, and mainly unsuccessful biography of the official sort.

As an account of Irving's doings in public, the work is, in a hundred respects, excellent. His career on the stage is traced minutely and with absolute fidelity; the early struggles in the provinces are better told, we think, than in any other book. We may scan the prodigious and quite extraordinary list of all the plays that Irving acted in. We are given the plentiful opinions of critics—English, American, and French—on his style of acting. We have "verbatim reports" of many of his speeches. We learn what it cost to produce the pieces that made him famous, and what he earned by them. We miss no detail of the royal, academic, and civic honors that were bestowed on him.

The greater part of this is interesting to all who are interested in Irving. The scissors have, indeed, been rather overworked; but those of us who remember Irving in his heyday will not be sorry to catch another echo of the pæans of his champions and the cries of his critics. If, however, we have little complaint on the score of what Mr. Brereton has revealed or restored to us, we have much on the score of what he has withheld from us. "No man," wrote Mr. H. B. Irving the other day, in the preface to Mr. Pollock's "Impressions,"

> "was ever more loved and regarded by a few good and tried friends than my father. It is well that those of them who will should tell us something of Henry Irving."

Mr. Brereton, unfortunately, is one of them who won't! In the small book he published a few weeks after Irving's death there were a few intimate and charming touches. He tells us there how he drove with Irving on a July evening through the glades of Richmond Park. Irving

> "was very meditative on the way; and in Richmond Park we alighted—not, as on former occasions, to take a stroll, but to sit down and look at the glory of the deep red sunset, which brought about in him a deep feeling of repose. He ate and drank but little at dinner, and then, from sheer exhaustion [it was but a few months before his death], lay down on the sofa in our private dining-room and fell asleep. At this moment I can hear the ticking of the clock as I sat quietly smoking until I felt that he should make the effort to return home."

Now, in the second of the two volumes before us, we see Mr. Brereton on his way to Glasgow to visit Irving, who had been lying wretchedly ill in his hotel.

> "It was with a joyful heart that I set out from London. . . . and never shall I forget our meeting on that night. But these intimate details, and all that passed between us during the next five days, may not have a place save in my memory."

The second of the sentences quoted is, in a measure, characteristic of the whole biography. Not in this way should the life of such a man as Henry Irving be written; the time has come when some at least of "these intimate details" should be shared with the Irvingites who remain. The Irving to whom Mr. Brereton introduces us is essentially the Irving already known to those English and American playgoers who paid over two millions to see him act. This Irving, the fashionable histrion of his day, rose from obscurity to splendour, focussed upon the theatre the gaze of hemispheres, had losses and bore them bravely, died at sixty-seven a strolling player, and was buried a monarch in Westminster Abbey. We could all have said that—and Mr. Brereton says little more. The Irving who was magnetic when the play had been played, who fascinated in the street the fascinated pittite of the night before, who at a king's garden party or a duke's costume ball or a laureate's funeral was the one conspicuous figure in the crowd, and whose personality was a puzzle to his friends—this unexplained Irving, is in these eight hundred fond, industrious pages, scarcely so much as seen!

We pass to the briefest note on his career, and observe at the outset that he is a model of sagacious and intense concentration on what seems to have been his sole object of ambition—success in the calling he had a passion for. "But in what way do you really amuse yourself?" an American reporter asked him. "I act," said Irving. Ten years he spent in the provinces, from 1856 to 1866. The principal things to recall of this period are that he played, as far as we can gather, more than five hundred parts (Garrick, from first to last, played but ninety-three), and was often hungry. "I wonder," he once said, surveying his limbs in his dressing-room at the Lyceum, "whether one ever quite gets over the effects of starvation?" He was at the top of his renown when he said this; and if, in saying it, he had thrown another glance of memory at some of the stage parts of his hunger days, he must have felt a second twinge. What a dreary, what a sorry list, what a light it throws on some later choices of his art! For a taste: Lord Welford in the "Artist's Wife"; Edmund Earlybird in the "Birthplace of Podgers;" Albert in the "Bottle Imp"; Mr. Henry Higgins in "Boots at the Swan"; Nat Nowlan in "Charming Polly"; Mr. Peregrine Pyefinch in "An Hour at Seville"; Adolphus Jobling in "Daddy Hardacre"; Flipper in "Number One Round the Corner"; an Ogre in "Puss in Boots": hundreds and hundreds of such parts; and they say that he was always perfect in them. We may even see him pirouetting in ballets, forcing a song in burlesque, and frizzling on a gridiron as the wicked fairy in pantomime. From this he passed, in the course of years, to receive princes and ambassadors at supper on his Lyceum stage. He had well won his release from purgatory; and it might have been said of him as it was of Garrick: "Damn him! he could act a gridiron."

For some years after he came (for the second time) to London, Irving was still battling for his hand. Now and again he was seen by a person of genius, who recognised in him the power to come. He had been praised by Dickens. George Eliot and Lewes witnessed his performance in "Hunted Down." "What do you think of him?" asked the lady. "In twenty years," replied Lewes, "he will be at the head of the English stage." "He is there, I think, already," said George Eliot.

On the occasion of his benefit at the Vaudeville, in 1871, Irving recited "The Dream of Eugene Aram." "Colonel" Bateman, of the Lyceum (this story we take from Mr. Fitzgerald), rushed from the theatre to his home, and exclaimed: "I have found the greatest actor of this century!" The "Cunnle" was quite right. On the night of the 21st of November of the same year Irving played Mathias in "The Bells" at the Lyceum, and from that hour the town was at his feet. Irving's Mathias, during the years of his prime, was the most astonishing tour de force ever beheld upon the stage.

But with triumph came not peace. No popular idol was ever more cruelly assailed, more keenly and at times more honestly criticised. No great actor has ever been everybody's actor. Let us be just, and remember that Irving's earlier style abounded in faults. He mouthed and ranted; he strutted and halted; he did queer things with his eyebrows; he lacked repose, spontaneity, large-

* "The Life of Henry Irving." By Austin Brereton. Longmans. Two Vols. 25s. net.

IMPORTANT BOOKS OF THE WEEK

A FRANK STATEMENT OF THE PERSONAL RELIGION OF ONE OF OUR FOREMOST WRITERS.

First and Last Things: A Confession of Faith and Rule of Life

By H. G. WELLS. Author of "New Worlds for Old." 4s. 6d. net.

EVERY READER HAS FELT THE NEED OF SOME RELIABLE GUIDE THROUGH THE MAZE OF CURRENT POLITICS. IT WILL BE FOUND IN

Human Nature in Politics

By GRAHAM WALLAS. Crown 8vo., 6s.

The problems discussed in this volume are those meditated by all who read the newspapers in moments of lucidity and emancipation from party blindness. It is an introduction to the serious study of political activities, whether local, national, or international, of the present day.

The WORKS of GEORGE MEREDITH

18 vols. Crown 8vo., 6s. Pocket Edition, cloth, 2s. 6d. net; leather, 3s. 6d. net.

The Ordeal of Richard Feverel
Beauchamp's Career
Sandra Belloni
Vittoria
The Egoist
Evan Harrington
One of our Conquerors
Lord Ormont and his Aminta
The Amazing Marriage
Diana of the Crossways
The Adventures of Harry Richmond
Rhoda Fleming
The Shaving of Shagpat
The Tragic Comedians
Short Stories
Poems, Vol. I.
Poems, Vol. II.
An Essay on Comedy

BOOKS by BERNARD SHAW

DRAMATIC WORKS

PLAYS, PLEASANT AND UNPLEASANT. 2 vols. 6s. each. Sold separately.
UNPLEASANT: Widowers' Houses; The Philanderer; Mrs. Warren's Profession.
PLEASANT: Arms and the Man; Candida; The Man of Destiny; You Never Can Tell.

THREE PLAYS FOR PURITANS. 1 vol. 6s. PREFACE: Why for Puritans? On Diabolonian Ethics. Better than Shakespeare?
THE DEVIL'S DISCIPLE.
CÆSAR AND CLEOPATRA.
CAPTAIN BRASSBOUND'S CONVERSION.

* MAN AND SUPERMAN. A COMEDY AND A PHILOSOPHY. 6s. In Four Acts. The Revolutionist's Handbook. Maxims for Revolutionists.

JOHN BULL'S OTHER ISLAND and MAJOR BARBARA. 1 vol. 6s. Preface for Politicians. Home Rule in Ireland and Egypt.
*JOHN BULL'S OTHER ISLAND.
*HOW HE LIED TO HER HUSBAND.
Preface to Major Barbara. First Aid to Critics. The Salvation Army. Christianity and Anarchism.
*MAJOR BARBARA.

NOVELS OF MY NONAGE

THE IRRATIONAL KNOT (1880). Reprinted with a Preface in 1905. 6s.

CASHEL BYRON'S PROFESSION (1882), with the dramatic version in the Elizabethan style, entitled THE ADMIRAL BASHVILLE OR CONSTANCY UNREWARDED, and a Note on Modern Prize Fighting. 6s.

ESSAYS

THE PERFECT WAGNERITE (1898). Second Edition, 1903. Reprinted 1906. 3s. 6d. net.

DRAMATIC OPINIONS AND ESSAYS Originally contributed to "The Saturday Review" in 1895-98. Selected by JAMES HUNEKER, with a preface by him. 2 vols. 10s. 6d. net.

Separate Editions of the Plays, paper wrappers, 1s. 6d. net; Cloth, 2s. net except those marked *

ASK FOR DESCRIPTIVE LISTS

ARCHIBALD CONSTABLE & CO. LTD.

10 ORANGE STREET LONDON W.C.

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS.

COMPLETION OF VOL. VI.

THE OXFORD ENGLISH DICTIONARY.

Edited by Sir JAMES MURRAY. Vol. VI. (L—N), half-morocco, £3 5s.; or in half volumes, straight-grained persian, L, £1 7s. 6d.; M—N, £2 2s. 6d. By Dr. BRADLEY and Dr. CRAIGIE.

Already published:—A—O, P—PREMIOUS, P—R—RIBALDOUSLY. The next issue (January 1) will be a further portion of P, by Sir JAMES MURRAY.

Times.—"A work which has been universally recognised by scholars as the first dictionary which has ever attempted to treat the English language with anything approaching to scientific completeness. . . . Incomparably superior to any other work of the kind in the English language."

CHINESE PORCELAIN.

Sixteenth-Century Coloured Illustrations, with Chinese MS. Text. By HSIANG YUAN-P'IEN. Translated and Annotated by S. W. BUSHELL, C.M.G. With 83 plates in colour by W. GRIGGS, with corresponding Chinese text reproduced in facsimile, and accompanied by translation, notes, and introduction on folded sheets of Oxford India paper, bound in the Chinese manner in dark blue silk. Royal 4to, in a box, £5 5s. net.

TUDOR AND STUART LIBRARY.

Linen rag paper, printed with the types given to the University by Dr. FELL, 1660. 5s. net each (with exceptions)

NEW VOLUMES.

SHAKESPEARE'S MERRY WIVES OF WINDSOR (the quarto of 1602).
With an Introduction by W. W. GREG.

TURBERVILLE'S NOBLE ARTE OF VENERIE OR HUNTING. (7s. 6d. net)

WILSON'S ARTE OF RHETORIQUE (1585).
Edited, with an Introduction, by G. H. MAIR.

OXFORD LIBRARY OF TRANSLATIONS.

Extra fcap 8vo, 3s. 6d. net per Volume.

NEW VOLUMES.

VIRGIL.
Translated by JOHN JACKSON. On Oxford India paper, 4s. 6d. net.

SAINT BERNARD ON CONSIDERATION.
Translated by GEORGE LEWIS. With Introduction and Notes.

THE MANAGEMENT OF PRIVATE AFFAIRS
By JOSEPH KING, F. T. R. BIGHAM, M. L. GWYER EDWIN CANNAM, J. S. C. BRIDGE, A. M. LATTER. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

THE COMEDIES OF TERENCE.

P. TERENTI AFRI COMOEDIAE.

Edited with Introduction and Notes, by Sidney G. Ashmore, L.H.D. Crown 8vo, Cloth, 6s.

OXFORD LIBRARY OF PROSE AND POETRY.

Uniform volumes, fcap. 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. net each; lambskin, thin boards, gilt extra, 3s. 6d. net each.

MRS. INCHBALD'S A SIMPLE STORY.
With Introduction by G. L. STRACHEY.

New Volumes ready immediately—

WAR SONGS.
Collected by CHRISTOPHER STONE. With Introduction by Lieut.-Gen. Sir IAN HAMILTON, K.C.B.

POEMS BY JOHN CLARE.
With Introduction by ARTHUR SYMONS.

GALT'S ANNALS OF THE PARISH.
Edited by G. S. GORDON.

ECHOES FROM THE OXFORD MAGAZINE (1883-1890).

SELECT POEMS OF WILLIAM BARNES.
Chosen and Edited, with a Preface of Glossarial Notes, by THOMAS HARDY.

COMPLETE CATALOGUE POST FREE ON APPLICATION.

London: HENRY FROWDE, Oxford University Press, Amen Corner, E.C.

ness of conception, ease and simplicity in execution. Always a nervous and very emotional player, he was long in bringing his forces under due control. Miss Terry, our readers may recollect, found him "stiff with self-consciousness." But, even in the old days, what qualities he had to set against his vices! Imagination was always there—imagination and sincerity. His power in the grotesque and the terrible can never have been surpassed. He had every kind of humor: the gay, the boisterous, the gentle, the sardonic. With years some of his faults fell from him. He moved more freely and easily, spoke finely, could stand motionless, and was consummate in gesture. The saint-like calm of his Becket (a part in which his elocution seemed flawless) was as exquisite as anything on the stage could be.

He was knighted. This distinction came in 1895, when Irving was fifty-seven. Mr. Brereton says of it:—

> "No other announcement in the list of Queen Victoria's birthday honours for that day appealed to the public so forcibly as this, and the manner in which the distinction was welcomed by the Press and all classes of people proved that Lord Rosebery had done one of the most popular and graceful acts of his administration. Mr. Gladstone spoke of the knighthood as 'a more than deserved honour,' and as having given him 'the liveliest satisfaction.'"

Buttermen are knighted, but the Universities do not open their doors to buttermen. In 1892 the degree of Doctor of Letters was conferred upon Henry Irving at Trinity College, Dublin. Cambridge made him a Doctor of Letters in 1898, and on the day that he received the degree he delivered the Rede Lecture in the Senate House of the University. Ruskin, Huxley, Matthew Arnold, and Max Müller were among those who had preceded him. In the following year, 1899, the University of Glasgow honored him signally, unprecedentedly: Hamlet became a Doctor of Laws.

Irving's social triumphs are an old story. On the proposal of the King (then Prince of Wales) he was "selected" a member of the Marlborough Club. The committee of the Athenæum chose him in like manner. He was more than once, we fancy, a speaker at the Academy banquet, and during five-and-twenty years society never ceased to clamour for him. He carried all with grace and a dignity void of affectation. Irving had a manner which never failed him; and—so often has it been described—posterity will almost be able to realise the smile on his mobile lips.

He could draw to him, and hold in some strange bond of affection, anyone whose aid he needed. From the Lyceum days to the end he was always finely and most loyally helped; and while on this topic let us say that we are especially glad of the tribute which Mr. Brereton pays to the late Louis Frederick Austin. "L.F.A.," a versatile and very highly gifted journalist, with a delicately witty style, was for many years Irving's confidential secretary, almoner, and literary right hand. Himself a first-rate speaker, he it was—though Mr. Brereton does not tell us this—who taught Irving how a speech should be made. It is known what a delightful speaker Irving became; it is not known—or it is known to few—how many of his happiest efforts were directly inspired by Austin. Mr. Brereton says that Irving brought "L.F.A." to London. Is this exact? It was in Austin's company that the writer of these lines first met Irving, at the Grafton Street chambers, and his impression is that Austin and Irving were brought together by the Baroness Burdett-Coutts. The friendship between them—this alone is of importance—knew neither break nor shadow, and the shock of Austin's sudden death at Brighton hastened the almost identical death of Irving, a month later, at Bradford.

Irving died, weary and spirit-worn, but dauntless to the last, tramping the second-rate towns of the provinces. As an actor his career was never quite finished: too much was declined; and the vital needs of the modern English stage were hardly canvassed by this splendid egotist, with his too fascinating personality, his over-mannered art, which displayed rather than concealed itself, and was limited by his physical disadvantages, his inadequate sense of the best in stage literature, and of what was due to it. But it would be a hard judgment that set him down as other than a great man.

ENGRAVING AND ETCHING.*

A VAST literature, vaster even than that which has gathered round painting and sculpture, belongs to the engraver's art. Within the last few years especially, the number of volumes on one or another phase of the subject has shown an astonishing increase; so that one is driven to wonder whether the supply is justified by the demand. Yet, even if the latter is not the case, there exist many reasons why engraving and etching should attract the attention of authors. Apart from all technical questions, the story of the art teems with romance. Its origin contains those elements of mystery which the half-scientific, half-imaginative mind of the present day delights to probe. Its development is bound up with that of the nations who developed it, and that in a fashion to which the growth of painting can hardly offer a parallel; for it is of all arts the most democratic, the most intimately associated with social evolution, the most true in its record of the popular life of the past. One can scarcely, for instance, imagine the eighteenth century in England without its prints. On the technical side, the manifold processes provide an everlasting field for inquiry, and there is hardly a more fascinating study than to trace the growth of one process out of another, to compare the methods of the modern worker with those of Durer and Marcantonio, or to connect so recent a discovery as the three-color process with the troubled efforts in the same direction of seventeenth-century Christopher Le Blon. The subject, therefore, is almost illimitable in its intellectual opportunities; and there is yet another reason why it should appeal to us so strongly at the present time. The purely artistic side was, during the last century, and still is, very much alive, particularly in regard to etching. In this country the arts generally have long since been passing through a period of decay, but if there is one branch in which virility is displayed, and a resuscitation foreshadowed, more than in another, it is etching. The best of our best artists seem to find in this medium the opportunities for expression which the condition of the picture market, so far as it concerns modern work, has discouraged elsewhere.

We have before us two new books on engraving and etching, by Messrs. A. M. Hind and Stanley Austin respectively, and each of them contributes something to the thoughts if not to the facts embodied in the mass of previous literature. There is no need to compare the two; Mr. Austin's work is so much more modest than the other in its intention, and so different in its treatment, that any comparison would be futile. As the more important volume, Mr. Hind's "Short History of Engraving and Etching" may be briefly considered in regard to the features that justify its appearance. To begin with its scope, it is a history of engraving and etching throughout the various centuries and schools; secondly it deals only with engraving on metal, thus excluding wood engraving; and thirdly, it is confined to the species of engraving from which impressions are taken. The last point is important, in that it limits the period of the existence of metal engraving very considerably by placing its beginnings somewhere in the fifteenth century, paper not having been procurable in sufficient quantities much before 1400; whereas the art of engraving for ornamentation must have been known and practised at least two thousand years previously. Even so, it is difficult to decide what artist or nationality was responsible for the invention of prints. Vasari's story of Maso Finiguerra and an Italian origin having been discounted by evidence that gives equal, if not greater, antiquity to the art in Germany and the Netherlands. In England, of course, engraving was, like painting, late in arriving, and—also like painting—was at first carried on by foreigners. A principal feature of Mr. Hind's book is that as much care has been lavished on the appendices as on the text itself. The Classified List of Engravers is a specially excellent addition. Then the Index includes over 2,500 names, to each of which is appended, in abbreviated form, the date, the locality, and, where possible, the individual bibliography of the artist mentioned. There is,

* "A Short History of Engraving and Etching." By A. M. Hind. With frontispiece in photogravure, and 110 illustrations in the text. Constable. 18s. net.

"The History of Engraving: From its Inception to the Time of Thomas Bewick." By Stanley Austin. Werner Laurie. 6s. net.

NOW READY.

A PRIMER OF SOCIALISM

BY

THOMAS KIRKUP,

Author of "A History of Socialism," etc.

CROWN OCTAVO. PRICE 1s. NET. CLOTH LIMP.

Post free 1s. 2d.

A. & C. BLACK, SOHO SQUARE, LONDON, W.

FROM . . .

Wells Gardner, Darton & Co.'s List.

BOOKS by the BISHOP OF LONDON.

THE LOVE OF THE TRINITY.

By the Right Rev. A. F. WINNINGTON INGRAM, D.D., Lord Bishop of London. Addresses given in the Central London Mission last Lent. This Volume contains the Questions asked of, and the Answers given by, the Bishop of London. Crown 8vo., cloth boards, on superior paper, 2s. 6d. A Cheap Edition, paper covers, 1s.

BY THE SAME AUTHOR.

THE CALL OF THE FATHER.

(The East London Mission.) Cloth, 2s. 6d.; paper, 1s.

A MISSION OF THE SPIRIT.

(The North London Mission.) Cloth, 2s. 6d.; paper, 1s.

A List of other Books by the BISHOP OF LONDON post free from WELLS GARDNER, DARTON and CO., Ltd.

THE PRAYER-BOOK: its History, Language, and Contents. By the Rev. EVAN DANIEL. Large crown 8vo., cloth, 6s.

21st EDITION. 700 pages.

"Crammed with solid information derived from every conceivable source. It is a work of great erudition, which, however, is reduced to such a digestible form that it can be assimilated even by young persons. The book deserves a high place in the literature relating to the Prayer-book."—Church Times (Second Notice).

SONG FLOWERS. From A Child's Garden of Verses." By ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON. Set to Music by the MARCHIONESS OF TULLIBARDINE. Introduction by S. R. CROCKETT. Illustrations by GORDON BROWNE, R.I. Demy 4to., cloth, 7s. 6d.

"Matchless poems for children. . . . The accompaniments are charmingly designed with plenty of variety and no affectation. The illustrations are exceedingly pretty, and are an additional attraction to one of the prettiest gift-books."—Times.

PERSONAL STUDIES. By the Rev. Canon SCOTT HOLLAND. Crown 8vo., cloth boards, 6s. [4th Edition.

"Fresh, brilliant, and pointed. . . . These studies are coloured with vivid personal touches which recall the voice and presence of the man with whom the writer is dealing."

—Westminster Gazette.

LONDON: WELLS GARDNER DARTON & CO., Ltd.,

3, PATERNOSTER BUILDINGS, E.C., & 44, VICTORIA STREET, S.W.

BOOKS WANTED, 25s. Each Offered.—Brewer's Henry VIII., 2 vols., 1884. Burke's Armoury and Extinct Peerage, 1883. Borrow's Wild Wales, 3 vols., 1862. Eliot's Scenes of Clerical Life, 1st edition, 2 vols., 1858. Jerrold's Men of Character, 3 vols., 1838. Alice in Wonderland, 1865 or 1866. Stevenson's Edinburgh, 1879. Desperate Remedies, 3 vols., 1871. Churchill's Poems, 3 vols., 1844. Symond's Italian Literature, 2 vols., 1881. Swinburne's Atalanta, white cloth, 1865. Lorna Doone, 3 vols., 1869. James's Painters and their Work, 3 vols. Gardiner's History of England, 2 vols., 1863. Jackson's Old Paris, 2 vols., 1878. Freer's Last Decade, 2 vols., 1863. 100,000 books for sale and wanted. Please state wants.—HOLLAND BROS., Book Merchants, 21, John Bright Street, Birmingham.

THE INDEX TO VOLUME III. OF THE NATION

Is NOW READY and can be had free on application to the Manager.

G. P. Putnam's Sons' List.

"HEROES OF THE NATIONS."—New Volume.

WILLIAM THE CONQUEROR AND THE RULE OF THE NORMANS.

By F. M. STENTON, M.A. Fully illustrated, crown 8vo, cloth extra, 5s.

 Send for Descriptive List of Previous Volumes.

THE NATURALISATION OF THE SUPERNATURAL.

By FRANK PODMORE. Crown 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

"A forcible criticism of the nature of the reasoning in those processes of psychical research."—The Nation.

ROMANCE OF THE ROMAN VILLAS.

By ELIZABETH W. CHAMPNEY, Author of "Romance of the Italian Villas," &c. 8vo, cloth extra, gilt top, 15s. net.

"In other volumes Miss Champney has given us delightful glimpses of the castles, abbeys, and villas of France and Italy, and here she writes in quite a fascinating way about the villas of the great Cardinals of the Renaissance."—Newcastle Chronicle.

MIRABEAU AND THE FRENCH REVOLUTION.

By FRED MORROW FLING, Ph.D. To be completed in Three Parts. Illustrated. Part I., "The Youth of Mirabeau." 8vo, cloth, 15s. net.

"Professor Fling has built his biography in the approved French style of boldness and decoration, making full use of all the best material, and it promises to be a book quite worthy of its subject."

—The Yorkshire Post.

THE NIAGARA RIVER.

By ARCHER BUTLER HULBERT, Author of "The Ohio River." 8vo, cloth extra, 15s. net.

A graphic story of that wonderful river whose scenes are as grand and as impressive as the world has to show. The volume contains many magnificent illustrations.

FLOWER OF THE DUSK.

By MYRTLE REED, Author of "The Spinner in the Sun," "Lavender and Old Lace," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 6s.

"The present story we hold to be in advance of anything she has before written."—Northern Whig.

THE TWENTIETH CENTURY AMERICAN.

Being a Comparative Study of the Peoples of the Two Great Anglo-Saxon Nations. By H. PERRY ROBINSON. Crown 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d.

"Probably a gentler, a fairer, and a better intended book on America has never before been written."—Daily Chronicle.

A PHYSICIAN TO THE SOUL.

By HORATIO W. DRESSER, Author of "A Book of Secrets," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

An important new work by the author of that remarkably successful book, "The Power of Silence." Some of Dr. Dresser's other books which have had a large sale are: "Living by the Spirit," "Voices of Freedom," "Philosophy of the Spirit," &c. A full list may be had on application.

THE LAST VOYAGE OF THE DONNA ISABEL.

A Romance of the Sea. By RANDALL PARRISH. With Illustrations in Full Colour by ALLEN T. TRUE. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 6s.

"A modern sea story packed with the excitement of adventure."

—Pall Mall Gazette.

A WOMAN AT BAY.

By SIBILLA ALERAMO. Authorised English Version. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 6s.

"Signora Aleramo knows how to enlist human sympathies in behalf of a wrong woman's right to freedom, and to support her view of the matter by eloquence."—Pall Mall Gazette.

THE SOVEREIGN GOOD.

By HELEN HUNTINGTON. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 6s.

"There are original and unexpected developments in the story, which is altogether a sound, careful, and humane piece of work."

—Birmingham Post.

JUDITH OF THE CUMBERLANDS.

By ALICE MacGOWAN. With Illustrations in Colour by GEORGE WRIGHT. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

"A story which is a masterpiece of its kind. It breathes the mountain air. . . . The interest is sustained through every chapter, and the reader, thrilled by the train of incidents, keeps wondering how it will all end. . . . It is a delightful story, charmingly told and skilfully conceived."—Aberdeen Free Press.

NEW ILLUSTRATED LIST NOW READY.

24, BEDFORD STREET, STRAND, LONDON and NEW YORK.

besides, a general bibliography. In the text the balance is nicely maintained between the technical and the historical sides of the matter, and if at times the construction resembles that of an encyclopædia or a dictionary of engravers and artists, the general tendencies in the development of the art are sincerely thought out and presented with a lucidity that compels praise; while from Dürer "solid, scientific, conscious in all his creating," through the great reproductive engravers called into being by Rubens and Van Dyck, through Rembrandt in etching, through the Tiepoli and Piranesi, and our own eighteenth-century mezzotinters, the advance to modernity makes a story of wholesale interest.

Mr. Austin's text is lighter, and possesses the qualities as well as the drawbacks of lightness. His range is wide. There is hardly a phase of engraving on wood or metal that he does not touch on; and, while line etching is outside his scope, he includes a chapter on the early British mezzotinters. His opening chapter on the "Fables or Romantic Origin" of engraving gives us the old stories of Papillon and others, together with some legitimate criticism of his own on their value; and a chapter on Block Books—with excellent illustrations—touches a section of the subject that is less familiar than most. Necessarily, there are many gaps and, in places, signs of hasty judgment, the discriminating faculty appearing to us to be wanting in the chapter on the British Mezzotinters. But, on the whole, there is little room for fault-finding, and the volume may be read as a profitable corollary to the other.

THE CHRIST OF TORO.*

It is not always in what is definitely shown that a piece of literature captures us, but in what it suggests of life or nature behind the telling. Thus a flying sketch is often far more potent in its suggestiveness than a finished study. In Mrs. Cunninghame Graham's "The Christ of Toro and Other Stories," what holds our attention is not the stories, most of which are strongly conceived and picturesquely told, but a certain poetic sensitiveness of mood, which is haunted by life's unfathomableness, its infinite ocean of forces and permutations. Without any special originality of style or gift of presentation, she contrives none the less to convey in a remarkable manner a sense of that shadowy background of nature into which everything fades and is dissolved, after its earthly span. This sense of the mutability of life, of its being a great whole, inexorable, capricious, fantastic in its decrees of human fate, is what pervades the author's secret thought, and colors spiritually all her descriptions. We find it in her charming sketch of the Castilian plains, which in three or four pages renders most delicately the soul of the landscape. And it is this mournful quality of mood, unappeased in its yearning for the divine—for even the beauty of the earth which it reaches out to, shows forth the transitoriness of life—that informs every page of the best story, "How Juan Ramon Joined the Order." The author's poetic instinct, one judges, led her much into communion with Nature, without any dividing interest in human character, but in "Juan Ramon" she has drawn in admirable contrast three types, the housewife Señora Petra, the youth Juan, and the Provincial of the Order. Touching is the ending of this story, but not so touching, we think, as the admirable sketch, "An Incident," with its unforgettable description of the Spanish family's greeting at a little railway station of the consumptive man, Mercedes, who has been sent back to Seville to die. One wishes that the author had written many more such little scenes, direct from life, as it is evident that her impressionistic power of suggesting a background of human life shows to less advantage in the regular form of the short story, as, for example, in "The Christ of Toro." The author's power of indicating an atmosphere is perhaps best seen, however, in her vivid narrative of a journey, by waggon, on the Rio Grande. In picturesqueness and swift dramatic force this account of the life of a wild region, seen many years ago, is extraordinarily vivid. In crisp actuality of vision it has all the spontaneity of youth, to which it adds a sureness of touch rare indeed in the work of a girl of twenty years.

* "The Christ of Toro, and Other Stories." By Gabriela Cunninghame Graham. Eveleigh Nash. 6s.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

The French and Italian Rivieras are among the few European subjects that justify the issue of a travel book at this time of year. It is the season when those who dread the English winter, and enjoy the means for evading it, go south in search of purer air and longer sunshine. That the Riviera climate sometimes disappoints them is probably due, as Mr. Gordon Home suggests in "Along the Rivieras" (Dent, 7s. 6d. net), to the undoubted fact that they have not yet realised the choicest spots to visit—that they cling mostly to the well-known resorts in the French Riviera, and when they cross to the Italian side, rarely go further eastwards than San Remo. The object of this book is in great part to expound with pen and brush the fascination of the sea-board and its climate beyond as well as up to this point; the area included in its scope extending from Marseilles to Pisa. The French Riviera, with its terminus at Mentone, is taken first; and then two sections are devoted respectively to the Italian Rivieras di Ponente and di Levante. The latter include virtually all the places visited and described by such notable English travellers of the past as Lady Blessington and Tobias Smollett, to say nothing of later historians like Augustus Hare, or of the English poets who found inspiration in this region; it was at Porto Venere that Byron wrote "The Corsair." Shelley had a villa at Lerici, and met his death by drowning off Viareggio. Historically, the interest of the Rivieras dates back to the early Greek settlers, and a great part of this volume is devoted to tracing the vicissitudes of the peoples and their leaders, who fought for the mastery of the soil in Roman and medieval times, and during the Napoleonic period when the Riviera was one of the principal battle-grounds of Europe. There is, however, no dearth of first-hand description; Mr. Home writes most interestingly of Toulon, of the streets of Genoa, where "one's sensations are those of a mouse running between huge packing-cases," and of a thunderstorm at Portofino. His book is exhaustive in regard to the places dealt with, and the mass of information and reminiscences it contains is well set off by the author's own illustrations in color and line. The water-color drawings vary somewhat in quality, but many reveal a courage and beauty greatly beyond those of his previous volumes on localities nearer home.

* * *

Though we know that all good gardeners come from Scotland, Sir Henry Maxwell's book on "Scottish Gardens" (Arnold) is likely to surprise many readers. The collection of representative Scottish gardens here described by Sir Herbert Maxwell's pen, and illustrated by Miss Mary W. G. Wilson's charming water-colors, shows that at least the greater gardens north of the Tweed bear comparison with their English rivals. It would be hard to find anyone better entitled to write upon this subject than Sir Herbert Maxwell and his account of the climatic conditions of gardening in Scotland is full of interest and value. He easily shows that the climate of Scotland is not without its special advantages for the gardener, since a number of plants that would perish from cold in the English midlands can be grown with ease on the west coast of Scotland. The present volume necessarily deals with a small number of gardens, and of those chosen the pictures of the rhododendrons at The Hirsel in Berwickshire, of the roses at Kellie Castle, the rock-garden at Croom, and the mixed borders at Baberton and Fyvie, are the most striking, though, indeed, all of Miss Wilson's pictures are excellent. Sir Herbert Maxwell's descriptions of the gardens are pleasantly mingled with historical and legendary digressions.

* * *

It is high praise to give Mrs. MacDermot Crawford's book, "The Wife of Lafayette" (Nash, 15s. net), to say that it is adequate to its subject. Amid the deluge of biographies of the leading characters in the French Revolution it is pleasant to read of a woman who is remembered for solid worth rather than a capacity for intrigue. Although of noble birth and greatly influenced by her religious beliefs, Adrienne de Noailles never swerved in her devotion to the popular cause. Her husband owed an immense amount to her inspiration and support. At a time when, by pretending to divorce him, she might have preserved her own and her children's fortunes, she boldly refused, and every paper she

From MESSRS. ROUTLEDGE'S LIST OF AUTUMN BOOKS.

THE IDEAL OF A GENTLEMAN.

By the Rev. A. SMYTHE PALMER, D.D. Large Cr. 8vo, cloth extra, gilt, gilt top, silk marker and engraved frontispiece, 6s.

"There are plenty of books which supply extracts of the wisdom of the world concerning right thinking and acting. None of these can compare in range and exhaustiveness with the author's admirable collection. He is a scholar of ample erudition, and his book supplies endless matter for reflection and edification."—Notes and Queries.

"As we read the glowing testimony to the character of gentleman from poet, courtier, moralist, divine, soldier, lawyer, facet after facet of the dazzling jewel is exposed to our view."—Nation.

INDIA THROUGH THE AGES:

A Popular History of Hindustan. By FLORA ANNIE STEEL, Author of "On the Face of the Waters," &c. 2nd Edition. With 7 Maps, crown 8vo, cloth extra, 4s. 6d.

"Inspired by genius and lit up by imagination."—Literary World.

"In 360 pages she has succeeded in composing a genuinely interesting history of India, and we believe that no one else has done anything like it."—Nation.

A SHAKESPEARE WORD-BOOK.

By JOHN FOSTER, M.A. Med. 8vo, half-morocco, gilt, 7s. 6d. net. [Just out.

CELESTINA, or the Tragic Comedy of Calisto and Melibea.

Translated from the Spanish by JAMES MABBE, anno 1631. Also "An Interlude of Calisto and Melibea," for the first time accurately reproduced from the original copy printed by John Rastell, circa 1530. Edited, with Introduction (56 pages) on Picaresque (or Rogue) Novel, and Tables and Appendixes, by H. WARNER ALLEN, Taylorian Scholar in Spanish Language and Literature. 8vo, buckram, gilt, gilt top, 6s. net. [Just out.

ROMAN LIFE & MANNERS UNDER THE EARLY EMPIRE

By LUDWIG FRIEDLAENDER. Authorised Translation of the Seventh (Enlarged and Revised) Edition of the "Sittengeschichte Roms." In 2 vols. Vol. I. By LEONARD A. MAGNUS, LL.B. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, gilt, gilt top, 6s. [Just out.

THE POETS AND THE POETRY of the NINETEENTH CENTURY.

A Popular Encyclopædia of Modern Poetry, covering the area of Greater Britain and the limits of the Nineteenth Century. Edited by ALFRED H. MILES. With Biographical and Critical Notices by the most eminent living Writers. 12 vols., pott 8vo, red cloth binding, full-gilt back, each 1s. 6d. net; red lambskin gilt, gilt tops, silk register, each 2s. 6d. net.

Each volume is sold separately.

Also boxed in Sets. 12 vols., cloth, in cloth case, with red leather label, 21s. net; or, 12 vols., lambskin, in triangular cloth case with drop lid, displaying contents of series, 36s. net.

1. Crabbe to Coleridge.
2. Southey to Shelley.
3. Keats to Lytton.
4. Tennyson to Clough.
5. Kingsley to Thomson.
6. Morris to Buchanan.
7. Bridges to Kipling.
8. Women Poets—I.
9. Women Poets—II.
10. Humorous Poets.
11. Sacred Poets—I.
12. Sacred Poets—II.

Write for the Xmas (1908) Analysed List of "The New Universal Library" (203 vols.), and other Book-Lists.

GEORGE ROUTLEDGE & SONS, LTD., BROADWAY HOUSE, CARTER LANE, E.C.

BOOKSELLERS.

A SHILLING ILLUSTRATED BIBLE.

This Bible is printed in clear Pearl type, and contains 16 Photographic Views, 16 beautiful Figure Pictures after Collier, Delaroche, Hoffmann, Reynolds, Titian, etc.; 2 beautiful Illuminated Title Pages and Maps; tastefully bound in crimson imitation leather, gilt edges, and round corners, 1s. 3d. post free, or 6 copies for 6s. 6d. post free.

Rev. ALAN BRODRICK, Broughton Gifford Rectory, writes:—"The Bibles are perfect books of art and cheapness."

The London Bible Warehouse, 53, Paternoster Row, E.C.

J. POOLE & CO., 104, Charing Cross Road, LONDON.

School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific, and Students'

BOOKSELLERS.

NEW AND SECOND-HAND.

All enquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered.

Catalogue No. 361. 148 Pages.

GLAISHER'S 1909 GENERAL CATALOGUE OF SELECTED PUBLISHERS' REMAINDERS.

Now Ready. Reduced Prices. Immense Variety.

WILLIAM GLAISHER, LTD.,

Remainder and Discount Booksellers,

265, HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON

Buy

The Saturday Westminster

Weekly Issue of "The Westminster Gazette."

Because

it contains all F.C.G.'S Cartoons of the Week.
of its unique page of "Problems and Prizes."
of its Book Reviews and Literary Columns.
of the Variety of General Articles and Short Stories.
it is the only Weekly Magazine-Review of the kind.
it costs but a Penny a Week. By post, 6s. 6d. (Home), and 8s. 8d. (Abroad) per annum.

It

Never Fails to Please & Satisfy

Offices: Tudor House, Tudor St., London, E.C.

THE Now Ready.

Investors' Shilling Year Book

For 1909

Contains the history, salient particulars, balance-sheet details, price movements, &c., respecting 5,000 principal investments quoted in the United Kingdom.

IN HIS PREFACE TO THIS BOOK

SIR HENRY C. BURDETT, K.C.B., says:—

"By means of the Year Book the investor may compare the financial position of other similar companies with the financial position of those companies in which he has invested capital. Such comparisons should enable him to obtain safer, cheaper, and more remunerative stocks."

Royal 8vo, 424 pp. PRICE ONE SHILLING NET.

Obtainable of all leading bookstalls and booksellers throughout the United Kingdom.

EVERETT & CO'S NEW BOOKS.

PUBLISHED TO-DAY.

THE LIFE OF

Col. FRED BURNABY.

By THOMAS WRIGHT.

Author of "The Life of Sir Richard Burton," etc.

One Vol., with 50 Plates. 12s. net.

NEW NOVELS.

THE IRON HEEL JACK LONDON

PUBLISHED TO-DAY.

CHRISTIAN MURDERERS WINIFRED GRAHAM

A skilful attack on Christian Science and its denial of human suffering and death.

ROSALIND AT REDGATE MEREDITH NICHOLSON

A ROYAL HOAX FRED WHISHAW

London: EVERETT & CO., 42, ESSEX STREET, W.C.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST

allowed on Deposits repayable on demand.

2 per cent. INTEREST

on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.

All General Banking Business transacted.

ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.

C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

presented to the Administration began with the words, "La femme Lafayette." When Lafayette was imprisoned at Omütz she shared his prison although the conditions were extremely rigorous. Mrs. Crawford travels over well-known ground in much of her book. We have a sympathetic account of the state of the peasants before the Revolution, and several of the more striking scenes in that great drama are described. We are better pleased when she keeps closer to her subject for, although it would be impossible to relate Madame de Lafayette's life without sketching its historical background, the reader who is likely to take up the book is sure to be acquainted with its main features. Now and again Mrs. Crawford allows her admiration for Madame de Lafayette to run away with her, but, upon the whole, the book is a most useful addition to the long list of biographies of the heroines of the French Revolution. It treats an interesting subject in an interesting style.

* * *

A Novel Reader's Guide.—"The Money-Changers," by Upton Sinclair (John Long, 6s.). An exposure of the financial trickery of the big millionaires and Wall Street operators which brought about the panic in the American market last year.—"The Spirit of Revolt," by Philip Gibbs (Methuen, 6s.). A thoughtful and well-written novel, recounting the experiences of a young Labor M.P. in political and social life.—"The Golden Precipice," by H. B. Marriott Watson (Cassell, 6s.). A pleasant story of treasure-seeking, with a good description of a mutiny upon a desert island. Mr. Watson has the gift of style.—"A Fish out of Water," By F. F. Montrésor (Murray, 2s. 6d. net). A clever little story of the experiences of an essentially Philistine girl forced to live with an artistic family in London.—"Joan of Garioch," by A. Kinross (Macmillan, 6s.). A readable account of the adventures of a war-correspondent in Russia, with a love story.

The Week in the City.

The Movement of Leading Stocks.

	Price Friday Morning, Nov. 6.	Price Friday Morning, Nov 13.
Consols 2½ per cent.	84⅜ ...	84⅝
German 3 per cent.	83 ...	83
French Rentes 3 per cent.	95 ...	95½
Turkish Unified	89¾ ...	91¼
Grand Trunk 1st Pref.	105 ...	105
Canadian-Pacific	178½ ...	183¾
Southern Pacific	114¼ ...	119
Union Pacific	181½ ...	183¾
Rand Mines	6 1/16 ...	7⅛
Cons. Goldfields	6⅝ ...	4⅞

Brightness and animation have ruled in most of the Stock Exchange markets during the week now closing. Prices, on the whole, are better—in many departments substantially so—but the growl of the Stock Exchange member is again heard, to the effect that "there is more tone than trade." A remarkable development in American Railroad and copper shares has lifted prices of those securities much above the levels of last week, and the immediate aftermath of the United States Presidential election has been a strenuous boomlet in New York, which London faithfully reflected. A rise in Home Railway stocks comforted the investor quite as much as a good improvement in South Africans rejoiced the bullish speculator, while the calmer atmosphere of the political outlook abroad is mainly responsible for a higher range of values amongst British gilt-edged securities and Foreign Government bonds.

Politics and Prices.

The closing of the Casablanca chapter, and the consequent subsidence of Continental excitement, are matters of considerable gratification to the City in general and the Stock Exchange in particular. That the "incident" would lead to anything of importance, everyone declared—after the agreement had been reached—an absolute impossibility. Nevertheless, prices were depressed, more perhaps by way of taking measures of precaution than in consequence of actual sales being made. Relieved from anxiety on this score, quotations sprang up again, fully recovering the losses which had taken place. Consols, however, did not retain a ¼ per cent. advance for long. Mr. Asquith's Guildhall banquet speech, frankly admired, approved, and endorsed even by so loyal a Unionist body as the Stock Exchange, was taken by certain shrewd financiers as affording a quiet hint that next year might see the launching of a Patriotic Navy Loan for the support of the blue-water policy which the Premier dwelt upon with such emphasis. And a Navy Loan of proportions which the market already foresees would mean yet another competitor with Consols. Wherefore the price of the Funds kept dull, and, although it freshened again in the middle of the week, a sagging tendency re-exhibited itself towards the close, with the result that on balance the quotation shows but a slight improvement. There is, moreover, a new issue of Irish Land stock, in one shape or another, looming largely ahead, and the statement on the subject, to be made in Parliament next Monday week, November 23rd, is awaited with uneasy interest.

Railways and Rises.

The scream of the American eagle, prophesying bumper trade, increased dividends, bounding prosperity as the results to be expected from Mr. Taft's election, has called prices ever higher and yet higher still. Manipulation is patently at work: its presence visible in the crop of rumors and reports which accompany the successive rises. The superstructure of the market now rests more upon prospects than performance, and while this is, of course, always a condition which prevails to some extent in the American market, merits are more obscured than usual, at the present time, and a wild gamble has taken the place of sober speculation. This, naturally, is by no means to say that the advance has come to an end. The giddy whirl may easily be kept going for some time to come, and would-be operators are torn between the conflicting facts that to be a bull is quite as dangerous as it is to be a bear. Therefore, it is not surprising that speculation has in some degree flowed into Home Railway stocks, where prices have risen appreciably under the kindly influence of a little buying. The dividend estimate days begin to approach this section, and, while hopes are very chastened as to the next batch of distributions upon British Railway Ordinary stocks, the low levels to which prices have fallen are considered to discount a good deal of pessimism. Moreover, there is the anticipation of better trade in store, the hope of more settled labor conditions now the cotton strike is over, the knowledge that working agreements between different companies must be making a sensible difference to expenditure. These are some of the factors which weigh with the buyers of Home Railway stocks, and their influence is effective enough to cause the complexion of the market to assume a brighter aspect than it has done for several months past. It must be pointed out, however, that the narrowness of the market, due to lack of practical public interest, causes swift fluctuations in prices, and it might readily be that suspension of the present breath of buying would again reduce this department to limpness and inertia.

Lucellum.

TAKE CARE OF YOUR THROAT.

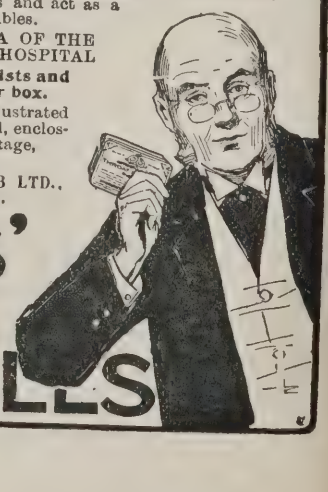
If you suffer from irritation of the Throat, Catarrh, Coughs, Colds, Bronchitis, or other Throat and Chest affections then try these wonderfully efficacious Throat Pastilles. They quickly relieve hoarseness and soreness and act as a safeguard against all Throat troubles.

MADE TO A FORMULA OF THE LIVERPOOL THROAT HOSPITAL

Can be obtained at all Chemists and Stores at 1s. and 4s. 6d. per box.

Write for Free Sample and Illustrated brochure of testimonials received, enclosing 1d. stamp to cover postage, to Sole Manufacturers—

EVANS SONS LESCHER & WEBB LTD., Hanover Street, Liverpool.



EVANS' ANTISEPTIC THROAT PASTILLES

Ask for "Evans" Pastilles and see that you get them

Beware of the numerous imitations.

LONDON AND COUNTY BANKING COMPANY, LIMITED.

ESTABLISHED IN 1836.

CAPITAL - £8,000,000, in 100,000 Shares of £80 each.
Paid-up Capital, £2,000,000. Reserve Fund, £1,600,000.

Directors.

Hon. Sir ERIC BARRINGTON, K.C.B.
JOHN ANNAN BRYCE, Esq., M.P.
JOHN JAMES CATER, Esq.
ERNEST H. CUNARD, Esq.
Right Hon. Viscount GOSCHEN.
C. SEYMOUR GRENFELL, Esq.
CHARLES JOHN HEGAN, Esq.
WILLIAM E. HUBBARD, Esq.
Sir THOMAS JACKSON, Bart.
WM. McKEWAN, Esq. (Honorary Director).
OSWALD CECIL MAGNIAC, Esq.
WILLIAM G. RATHBONE, Esq.
CHARLES J. CATER SCOTT, Esq.

Auditors.

HENRY GRANT, Esq. THOMAS HORWOOD, Esq.
Hon. STUART PLEYDELL-BOUVERIE.

Head Office Manager—HERMAN RICHARD WYATT.
Deputy Head Office Manager—FREDERICK JAMES BARTHORPE.
Country Manager—WILLIAM GEORGE GRIBBLE.
Chief Inspector—FRANK WILLIAM HOWETT.
Chief Accountant—THEOPHILUS JAMES CARPENTER.
Secretary—EDGAR FRANCIS ROBINSON.

Head Office: 21, LOMBARD STREET, E.C.

Foreign Exchange Office—80, Cornhill, E.C.

266 Branches in London and Country.

CURRENT ACCOUNTS are opened on the usual terms. Facilities are given Customers at any Branch for the transfer of money to or from any other Branch.

DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.—Sums of £10 and upwards are received on deposit at interest, subject to notice of withdrawal, or by special agreement, in accordance with the usual custom.

PURCHASE AND SALE of Stocks and Shares effected.

DIVIDENDS, ANNUITIES, &c., received.

THE AGENCY OF FOREIGN AND COUNTRY BANKS is undertaken, and every description of Banking business transacted.

FOREIGN DEPARTMENT.

CURRENCY DRAFTS, CIRCULAR NOTES and LETTERS OF CREDIT are issued, and TELEGRAPHIC TRANSFERS made to all parts of the World.

APPROVED FOREIGN DRAFTS are purchased and Collections undertaken.

DOCUMENTARY CREDITS are established, and every facility given for the handling of Documents to or from Abroad.

The Officers of the Bank are bound to secrecy.

100 POINTS FOR FREE TRADE

By L. G. CHIOZZA MONEY, M.P.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

(Reprinted from "The Daily News.")

The publication of 100 POINTS for FREE TRADE day by day during the last few months in "The Daily News" has been followed with the keenest interest. These 100 Points are now issued in convenient pamphlet form (100 Pages). Free Traders all over the country have thus an opportunity of possessing in a handy form the material for an immediate answer to the fallacies of the Tariff Reformer.

100 POINTS FOR FREE TRADE

PRICE ONE PENNY.

The price of this 100-page pamphlet, which is of a handy shape for the pocket, is 1d. for a single copy or 1½d. post free. A comprehensive index to the entire subject matter makes every item of information contained readily accessible.

We have arranged for special terms to be in force for large orders as follows:—

SPECIAL TERMS FOR QUANTITIES.

(Carriage Paid.)

2 dozen and upwards	-	1d. each.
200 and upwards	- -	1d.	„	less	2½ per cent.
500 „ „	- -	1d.	„	„	5 „
1,000 „ „	- -	1d.	„	„	10 „

1d. 100 POINTS FOR FREE TRADE. 1d.

Applications to be made to THE MANAGER, Publications Dept. "The Daily News," Bouverie Street, Fleet Street, E.C.

MAKERS TO H.M. THE KING

Rowntree's

"WARMS & CHEERS"

ELECT COCOA

THE

LEADING EGYPTIAN CIGARETTES

Kyriazis'

EGYPTIAN CIGARETTES

CAIRO.

Try them. They are the finest imported, and can be obtained from all High-class Tobacconists, Stores, &c.

Wholesale depot—20, Cheapside, London, E.C.

BOVRIL

helps you to eat and feeds you

MISCELLANEOUS.

Curio Club Bargains

Private persons desirous of disposing of antiques at bargain prices will find a ready sale for same at the "London Opinion Curio Club" 107, Regent Street, London, W.

To Collectors of China, etc.

Don't throw away anything broken in the home, but buy

"FORTAFIX"

Which is the Strongest Cement in the world, and

Withstands Boiling Water.

White in colour, it mends and repairs anything from a saucepan to a piece of china. It is fire-proof and chemical-proof. Of all Ironmongers, Stationers, Oilmen, Chemists and Stores,

Per 6d. Tube.

or sent post-free through nearest Agent on receipt of 6d. in stamps to

BENJAMIN & GEE,
31, St. Mary Axe, LONDON, E.C.

Selections from ELKIN MATHEWS' LIST

"THE REAL OMAR."
First Thousand Copies Exhausted in a Fortnight.
Second Thousand Revised and Corrected,
READY NEXT WEEK.
Royal 16mo, cloth 1s. 6d net; Wrapper 1s. net.

QUATRAINS OF OMAR KHAYYAM, from a literal Prose Translation by E. HERON-ALLEN. Done into Verse by ARTHUR B. TALBOT.

"Mr. Talbot has produced a translation remarkable for fidelity, but of genuine poetical value. One has only to turn a page or two to acknowledge one merit with gratitude, for it is one which few of the quatrain-spinners share—he is wholly bent on rendering Omar for Omar's sake, and never makes him a vehicle for his own moods and conceits. . . . Mr. Talbot, then, has one characteristic which inspires confidence from the first; and one's confidence is enhanced by the discovery of how resolutely he has also set himself against FitzGerald's mesmerism in keeping to the spirit as well as the letter of the text. . . . Mr. Talbot has, in fact, achieved a version of undoubted value to those who wish to know more of the real Omar and cannot read him in his own tongue; and even where its own poetical merit is least, his translation has the virtue of fidelity to the spirit of the desolate old singer who explored life and found it wanting even in the confident and single-minded days of the First Crusades."—Times.

A SELECTION FROM THE POETRY OF LIONEL JOHNSON. With Biographical Note by C. K. SHORTER. Roy. 16mo. 1s. net. [Just out.

"It is at once stately and passionate, austere and free. His passion has a sane mood, his fire a white heat. . . . Once again it is the Celtic spirit that makes for higher things. Lionel Johnson's muse is concerned only with the highest. Her flight is as of a winged thing, that goes 'higher still and higher,' and has few flutterings near earth."—Irish Daily Independent.

LONDON VISIONS. By LAURENCE BINYON. Collected and Augmented. Printed at the Chiswick Press. Fcap 8vo. 2s. 6d. net. [Just out.

"The volumes of so accomplished a poet as Mr. Laurence Binyon must always be welcome, and 'London Visions' is exceptionally so. . . . The poems recall no one except Mr. Binyon's own personality. It is not easy to describe their charm. Mr. Binyon is master of a style of his own that is full of charm and dignity."
—Country Life.

"There are pieces here in which by sureness of selection and felicity of rendering, the poet gives us scenes that are as cameos in words."—Daily Telegraph.

IN A STREET—IN A LANE. By N. W. BYNG. Fcap. 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

PAN-WORSHIP, and other Poems. By ELEANOR FARJEON. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. net. [In the press.

LOVE AS PEDLAR, and other Verses. By LADY ALICE EYRE. Fcap. 8vo. cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrapper, 1s. net. [In the press.

THE SHADOW OF THE RAGGEDSTONE (a Romance of the Malvern Range, temp. twelfth century). By C. F. GRINDROD. With Cover-design by AUSTIN O. SPARE. Crown 8vo. 570 pp., 6s.

"A story of absorbing interest . . . moves with that stateliness which is ever a pleasing feature of historical romance."
—Scotsman.

LONDON: ELKIN MATHEWS, VIGO STREET, W.

TOURS.

SKI-ING, SKATING, TOBOGGANNING ON THE ALPS.
For full particulars of best resorts see "Public Schools Winter Sports Year Book, with Club "Who's Who," cloth, illustrated, 1s. post free from Watkin Watkins, Hon. Secretary, Highfield, Harrow

EDUCATIONAL.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

CHANTRY MOUNT SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
BISHOP'S STORTFORD.

Head Mistress Miss ESTHER CASE, M.A., Dublin (Class. Tripos, Camb.
Second Mistress: Miss ESTERBROOK HICKS, B.SC., London.
A limited number of boarders received.

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.

BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING
Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.
Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.
Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

CO-EDUCATION BY THE SOCIETY OF FRIENDS.
Friends' School, Great Ayton in Cleveland, Yorkshire.

A Boarding School for Boys and Girls (9-16). Modern Education. Preparation for Exams. Unique health record. Ten acres Recreation Grounds, Gymnasium, Swimming Bath, Laboratories, Domestic Science School. 30 Guineas per annum. Apply to the Headmaster for Prospectus, etc.

EDUCATIONAL.

SOUTHPORT MODERN SCHOOL.
A First-Class School for Boys. Staff includes B.A., M.Sc., F.C.V., Mus. Bac., etc. Languages, Science, Commercial Subjects, Gymnastics, Swimming, Cadet Company. Prospectus from Secretary.

TANGLEWOOD, BARNT GREEN, THE LICKEY HILLS,
Near Birmingham.
BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.
On approved Modern Lines Thorough Education with individual care and character training. Games, gardening, and open air life in lovely country, with bracing air. Good train service on main line. Escorts provided.
Principal - - MISS EBBUTT, M.A.
(Newnham College, Cambridge—Trinity College, Dublin.)

LINCOLNSHIRE COAST.
ESSENDON GIRLS' SCHOOL, SKEGNESS.
Headmistress, MISS PAGAN, M.A. Full Staff. L.R.A.M. Swedish Gymnastics. Higher Examinations. Tennis, Hockey, Swimming. Dry sunny climate. Bracing sea air. Exhibitions offered.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.
Scholarship Examination in December.
Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors.
Enquiries should be addressed to the Bursar.

CRAIGMOUNT, EDINBURGH.
Private Boarding and Day School for Girls.

THE Principals, the Misses Gossip, are assisted by highly-qualified residents, English and Foreign Mistresses and visiting Professors. The aim of the school is a sound education, special attention being given to the study of English Literature, Modern Languages, and Music. The Gymnasium is fitted with Swedish apparatus and the school has its own Swimming Bath. The situation of the school is bracing and very healthy, and the grounds give abundant scope for games. Prospectus on application to the Principals.

CROYDON. Croham Hurst School for Girls.
House built for the purpose in healthy and beautiful situation. Limited number of girls taken. Thorough education on modern lines. Special encouragement given to reading and leisure pursuits, and to interest in current movements.
Hockey. Tennis, &c., &c. Swimming. Riding. Much outdoor life
Principals { THEODORA E. CLARK. K. M. ELLIS.

WILLASTON SCHOOL, NANTWICH.
In the Cheshire Plain, four miles from Crewe. Opened in 1900. Modern Buildings standing in twenty four acres of grounds. Preparation for University Scholarships and Matriculation, or for Professional and Commercial Life. A Preparatory School in connection with the Senior School will be opened in May, 1909.
Next Entrance Examination, December 8th, at the School.
For Prospectus and Particulars of Admission on the Foundation apply to the Headmaster, H. L. JONES, M.A., or to the CLERK TO THE GOVERNORS 38, Barton Arcade, Manchester.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.
THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager,
R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C.
Telegrams: "TRIFORM, LONDON." Telephone No. GERRARD 1854.

SCHOOLS IN ENGLAND OR ABROAD
FOR BOYS AND GIRLS.
Messrs. J. and J. PATON having an intimate knowledge of the BEST SCHOOLS and TUTORS in this country and on the Continent, will be pleased to aid parents in their selection by sending (free of charge) prospectuses and full particulars of reliable and highly-recommended establishments. When writing please state the age of pupil, the district preferred, and give some idea of the fees to be paid.—J. and J. PATON, Educational Agents, 143, Cannon-st, London. E.C. Telephone 5,053, Central.

STAMMERING.
The severest cases cured, but only by personal tuition, by one who has cured himself after stammering for 10 years. Adults and boys received in residence or as daily pupils. Particulars on application to
Mr. A. C. SCHNELLE, 119, Bedford Court Mansions, London, W.C.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout, Bathrooms on every Floor, Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard and Smoking Rooms. Heated throughout.

Fireproof Floors. Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 6/0.

Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hote, Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London." Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

LONDON.
WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. WILD, C.C., Man. Direc. 30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

BLACKPOOL.
67, ALEXANDRA ROAD. Board and Residence. 5s. per day

PROSPECT HOUSE BOARDING ESTAB., 33, Central Par. facing Sea, Central for Amusements. S. Aspect. Tel. 575 Manageress

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.
IDEAL RESIDENCE.
Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.
THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate

SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30/- week

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.
BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport

BRIGHTON.
THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston

BUXTON.
ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.
THE TORS PRIVATE HOTEL (en pension). Tel. 199. Mrs. F. Sara

DARTMOOR DOUSLAND, Nr. YELVERTON.
BARONS' PRIVATE HOTEL. Close to Moors. J. Wonnacott, Prop.

DEAL.
BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson

EASTBOURNE.
CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Gdns. 5/- day

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day

EDINBURGH.
ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading Hotel

FARNWORTH (Station) Nr. BOLTON.
RAWSON ARMS HOTEL. Theatrical Accommodation

GREAT YARMOUTH.
HILLS MARINE VIEW BOARDING HOUSE.

MELTON LODGE RESIDENTIAL MANSION. Facing Sea. 10/- per day

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.
THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.
RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta Course

ILFRACOMBE.
COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea

LANCASTER.
BOAR'S HEAD HOTEL. Wm. McIntosh

STONEWELL RESTAURANT. T. M. Hey, Proprietor

MARKET HALL RESTAURANT. Prop., J. E. Dowthwaite

LEEDS.
HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station

LIVERPOOL.
COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone: 3032 Royal, 3 wires

LLANELLY.
CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver

MALVERN.
HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & Manager—J. Wilson

MANCHESTER.
THE CROSBY, Withy Grove. The Rendezvous of Lancashire Trade Unions.

"OLD SWAN," Victoria Station Approach.—Best and most reliable train information.

MATLOCK.
SMEDLEY'S Hydro. Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Manager

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links (18 holes)

OXFORD (near).
SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, &c. Lecture

PENTRE.
PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles

PORTSMOUTH.
SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director

SOUTHPORT.
KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St., Band and Illuminations. Turkish, Electric, Hydropathic, &c., Baths & Treatment

ROWNTREE'S CAFE, Lord St., Hot Luncheons, Aft'noon Teas, Tel. 647

HOTEL CAFE CONTINENTAL, 207, Lord St., French and English Confectioners, Dinners, Teas and Suppers. Parties catered for

SOUTHSEA.
STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress

TEIGNMOUTH.
REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner

WHITBY.
WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.
HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplace. "The English Home."

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.
THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE NATION PUBLISHING CO. LTD., and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following booksellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—W. H. Smith & Son's Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm Norden and Jephson.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—Gordon and Gotch.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions are received.

Scale of Charges for Advertisements.

	FULL PAGE.	½ PAGE.	¼ PAGE.
Back Page, or Page facing matter ...	£10 0 0	£5 0 0	£2 10 0
Other Pages ...	8 0 0	4 0 0	2 0 0

Hotels, Hydros, and Educational
13 Insertions ... ... 8d. per line.
52 ,, ... 6d. ,,

THE INDEX TO VOLUME III. OF THE NATION

Is NOW READY and can be had free on application to the Manager.

The Index to Volumes I. and II. can also be obtained free.

MESSRS. METHUEN'S NEW BOOKS

GENERAL LITERATURE

THE WOMEN BONAPARTES. By H. NOEL WILLIAMS. Author of "Five Fair Sisters." With many Illustrations. In Two Volumes, demy 8vo, 24s. net.
In this work Mr. Noel Willams traces the careers of the mother and three sisters of the great Napoleon.

WOMAN THROUGH THE AGES By EMIL REICH' Doctor Juris. With 36 Illustrations. Two Volumes. Demy 8vo, 21s. net.

THE GILDS AND COMPANIES OF LONDON. By GEORGE UNWIN. With many Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net. [The Antiquary's Books.

THE WESTMINSTER PROBLEMS-BOOK. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.
"The Westminster Problems Book" contains a selection from the work of several hundred of poets and prose writers, who have contributed to the Problem Page of the Saturday Westminster Gazette during the last four years.

THE YOUNG ENGINEER. By HAMMOND HALL. Profusely illustrated with Photographs, Drawings, and Plans. Crown 8vo, 5s.

THE FIRST GOVERNESS OF THE NETHERLANDS. MARGARET OF AUSTRIA. By ELEANOR E. TREMAYNE. With an Introduction by MARTIN HUME. Illustrated, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net. [Romantic History.

THE WIND IN THE WILLOWS. By KENNETH GRAHAME, Author of "The Golden Age." Crown 8vo, 6s. [Second Edition.

HER INFINITE VARIETY: a Feminine Portrait Gallery. By E. V. LUCAS. Fcap. 8vo, 5s.
This is uniform with "The Open Road."

FORTY YEARS OF MUSIC, 1865 to 1905. By JOSEPH BENNETT. Illustrated, demy 8vo, 16s. net.
This is a delightful retrospect of the busy life of a great musical critic.

LORENZO THE MAGNIFICENT; and Florence in her Golden Age. By E. L. S. HORSBURGH. Illustrated, demy 8vo, 15s. net.

OXFORD IN THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY. By A. D. GODLEY. Illustrated, demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

THIRD EDITION IN THE PRESS.

MAN AND THE UNIVERSE. By Sir OLIVER LODGE. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.
This is a study of the influence of the advance in scientific knowledge upon our understanding of Christianity.

SECOND EDITION NEARLY READY.

MEMORIES OF MY LIFE. By FRANCIS GALTON. F.R.S. With 7 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.
This book contains the reminiscences of eighty-six years of a very varied life—the life of the most distinguished man of science of the day.

TWO ENGLISH QUEENS AND PHILIP. By MARTIN HUME, M.A., Pembroke College, Cambridge. With a Frontispiece in Photogravure and 12 other Illustrations, demy 8vo, 15s. net. [Romantic History.

SINTRAM AND HIS COMPANIONS. By LA MOTTE FOUQUE. Translated by A. C. FARQUHARSON. With 20 Illustrations by EDMUND J. SULLIVAN, and a Frontispiece in Photogravure after Dürer. Demy 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net. In green parchment in box, 10s. 6d. net.

THE MEDICI POPES. By HERBERT M. VAUGHAN. Demy 8vo, 15s. net.

CHAUCER AND HIS ENGLAND. By G. G. COULTON. M.A. With 32 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.
"At once popular and scholarly. A vivid and realistic picture of life in the fourteenth century."—Times.

RUSSIAN ESSAYS AND STORIES. By the Hon. MAURICE BARING. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

COUNTRY WALKS ABOUT FLORENCE. By EDWARD HUTTON. With 32 Drawings by ADELAIDE MARCHI, and 20 other Illustrations. fcap. 8vo, 5s. net.
The byways, village churches, wayside shrines, villas, and gardens of the country in the vicinity of Florence.

MY LITTLE BOY. By CARL EWALD. Translated from the Danish by A. TEIXEIRA DE MATTOS. With Coloured Illustrations, fcap. 8vo, 5s.

GHIRLANDAIO. By GERALD S. DAVIES. With 55 Illustrations. Wide royal 8vo, 10s. 6d. net. [Classics of Art.

FLORENTINE SCULPTORS OF THE RENAISSANCE. By WILHELM BODE, Ph.D. Translated by J. HAYNES. With 94 Illustrations, wide royal 8vo, 12s. 6d. net. [Classics of Art.

THE HOLLAND HOUSE CIRCLE. By LLOYD SANDERS. With 24 Portraits and Illustrations, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.
A delightful gallery of witty and distinguished men and women—Rogers, Bacon, Moore, Sydney Smith, Macaulay among them.

HOME LIFE IN ITALY. By LINA DUFF GORDON (Mrs. Aubrey Waterfield). With many Illustrations, of which 13 are by Aubrey Waterfield. demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.
The life of modern rural Italy is described with sympathy and intimate knowledge.

THE OLD-TIME PARSON. By P. H. DITCHFIELD, M.A. With 16 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.
"Full of information and teeming with stories."—Guardian.

COMPANIONS OF THE WAY. Edited by ELIZABETH WATERHOUSE, Editor of "A Little Book of Life and Death." Crown 8vo, gilt top, 5s. net.
This is a wonderful book of selections for morning and evening reading, and it contains over 760 pages.

ALL THINGS CONSIDERED. By G. K. CHESTERTON. Fcap. 8vo, 5s. [Second Edition.
A new volume of essays which plays over the whole range of modern life.

WELLS AND GLASTONBURY. By T. SCOTT HOLMES. With Maps, Plans, and Illustrations by E. H. NEW. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net. [Ancient Cities.

A HISTORY OF GERMANY, from 1713 to 1815. By C. T. Atkinson, M.A. With Maps, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

A SPANISH HOLIDAY. By CHARLES MARRIOTT. Illustrated, demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.
A charming account of an unconventional holiday in Spain, in which most of the interesting places are described.

HORAE MYSTICAE: a Day-Book from the Writings of Mystics of Many Nations. Compiled by ELEANOR C. GREGORY. Small pott 8vo, cloth, 2s.; leather 2s. 6d. net. [The Library of Devotion.

THE COMPLETE FOXHUNTER. By CHARLES RICHARDSON. With 46 Illustrations, of which four are in Colour, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

COROT AND HIS FRIENDS. By EVERARD MEYNELL. With 29 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

AN INTRODUCTION TO SOCIAL PSYCHOLOGY. By W. McDOUGALL, M.A. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.
The motive forces that underlie all the activities of individuals and of societies are defined, and the way in which they become organised in the individual mind and in society.

METHUEN'S POPULAR NOVELS

Six Shillings each.

HOLY ORDERS. The Tragedy of a Quiet Life. By MARIE CORELLI. [Second Edition ready.
"In Holy Orders the authoress has given us of her best. It is the work of a genius. None but an extraordinary woman could have conceived and written it."—British Congregationalist.
"A burning sincerity fills her story as with living fire."
—Bookman.

SALTHAVEN. By W. W JACOBS, Author of "Many Cargoes." Illustrated by WILL OWEN.
"A sniff at the title should be enough to send off anyone to the nearest bookseller. How shall we describe the narrative power that holds our rapt attention? No admirer of 'A Master of Craft' will be disappointed with 'Salthaven.'"—Morning Post.
"What Mr. Jacobs has given us, he gives us again in 'Salthaven,' and will, we hope, go on giving us in new books for many years."
—Times.

THE GREAT MISS DRIVER. By ANTHONY HOPE. [Third Edition in the Press.
"The style is suave, easy, polished."—Morning Leader.
"There is the same sparkle and felicity, and there is superadded a deeper note."—Manchester Guardian.
"A study full of complexity and of absorbing interest."
—Westminster Gazette.

INTERPLAY. By BEATRICE HARRADEN, Author of "Ships that Pass in the Night." [Fourth Edition in the Press.
"The story is admirable, full of quiet humour and deep observation."—Manchester Courier.
"A good story, human and tender."—Evening Standard.
"Here is a page of life itself, in which real people pass through common experiences."—Daily Graphic.

OVER BEMERTON'S: an Easy-Going Chronicle. By E. V. LUCAS, Author of "Listener's Lure." [Fourth Edition in the Press.
"Beside Mr. Lucas's cradle must have sat, each in her own hour, many a fairy godmother. From first to last in 'Over Bemerton's' whisks and flashes and fascinates the same light, dexterous hand."
—Times.
"The fascination of the story is not to be gainsaid, and the book is full of quiet enjoyment and subtle charm."—Liverpool Post.

THE HEART SMITER. By MARY E. MANN, Author of "The Sheep and the Goats." [Second Edition in the Press.
"Clever, direct, and concise."—Morning Post.

MIRAGE. By E. TEMPLE THURSTON. [Fourth Edition.
"The story is told with such dainty art, and with such a tender, unaffected sensibility, that it seems to us capable of charming all tastes."—Daily Telegraph.
"Unique in its simplicity and charm."—Bystander.

HILL RISE. By W. B. MAXWELL, Author of "Vivien." [Third Edition.
"An exceptionally clever and interesting story: an excellent example of ingenious and wholesome fiction; skilfully told and of absorbing interest."—Scotsman.

ANTHONY CUTHBERT. By RICHARD BAGOT. [Third Edition in the Press.
"Full of knowledge of human nature, motives, and manners."
—Yorkshire Herald.
"A singularly original and powerful story."—Dundee Courier.

A DAUGHTER OF FRANCE. By CONSTANCE E. MAUD, Author of "An English Girl in Paris." With a Frontispiece. [Second Edition.
"A bright, kindly, discerning book, full of humour."—Times.
"The situation ensures the reader's engrossment."
—Pall Mall Gazette.

COUSIN CINDERELLA. By SARA JEANNETTE DUNCAN (Mrs. Cotes). [Second Edition in the Press.
"A very welcome, pleasant, and effective book."—Pall Mall Gazette.
"Charmingly frivolous—thoroughly enjoyable."—Morning Leader.

METHUEN & CO., 36, Essex Street, London, W.C.

"THE NATION," with which is incorporated "The Speaker," printed for the Proprietors by the NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY LIMITED, Whitefriars House, London, E.C., and Published by THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY LIMITED, at the Offices, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C. Registered at the General Post Office as a Newspaper.—SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 1908.

THE NATION, November 14, 1908.
LITERARY SUPPLEMENT.

The Nation

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 1908.

MR. EDWARD ARNOLD'S NEW BOOKS.

ARNOLD'S SELECT NEW NOVELS.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "VALERIE UPTON."

AMABEL CHANNICE. By ANNE DOUGLAS SEDGWICK. 6s.

Daily Telegraph.—"There is not a word too much nor one dull moment in this book, which perfectly dissects four people bound together in an unusually deft and human tale."

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE LONGEST JOURNEY."

A ROOM WITH A VIEW. By E. M. FORSTER. 6s.

Daily Mail.—"This is one of the cleverest and most entertaining novels we have read for some time. The characters are as clear and salient as a portrait by Sargent, and there are many of them. One is continually moved to appreciative smiles by clever little touches of description and enlightenment. The story, too, is interesting and real."

BY A PROMISING NEW WRITER.

MIRIAM. By EDITH C. M. DART.

Standard.—"A thoroughly readable story."

THE WITCH'S SWORD. By DAVID KERR FULTON. 6s. With Illustrations by the Author.

Times.—"It is a moving story, giving a stirring picture of troublous times."

CHRONICLES OF SERVICE LIFE IN MALTA, By MRS. ARTHUR STUART. 6s.

Times.—"Very lively reading."

"One of the best as well as the most daring memoirs of our time."—Daily Chronicle.

THE REMINISCENCES OF LADY RANDOLPH CHURCHILL.

By MRS. GEORGE CORNWALLIS-WEST. Demy 8vo. With Portraits 15s. net.

RECOLLECTIONS OF THE AUTHOR OF "TALKS WITH MR. GLADSTONE."

OLD AND ODD MEMORIES.

By the Hon. LIONEL TOLLEMACHE. Demy 8vo, with Portraits, 12s. 6d. net.

Daily Mail.—"Quite one of the best volumes of reminiscences of the year. This book is full of most interesting stories of famous people."

A CHARMING WORK, CONTAINING COLOURED ILLUSTRATIONS OF QUITE EXCEPTIONAL BEAUTY.

SCOTTISH GARDENS. By the Right Hon. Sir HERBERT MAXWELL, Bart. Illustrated by Mary G. W. WILSON, Member of the Society of Scottish Artists. With Full-page Coloured Plates. Crown 4to, 21s. net.

Daily Mail.—"Pictures and letterpress, this is one of the most charming garden books that has been published."

THE BOOK OF WINTER SPORTS. With Contributions from Experts in various branches of Sport. Edited by EDGAR SYERS. Fully Illustrated, demy 8vo, 15s. net.

Evening Standard.—"The volume is in very truth the book of winter sports, and from Lord Lytton's introduction to the last page we have nothing but praise for it."

MADAME ELIZABETH DE FRANCE, 1764-1794. By the Hon. Mrs. MAXWELL-SCOTT. With Finely-printed Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

Birmingham Post.—"Mrs. Maxwell Scott's book is admirably composed and finely illustrated."

A HISTORY OF THE "GEORGE" WORN ON THE Scaffold by King Charles I. By Sir RALPH PAYNE-GALLWEY, Bart. With interesting Illustrations. Royal 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

Evening Standard.—"An interesting excursion into the by-paths of historical mystery and romance."

MR. LAURENCE BINYON'S NEW BOOK.

PAINTING IN THE FAR EAST. An Introduction to the History of Pictorial Art in Asia, especially China and Japan. By LAURENCE BINYON. With 31 Plates from Original Japanese and Chinese Pictures. Crown 4to, 21s. net.

The Times.—"The more we consider the book the more are we struck with its excellence. Not only is it coherent in plan, not only is it the work of a poet and a man of letters, but it displays everywhere the intimate sympathy with Oriental thought, and the knowledge of Oriental history and religion, which are essential if Eastern art is to be introduced to Western minds."

THE MISTRESS ART. By REGINALD BLOMFIELD, A.R.A., Professor of Architecture to the Royal Academy, Author of "A History of Renaissance Architecture in England." Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

British Architect.—"We can hardly conceive of the earnest student who would not be better for their perusal."

LONDON SIDELIGHTS. By CLARENCE ROOK. With Frontispiece by S. B. DE LA BERE. 6s.

MR. GEORGE R. SIMS in the Daily Chronicle.—"It is good to stand in the rays with one who has searched the heart of London as diligently as Mr. Clarence Rook, and who tells the secrets of the heart so truly and so takingly."

KNOWN TO THE POLICE. Memories of a Police-Court Missionary. By THOMAS HOLMES. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

Referee.—"Full of human interest, and replete with pen-pictures of real scenes from real life among the submerged Tenth."

BISHOP TUCKER'S BOOK.

EIGHTEEN YEARS IN UGANDA AND EAST AFRICA. By the Right Rev. A. R. Tucker, D.D., Bishop of Uganda. With 60 Full-page Illustrations by the Author and a Map, 2 vols., demy 8vo, 30s. net.

Times.—"This complete and official episcopal narrative surpasses in interest and authority all the smaller volumes hitherto published."

IN SEARCH OF A POLAR COMTINENT, 1905- 1907. By ALFRED H. HARRISON, F.R.G.S. Illustrated from Photographs, with a Map, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

Standard.—"A fascinating account of a long and arduous expedition."

Black and White.—"The best book of travel published recently."

IN OLD CEYLON. By REGINALD FARRER, Author of "The Garden of Asia." Illustrated, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

Scotsman.—"Mr. Farrer's knowledge of and sympathy with the Faith of Buddha is an open sesame to the innermost recesses of early Ceylon and its powerful State Church, and no more instructive and impressive guide to their existing remains could be desired."

ON SAFARI. Big Game Hunting in British East Africa, with Studies in Bird Life. By ABEL CHAPMAN, Author of "Wild Norway." With 170 Illustrations by the Author and E. CALDWELL. 1 vol., demy 8vo, 16s. net.

World.—"A first-rate book of combined travel and sport."

WOODSMEN OF THE WEST. By M. ALLENDALE GRAINGER. Illustrated from Photographs, demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

Scotsman.—"The book will be read with a hearty interest by readers who like to get away from civilisation."

A PARSON IN THE AUSTRALIAN BUSH. By the Rev. C. H. S. MATTHEWS. Illustrated by the Author. Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

Sheffield Daily Telegraph.—"The whole book is admirably done, affording, with much that is instructive, a good deal of vivid entertainment."

PEEP-IN-THE-WORLD. A Story for Children. By MRS. F. E. CRICHTON. Illustrated by H. ROWNTREE. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

Northern Whig, Belfast.—"Seldom do we meet with a story in which children play the leading parts so genuinely entertaining as the one before us."

THE ROSE-WINGED HOURS. A Collection of English Lyrics. Arranged by ST. JOHN LUCAS, Editor of "The Oxford Book of French Verse," &c. Small 8vo, 5s. net.

Scotsman.—"A perusal of the volume, or even a random dipping into its honeyed pages, must bring pleasure to minds even the most commercial."

NEW BOOK BY THE AUTHOR OF "MY ROCK GARDEN."

ALPINES AND BOG-PLANTS. By REGINALD FARRER. With numerous Illustrations. Large Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

PLEASE ASK FOR PROSPECTUSES.

LONDON: EDWARD ARNOLD, 41 & 43, MADDOX STREET, BOND STREET, W.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S NEW BOOKS

VOLUME II. JUST PUBLISHED.

Origin and Development of the Moral Ideas. By EDWARD WESTERMARCK, Ph.D., Martin White Professor of Sociology in the University London. In 2 vols. 8vo. Vol. II. 14s. net. Previously published: Vol. I. 14s. net.

A Motor-Flight through France. By EDITH WHARTON. Illustrated. Extra Crown 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.

Collected Poems. By HORACE SMITH, Author of "Interludes" (First Second, Third, and Fourth Series). Globe 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

Buddhist Essays. By PAUL DAHLKE. Translated from the German by BHIKKHU SILACARA. 8vo, 10s. net.

Fairies—of Sorts. By MRS. MOLESWORTH. With Illustrations by GERTRUDE DEMAIN HAMMOND. Crown 8vo, gilt edges, 3s. 6d.

Fairy Tales from South Africa. Collected from Original Native Sources and Arranged by Mrs. E. J. BOURHILL and Mrs. J. B. DRAKE. Illustrated by W. HERBERT HOLLOWAY. Crown 8vo, gilt edges, 3s. 6d

Uncle Tom Andy Bill. A Story of Bears and Indian Treasure. By CHARLES MAJOR. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, 6s.

MINIATURE EDITIONS.

Through the Looking-Glass and What Alice Found There. By LEWIS CARROLL. With the Original Illustrations by TENNIEL. Cloth gilt, Pott 8vo, 1s. net.

The Rose and the Ring. By W. M. THACKERAY. With Reproductions of the Original Illustrations, cloth gilt, Pott 8vo, 1s. net.

NEW 6s. NOVELS.

The Diva's Ruby. By F. MARION CRAWFORD. A Sequel to "The Primadonna" and "Soprano."

OUIDA'S LAST NOVEL.

Helianthus. A Romance of Modern Europe.

EDITH WHARTON'S NEW NOVEL.

The Hermit and the Wild Woman And other Stories. By EDITH WHARTON.

Paths of the Righteous. By L. DOUGALL, Author of "Beggars All," &c.

Mamma. By RHODA BROUGHTON.

The Sunny Side of the Hill. By ROSA N. CAREY.

The Forbidden Boundary, And other Stories. By B. L. PUTNAM WEALE.

Joan of Garioch. By ALBERT KINROSS.

The Red City. A Novel of the Second Administration of Washington. By Dr. S. WEIR MITCHELL. [Tuesday.

French Prints of the Eighteenth Century. By RALPH NEVILL. With Fifty Full-page Plates. 8vo. 15s. net. [Tuesday.

The Engraved Work of J. M. W. Turner, R.A. By W. G. RAWLINSON, Author of "Turner's Liber Studiorum." With Photogravure Portrait. 3 vols. Vol. I., LINE ENGRAVINGS ON COPPER, 1794-1839. 8vo, 20s. net. Also an Edition on Hand-made Paper, Super-Royal 8vo, 30s. net.

Lollardy and the Reformation in England. An Historical Survey. By JAMES GAIRDNER, C.B., Hon. LL.D., Edin. 2 vols. 8vo, 21s. net.

Earthwork of England. Prehistoric, Roman, Saxon, Danish, Norman, and Mediæval. By A. HADRIAN ALLCROFT, M.A. Illustrated with upwards of 220 Plans, Sections, &c. 8vo, 18s. net. [Nov. 20.

Herculaneum, Past, Present, and Future. By CHARLES WALDSTEIN, Litt.D., Ph.D., L.H.D., and LEONARD SHOOBRIDGE, M.A. With Coloured Frontispiece, numerous Photogravure Plates, and other Illustrations and Maps. Imperial 8vo, 21s. net.

A History of English Prosody From the Twelfth Century to the Present Day. By Prof. GEORGE SAINTSBURY, M.A., Hon. LL.D. 3 vols. 8vo. Vol. II. From Shakespeare to Crabbe. 15s. net. Previously published: Vol. I. From the Origins to Spenser. 10s. net.

William Haig Brown, sometime Master of Charterhouse. A Short Biographical Memoir. By some of his Pupils. Edited by HAROLD E. HAIG BROWN. With Portrait. 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

De Libris. Prose and Verse. By AUSTIN DOBSON. With Illustrations by HUGH THOMSON and KATE GREENAWAY. Extra Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

The Little City of Hope. A Christmas Story. By F. MARION CRAWFORD. A New Edition. With Illustrations in Colour by A. S. HARTRICK. 8vo, 5s. net.

The Jungle Book. By RUDYARD KIPLING. With 16 Illustrations in Colour by MAURICE and EDWARD DETMOLD. 8vo, 5s. net.

FREDERIC HARRISON.

Realities and Ideals. Social, Political, Literary, and Artistic. By FREDERIC HARRISON. Extra Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

FREE TRADE IN BEING

By RUSSELL REA, M.P.

Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

Abraham Lincoln: The Boy and the Man. By JAMES MORGAN. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, 6s.

Macmillan's Illustrated Catalogue Post Free on application.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

The Nation

Reviews.

THE LATINS IN THE LEVANT.*

"The Latins in the Levant" is the history of Greece and the islands of the Aegean and Ionian seas during more than three centuries, from the break-up of the Eastern Empire by the Fourth Crusade (A.D. 1204) to the completion of the Turkish conquest. The Turkish conquest was legitimate, so far as any conquests can be called legitimate, but the Latin conquest which the Fourth Crusade achieved can, in its immediate aspect, hardly be described as anything but an act of colossal brigandage on the part of adventurers who had hypocritically taken the Crusading vow. From a wider point of view, however, it is well to recognise that the Latin capture of Constantinople, though accomplished in an unexpected and shameful way, was the realisation of an idea which had been in the minds of Western potentates long before. Throughout the twelfth century the Norman sovrans of Southern Italy had not only contemplated, but had more than once attempted to carry out, the project of seizing the Eastern Empire for themselves. The Popes, who feared nothing more gravely than any increase of the power and dominion of the Western Emperors, had a very real dread that Byzantium might become the prey of a Conrad or a Frederick Barbarossa. They were faced by a serious political problem arising out of the experiences and the results of the First Crusade, which had revealed as deep a hostility between Greek and Latin Christians as between Christians and unbelievers, and had exhibited the Greek Empire as an impediment to the expansive forces of the West which that Crusade had unbound. The Fourth Crusade solved the problem, and in a manner surpassingly welcome to the Pope, because it involved no political danger for the Roman See. Innocent III. wrote, soon after he had heard the news: "magnifica miracula; mirabile; pro tanti miraculi novitate!" These considerations are important for the sake of the principle of historical continuity; and the only criticism we have to make on Mr. Miller's book is that a few preliminary pages have not been devoted to placing the Latin conquest in its historical perspective.

Those who seek the picturesque in history will not find many more fascinating stories than that of the Latin States which were planted so abruptly on Greek soil. The complete story has never been accessible before in a readable form. Last year saw the appearance of Sir Rennell Rodd's admirable volumes on the Princes of Achaia, but though he allowed himself ample latitude for ranging into the histories of neighbouring States, he occupied only a portion of the ground which is covered in the present volume. Of course, the general outline will be found in Finlay's "History of Greece," but Finlay's narrative, besides failing to rise to the interest of the theme, is tedious on account of the repetitions due to his plan of treating each State separately. And he was only acquainted with a part of the available material. Hopf's immense "Geschichte Griechenlands" is the standard work, but it is hopelessly unreadable and labyrinthine; even to refer to it is a day's labor, as there is no Index. Perhaps only those who have had the perversity to toil through Hopf will fully appreciate the difficulties of Mr. Miller's task and the skill with which he has overcome them. His book, though he has not formally divided it, falls into three unequal sections. He first weaves together in one narrative the fortunes of Achaia, Athens, Negroponte, and the small States of Northern Greece. The second part is devoted to Corfu, and the third is the history of the Duchy of the Archipelago. Complete mastery of an exceptionally complicated network of events was demanded to compress such a full narrative into the compass of a single volume, which is not unwieldy or overcrowded and is readable from cover to cover. It would be hard to measure what the work has gained by the author's familiarity with Greece and its islands.

We could not expect him, within the limits which he has imposed on his space, to say much of architecture or of literature. He has found it possible to spare a few pages to the Greek philosopher of the Renaissance, Gemistos Plethon. His readers, we think, would have been grateful for some account of the "Chronicle of Morea," which he mentions so often but does not describe. Blended of history and legend, this verse-chronicle, though pedestrian ("jog-trot" in Mr. Miller's phrase), reflects better than any other document the spirit and flavor of the Achaia of the Villehardouins. It presents a concrete picture of the life of the Western knights on Hellenic soil, a picture that has nothing in common with the blend of classical and medieval civilisations which Goethe imagined in the second part of Faust. An interesting literary question was raised by the late Dr. John Schmitt who devoted his best years to the study of the Chronicle. Was it the Chronicle that suggested to Goethe the idea of placing the marriage of Faust and Helena near Sparta in a nameless castle which ought to be Mistra, the stronghold of the Villehardouins? It is certainly remarkable that the Chronicle was first published in 1825, and that in that very year the poet began to reshape his "Helena" (afterwards to be the Third Act of Part 2), which he had dropped for many years. In a prose sketch of 1816 he had destined for the home of Helena a castle on the Rhine. There seems to be no positive evidence that Goethe had seen the Chronicle, but much would be explained if he had.

